Wait, is this just GATE? (355/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Gentle reminder that the world of Petravus has a different atmospheric composition than ours (albeit only barely) and also slightly more gravity.

That's my excuse for the iffy fall time in this chapter and IDK how nerdy yall get. I'm stickin to it.

Enjoy.

\~

James was sitting out on one of the observation decks enjoying some pastries when he heard it.

Gorna was sitting a few spaces over, resting on a chair made specifically for centaurs and other quadrupedal people. Her ears perking up and angling upwards were what alerted him that something was coming.

The prince's soldiers, most of them on the deck being griffin riders themselves, began to move about almost as one as a low vibrating hum came from above.

"Rider dropping!" One of the sergeants yelled as the sat in a chair that was almost lying down, looking up through a pair of massive spyglasses that were affixed over it. "North East and three off! Wrestling a black and red!"

"Confirmed!" Another soldier somewhere else yelled, and James saw them in a similar setup on the other side of the deck.

"What's that noise?" James asked even as he pulled out his scouting glasses and powered them on.

"Screamer whistles." One of the nearby soldiers, a relatively young human with the shortcut hair of a fresh recruit. "They attach them to themselves so we know when they're falling."

"Is it the princess?" Gorna asked. But the soldiers at the spyglass chairs ignored her.

"Status!" The watch captain, a large orc, demanded as he stepped up onto the deck.

"Looks like Krom!" One of the observers said. "Blonde hair! Not large enough to be the prince!"

"Whoever they are they're in a spin!" The other informed them. "Either they have one of the wings bound or there's a problem!"

The Captain walked over to one of the rails at the side of the deck.

"CATCH TEAMS! PREP FOR INTERCEPTION! WE'VE GOT A RIDER BREAKING!" He yelled. There was a chorus of yells and cries of confirmation as the first of a wing of riders took to the air and moved up. "NORTH EAST AND THREE OFF!" He added. The first of the riders waved understanding and began to climb.

"Where's Amina?" James asked under his breath as he used the controls on the side of his glasses to zoom in and try to spot her. "Come onnnnnn."

\---

Amina grunted as she slammed into a wing, causing the griffin it belonged to to screech in surprise as she did. The impact put her into a spin and she released a burst of air from her hand to correct her path. But the surprised griffin's cries had startled the other griffins into new paths too.

She looked for her mark as she regained her sense of direction. It had re-angled and she burst more air out to match.

But the griffins were aware of an intruder now. Or rather a second intruder, since Krom had already made his leap. And they began to roll to get a visual on the newcomer.

Talons began to flex and beaks began to snap as she plummeted past them.

Then the blue, green, and brown griffin that she desired rolled in a spin and looked right at her.

The two of them locked eyes for what, in her magic enhanced vision, felt like minutes.

Like all the other griffins it looked angry. Then it seemed to realize where she was heading and she saw surprise as its eyes widened.

That's right. She thought. You're already mine.

The griffin beat its wings and writhed in mid-air, doing everything it could to get out of her path. But Amina saw it all occur in slow motion, and before it could even get the first beat completed two massive blasts of wind emanated from her hands and propelled her forward.

The griffin screeched as she slammed into its ribs like a cannon shot. Her hands flew to her belt in a blur and quickly scrambled to grab the first set of restraints out and around its neck.

BANG!

Amina jerked back in shock as the creature's massive beak snapped shut just to the side of her head with a noise that sounded eerily like James's pistol being fired. She climbed like a spider over the bests side, dodging thrashing talons as she held onto handfuls of fur and feathers with a death grip.

The two of them rolled like that for what felt like an eternity. For so long that the swarm faded back behind them.

When it snapped at her again she used the motion to trick it into biting the small net webbing she'd been given, and scrambled to strap it behind the things neck. The buckle, while decently large, was too finicky to deal with right now. So she settled for holding the two opposing ends in her hand, wrapped around the shoulder that had grown used to the pulling of her animated shield. Her legs gripped the griffin's ribs harder than she'd ever clamped onto a horse or a tamed griffin before.

And the two of them continued to plummet as they each struggled for control of each other.

\----------

"Second rider!" The second of the two observers called. "Same direction! Two in!"

"Confirmed! And third rider following!" The first observer said. "First one is wrestling! Third is lone! I think it's the prince!"

"Is it Amina?" James asked, and was once again ignored. He was reminded of times when random LT's had tried to interfere in the engine bay back on Earth and been ignored by the NCO's and Chiefs that had been waist deep in engine parts and power tools. He was an interloper in this event. An observer who could only slow these soldiers down in their job.

But the captain took pity on him. "It has to be." He said sternly with an annoyed look as James looked at him. "The third one is the prince, who can fly. The rest of the climbers have already either been retrieved or signaled that they were climbing back down at their own pace. That only leaves her."

"Is she okay?" James asked as he scanned the sky with his glasses. It took a minute, but he did find her.

"That is between her and the griffin." The captain said as he went to the opposing side of the deck from before. "SECOND TEAM! GO!"

\----------

Amina felt a flash of pain, and had to hold onto the improvised reins as one of the griffins rear legs raked at her leg. She looked down for a moment and saw three long, but remarkably clean, lines of torn leather with blood seeping down the side.

She let go with her legs, letting herself free-fall for a few seconds as she held on with only the straps in her hands tying the two of them together.

The griffin thrashed and spun, making her dizzy as it did, doing everything it could to get rid of her as it also clawed at the ropes and straps around its face.

Amina waited for it to initiate another diving spin before pulling her self back in quickly. This time she impacted closer to her goal, landing just off center of the griffin's back and causing it to squawk in surprise and frustration. As she did she threw one of the weighted ropes at the wing that was further away from her, spinning it as she did. She cursed herself as it sailed just past the wing and off into the open air. Even as she did, the wing closest to her beat at her rapidly. If Kraug the Orc had decided to repeatedly slam his massive arms into her, it would have been more pleasant. Her injured leg screamed in pain as she forced it to snake around the offending wing and attempt to pin it.

^("AMINAAAA!!!") Someone shouted from above them. ^("YOU HAVE TO BIND THEM!")

She didn't hear it. Not through the rushing wind, screeching beast, and screaming whistles. Or above the blood pounding through her ears.

She grabbed another of the weighted lines. She had three left, and needed a minimum of two to succeed. All the while the wing thrashed against the arm and leg that were attempting to pin it in place. Though the arm in question was also still holding the straps that restrained the griffin's head.

And the ground was rising towards them.

\----------

"Sergeant Krom is clear sir!" One of the observers reported, though James stopped listening as soon as he heard the name.

"Come on." He said as he watched his wife and the griffin she was wrestling with continue to plummet. The range finder on his readout couldn't even get a reading on how far she was. And it was supposedly rated for up to three kilometers. And his view of her was so heavily pixelated from zooming in that he couldn't ACTUALLY see her clearly.

What he could see was that she and the griffin were tumbling end over end. He could also see the black winged form of the prince plummeting after them and circling them as he matched their speed. He wondered why the prince wasn't helping her.

If he hadn't been so focused on her he would have noticed the way Gorna and Glag began to look at him curiously. The bottoms of his feet were beginning to glow and flutter as magical energy instinctively began concentrating on them.

"Come on Aminaaaaaa."

\----------

Amina had been mid throw when the Griffin headbutted her. She'd opted to keep one end of the line in her hand this time, and that was the only thing that let her keep attached to the monstrous hybrid.

She had a split second's warning as she felt the makeshift reins go slack in her hand. But by then she'd already been releasing the weighted line to wrap around the unrestrained wing.

The griffin's head slammed into her in an impact so ferocious it reminded her of how Glag had sent her flying in the arena. Something popped somewhere and she would have screamed in pain if she hadn't also felt her consciousness fade out for a moment. Her left hand let go of the straps it had been holding onto. It's fingers limp and prickling with numbness

But her left hand kept a hold of its end of the rope, which had successfully wrapped around the base of the opposing wing.

The griffin rolled in a spin, effectively reeling her back into it without realizing. It screeched in fury at the sight of her coming towards it again, and lashed out with one of the claws that wasn't entangled in the netting that it had just removed from its face. The slash attempted to catch her in the side of the ribs. But her numb, and likely dislocated, arm intercepted it without her even consciously telling it to.

The pain brought her back to full consciousness.

Amina's eyes blazed with golden light as she turned to face the source of her pain. Her throat shone bright with the purplish pink light of her family's voice of command power.

She yelled a cry of fury at the griffin, which cringed back in surprise and pain at the sudden verbal onslaught. Amina took advantage of the sudden opportunity and wrapped her wounded legs around one wing in a sort of modified arm hold. Her good arm pinned the other between itself and her waist, and in a battle-rage she hadn't felt since the battle in the dessert, she fought the beast.

Even Alixan, who had made to move in and retrieve her at the sight of the impact, fell back as she screamed and struggled at the monster for control.

There were no ropes or straps or harnesses. No weapons save their own bodies.

In those last few thousand feet there was only a wounded and half mad warrior, and a suddenly very frightened griffin.

And they each fought for their lives.

\---------------------------------------

Of all the people present on the observation deck, James flinched the least at the sudden sound from above. He had, after all, heard Amina use this power before. He wouldn't be surprised if the local soldiers had heard the prince use that power. But this wasn't the prince. It was Amina.

And James knew how she sounded when she got pissed.

"YOU WILL OBEY ME YOU BASTARD!" Came echoing down from above.

"Bleedin' hells!" One of the soldiers said. "Those two are goin' at it."

And as James watched, reeling back the zoom in his glasses at an increasing rate and glad to gain more clarity, he saw that they were right.

Murmurs rose among the soldiers present as they watched the three bodies continue to plummet.

James's face paled as he saw the flashes of red on Amina's clothes. The familiar red of blood. And knew that that was what had driven her to rage like she was doing now.

"BLEED ME NO MORE!" He heard her bellow as he saw her head flash forward and strike the side of the griffin's face in a headbutt.

"Too low!" Someone exclaimed nearby.

James killed the feed on his left lens and was surprised to see that she couldn't be more than four or five hundred feet above them now.

He saw the already dispatched wing of riders moving to intercept.

He ripped the glasses from his head and tossed them at Gorna, who jumped back in confusion at the unexpected projectile hitting her, and began to run toward the edge of the deck so he could jump off.

Then he faltered and tripped as he saw something amazing.

"YOU ARE MINE!!!!!!" Amina yelled as a set of massive, shimmering, blue and green wings opened up wide above them.

The soldiers all around began to go wide eyed and oohed and aah-ed as a massive, fan-like, tail spread wide behind the griffin. It was supported every few feet by long furred portions that made it look like it was actually many tails in one. Between them were long trailing feathers matching the wings. It looked like it had eyes spread all across it.

James looked up from where he'd fallen to his knees, and was amazed at the sight of the creature.

"It's a damn peacock." He said to himself, though he couldn't recognize the feline parts of the griffin just yet.

They sailed over the grounds, only maybe two hundred feet up now. Way too close for James's liking.

"The princess is clear sir!" One of the observers yelled.

"No shite Malliers!" The guard captain shot back angrily. "We can all see that!" This drew some mild laughter from some of the soldiers.

The laughter quickly stopped as they all watched Amina slump over and fall off the griffin.

James left scorched splinters where his feet exploded, propelling him into the air.

Wait, is this just GATE? (199.5/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Back that garbage truck on up and tip the bucket. Cause we're at the dump.

THE LORE DUMP!

Again, this is mainly so that I can devote a bit more brainstorming/writing to chapter 200, and so that it can drop on either friday or saturday.

Ready for some..... forbidden knowledge? Relax it's only forbidden because it falls outside the scope of what any of the established characters know/bring to the story. Or it's just something they haven't had reason to reveal in their own narratives.

These aren't actual IN WORLD historical documents or anything, I'm not gonna pretend they are. They're literally just me giving you guys details so you can have some context on different things.

Anyway HEREWEGO!

Enjoy.

\~

Subject #1: Earth.

The Earth of the setting is vastly different than the one we know of IRL. Namely the story takes place roughly 25\~ years in the future, and society exists in the aftermath of a globally inclusive war that was primarily for control of sources of water. This escalating set of conflicts, ultimately culminating in a series of tactical nuclear detonations and numerous destroyed cities, came to be known as the Water Wars.

The Water Wars not only involved almost every country on the planet, but also drastically rearranged the borders on the maps. Numerous weaker countries were either conquered or else absorbed into their larger, stronger neighbors. On top of that, more than a few small coastline or island countries were destroyed outright.

America, home of James and more than a few other focal characters, has likewise been changed by the wars.

Most of the west coast has been destroyed by attacks from a combination of Chinese and Russian attacks, as well as raids from Polynesian Insurgents who had already had a troubled past with the U.S. Military.

Los Angeles, once the largest port in the country, was a prime target for enemy attack and was destroyed outright. All that remains is a massive, glassy, crater of irradiated land and burned superstructure. The resulting inflow of ocean water has resulted in it being called the L.A. Bay.

San Diego, a crucial military strong hold in the Water Wars, Suffered a startlingly similar fate. However the Military was able to fortify its positions there AND intercept incoming attacks effectively enough to prevent complete devastation. The once vibrant city became a deadly battlefield, with land, air, and sea battles that would last several years before culminating in a successful defense. However, only a very small civilian population is left in what is now one of the strongest Military Posts on the West Coast.

Seattle followed San Diego's lead and fortified itself almost beyond recognition, attempting to hold off attacks from the same militaries. But a well placed nuclear strike from a Chinese submarine resulted in a lack of viable options for transporting land goods to support the besieged city, resulting in one of the costliest sieges in the war. To the surprise of their attackers, Seattle prevailed, and ever since its citizens carried great pride in the resolve they showed.

San Francisco remained remarkably untouched throughout the war. Many people think that this may be a result of the large population of Chinese Immigrants that were known to live in the city before hostilities became open, however that has never been confirmed. Whatever the case most Americans, especially Water War veterans, look at San Fransisco with intense suspicion to this day. More than a few bar fights have broken out over the subject.

Moving away from the west coast. The center of America was called upon as it hadn't been since World War Two. Farms were devoted to producing mass quantities of food and materials both to support the war effort, and to feed and clothe the civilian population that was rapidly fleeing inland from the coasts to escape the violence and devastation. Factories popped up seemingly overnight to produce everything from weapons and armor for the troops, to cots and instant shelters for refugees.

Many cities in the central states were overwhelmed by the influx of refugees and became massive shanty towns that have yet to recover. But several, like Denver, Topeka, and Minneapolis managed to adapt to the change. Most impressive was Detroit. Once the butt of jokes for its crime rate, deserted buildings, failed economy, and poor living quality, the Motor City saw the biggest resurgence. Once empty buildings were filled with new residents. Plants and factories were brought to life to produce what they'd once produced en masse, vehicles. Vehicles from the newly repopulated Detroit became the backbone of the military's mobile forces. Even in the aftermath of the war, Detroit has clung to its renewed title as the Motor City.

The east coast, while not as badly affected as the west, was still devastated by the war. While opposing forces, such as the somewhat allied Russian and Chinese navies were capable of engaging in strikes on the coast, most of their western (our eastern) focus was on holding off the combined forces of the European and African Alliance forces. However America still came under attack from the two Communist states, as well as attacks from, of all places, South America. This multi direction conflict was largely rebuffed by the incredibly condensed forces of the various military bases on the east coast, though it did ultimately result in nuclear strikes against New York, Florida, and most devastatingly Washington D.C.

The Water Wars lasted the better part of two decades for the U.S., starting in the late 2020's and for some countries lasting well into the 2040's, only seeing a decline in combat once numerous nuclear strikes across the globe took several former super powers to the brink of actually utilizing M.A.D. and wiping the planet clean of livable land.

This escalation, and increasing civilian deaths and their resulting riots ultimately brought the war to its end. Each nation being forced to choose between either continuing to fight, and risking their governmental dissolution as a result Or ceasing the violence, and turning inward to repair their damage, and utilize newfound technologies to attempt a recovery. Not all of them were capable of doing so, and several countries saw massive reforms into new governmental organizations, the most drastic of which was the massive number of southeast Asian countries that ended up conglomerating as they pushed back against both American AND Chinese control as well as solidified their hold on the ocean around their borders.

Current America, where a lot of our characters are from and work for, is a vastly different country than we currently know. Some parts look like 40k hive cities, while other parts look like they've been ripped straight from a fallout game. For many, like James and a lot of the desert team, joining the military was the best way to ensure themselves a future that didn't require fighting for every scrap of food and drop of water they could get.

\[Writer's note: That should give you guys a good idea of the world James and the Earth gang came from. It's incomplete, as I'm not a Poli-Sci major or anything. Plus, you really only need to know how this stuff fits into James's back story. Since he's kinda the main character if you haven't noticed. And it is kind of the KEY difference between OUR world and theirs. Anyways, moving on.\]

\---

Subject #2: The world of Petravus.

For the record, the world of Petravus doesn't actually have a name. The people there understand the concept of celestial bodies AKA planets and moons and things. And they have named those things, just like we have (RIP Pluto, you're still a planet to me buddy). But they haven't named their planet, typically simply referring to is as "The World". IDK what yall expected here. We call our planet "Dirt".

\-Sub-subject: Were-folk.

There's tons of were-folk the world over. Probably a few million during the point of time the story is set in.

Wolves ARE the most populous of them. As mentioned in recent chapters, primarily because their instincts are a bit harder for them to control during their youthful years, resulting in more incidental bites. AGAIN, unsancioned bites/infections are SUPER TABOO amongst were-folk

A were-folks truest weakness is SILVER. Though they can also be killed via; beheading, incineration, crushing, and basically anything that's going to cause massive damage on a level that will overwhelm their regenerative ability. Yall saw Kela get literally disemboweled and she lived, so you know.... it takes a lot... to get past that.

Also there's a spell, that's super old, and wont come into play in the story. Certain rare, high power, casters know it. The Lunar Council knows it for REASONS. But it is possible to cut a were-person off from the moon's power. Resulting in them being reverted to their non beast form and being INCREDIBLY weakened for the rest of their lives. (Think, fire-lord once he lost his bending. ATLA rules!)

That being said, HERE'S A LIST OF ALL THE BEAST TYPES THAT HAVE A WERE-FOLK FORM (or at least our world's equivalent) arranged from most common to rarest.

1. Wolves
2. Lions
3. Tigers
4. Boars
5. Foxes
6. Jaguars/Panthers
7. Giraffes (They're a touch different though. Probably not gonna elaborate.)
8. Gorillas (Typically red or gold furred.)

9. Squirrels (including rare "flying" variants)
10. Bears
11. Deer
12. Golden Eagles
13. Lynxes
14. Tapirs (Actually thought to be extinct, though that's not confirmed.)
15. Pangolin (Currently only 1 exists.)

\-Sub-Subject #2: MAGIC (I know yall want more details on that)

The simplest way to explain Magic in this setting is to say that it is THE PUREST version of mind over matter.

It taps into the ambient magical energy that infuses every aspect of the world, from the world itself, the more mundane energies that we Earth type folk would know, thermal, hydro, wind, electricity, all that stuff. But also on more esoteric energies such as death, the moon, the soul of the person casting >!(or being sacrificed, but that's a surprise tool that we'll need later)!< And as such a person who gets good at drawing in this energy Cough Cough JAMES Cough Cough can become very powerful very quickly.

Once energy has been drawn in a skilled mage/caster can basically do (to a limited extent) anything they can imagine. However they DO have to imagine it in relation to their own body and location. Also, the more complex and powerful the spell the more energy is required to pull it off.

THE BIG LIMITATION ON MAGIC.... is the fact that certain powers clash with numerous factors in the world around the person casting them. These factors can include things like; rules put in place by gods/other more powerful entities, other magical effects in the area, chemical substances in the area, whether or not other casters are drawing from the same energy source, and of course basic physics (Sorry, but James is never gonna explode his way to light speed. Yeah, I know, it'd be dope as hell.)

Now, the workaround for these limitations is rituals and material aides. Believe it or not, Everyone's favorite little red headed mage is actually afraid of heights. This puts a huge damper on her ability to use her flight magic because it gets all up in her visualization process. That's why she has the magical tattoos on her legs. They act like energy stabilizers for those times when she gets inside her own head and freaks out, and basically keep her from falling to her death. They also allow her to fly faster on less energy, cause (quoting Vickers here) she's wicked smaht.

But that's a very mundane, minimal, example of material aides for magic. What about rituals?

Well, rituals are basically a caster's way of asking the gods/forces of nature to let them break rules for a spell. The most obvious examples of this idea are Kela's transformation into a champion, which drew the Moon Goddess's attention directly AND... James getting Steve bonded to his soul. Soul alteration magic like that is super difficult and watched over by an CURRENTLY unnamed extra-dimensional deity. But the tattoo and the bonding process of actually taming a dragon-kin is used as a sort of combo of physical material, physical pain, and a show of courage from the attempted rider. Plus it does have the caveat of shared pain and the drake dying if its rider does.

\-Sub-Subject #Tres: The Deep Dark

Now I don't wanna SPOIL too much. But very soon we are going to get a much more in depth look at this mysterious realm.

It is pretty much just the Great Value Brand ^(TM) version of the Underdark from D&D. I'm not even gonna deny it.

However where the Underdark is primarily run by dark elves and their spider/drider simpy boiz. The deep dark is actually mostly run by the monsters inhabiting it. What few bastions of "Civilization" exist in the deep are primarily just defensive strong holds chosen for their ability to either hide from the monsters, or give a massive defensive advantage to whoever is in control of it.

The most common denizens of the deep dark are Deep Orcs, Dwelfs (Google it), goblins, Yarbogs (Basically spiny hobgoblins), and of course Dark Elves.

I will say that Dark Elves are actually homies. They're like, the one faction in the Deep Dark that aren't INHERENTLY evil. Don't get me wrong, they're elves, they're gonna be judgmental, but... they're alright. They've also got some other stuff going on that we'll get to later.

Then of course there's the fact that THE AGENCY likes to set its most secretive of locations in the deep dark. That said, as Vickers and the Petravian investigators/mages found out. THEY BUNKER UP HAAAAARD. If Vickers hadn't been walking behind an undead MS PAINT erase tool he wouldn't have gotten to where he was going. Not many things can.

Also, some of y'all were right about the Agency's little meeting room/treasury. It was full of poisonous gas that was heavier than normal air, and the whole place was designed to keep that stuff trapped there. Funny thing is. It wouldn't have killed Vickers. Least not for a few more months. Yall know enough to know why. Just gotta think about it.

\---

That's all I got for you guys in this INFODUMP chapter. We'll be resuming tomorrow and MAYBE Saturday. Chapter 200 (yay me) is gonna be FIGHT NIGHT!

And if yall think James was OP before, just remember that in most of the fights he's been in up until now, he's been either too weak (magically) or too inexperienced to actually use his full skill set.

That aint gonna be the case in this next chapter. Shit's gonna go off the rails.

Queue up whatever anime sakuga scene music you want. Or heavy metal. Or hardcore, OG West Coast (none of that weak ass east coast garbage) gangster rap you like to listen to during fight sequences and boss fights.

Because that same thing I said about James's fighting style..... is gonna be applied to my fight scene writing style.

Looking forward to writing it guys. Still have no idea when we're gonna replace the question mark in the title numbers.

[\[Back to the story\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/wh74de/wait_is_this_just_gate_200/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (1/?)

Writers note: everyone else is doing ISEKAI stories, why not me too? And who knows, maybe this time i'll actually keep a story going for a change.

\---

James was not having a good time. In fact, he was pretty sure that he was either tripping on drugs, or that something terrible had happened and he had some kind of brain damage. And he didn't remember doing any drugs recently, so that pointed towards the latter.

He was half right in this regard, something terrible had happened.

Here's what he knew:

Just moments ago, himself, SGT Adeke "Odie" Odikowe, and CPL Paul "Batty" Batista had been chilling in their STRYKER3 on guard duty outside their FOB at NTC.

Some kind of green light had begun glowing all over them and the Stryker. It had lasted maybe ten seconds. He'd thought maybe some of the guys had been fucking with them. Maybe even the OPFOR guys.

He was still inside of the STRYKER3, but only part of it. So was Sarge. And so was Batty's right leg. Sarge was screaming, he was pretty sure he was too.

They were screaming because they were currently living through one of the most traumatizing scenes from one of his favorite childhood movies.

It was the Tunnel Scene from the original Willy Wonka movie.

Only there was no Gene Wilder giving a crazy monologue. There was no river of chocolate. No Golden Tickets.

There was just him and Sarge screaming and shitting themselves while a kaleidoscope of lights and images flew past their windshield. He couldn't take his eyes off of the windshield long enough to look out the side windows. But he didn't want to anyways.

He knew about sensory overload. His little brother was on the spectrum, so he'd seen first hand what a person looked like when there was too much going on for them. It had taken years to figure out what would and wouldn't overload Joey. Now he was getting a first hand crash course in what that must've been like.

There was a noise, he couldn't comprehend what it was. Like a train running by outside while it's horn is blowing, only it was coming from every direction, and it kept changing tone. Something in his mind said that he was being spoken to. But there were no words, at least not that he could understand.

There were lights shifting through every color he could imagine, and several that he felt certain were actually outside the visible spectrum, but he was looking at them, and it made his eyes ache. They were flashing in patterns that would have made the raves he used to go to while still in high school look tame. If he'd been epileptic he would've been having a seizure, and who knows, maybe he was.

And the images. God the images. He saw things that he thought would have fit in history documentaries, news specials, national geographic specials, and more. But the subject of some of the images were so fantastical, and bizarre that they could've only come from the fever dreams of some sci-fi visionary. Geiger, Tolkien, Cronenberg, Aasimov, whoever made the care bears. Things that looked real but couldn't be.

All of these were going on at once. His brain felt like it was straining to escape his skull. He felt something wet under his nose. But he was so preoccupied that that information became a footnote in his mind.

And then, with no warning whatsoever, it all changed. Suddenly he was looking at a stone wall with a small window in it.

And then they were falling.

It wasn't far, maybe ten feet. But the STRYKER had originally been on the ground, so they weren't exactly braced for an impact. The fact that most of the STRYKER was now missing only made it worse, as he was now unexpectedly looking at the ceiling.

Wait, a ceiling? He thought. Before the hatch next to him was hit by something. Suddenly a small, sharp, metallic object was wedged between the frame of the STRYKER and the hatch. Oh shit, they're trying to get in.

"SARGE! THEY'RE TRYING TO GET IN!" He yelled. But when he looked the Sargeant wasn't moving. Shit, he must've passed out.

James looked back to see what had happened to batty, only to be greeted by the sight of a small pool of blood, and a severed right leg.

"WHAT THE FUCK IS GOING ON?!?!"

Another hit happened on the hatch, and he looked back in time to see another intruder prying under the edge of the hatch. Wait? why does that look like the tip of a sword?

He drew the pistol from the chest holster MOLLE'd to the front of his vest. Then he saw the shadow that was in front of, we're sideways so I guess technically it's on top of us now, the front windshield.

Whatever it was, it was huge. It was wearing armor. It had a spear aimed right at him. And he had no idea how well a windshield made to stop .50 cal rounds would be against a spear. That info hadn't been in any of the power-points during AIT.

Luckily it seemed that the .50 cal rating meant that it was spear-proof too. The spear skidded off the windshield, leaving a long scratch and throwing the armored figure off balance. Meanwhile the hatch was starting to show some light around the edge. He undid his seat belt, and began sliding down towards Odie, pistol remaining trained on the hatch.

"SARGE WAKE THE FUCK UP! THEY'RE GETTING IN!!!" But Odie gave no sign of hearing him. He bit his left glove and pulled it off, then reached down to check for a pulse.

Then the windshield exploded.

Wait, what the fuck? He turned just in time to dodge the spear as it stabbed past his left ear. He raised his pistol and fired three shots straight into the armored figure. It fell back, blood spraying from the holes in it's chest plate. He felt Odie grasping at his arm.

"SARGE WE GOTTA-" But when he looked back, he saw what the spear had been aimed at. It was embedded in Odie's neck. Blood was pouring from around it, and out of the sargeant's mouth. The pain must have woken him up. His eyes were frantic, and he was trying to talk. But the spear and the blood muted him. So he just struggled to grab a hold of James' sleeve.

James was frozen. He didn't know what to do. He didn't know what he could do.

He reached down, dropping the pistol, and began trying to hold the sergeant's neck closed with his hands. But there was just too much blood. It seemed like it was everywhere. Odie's hands were getting more frantic in their attempts to grab him. But they were also getting weaker. His eyes were starting to lose focus, slowly rolling to back to look towards the vehicle's ceiling. Tears were rolling down James' cheeks.

"COME ON SARGE! DON'T DO THIS!"

And then James felt himself get pulled by the back of his vest. Pulled through the now opened hatch and out of the STRYKER. Pulled away from the dying Sargeant.

Then he felt an impact on the side of his head, and he was out.

Next

Wait, is this just GATE? (355/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Gentle reminder that the world of Petravus has a different atmospheric composition than ours (albeit only barely) and also slightly more gravity.

That's my excuse for the iffy fall time in this chapter and IDK how nerdy yall get. I'm stickin to it.

Enjoy.

\~

James was sitting out on one of the observation decks enjoying some pastries when he heard it.

Gorna was sitting a few spaces over, resting on a chair made specifically for centaurs and other quadrupedal people. Her ears perking up and angling upwards were what alerted him that something was coming.

The prince's soldiers, most of them on the deck being griffin riders themselves, began to move about almost as one as a low vibrating hum came from above.

"Rider dropping!" One of the sergeants yelled as the sat in a chair that was almost lying down, looking up through a pair of massive spyglasses that were affixed over it. "North East and three off! Wrestling a black and red!"

"Confirmed!" Another soldier somewhere else yelled, and James saw them in a similar setup on the other side of the deck.

"What's that noise?" James asked even as he pulled out his scouting glasses and powered them on.

"Screamer whistles." One of the nearby soldiers, a relatively young human with the shortcut hair of a fresh recruit. "They attach them to themselves so we know when they're falling."

"Is it the princess?" Gorna asked. But the soldiers at the spyglass chairs ignored her.

"Status!" The watch captain, a large orc, demanded as he stepped up onto the deck.

"Looks like Krom!" One of the observers said. "Blonde hair! Not large enough to be the prince!"

"Whoever they are they're in a spin!" The other informed them. "Either they have one of the wings bound or there's a problem!"

The Captain walked over to one of the rails at the side of the deck.

"CATCH TEAMS! PREP FOR INTERCEPTION! WE'VE GOT A RIDER BREAKING!" He yelled. There was a chorus of yells and cries of confirmation as the first of a wing of riders took to the air and moved up. "NORTH EAST AND THREE OFF!" He added. The first of the riders waved understanding and began to climb.

"Where's Amina?" James asked under his breath as he used the controls on the side of his glasses to zoom in and try to spot her. "Come onnnnnn."

\---------------------------

Amina grunted as she slammed into a wing, causing the griffin it belonged to to screech in surprise as she did. The impact put her into a spin and she released a burst of air from her hand to correct her path. But the surprised griffin's cries had startled the other griffins into new paths too.

She looked for her mark as she regained her sense of direction. It had re-angled and she burst more air out to match.

But the griffins were aware of an intruder now. Or rather a second intruder, since Krom had already made his leap. And they began to roll to get a visual on the newcomer.

Talons began to flex and beaks began to snap as she plummeted past them.

Then the blue, green, and brown griffin that she desired rolled in a spin and looked right at her.

The two of them locked eyes for what, in her magic enhanced vision, felt like minutes.

Like all the other griffins it looked angry. Then it seemed to realize where she was heading and she saw surprise as its eyes widened.

That's right. She thought. You're already mine.

The griffin beat its wings and writhed in mid-air, doing everything it could to get out of her path. But Amina saw it all occur in slow motion, and before it could even get the first beat completed to massive blasts of wind emanated from her hands and propelled her forward.

The griffin screeched as she slammed into its ribs like a cannon shot. Her hands flew to her belt in a blur and quickly scrambled to grab the first set of restraints out and around its neck.

BANG!

Amina jerked back in shock as the creature's massive beak snapped shut just to the side of her head with a noise that sounded eerily like James's pistol being fired. She climbed like a spider over the bests side, dodging thrashing talons as she held onto handfuls of fur and feathers with a death grip.

The two of them rolled like that for what felt like an eternity. For so long that the swarm faded back behind them.

When it snapped at her again she used the motion to trick it into biting the small net webbing she'd been given, and scrambled to strap it behind the things neck. The buckle, while decently large, was too finicky to deal with right now. So she settled for holding the two opposing ends in her hand, wrapped around the shoulder that had grown used to the pulling of her animated shield. Her legs gripped the griffin's ribs harder than she'd ever clamped onto a horse or a tamed griffin before.

And the two of them continued to plummet as they each struggled for control of each other.

\----------

"Second rider!" The second of the two observers called. "Same direction! Two in!"

"Confirmed! And third rider following!" The first observer said. "First one is wrestling! Third is lone! I think it's the prince!"

"Is it Amina?" James asked, and was once again ignored. He was reminded of times when random LT's had tried to interfere in the engine bay back on Earth and been ignored by the NCO's and Chiefs that had been waist deep in engine parts and power tools. He was an interloper in this event. An observer who could only slow these soldiers down in their job.

But the captain took pity on him. "It has to be." He said sternly with an annoyed look as James looked at him. "The third one is the prince, who can fly. The rest of the climbers have already either been retrieved or signaled that they were climbing back down at their own pace. That only leaves her."

"Is she okay?" James asked as he scanned the sky with his glasses. It took a minute, but he did find her.

"That is between her and the griffin." The captain said as he went to the opposing side of the deck from before. "SECOND TEAM! GO!"

\----------

Amina felt a flash of pain, and had to hold onto the improvised reins as one of the griffins rear legs racked at her leg. She looked down for a moment and saw three long, but remarkably clean, lines of torn leather with blood seeping down the side.

She let go with her legs, letting herself free-fall for a few seconds as she held on with only the straps in her hands tying the two of them together.

The griffin thrashed and spun, making her dizzy as it did, doing everything it could to get rid of her as it also clawed at the ropes and straps around its face.

Amina waited for it to initiate another diving spin before pulling her self back in quickly. This time she impacted closer to her goal, landing just off center of the griffin's back and causing it to squawk in surprise and frustration. As she did she threw one of the weighted ropes at the wing that was further away from her, spinning it as she did. She cursed herself as it sailed just past the wing and off into the open air. Even as she did, the wing closest to her beat at her rapidly. If Kraug the Orc had decided to repeatedly slam his massive arms into her, it would have been more pleasant. Her injured leg screamed in pain as she forced it to snake around the offending wing and attempt to pin it.

"AMINAAAA!!!" Someone shouted from above them. "YOU HAVE TO BIND THEM!"

She didn't hear it. Not through the rushing wind, screeching beast, and screaming whistles. Or above the blood pounding through her ears.

She grabbed another of the weighted lines. She had three left, and needed a minimum of two to succeed. All the while the wing thrashed against the arm and leg that were attempting to pin it in place. Though the arm in question was also still holding the straps that restrained the griffin's head.

And the ground was rising towards them.

\----------

"Sergeant Krom is clear sir!" One of the observers reported, though James stopped listening as soon as he heard the name.

"Come on." He said as he watched his wife and the griffin she was wrestling with continue to plummet. The range finder on his readout couldn't even get a reading on how far she was. And it was supposedly rated for up to three kilometers. And his view of her was so heavily pixelated from zooming in that he couldn't ACTUALLY see her clearly.

What he could see was that she and the griffin were tumbling end over end. He could also see the black winged form of the prince plummeting after them and circling them as he matched their speed. He wondered why the prince wasn't helping her.

If he hadn't been so focused on her he would have noticed the way Gorna and Glag began to look at him curiously. The bottoms of his feet were beginning to glow and flutter as magical energy instinctively began concentrating on them.

"Come on Aminaaaaaa."

\----------

Amina had been mid throw when the Griffin headbutted her. She'd opted to keep one end of the line in her hand this time, and that was the only thing that let her keep attached to the monstrous hybrid.

She had a split second's warning as she felt the makeshift reins go slack in her hand. But by then she'd already been releasing the weighted line to wrap around the unrestrained wing.

The griffin's head slammed into her in an impact so ferocious it reminded her of how Glag had sent her flying in the arena. Something popped somewhere and she would have screamed in pain if she hadn't also felt her consciousness fade out for a moment. Her left hand let go of the straps it had been holding onto. It's fingers limp and prickling with numbness

But her left hand kept a hold of its end of the rope, which had successfully wrapped around the base of the opposing wing.

The griffin rolled in a spin, effectively reeling her back into it without realizing. It screeched in fury at the sight of her coming towards it again, and lashed out with one of the claws that wasn't entangled in the netting that it had just removed from its face. The slash attempted to catch her in the side of the ribs. But her numb, and likely dislocated, arm intercepted it without her even consciously telling it to.

The pain brought her back to full consciousness.

Amina's eyes blazed with golden light as she turned to face the source of her pain. Her throat shone bright with the purplish pink light of her family's voice of command power.

She yelled a cry of fury at the griffin, which cringed back in surprise and pain at the sudden verbal onslaught. Amina took advantage of the sudden opportunity and wrapped her wounded legs around one wing in a sort of modified arm hold. Her good arm pinned the other between itself and her waist, and in a battle-rage she hadn't felt since the battle in the dessert, she fought the beast.

Even Alixan, who had made to move in and retrieve her at the sight of the impact, fell back as she screamed and struggled at the monster for control.

There were no ropes or straps or harnesses. No weapons save their own bodies.

In those last few thousand feet there was only a wounded and half mad warrior, and a suddenly very frightened griffin.

And they each fought for their lives.

\---------------------------------------

Of all the people present on the observation deck, James flinched the least at the sudden sound from above. He had, after all, heard Amina use this power before. He wouldn't be surprised if the local soldiers had heard the prince use that power. But this wasn't the prince. It was Amina.

And James knew how she sounded when she got pissed.

"YOU WILL OBEY ME YOU BASTARD!" Came echoing down from above.

"Bleedin' hells!" One of the soldiers said. "Those two are goin' at it."

And as James watched, reeling back the zoom in his glasses at an increasing rate and glad to gain more clarity, he saw that they were right.

Murmurs rose among the soldiers present as they watched the three bodies continue to plummet.

James's face paled as he saw the flashes of red on Amina's clothes. The familiar red of blood. And knew that that was what had driven her to rage like she was doing now.

"BLEED ME NO MORE!" He heard her bellow as he saw her head flash forward and strike the side of the griffin's face in a headbutt.

"Too low!" Someone exclaimed nearby.

James killed the feed on his left lens and was surprised to see that she couldn't be more than four or five hundred feet above them now.

He saw the already dispatched wing of riders moving to intercept.

He ripped the glasses from his head and tossed them at Gorna, who jumped back in confusion at the unexpected projectile hitting her, and began to run toward the edge of the deck so he could jump off.

Then he faltered and tripped as he saw something amazing.

"YOU ARE MINE!!!!!!" Amina yelled as a set of massive, shimmering, blue and green wings opened up wide above them.

The soldiers all around began to go wide eyed and oohed and aah-ed as a massive, fan-like, tail spread wide behind the griffin. It was supported every few feet by long furred portions that made it look like it was actually many tails in one. Between them were long trailing feathers matching the wings. It looked like it had eyes spread all across it.

James looked up from where he'd fallen to his knees, and was amazed at the sight of the creature.

"It's a damn peacock." He said to himself, though he couldn't recognize the feline parts of the griffin just yet.

They sailed over the grounds, only maybe two hundred feet up now. Way too close for James's liking.

"The princess is clear sir!" One of the observers yelled.

"No shite Malliers!" The guard captain shot back angrily. "We can all see that!" This drew some mild laughter from some of the soldiers.

The laughter quickly stopped as they all watched Amina slump over and fall off the griffin.

James left scorched splinters where his feet exploded, propelling him into the air.

Wait, is this just GATE? (354/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hmmm. Maybe James has been a bad influence on his wife.

Enjoy.

\~

"WHATEVER YOU DO!" Alixan shouted down at Amina and the only other climber between his legs. "DON'T LOOK AT THEM! IF THEY SEE YOUR EYES THEY'LL ATTACK!"

Around them, and around the spire, the seemingly endless flock of griffins roiled like the rapids of a fast moving river. She knew from looking up through a small spyglass that they were weaving in and out of each others ways, not always successfully, in a flurry of feathers, fur, and razor sharp beaks and claws. The noise of their screeches and screams and squawks was so loud that even with her ears plugged and covered by cloth her head was beginning to hurt.

A little over two hundred yards. She reminded herself as she felt something rush past her, and buffet her with its wings slightly in the process, before slamming into something else. There was a screech of fury and she felt the impact of something slamming into the cliff off to her side. She huddled against it, holding onto her handholds and making herself as small as she could while doing what she could to resist her curiosity and look at what had happened. Two hundred yards.

Alixan had given them the rules for being in the swarm as they'd doused themselves in the, incredibly vile, griffin urine that morning. No making eye contact, even accidentally with any of the beasts. Move slow, practically at a snail's pace, while climbing and ensure that you never have less than three tie off points at a time. No food, no water. And if a griffin hit you assume that you were already dead, because it would mean that they'd collided with another griffin and a fight would break out.

Though he'd assured them that that last part was rare. Not the fights. Those happened all the time up here. But them actually striking a rider were rare. That fact didn't comfort Amina at all as she felt something wet and hot land on the rock next to her and splash her hand a bit. One of the griffin's had blooded the other gruesomely, and she'd caught some of the spray.

I shouldn't have come up here. She thought for the hundredth time since starting this section of the climb.

But she continued climbing.

Small handhold after small handhold. Freezing in place anytime something happened nearby. Repositioning tie off points. Occasionally stopping to stretch a hand or a leg as slowly and deliberately as possible.

It took six hours and thirty three minutes to get the two hundred or so yards that were necessary for them to get past the swarm.

She never saw a reason for WHY the swarm flew where it did. No food source or water supply. No magical artifact or energy source. Not even any places that might have made comfortable resting spots for the massive hybrid animals. Just cliff face. She supposed it was possible that there was one on the other side of the spire. But she wasn't exactly going to go look.

And yet at the two hundred yard mark the swarm just stopped, as if there was some kind of hidden barrier that they as non-griffins couldn't see. There was still another mile or so of spire above them on the other side of it. But nothing else. The griffin's tooth seemed almost featureless beyond that point. Save for a small respite that, as she got into it and saw Alixan's smiling face, she realized must have been carved there by other aspiring griffin riders. There were even small simple chairs, a somewhat ragged looking tent that reminded her of James's yurt in the Clan Drakrid town, and a small fire pit over which hung a cooking surface.

To her surprise the other climber was sitting there with Alixan, enjoying a warm cup of tea and some jerky with him.

"Knew you'd make it." Alixan said. He gestured at one of the small chairs and pulled a rag out of a metal bucket that sat next to the fire. "Come. Change out of those clothes and wash the scent off as best you can. We're almost done up here."

"What is this place?" She asked as she moved over and took the rag. The elf's eyes went wide as she pulled her coat and pants off without hesitation. She still had her small clothes on underneath, but she had to imagine that he hadn't expected to see a princess undress in front of him. Even though he'd clearly already cleaned himself off before she'd even gotten here.

"The reason I decided to make this hold my home." Alixan answered as he poured her a cup of tea and tossed her sullied coat into a bottomless bag to be cleaned later. "I don't know what it was originally called. Or who first carved it out of the spire. Or HOW they did so without causing it to collapse." He said as he looked up at the curved back wall. "And noone knows why the griffins stay below it."

She looked as she wiped down her arms and shoulders with the clothe, dipping it in the warm water occasionally as she did. Sure enough the griffins continued to avoid this altitude. A head or wing or claw would occasionally break the surface of the teeming mass of the swarm. But they were always quick to dive back down when they did. And despite the cacophony she'd heard while moving THROUGH the swarm, she heard hardly a low din from in here.

"The griffin riders call it the Respite." Alixan said. He jerked his thumb over his shoulder at the tent. "Some of that magical jade is in there. Like the stuff from Jadesport. Or James's medallion. Makes up the floor of the tent. But it's PART of the spire."

"Up here?" She asked. "How's that possible?"

"Don't know." Alixan admitted. "It must've been here long before any of the past cataclysms that resulted in lost records too. Because I've looked for answers." He said.

"It's a nice color too." The elf said. "And feels warm to touch."

Alixan nodded. "It's why it isn't cold up here." He said. "Not the fire. Though that helps."

"What's at the top of the spire?" She asked as she hesitantly peered out around the top of the respite. Her nausea kicked in and she quickly stepped back.

"No idea." Alixan said with a sullen sip of his tea. "Tried climbing a few times. But if you think the air's thin here. Get's a lot worse up there. And as you can see griffins won't go up there."

"Has anyone?" The elf asked curiously.

Alixan shrugged. "Like I said. No idea."

Amina looked at him curiously as she pulled a shirt from her bag and put it on, then began cleaning her legs. She'd have to get her back and hair whenever they got back to the bottom.

"You're going up there aren't you?" She asked. "That's part of the reason you came up."

He chuckled. "You always knew me so well Mina." He said. Then he looked up at the edge of the shelter. "Yes.... I am." He said. "Once you two have leaped. Good or bad. I intend to use that.... Oxygen.... magic that James told us about. I've been training on it for quite a while now." He shook his head. "Hasn't worked in the Crag yet. But that gas is magical in nature so that's not a shock. This might be too. But I won't know for sure until I try."

Amina sighed. Her older brother had always had a tendency for climbing that had never made any sense to any of them.

"So what do we do now?" She asked as she laced her boots up, forgoing the simple leather shoes they'd all worn for the climb in favor of something with a bit more protection.

"You sure you're ready?" He asked. "You just barely got up here."

"I could go for a nice nap." The elf said. "Course I could also stand not being miles above the ground right above a swarm of bloodthirsty monsters too. But we all make bad decisions from time to time."

"Sergeant Krom you asked for this trip specifically." Alixan said with a hint of annoyed confusion.

"Yeeeeeaaaahh." The elf sighed. "I'm not the brightest. Plus I finally got over losin' my boy Hardbite. Figured it was time to get back in the saddle. Kinda forgot how awful this whole thing is. Don't think my husband's gonna let me do another of these trips before our century is up."

Alixan stared at the elf with mild exasperation. Then he turned back to Amina and guided her over to the edge. He pointed down at the swarm.

"Next up is the leap." He said. "Krom already knows that. He's done it before."

"Okay" She said. "I assume you're being literal."

"Very." He answered readily.

"That's a terrible plan." She said.

"Griffins can't be snuck up on from the ground." He said. "Or from the side. Sometimes you can lure them somewhere and trap them. But that runs a high risk of hurting them. They're accustomed to being the only thing in the sky besides the various dragons that can take each other on. And most dragons don't care to eat them when there's easier prey on the ground. So they aren't terribly accustomed to being attacked from above."

"So I'm going to jump down on top of one and what? Just hope like hell it doesn't try to kill me?"

"Oh it's definitely going to try to kill you." He said with a laugh. "That's where being an elite, royal, warrior comes into play. Bring out the bag we gave you." He instructed her. "Krom. Come help me show her what to do."

Krom drained the last of his tea and walked over, bag in hand. Over the next few minutes the two of them explained what to do with the series of straps and weighted ropes once she'd engaged a griffin. They had her run through a couple of trials with throwing the ones that needed throwing, and tying the ones that would need to be secured. When they were done she stood near the ledge with the tools in hand.

"You have an advantage." Alixan said. "Krom here is going in blind and hoping he gets one he likes. You have battle sight. You'll be able to pick one, assuming you can time the jump right. Has James shown you how to fly like he does?"

"A bit." She answered. "I can use wind magic to redirect myself. But the explosion thing is still a bit much."

Alixan nodded. "That ought to be enough to make a difference." He said. Then he looked down at the swarm. "Last chance to back out." He said quietly enough that Krom wouldn't hear. "No harm."

Then Krom screamed.

"FOR HARDBIIIIIIIiiiiiiittttteeee!" He roared as he flew out off the ledge and into the void. A series of shrill whistles following his voice out into the open air.

"Guess he got bored." Alixan said with a chuckle." Alixan said. "That reminds me. We almost let you jump without putting the screamer whistles on. Get those out." He said as he moved over to put out the fire and dump out the remaining water in the bucket.

"Is he going to be okay?" She asked as she tried spotting the elf in the swarm below to no avail.

"Krom?" Alixan asked over his shoulder. "Yeah. He's done this like... six times? Maybe seven... in his life. His husband just isn't a fan of them. And he bonded real hard with his last griffin. Hit him hard when it passed away. We'll see him back at the keep."

Then he spun as he heard more whistles screaming out over the edge.

"AMINA!" He yelled as he dashed back to the edge and dove over it after her.

She didn't hear him. By the time he got to the edge of the respite her world had already become a madness of wings and talons and noise again.

She could see the blue and green and brown beast with the long trailing tail that she desired.

And she was plummeting right towards its flight path.

Just like so many times before, as she'd charged into battles, and duels, and challenges. All her doubts melted away before her. There was no time for them now. No place for them now. Later, when things were settled, one way or the other, if she still lived, she could break down and process them. But for now. There was her, a seemingly endless swarm of griffins, several miles of open air, and the one that she wanted to make hers.

She smiled as she saw it continue flying forward, oblivious of the approach of its new master.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1394fjo/wait_is_this_just_gate_355/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (354/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hmmm. Maybe James has been a bad influence on his wife.

Enjoy.

\~

"WHATEVER YOU DO!" Alixan shouted down at Amina and the only other climber between his legs. "DON'T LOOK AT THEM! IF THEY SEE YOUR EYES THEY'LL ATTACK!"

Around them, and around the spire, the seemingly endless flock of griffins roiled like the rapids of a fast moving river. She knew from looking up through a small spyglass that they were weaving in and out of each others ways, not always successfully, in a flurry of feathers, fur, and razor sharp beaks and claws. The noise of their screeches and screams and squawks was so loud that even with her ears plugged and covered by cloth her head was beginning to hurt.

A little over two hundred yards. She reminded herself as she felt something rush past her, and buffet her with its wings slightly in the process, before slamming into something else. There was a screech of fury and she felt the impact of something slamming into the cliff off to her side. She huddled against it, holding onto her handholds and making herself as small as she could while doing what she could to resist her curiosity and look at what had happened. Two hundred yards.

Alixan had given them the rules for being in the swarm as they'd doused themselves in the, incredibly vile, griffin urine that morning. No making eye contact, even accidentally with any of the beasts. Move slow, practically at a snail's pace, while climbing and ensure that you never have less than three tie off points at a time. No food, no water. And if a griffin hit you assume that you were already dead, because it would mean that they'd collided with another griffin and a fight would break out.

Though he'd assured them that that last part was rare. Not the fights. Those happened all the time up here. But them actually striking a rider were rare. That fact didn't comfort Amina at all as she felt something wet and hot land on the rock next to her and splash her hand a bit. One of the griffin's had blooded the other gruesomely, and she'd caught some of the spray.

I shouldn't have come up here. She thought for the hundredth time since starting this section of the climb.

But she continued climbing.

Small handhold after small handhold. Freezing in place anytime something happened nearby. Repositioning tie off points. Occasionally stopping to stretch a hand or a leg as slowly and deliberately as possible.

It took six hours and thirty three minutes to get the two hundred or so yards that were necessary for them to get past the swarm.

She never saw a reason for WHY the swarm flew where it did. No food source or water supply. No magical artifact or energy source. Not even any places that might have made comfortable resting spots for the massive hybrid animals. Just cliff face. She supposed it was possible that there was one on the other side of the spire. But she wasn't exactly going to go look.

And yet at the two hundred yard mark the swarm just stopped, as if there was some kind of hidden barrier that they as non-griffins couldn't see. There was still another mile or so of spire above them on the other side of it. But nothing else. The griffin's tooth seemed almost featureless beyond that point. Save for a small respite that, as she got into it and saw Alixan's smiling face, she realized must have been carved there by other aspiring griffin riders. There were even small simple chairs, a somewhat ragged looking tent that reminded her of James's yurt in the Clan Drakrid town, and a small fire pit over which hung a cooking surface.

To her surprise the other climber was sitting there with Alixan, enjoying a warm cup of tea and some jerky with him.

"Knew you'd make it." Alixan said. He gestured at one of the small chairs and pulled a rag out of a metal bucket that sat next to the fire. "Come. Change out of those clothes and wash the scent off as best you can. We're almost done up here."

"What is this place?" She asked as she moved over and took the rag. The elf's eyes went wide as she pulled her coat and pants off without hesitation. She still had her small clothes on underneath, but she had to imagine that he hadn't expected to see a princess undress in front of him. Even though he'd clearly already cleaned himself off before she'd even gotten here.

"The reason I decided to make this hold my home." Alixan answered as he poured her a cup of tea and tossed her sullied coat into a bottomless bag to be cleaned later. "I don't know what it was originally called. Or who first carved it out of the spire. Or HOW they did so without causing it to collapse." He said as he looked up at the curved back wall. "And noone knows why the griffins stay below it."

She looked as she wiped down her arms and shoulders with the clothe, dipping it in the warm water occasionally as she did. Sure enough the griffins continued to avoid this altitude. A head or wing or claw would occasionally break the surface of the teeming mass of the swarm. But they were always quick to dive back down when they did. And despite the cacophony she'd heard while moving THROUGH the swarm, she heard hardly a low din from in here.

"The griffin riders call it the Respite." Alixan said. He jerked his thumb over his shoulder at the tent. "Some of that magical jade is in there. Like the stuff from Jadesport. Or James's medallion. Makes up the floor of the tent. But it's PART of the spire."

"Up here?" She asked. "How's that possible?"

"Don't know." Alixan admitted. "It must've been here long before any of the past cataclysms that resulted in lost records too. Because I've looked for answers." He said.

"It's a nice color too." The elf said. "And feels warm to touch."

Alixan nodded. "It's why it isn't cold up here." He said. "Not the fire. Though that helps."

"What's at the top of the spire?" She asked as she hesitantly peered out around the top of the respite. Her nausea kicked in and she quickly stepped back.

"No idea." Alixan said with a sullen sip of his tea. "Tried climbing a few times. But if you think the air's thin here. Get's a lot worse up there. And as you can see griffins won't go up there."

"Has anyone?" The elf asked curiously.

Alixan shrugged. "Like I said. No idea."

Amina looked at him curiously as she pulled a shirt from her bag and put it on, then began cleaning her legs. She'd have to get her back and hair whenever they got back to the bottom.

"You're going up there aren't you?" She asked. "That's part of the reason you came up."

He chuckled. "You always knew me so well Mina." He said. Then he looked up at the edge of the shelter. "Yes.... I am." He said. "Once you two have leaped. Good or bad. I intend to use that.... Oxygen.... magic that James told us about. I've been training on it for quite a while now." He shook his head. "Hasn't worked in the Crag yet. But that gas is magical in nature so that's not a shock. This might be too. But I won't know for sure until I try."

Amina sighed. Her older brother had always had a tendency for climbing that had never made any sense to any of them.

"So what do we do now?" She asked as she laced her boots up, forgoing the simple leather shoes they'd all worn for the climb in favor of something with a bit more protection.

"You sure you're ready?" He asked. "You just barely got up here."

"I could go for a nice nap." The elf said. "Course I could also stand not being miles above the ground right above a swarm of bloodthirsty monsters too. But we all make bad decisions from time to time."

"Sergeant Krom you asked for this trip specifically." Alixan said with a hint of annoyed confusion.

"Yeeeeeaaaahh." The elf sighed. "I'm not the brightest. Plus I finally got over losin' my boy Hardbite. Figured it was time to get back in the saddle. Kinda forgot how awful this whole thing is. Don't think my husband's gonna let me do another of these trips before our century is up."

Alixan stared at the elf with mild exasperation. Then he turned back to Amina and guided her over to the edge. He pointed down at the swarm.

"Next up is the leap." He said. "Krom already knows that. He's done it before."

"Okay" She said. "I assume you're being literal."

"Very." He answered readily.

"That's a terrible plan." She said.

"Griffins can't be snuck up on from the ground." He said. "Or from the side. Sometimes you can lure them somewhere and trap them. But that runs a high risk of hurting them. They're accustomed to being the only thing in the sky besides the various dragons that can take each other on. And most dragons don't care to eat them when there's easier prey on the ground. So they aren't terribly accustomed to being attacked from above."

"So I'm going to jump down on top of one and what? Just hope like hell it doesn't try to kill me?"

"Oh it's definitely going to try to kill you." He said with a laugh. "That's where being an elite, royal, warrior comes into play. Bring out the bag we gave you." He instructed her. "Krom. Come help me show her what to do."

Krom drained the last of his tea and walked over, bag in hand. Over the next few minutes the two of them explained what to do with the series of straps and weighted ropes once she'd engaged a griffin. They had her run through a couple of trials with throwing the ones that needed throwing, and tying the ones that would need to be secured. When they were done she stood near the ledge with the tools in hand.

"You have an advantage." Alixan said. "Krom here is going in blind and hoping he gets one he likes. You have battle sight. You'll be able to pick one, assuming you can time the jump right. Has James shown you how to fly like he does?"

"A bit." She answered. "I can use wind magic to redirect myself. But the explosion thing is still a bit much."

Alixan nodded. "That ought to be enough to make a difference." He said. Then he looked down at the swarm. "Last chance to back out." He said quietly enough that Krom wouldn't hear. "No harm."

Then Krom screamed.

"FOR HARDBIIIIIIIIiiiiiii^(ttttteeee!") He roared as he flew out off the ledge and into the void. A series of shrill whistles following his voice out into the open air.

"Guess he got bored." Alixan said with a chuckle." Alixan said. "That reminds me. We almost let you jump without putting the screamer whistles on. Get those out." He said as he moved over to put out the fire and dump out the remaining water in the bucket.

"Is he going to be okay?" She asked as she tried spotting the elf in the swarm below to no avail.

"Krom?" Alixan asked over his shoulder. "Yeah. He's done this like... six times? Maybe seven... in his life. His husband just isn't a fan of them. And he bonded real hard with his last griffin. Hit him hard when it passed away. We'll see him back at the keep."

Then he spun as he heard more whistles screaming out over the edge.

"AMINA!" He yelled as he dashed back to the edge and dove over it after her.

She didn't hear him. By the time he got to the edge of the respite her world had already become a madness of wings and talons and noise again.

She could see the blue and green and brown beast with the long trailing tail that she desired.

And she was plummeting right towards its flight path.

Just like so many times before, as she'd charged into battles, and duels, and challenges. All her doubts melted away before her. There was no time for them now. No place for them now. Later, when things were settled, one way or the other, if she still lived, she could break down and process them. But for now. There was her, a seemingly endless swarm of griffins, several miles of open air, and the one that she wanted to make hers.

She smiled as she saw it continue flying forward, oblivious of the approach of its new master.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1394a9s/wait_is_this_just_gate_355/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (353/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Is the last section unprofessional (maybe even illegal) in multiple ways? Yes.

Do I care? Lemme check..... Nope.

Cause EEEEEVERYBODY is experiencing growth in this chapter. Especially Vickers. Who is now a tiny bit of a scaredy cat. PUN INTENDED!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

Vickers looked at the papers that had been distributed in the briefing room with mild disgust.

"Four hundred and eighty three refugees of various species, age, and profession?" The King said from where he sat with the main report in hand. "And that's just what our mages can detect? And no sign of where the golemancers are performing this... this... perversion of souls?" He asked. "And all without detection until the Chief caught a scent with a new nose."

"The miners have detected several subterranean passages your majesty." Guardian Ira'Nyl said grimly. "But they seem to shift positions every day. And are well warded against detection. They only found them because one shifted THROUGH one of their exploratory tunnels WHILE they were still in it. They lost two men." She shifted uncomfortably. "They still haven't been able to determine where they lead though."

"How did they even get in the capital?" The King asked. Everyone murmured and grumbled and whispered, not wanting to be the ones to have to answer.

Vickers didn't mind though.

"Walked right in." He said simply. "Sometimes the best way to sneak is to NOT sneak. Walk in and act like you belong."

"We were..." Marcos began in his slow voice. "Monitoring for more changelings like the Grinner, and for magical entry methods. Like the doors." He shuffled the papers in front of him for a moment. "If your target is looking for magical infiltration. Non-magical would be the way to go."

"We were also monitoring for golems." The King countered. "How did that get past our detection?"

"Likely." Marcos replied. "By leaving the creature dormant. And probably hidden amongst the supplies the... false.... refugees had brought with them. A normal soldier might not pry too much. It has after all been many months since the attack on the Captain."

King Farrick grumbled. He knew they were right. But it still rankled him awfully.

"Countermeasures?" He asked simply.

"We have constructed communication denial crystals." Marcos answered. "Once activated they will sever any external control magic. If the Golemancer congruency is outside the effected area it will render their creature inert. If they are INSIDE the area, then we will be able to track them down quickly. We should have the last few constructed within two days."

"And what can we do for any of our people who have been put under their control?" The King followed up.

At this the elder Arch-Mage's face grew grim.

"I'm afraid there is very little sire." He said. "If the Agency is using the method we believe they are, then the process is all but irreversible. It is highly likely that if we do sever their control, these people will drop dead."

The King slammed his hand on his desk.

"Damn them!" He cursed. Everyone waited. "Near to five hundred of my people. PETRAVIAN... people!"

"That does make our options simple then." Vickers said in the ensuing silence.

The King turned to him with an eye full of malice.

"If the process is irreversible. Then there's no need to expend excess resources should the operation fail." Vickers said without flinching. He'd been under similar glares before. "Once we kick off we capture a few. Test the theory. If it's confirmed then we no longer need to hold back."

"They're my citizens." The King said venomously.

"Not if your mage is right they aren't." Vickers countered. "IF... he's wrong then sure, we should do everything in our power to save them. But if not then the math gets easy."

"How so?" The Guardian asked from her seat a few tables away. Vickers got the sense that she knew what he meant. But also that maybe not everyone present did.

"We evacuate the area in question." He said. "Do it at night. With our stealthiest people. Get everyone who ISN'T under their control out. We can use that as an opportunity to test a few of the ones we suspect, should we stumble across any." He took a deep breath. "Then we set up a cordon around the area. Above and below if your people can manage that. By the time we do that the Agency will know something's wrong. Then we just have to see who makes the first move. And if Arch-Mage Marcos is right then we have the ultimate trump card."

"We do?" The King asked.

"Far as we know anyways." Vickers replied. "We don't KNOW the Agency's ultimate goal here in the capital. But we know what ours is.... Their destruction." He looked around and saw the others agreeing amongst themselves. "If they put our backs to a wall and don't wanna go down easy then we can have some of your mages turn that sector into a gravel pit."

"It's the refugee sector." The King said. "It was a gravel and ash pit less than a year ago. We just rebuilt it from nothing."

"And now its a den of snakes." Vickers replied firmly. "Which one is safer for the rest of the people in the capital?"

"Gods dammit!" The King said as he stood up and turned away to look at the city map on the wall behind him. "We'd just begun to see recovery!"

Everyone else present remained silent as he thought.

After several minutes, which seemed to drag on, the King turned back around.

"Guardian?" He said as he moved a paper and looked at it.

"My King?" She replied.

"You and your riflemen are to see to the action hear in the castle grounds." He said. "You are to apprehend this imposter Sergeant and eliminate all the false recruits she brought in with her, as well as anyone who attempts to aid them. Capture them if possible. But eliminate them as needed. I will not allow their plans to take hold in MY castle."

He said with a jab of his finger at the paper, which Vickers assumed was the roster of fake soldiers.

"On my life your majesty!" She said as she stood and saluted. King Farrick jerked his head toward the door and she nodded before jogging out of the door to her task.

"Spymaster Telderin?" The King said.

Vickers had to fight the urge to leap out of his skin as a breathy voice emanated from the seat next to him, which had been empty only a second before.

"Yes your majesty?" Said a hooded figure whose face Vickers couldn't see.

"Chief Vickers is considered his people's foremost covert operative." The King replied. "The two werefolk that are his charges are of a similar nature. Coordinate with them to enact the plan to COVERTLY extract our citizens. Chief Vickers I assume this operation would be agreeable to you?"

Both Vickers and the hooded figure nodded. Then they seemed to disappear right before Vickers' eyes. One second they were there, then they simply weren't. Vickers hadn't even heard them move. Nor had he smelled their presence. He stared at the now empty seat with wide feline eyes.

"I would check your pockets Chief." The King said. "Please go relay this information to your compatriots."

Vickers nodded awkwardly and fought not to let his confusion and anger show as he got up and left the room.

As he walked out he did what he'd been told and, sure enough, there was something in his chest pocket. The one that was UNDERNEATH his modified MOLLE vest.

He opened the small paper and read the incredibly small, yet clear, handwriting. Though he was amazed to find that it was written in English.

>One of my agents shall meet you at the quarters of your companions at sundown.Also, well chosen with your were-folk form. Very suitable for a fellow shadow.

Vickers disliked being one-upped at his own craft. He grumbled angrily to himself as the piece of paper disappeared in a small cloud of orange smoke, leaving not a trace of its existence behind.

\----------

Amina reached up to the hand and grasped it as she finally managed to get to the end of the nesting area.

"Well done sister." Alixan said as he pulled her into the small cove he'd started a small fire in. "That's enough for tonight. We'll continue in the morning."

It was clearly an old griffin nest, though it was empty of any of the fluff, feathers, or dry shrub that seemed to be the standard for the nests. She took a moment to catch her breath as she scooted away from the edge of the opening.

"I guess I'm the first." She said. "Besides you."

"Only one more left." He replied. "The northern lad turned around after a rather large mother griffin took a swipe at him. Can't blame him. She looked meaner than most."

"Is that level of washout normal?" She asked. She probably should have asked before starting the climb, she realized as she said it.

"Actually, two out of six is better than normal." He said with a smile. "And nobody has even fallen off yet."

"Quite dangerous." She said.

"I figured you knew that when you heard me explain that you'd be climbing a three mile tall spire, through griffin nesting grounds, and then leaping off of it and hoping to land on a griffin. Followed by doing everything you can to NOT get killed by one before you hit the ground." He said, and was correct.

"I shouldn't be up here." She said glumly. She felt like a fool.

"No. Probably not." Alixan agreed.

"Then why did you let me join you?" She asked.

"Because you're a grown woman."

"I'm pregnant." She countered.

"Does that make you LESS of a grown woman?" He asked. "Because I'm fairly certain it doesn't."

"This is dangerous." She said somewhat sheepishly.

"Yes. We've already covered that part." He agreed again.

"What if something happens to me. Or to the baby?" She wondered.

"Firstly." He began. "You being pregnant is the only reason I came on this climb." He said as he offered her a bit of dried fruit, which she took greedily. "I'm not going to let anything happen to you little sister. And especially not to my future nephew."

"Nephew?" She wondered curiously. "How do you know its a boy?"

He chuckled, happy to see that he'd distracted her from her worry, even if only temporarily.

"I don't." He replied with a smile. "Just hopeful. It's James's child so I'm already braced to be disappointed by it being short once it grows up. Might as well hope its a boy."

She slugged him on the shoulder and he donned a fake shocked expression.

"My child will never be a disappointment. Height aside." She said with a bit of genuine anger.

Alixan raised his hands in surrender. "Poor choice of words. You're right of course." Then he turned serious again. "But really Mina." He said. "I'll be right there with you the rest of the way. And you know what I can do. If anything happens, I'll get you- BOTH of you, out without harm."

"Can't guarantee that." She replied.

He shook his head. "No." He agreed. "No there's no guarantees in this kind of thing. But I can be fairly certain."

"Why'd you let me come up?" She asked.

"I told you." He reminded her. "You're a grown woman. I can't make decisions for you. Nobody can. Not even dad.... GENERAL." He said, reminding her of how she'd originally run away from home.

She thought back to when they'd all been children. She'd always thought that Artair or Xarina were the rascals of their family. But now that Alixan had so glaringly pointed it out, SHE had always been the rebellious one. She just had a stronger call to duty, and less wanderlust, than their younger siblings.

"You've officially surpassed me as the favored child." Alixan said with a smile. "I may be the crown prince. But married AND expecting a child?" He made a fake impressed face. "Not even Ferria can claim that one." He pointed out into the darkness. "Neither she or I can guide you now little sister. It's all learning experiences for you from here on out. Just like any other new parent."

"Most pregnant woman probably don't need to LEARN not to do things like this." She said, partly scolding herself as she gestured at the massive spire behind them.

"No. This was a very foolish decision." He agreed. She was about to scold him for the insult. But he continued. "But you're probably one of the few that can actually pull it off." He looked over at her as a hand came over the ledge and grasped for purchase. "In the morning." He said as he moved over to help the only other remaining climber up.

"Hope I wasn't interrupting what sounded like a very important sibling conversation." The ragged looking elf said sarcastically. "Just been climbing for my life in the dark all night."

\----------

Samantha walked with her hands fidgeting with each other inside the front pocket of her hoodie.

It was nice to be able to walk the hospital grounds more or less freely now. She knew that the cameras were keeping tabs on her. And she wouldn't be surprised if the "Long Term Guest" badge that hung from one of her hoodie's draw strings wasn't being tracked somehow. She was a former M.P. so she knew exactly how that kind of thing worked.

She paused as she got to the door she'd been walking toward this whole time. She looked around a few times and was legitimately surprised to see that the halls were empty, though a few of the other doors were open, implying that their occupants were in them.

She was about to reach up to knock but stopped.

Was she really gonna do this?

She definitely wasn't in the right headspace to be making these kinds of decisions. And she didn't exactly have the freedom to run away and hide if something went wrong. There'd be no turning back if this didn't go as she hoped it would.

Shut up and just do it. The part of her brain that wasn't 100% hers said. It... wasn't big on patience.

"Oh hell. When it's right it's right." She said as she reached up again and knocked.

"Come in!" The familiar voice said. She grasped the handle and pulled the door open.

"Hi." She said as she entered.

"Samantha." Fletcher said as he saw her. He had a small smile on his face as he turned from his computer to face her. "How are you? Come on in." He said with a gesture at the seats opposite of him. "Something I can help you with?"

"Uhhh." She said as her brain suddenly stopped existing. All the plans and imagined conversations she'd had to prepare for this point immediately evaporated as she grasped at brain cells that had stopped functioning. "Yes?" She said as she sat awkwardly in one of the seats.

How is it that YOU lead a pack? Her wolf instincts wondered. So indecisive.

"What can I do for you?" Fletcher asked.

"WOULDYOUGOWITHMEONMYOUTINGNEXTWEEK?!" She blurted out in a rush.

Fletcher, to his credit, had been in enough courts where things had gotten emotional or even occasionally violent, that his face only showed temporary surprise.

"What?" He asked. "Can... You repeat that?"

Samantha took a deep breath.

You should probably blink. Our eyes are probably freaking him out. Not good for gaining a mate.

SHUT UP! She yelled at her own brain.

"Would you..." She began. "Go with me..... on my outing.... next week?" She said slowly, forcing herself to keep the volume down. "My father... had to go back home so he could keep his shop open.... I have nobody... to go with."

"Um..." He said. He was blushing as he swallowed noisily. "Sure."

"Can it be a date?" She asked before she could second guess it.

Much better.

Quiet!

He swallowed again while glancing at his computer for just a moment, likely as a distraction. If he'd been blushing before, he was downright scarlet now.

"Uh... Yeah." He said with a nod. "That would be.... nice."

"Thank you." She said as she stood up and made to leave. "That's pretty much all my anxiety for the day. So I'll let you get back to work."

And right back to awful.

"I know a nice bistro." He said before she could get all the way out the door. She turned back, surprised at the outburst. He was still red. "They make an excellent filet mignon." Then he thought for a moment. "We'll have to get you some um.... formal wear though. They have a dress code. Shopping trip first?" He asked.

She smiled, though she made sure not to bare her teeth. "I'd like that." She said. "Kinda tired of the sweats."

"Then it's.... a date." He said with a hesitant smile.

She nodded and stepped out. When she did she let herself smile all the way. A passing staff member, likely another lawyer or something given where they were, went bug eyed at the sight and sped up her pace. But Samantha didn't care.

As she walked back to her room she kept smiling, even as she scolded her own instincts.

I went my whole life with insecurity and judgment from other women. She thought at the intrusive thoughts that she'd been wrestling with ever since her transformation. I don't need it from my own damn brain.

Too bad. That other part said back. Be a better fucking wolf. Literally.

The legal/HR department receptionist smiled at her as she walked past. "Have a nice day Miss Jenkins." She said. Samantha nodded at her as she exited the door out to the elevator hall. Then once the door closed the receptionist pulled out her cell phone.

>SCORE! She did it. They're totally a thing. Cash in everyone.

She sent the message to the group chat.

Her phone began dinging rapidly only a few seconds later.

>Munro: I'm using my winnings to buy myself some new wedges. Might get some for Samantha too. Think Versace makes them that big?

Was the first response.

Fletcher's number was NOT in that group chat.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1381rjy/wait_is_this_just_gate_354/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (353/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Is the last section unprofessional (maybe even illegal) in multiple ways? Yes.

Do I care? Lemme check..... Nope.

Cause EEEEEVERYBODY is experiencing growth in this chapter. Especially Vickers. Who is now a tiny bit of a scaredy cat. PUN INTENDED!!!!

Enjoy.

\~

Vickers looked at the papers that had been distributed in the briefing room with mild disgust.

"Four hundred and eighty three refugees of various species, age, and profession?" The King said from where he sat with the main report in hand. "And that's just what our mages can detect? And no sign of where the golemancers are performing this... this... perversion of souls?" He asked. "And all without detection until the Chief caught a scent with a new nose."

"The miners have detected several subterranean passages your majesty." Guardian Ira'Nyl said grimly. "But they seem to shift positions every day. And are well warded against detection. They only found them because one shifted THROUGH one of their exploratory tunnels WHILE they were still in it. They lost two men." She shifted uncomfortably. "They still haven't been able to determine where they lead though."

"How did they even get in the capital?" The King asked. Everyone murmured and grumbled and whispered, not wanting to be the ones to have to answer.

Vickers didn't mind though.

"Walked right in." He said simply. "Sometimes the best way to sneak is to NOT sneak. Walk in and act like you belong."

"We were..." Marcos began in his slow voice. "Monitoring for more changelings like the Grinner, and for magical entry methods. Like the doors." He shuffled the papers in front of him for a moment. "If your target is looking for magical infiltration. Non-magical would be the way to go."

"We were also monitoring for golems." The King countered. "How did that get past our detection?"

"Likely." Marcos replied. "By leaving the creature dormant. And probably hidden amongst the supplies the... false.... refugees had brought with them. A normal soldier might not pry too much. It has after all been many months since the attack on the Captain."

King Farrick grumbled. He knew they were right. But it still rankled him awfully.

"Countermeasures?" He asked simply.

"We have constructed communication denial crystals." Marcos answered. "Once activated they will sever any external control magic. If the Golemancer congruency is outside the effected area it will render their creature inert. If they are INSIDE the area, then we will be able to track them down quickly. We should have the last few constructed within two days."

"And what can we do for any of our people who have been put under their control?" The King followed up.

At this the elder Arch-Mage's face grew grim.

"I'm afraid there is very little sire." He said. "If the Agency is using the method we believe they are, then the process is all but irreversible. It is highly likely that if we do sever their control, these people will drop dead."

The King slammed his hand on his desk.

"Damn them!" He cursed. Everyone waited. "Near to five hundred of my people. PETRAVIAN... people!"

"That does make our options simple then." Vickers said in the ensuing silence.

The King turned to him with an eye full of malice.

"If the process is irreversible. Then there's no need to expend excess resources should the operation fail." Vickers said without flinching. He'd been under similar glares before. "Once we kick off we capture a few. Test the theory. If it's confirmed then we no longer need to hold back."

"They're my citizens." The King said venomously.

"Not if your mage is right they aren't." Vickers countered. "IF... he's wrong then sure, we should do everything in our power to save them. But if not then the math gets easy."

"How so?" The Guardian asked from her seat a few tables away. Vickers got the sense that she knew what he meant. But also that maybe not everyone present did.

"We evacuate the area in question." He said. "Do it at night. With our stealthiest people. Get everyone who ISN'T under their control out. We can use that as an opportunity to test a few of the ones we suspect, should we stumble across any." He took a deep breath. "Then we set up a cordon around the area. Above and below if your people can manage that. By the time we do that the Agency will know something's wrong. Then we just have to see who makes the first move. And if Arch-Mage Marcos is right then we have the ultimate trump card."

"We do?" The King asked.

"Far as we know anyways." Vickers replied. "We don't KNOW the Agency's ultimate goal here in the capital. But we know what ours is.... Their destruction." He looked around and saw the others agreeing amongst themselves. "If they put our backs to a wall and don't wanna go down easy then we can have some of your mages turn that sector into a gravel pit."

"It's the refugee sector." The King said. "It was a gravel and ash pit less than a year ago. We just rebuilt it from nothing."

"And now its a den of snakes." Vickers replied firmly. "Which one is safer for the rest of the people in the capital?"

"Gods dammit!" The King said as he stood up and turned away to look at the city map on the wall behind him. "We'd just begun to see recovery!"

Everyone else present remained silent as he thought.

After several minutes, which seemed to drag on, the King turned back around.

"Guardian?" He said as he moved a paper and looked at it.

"My King?" She replied.

"You and your riflemen are to see to the action hear in the castle grounds." He said. "You are to apprehend this imposter Sergeant and eliminate all the false recruits she brought in with her, as well as anyone who attempts to aid them. Capture them if possible. But eliminate them as needed. I will not allow their plans to take hold in MY castle." He said with a jab of his finger at the paper, which Vickers assumed was the roster of fake soldiers.

"On my life your majesty!" She said as she stood and saluted. King Farrick jerked his head toward the door and she nodded before jogging out of the door to her task.

"Spymaster Telderin?" The King said.

Vickers had to fight the urge to leap out of his skin as a breathy voice emanated from the seat next to him, which had been empty only a second before.

"Yes your majesty?" Said a hooded figure whose face Vickers couldn't see.

"Chief Vickers is considered his people's foremost covert operative." The King replied. "The two werefolk that are his charges are of a similar nature. Coordinate with them to enact the plan to COVERTLY extract our citizens. Chief Vickers I assume this operation would be agreeable to you?"

Both Vickers and the hooded figure nodded. Then they seemed to disappear right before Vickers' eyes. One second they were there, then they simply weren't. Vickers hadn't even heard them move. Nor had he smelled their presence. He stared at the now empty seat with wide feline eyes.

"I would check your pockets Chief." The King said. "Please go relay this information to your compatriots."

Vickers nodded awkwardly and fought not to let his confusion and anger show as he got up and left the room.

As he walked out he did what he'd been told and, sure enough, there was something in his chest pocket. The one that was UNDERNEATH his modified MOLLE vest.

He opened the small paper and read the incredibly small, yet clear, handwriting. Though he was amazed to find that it was written in English.

>One of my agents shall meet you at the quarters of your companions at sundown.
>
>Also, well chosen with your were-folk form. Very suitable for a fellow shadow.

Vickers disliked being one-upped at his own craft. He grumbled angrily to himself as the piece of paper disappeared in a small cloud of orange smoke, leaving not a trace of its existence behind.

\----------

Amina reached up to the hand and grasped it as she finally managed to get to the end of the nesting area.

"Well done sister." Alixan said as he pulled her into the small cove he'd started a small fire in. "That's enough for tonight. We'll continue in the morning."

It was clearly an old griffin nest, though it was empty of any of the fluff, feathers, or dry shrub that seemed to be the standard for the nests. She took a moment to catch her breath as she scooted away from the edge of the opening.

"I guess I'm the first." She said. "Besides you."

"Only one more left." He replied. "The northern lad turned around after a rather large mother griffin took a swipe at him. Can't blame him. She looked meaner than most."

"Is that level of washout normal?" She asked. She probably should have asked before starting the climb, she realized as she said it.

"Actually, two out of six is better than normal." He said with a smile. "And nobody has even fallen off yet."

"Quite dangerous." She said.

"I figured you knew that when you heard me explain that you'd be climbing a three mile tall spire, through griffin nesting grounds, and then leaping off of it and hoping to land on a griffin. Followed by doing everything you can to NOT get killed by one before you hit the ground." He said, and was correct.

"I shouldn't be up here." She said glumly. She felt like a fool.

"No. Probably not." Alixan agreed.

"Then why did you let me join you?" She asked.

"Because you're a grown woman."

"I'm pregnant." She countered.

"Does that make you LESS of a grown woman?" He asked. "Because I'm fairly certain it doesn't."

"This is dangerous." She said somewhat sheepishly.

"Yes. We've already covered that part." He agreed again.

"What if something happens to me. Or to the baby?" She wondered.

"Firstly." He began. "You being pregnant is the only reason I came on this climb." He said as he offered her a bit of dried fruit, which she took greedily. "I'm not going to let anything happen to you little sister. And especially not to my future nephew."

"Nephew?" She wondered curiously. "How do you know its a boy?"

He chuckled, happy to see that he'd distracted her from her worry, even if only temporarily.

"I don't." He replied with a smile. "Just hopeful. It's James's child so I'm already braced to be disappointed by it being short once it grows up. Might as well hope its a boy."

She slugged him on the shoulder and he donned a fake shocked expression.

"My child will never be a disappointment. Height aside." She said with a bit of genuine anger.

Alixan raised his hands in surrender. "Poor choice of words. You're right of course." Then he turned serious again. "But really Mina." He said. "I'll be right there with you the rest of the way. And you know what I can do. If anything happens, I'll get you- BOTH of you, out without harm."

"Can't guarantee that." She replied.

He shook his head. "No." He agreed. "No there's no guarantees in this kind of thing. But I can be fairly certain."

"Why'd you let me come up?" She asked.

"I told you." He reminded her. "You're a grown woman. I can't make decisions for you. Nobody can. Not even dad.... GENERAL." He said, reminding her of how she'd originally run away from home.

She thought back to when they'd all been children. She'd always thought that Artair or Xarina were the rascals of their family. But now that Alixan had so glaringly pointed it out, SHE had always been the rebellious one. She just had a stronger call to duty, and less wanderlust, than their younger siblings.

"You've officially surpassed me as the favored child." Alixan said with a smile. "I may be the crown prince. But married AND expecting a child?" He made a fake impressed face. "Not even Ferria can claim that one." He pointed out into the darkness. "Neither she or I can guide you now little sister. It's all learning experiences for you from here on out. Just like any other new parent."

"Most pregnant woman probably don't need to LEARN not to do things like this." She said, partly scolding herself as she gestured at the massive spire behind them.

"No. This was a very foolish decision." He agreed. She was about to scold him for the insult. But he continued. "But you're probably one of the few that can actually pull it off." He looked over at her as a hand came over the ledge and grasped for purchase. "In the morning." He said as he moved over to help the only other remaining climber up.

"Hope I wasn't interrupting what sounded like a very important sibling conversation." The ragged looking elf said sarcastically. "Just been climbing for my life in the dark all night."

\----------

Samantha walked with her hands fidgeting with each other inside the front pocket of her hoodie.

It was nice to be able to walk the hospital grounds more or less freely now. She knew that the cameras were keeping tabs on her. And she wouldn't be surprised if the "Long Term Guest" badge that hung from one of her hoodie's draw strings wasn't being tracked somehow. She was a former M.P. so she knew exactly how that kind of thing worked.

She paused as she got to the door she'd been walking toward this whole time. She looked around a few times and was legitimately surprised to see that the halls were empty, though a few of the other doors were open, implying that their occupants were in them.

She was about to reach up to knock but stopped.

Was she really gonna do this?

She definitely wasn't in the right headspace to be making these kinds of decisions. And she didn't exactly have the freedom to run away and hide if something went wrong. There'd be no turning back if this didn't go as she hoped it would.

Shut up and just do it. The part of her brain that wasn't 100% hers said. It... wasn't big on patience.

"Oh hell. When it's right it's right." She said as she reached up again and knocked.

^("Come in!") The familiar voice said. She grasped the handle and pulled the door open.

"Hi." She said as she entered.

"Samantha." Fletcher said as he saw her. He had a small smile on his face as he turned from his computer to face her. "How are you? Come on in." He said with a gesture at the seats opposite of him. "Something I can help you with?"

"Uhhh." She said as her brain suddenly stopped existing. All the plans and imagined conversations she'd had to prepare for this point immediately evaporated as she grasped at brain cells that had stopped functioning. "Yes?" She said as she sat awkwardly in one of the seats.

How is it that YOU lead a pack? Her wolf instincts wondered. So indecisive.

"What can I do for you?" Fletcher asked.

"WOULDYOUGOWITHMEONMYOUTINGNEXTWEEK?!" She blurted out in a rush.

Fletcher, to his credit, had been in enough courts where things had gotten emotional or even occasionally violent, that his face only showed temporary surprise.

"What?" He asked. "Can... You repeat that?"

Samantha took a deep breath.

You should probably blink. Our eyes are probably freaking him out. Not good for gaining a mate.

SHUT UP! She yelled at her own brain.

"Would you..." She began. "Go with me..... on my outing.... next week?" She said slowly, forcing herself to keep the volume down. "My father... had to go back home so he could keep his shop open.... I have nobody... to go with."

"Um..." He said. He was blushing as he swallowed noisily. "Sure."

"Can it be a date?" She asked before she could second guess it.

Much better.

Quiet!

He swallowed again while glancing at his computer for just a moment, likely as a distraction. If he'd been blushing before, he was downright scarlet now.

"Uh... Yeah." He said with a nod. "That would be.... nice."

"Thank you." She said as she stood up and made to leave. "That's pretty much all my anxiety for the day. So I'll let you get back to work."

And right back to awful.

"I know a nice bistro." He said before she could get all the way out the door. She turned back, surprised at the outburst. He was still red. "They make an excellent filet mignon." Then he thought for a moment. "We'll have to get you some um.... formal wear though. They have a dress code. Shopping trip first?" He asked.

She smiled, though she made sure not to bare her teeth. "I'd like that." She said. "Kinda tired of the sweats."

"Then it's.... a date." He said with a hesitant smile.

She nodded and stepped out. When she did she let herself smile all the way. A passing staff member, likely another lawyer or something given where they were, went bug eyed at the sight and sped up her pace. But Samantha didn't care.

As she walked back to her room she kept smiling, even as she scolded her own instincts.

I went my whole life with insecurity and judgment from other women. She thought at the intrusive thoughts that she'd been wrestling with ever since her transformation. I don't need it from my own damn brain.

Too bad. That other part said back. Be a better fucking wolf. Literally.

The legal/HR department receptionist smiled at her as she walked past. "Have a nice day Miss Jenkins." She said. Samantha nodded at her as she exited the door out to the elevator hall. Then once the door closed the receptionist pulled out her cell phone.

>SCORE! She did it. They're totally a thing. Cash in everyone.

She sent the message to the group chat.

Her phone began dinging rapidly only a few seconds later.

>Munro: I'm using my winnings to buy myself some new wedges. Might get some for Samantha too. Think Versace makes them that big?

Was the first response.

Fletcher's number was NOT in that group chat.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1381pcs/wait_is_this_just_gate_354/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (352/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Remember kids; in any relationship communication is KEY!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"We may not be an actual squad anymore boss." She said with a hint of frustration. "But that don't stop us from being squad. Your fight's my fight."

"That's it?" He asked.

"That's it." She shot back. "After that I don't really care. Stay here. Try to get back to Earth. Keep being badasses or find a little hole in the wall with lots of trees and just chilling for the rest of our, what are apparently longer than normal, lives." She shrugged. "I've got a nose that aint got a piece of glass between it and the world now. If there's roses, I intend to stop and give em a big ole sniff. And if there's green grass, I intend to walk on it bare foot."

The two of them walked in silence for a few minutes as he processed that. She broke the silence first.

"I never wanted to be a soldier Driz." She said. "When I was in high school I wanted to be a mechanic like my dad. Help him in the shop with my big brother. They aint there no more. Neither's the shop. Once we got all our shit settled and D.C. has all our paper's locked up and redacted. I'm cool with never touching a weapon or wearing an armored suit again." Then she flexed her arm. "But I will drop any fucker that fucks with me. I can do that much at least."

Driscoll let out a short laugh.

"A mechanic?" He asked.

"I was the one that did all our field repairs on the deep ops." She reminded him.

"And the one that liked blowing stuff up the most." He countered.

"People can like multiple things." She said defensively. "I always loved those old videos of engines blasting off when they had more power than their rigs could handle. Or when their fuel mix was off. ESPECIALLY when the drivers were acting like dumbasses."

Driscoll listened absently as he thought of everything while they walked.

He couldn't even remember what he'd wanted to be before he'd been hurt. What did he want to do now, or at least when ever this was over?

"What do you think would happen if we DID go back?" He asked suddenly, breaking her monologue about how diesel engines could supposedly run away.

"What? Like back to Earth?" She asked as her head darted to follow one of the castle servants who had a cart full of food as they passed.

"Yeah."

She thought about it for a second, snapping out of the food focus as she did.

"I don't know if that's the move anymore boss." She said.

He'd thought the same. But wanted to hear her thoughts.

"Why not?" He asked.

"Well. For starters, we failed our mission. So we're not exactly gonna have a lot of pull in that department." She said. "Plus we're technically still POW's. So unless something changes, or the brass trades something big for us, we're probably not just gonna be released."

"Vickers was."Driscoll countered.

"He ingratiated himself. And let's be real. he mostly took advantage of the fact that a shit load of chaos occurred that allowed him to pop his cuffs without anyone noticing. Then he just kept acting natural anytime someone looked at him." She replied.

It was a fair point. Technically the SEAL HADN'T ever been explicitly released. Just sort of... unleashed and forgotten.

Part of him wondered if Vickers had done anything to facilitate that. Obviously not the battle at Jadesport. But maybe other stuff. He realized that even if he asked, he would probably never know for sure one way or the other.

"Plus they'll probably dissect us." Five continued, breaking him out of his train of thought.

"What?" He asked.

"I said they'd probably dissect us." She repeated. "I mean. We'd have to make the return trip, and you saw what happened to that werewolf they sent over. You know, the one that started the shit-show in the sand pit? Yeah. Don't think I wanna do that."

Driscoll cringed. That footage hadn't been terribly pleasant.

"Plus, while they may have were-WOLVES over there now." She continued. "They don't have any were-foxes. Or super cute and cuddly were-squirrels like yours truly." She said as she used her hands to squish her cheeks up and widened her eyes as far as they'd go.

Driscoll stopped, causing her to stop too.

"You realize that, for a lot of people, a six foot tall, bug eyed, sentient squirrel is the stuff of nightmares right?" He asked. "Like. I know I have the eerie, uncanny-movement-by-something human-like-but-not-actually-human thing going on. But a giant intelligent squirrel is still terrifying as a concept."

She pivoted away, puffing her tail up and putting it between them as she crossed her arms and began walking away.

"I'm not terrifying." She insisted. "I'm fluffy and adorable. My size has no bearing on that."

He sighed in exasperation. He was about to say something, but she spoke before he could as she rounded the corner.

"They'd dissect us either way!" She shouted over her shoulder.

\---

James looked up at the massive spire looming over the keep that Alixan used as a base.

He could barely even see it now that it was night.

"How long does the climb take?" He asked of Gorna, who was standing next to him and Steve awkwardly as they waited for the stable doors to open.

"One of the guards said that two to three days is normal." She replied. "Though she also said that when the prince leads them it tends to be faster. Apparently he drives them hard."

"So another day?" He wondered. "Maybe two."

"That's if she survives the leap." She replied.

"The what?" He asked.

"Did they not tell you?" She asked

"Apparently not." He replied. "What's the leap? And why's it being used while talking about that?" He asked while pointing up at the spire that was so tall he couldn't see its top from here even in the daytime.

"Umm." She began. "You won't like it. I didn't. Especially since I couldn't go up there with her."

\---

KRAK!

Amina braced herself in case she needed to move as the steel weight fell away to the end of the rope's length, which was tied to her belt.

After a few moments of nothing emerging from the ledge above, she continued.

Krak!

She looked over at where the other noise had come from, just in time to see one of the other climbers freeze in place as they proceeded to stare down a defending griffin. Once the griffin had backed up a bit, the climber began slowly moving away. Once they'd moved a sufficient distance the griffin retreated back into its den. Like before it kept its head poking out and watched the climber.

Krak-Krak! came from above.

She looked up at where her brother was. He was climbing more nimbly than any of them, having scaled the spire numerous times before he'd even successfully gotten his first personal griffin and many times since even then. He knew this climb better than most people knew their own country maps, and was moving rapidly.

She looked down for just a moment and was barely able to see the glowing lights of the keep below.

If everything had gone well, James would be back there by now. She wondered at what he'd seen in the Orccrag. No other human had been there before, and likely wouldn't again for some time.

She also hoped he hadn't said or done anything stupid that might get him imprisoned or killed. Then she heard another loud KRAK from somewhere, followed by a screech.

The sudden change from looking up, to looking down, to looking back up and to the side made her nauseous.

Or maybe the baby had. It was hard to tell.

Oh, who am I to judge James right now? She wondered. At least he's doing his duty as a new prince. What am I doing? Getting myself a new mount? I mostly ride around on Steve anyways. What in the hells am I doing up here?

She wanted to call up to Alixan and talk to him. To ask his advice.

But he was at least a hundred feet above her. And to call out now, in the middle of the griffin nests, would invite the wrath of all the griffins around them, and draw attention from above.

"Dammit." She said quietly to herself. "Too late for second guessing." She looked back down for a moment before reconsidering it as a new wave of nausea overcame her from it. "Gods. Isn't it too early to be suffering from babe's brain?"

She sighed as she pressed against the wall for a moment to stretch her arms a bit.

Whichever way she got back to the base of the tower, she'd need to talk to James. She knew he'd been uncomfortable when she'd told him what she and Alixan were going to do. But he'd obviously not wanted to hold her back. Neither of them knew what they were doing in this new marriage, or as parents. And while they weren't the first to ever be in that particular realm of confusion, they needed to communicate a bit better moving forward.

KRAK! sounded somewhere off to the side where the other climber had clearly picked up their pace again.

"Oh hells." She said to herself. "You were never a quitter before. Let's not start now."

She set another piton in the stone face and in more ways than one, she reached out into the unknown darkness for another hand hold.

\----------

Vickers walked down the hallway, having just bathed and changed into his "duty" uniform. Which was basically a normal uniform with the sleeves cut off at the point where they'd normally roll up to, and the legs cut off just above his knee. He didn't wear a hat anymore, since they didn't fit. And his boots were a thing of the past.

It was a work in progress.

He rounded the corner and actually ran into one of the Petravian soldiers he'd been looking for.

"Guardian." He said with a nod. "Heading to the briefing room?"

"Chief." The massive elf said as she returned the nod. "I am."

He gestured and she began walking, he took up position next to her.

"I was hoping to get some intel on the agency hunt." He said.

"Then you're in luck." She replied. "That is what I am delivering to the King."

"News?" He wondered.

"Indeed. The Sergeant in question has been.... isolated... in a sense." She admitted, and he wondered if the royal army had OPSEC training for a moment. "And the other ones are being monitored."

"And that area I found?" He asked.

She held up an envelope with the seal of her office holding it shut.

"Got it." He said. "How bad?" He asked just as they got to the door to the King's audience chamber. The guards nodded at both of them, knocked and announced them, then opened the door.

"We have problems." She admitted as she stepped in ahead of him.

"Well fuck." He said, knowing that this briefing was about to bring a rain of shit down on his head.

And he couldn't even wear hats anymore.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1373blq/wait_is_this_just_gate_353/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (352/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Remember kids; in any relationship communication is KEY!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

She raised an eyebrow in exasperation. Or at least tried to. She didn't exactly HAVE eyebrows now. Also, the hypothetical eyebrow in question was on the side of her head that he couldn't see from where he was walking.

"We may not be an actual squad anymore boss." She said with a hint of frustration. "But that don't stop us from being squad. Your fight's my fight."

"That's it?" He asked.

"That's it." She shot back. "After that I don't really care. Stay here. Try to get back to Earth. Keep being badasses or find a little hole in the wall with lots of trees and just chilling for the rest of our, what are apparently longer than normal, lives." She shrugged. "I've got a nose that aint got a piece of glass between it and the world now. If there's roses, I intend to stop and give em a big ole sniff. And if there's green grass, I intend to walk on it bare foot."

The two of them walked in silence for a few minutes as he processed that. She broke the silence first.

"I never wanted to be a soldier Driz." She said. "When I was in high school I wanted to be a mechanic like my dad. Help him in the shop with my big brother. They aint there no more. Neither's the shop. Once we got all our shit settled and D.C. has all our paper's locked up and redacted. I'm cool with never touching a weapon or wearing an armored suit again." Then she flexed her arm. "But I will drop any fucker that fucks with me. I can do that much at least."

Driscoll let out a short laugh.

"A mechanic?" He asked.

"I was the one that did all our field repairs on the deep ops." She reminded him.

"And the one that liked blowing stuff up the most." He countered.

"People can like multiple things." She said defensively. "I always loved those old videos of engines blasting off when they had more power than their rigs could handle. Or when their fuel mix was off. ESPECIALLY when the drivers were acting like dumbasses."

Driscoll listened absently as he thought of everything while they walked.

He couldn't even remember what he'd wanted to be before he'd been hurt. What did he want to do now, or at least when ever this was over?

"What do you think would happen if we DID go back?" He asked suddenly, breaking her monologue about how diesel engines could supposedly run away.

"What? Like back to Earth?" She asked as her head darted to follow one of the castle servants who had a cart full of food as they passed.

"Yeah."

She thought about it for a second, snapping out of the food focus as she did.

"I don't know if that's the move anymore boss." She said.

He'd thought the same. But wanted to hear her thoughts.

"Why not?" He asked.

"Well. For starters, we failed our mission. So we're not exactly gonna have a lot of pull in that department." She said. "Plus we're technically still POW's. So unless something changes, or the brass trades something big for us, we're probably not just gonna be released."

"Vickers was."Driscoll countered.

"He ingratiated himself. And let's be real. he mostly took advantage of the fact that a shit load of chaos occurred that allowed him to pop his cuffs without anyone noticing. Then he just kept acting natural anytime someone looked at him." She replied.

It was a fair point. Technically the SEAL HADN'T ever been explicitly released. Just sort of... unleashed and forgotten.

Part of him wondered if Vickers had done anything to facilitate that. Obviously not the battle at Jadesport. But maybe other stuff. He realized that even if he asked, he would probably never know for sure one way or the other.

"Plus they'll probably dissect us." Five continued, breaking him out of his train of thought.

"What?" He asked.

"I said they'd probably dissect us." She repeated. "I mean. We'd have to make the return trip, and you saw what happened to that werewolf they sent over. You know, the one that started the shit-show in the sand pit? Yeah. Don't think I wanna do that."

Driscoll cringed. That footage hadn't been terribly pleasant.

"Plus, while they may have were-WOLVES over there now." She continued. "They don't have any were-foxes. Or super cute and cuddly were-squirrels like yours truly." She said as she used her hands to squish her cheeks up and widened her eyes as far as they'd go.

Driscoll stopped, causing her to stop too.

"You realize that, for a lot of people, a six foot tall, bug eyed, sentient squirrel is the stuff of nightmares right?" He asked. "Like. I know I have the eerie, uncanny-movement-by-something human-like-but-not-actually-human thing going on. But a giant intelligent squirrel is still terrifying as a concept."

She pivoted away, puffing her tail up and putting it between them as she crossed her arms and began walking away.

"I'm not terrifying." She insisted. "I'm fluffy and adorable. My size has no bearing on that."

He sighed in exasperation. He was about to say something, but she spoke before he could as she rounded the corner.

"They'd dissect us either way!" She shouted over her shoulder.

\---

James looked up at the massive spire looming over the keep that Alixan used as a base.

He could barely even see it now that it was night.

"How long does the climb take?" He asked of Gorna, who was standing next to him and Steve awkwardly as they waited for the stable doors to open.

"One of the guards said that two to three days is normal." She replied. "Though she also said that when the prince leads them it tends to be faster. Apparently he drives them hard."

"So another day?" He wondered. "Maybe two."

"That's if she survives the leap." She replied.

"The what?" He asked.

"Did they not tell you?" She asked

"Apparently not." He replied. "What's the leap? And why's it being used while talking about that?" He asked while pointing up at the spire that was so tall he couldn't see its top from here even in the daytime.

"Umm." She began. "You won't like it. I didn't. Especially since I couldn't go up there with her."

\---

KRAK!

Amina braced herself in case she needed to move as the steel weight fell away to the end of the rope's length, which was tied to her belt.

After a few moments of nothing emerging from the ledge above, she continued.

Krak!

She looked over at where the other noise had come from, just in time to see one of the other climbers freeze in place as they proceeded to stare down a defending griffin. Once the griffin had backed up a bit, the climber began slowly moving away. Once they'd moved a sufficient distance the griffin retreated back into its den. Like before it kept its head poking out and watched the climber.

Krak-Krak! came from above.

She looked up at where her brother was. He was climbing more nimbly than any of them, having scaled the spire numerous times before he'd even successfully gotten his first personal griffin and many times since even then. He knew this climb better than most people knew their own country maps, and was moving rapidly.

She looked down for just a moment and was barely able to see the glowing lights of the keep below.

If everything had gone well, James would be back there by now. She wondered at what he'd seen in the Orccrag. No other human had been there before, and likely wouldn't again for some time.

She also hoped he hadn't said or done anything stupid that might get him imprisoned or killed. Then she heard another loud KRAK from somewhere, followed by a screech.

The sudden change from looking up, to looking down, to looking back up and to the side made her nauseous.

Or maybe the baby had. It was hard to tell.

Oh, who am I to judge James right now? She wondered. At least he's doing his duty as a new prince. What am I doing? Getting myself a new mount? I mostly ride around on Steve anyways. What in the hells am I doing up here?

She wanted to call up to Alixan and talk to him. To ask his advice.

But he was at least a hundred feet above her. And to call out now, in the middle of the griffin nests, would invite the wrath of all the griffins around them, and draw attention from above.

"Dammit." She said quietly to herself. "Too late for second guessing." She looked back down for a moment before reconsidering it as a new wave of nausea overcame her from it. "Gods. Isn't it too early to be suffering from babe's brain?"

She sighed as she pressed against the wall for a moment to stretch her arms a bit.

Whichever way she got back to the base of the tower, she'd need to talk to James. She knew he'd been uncomfortable when she'd told him what she and Alixan were going to do. But he'd obviously not wanted to hold her back. Neither of them knew what they were doing in this new marriage, or as parents. And while they weren't the first to ever be in that particular realm of confusion, they needed to communicate a bit better moving forward.

KRAK! sounded somewhere off to the side where the other climber had clearly picked up their pace again.

"Oh hells." She said to herself. "You were never a quitter before. Let's not start now."

She set another piton in the stone face and in more ways than one, she reached out into the unknown darkness for another hand hold.

\----------

Vickers walked down the hallway, having just bathed and changed into his "duty" uniform. Which was basically a normal uniform with the sleeves cut off at the point where they'd normally roll up to, and the legs cut off just above his knee. He didn't wear a hat anymore, since they didn't fit. And his boots were a thing of the past.

It was a work in progress.

He rounded the corner and actually ran into one of the Petravian soldiers he'd been looking for.

"Guardian." He said with a nod. "Heading to the briefing room?"

"Chief." The massive elf said as she returned the nod. "I am."

He gestured and she began walking, he took up position next to her.

"I was hoping to get some intel on the agency hunt." He said.

"Then you're in luck." She replied. "That is what I am delivering to the King."

"News?" He wondered.

"Indeed. The Sergeant in question has been.... isolated... in a sense." She admitted, and he wondered if the royal army had OPSEC training for a moment. "And the other ones are being monitored."

"And that area I found?" He asked.

She held up an envelope with the seal of her office holding it shut.

"Got it." He said. "How bad?" He asked just as they got to the door to the King's audience chamber. The guards nodded at both of them, knocked and announced them, then opened the door.

"We have problems." She admitted as she stepped in ahead of him.

"Well fuck." He said, knowing that this briefing was about to bring a rain of shit down on his head.

And he couldn't even wear hats anymore.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/137385g/wait_is_this_just_gate_353/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (351/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey I'm back. How's everyone been? And what do you know. James DOESN'T fuck something up for a change. Aaaaaw. Our little specialist is growing up.

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright. This next part is the difficult bit." Alixan said as he leaned back in his harness, stretching his hands a bit.

Amina followed suit, giving her line one last tighten before also setting back a bit and kicking out her right leg to work out a cramp there. The two other climbers rested in similar ways. The other two had fallen behind. The dwarf had decided he'd had enough and stopped at the worm trail, promising to head back down once he was rested. The other had been noncommittal either way, but had seemed broken by the climb.

"You mean the nearly two miles of climbing WEREN'T the hard part?" One of the others asked.

"Not at all." Alixan said with a grin that only Amina could hear in his voice.

He pointed at something in the sky and they all looked as something blurred past overhead. A moment later it banked in and they all watched a massive griffin with green fur on its rear half rushed into a hidden opening in the side of the spire.

"Now we're in the nesting region." He added. "You all have the slings we gave you. Right?"

Amina nodded as she watched him pull one out and begin feeding it out. When it was at full length he looked back at them.

"See that bit of fluff at the edge of that opening there?" He said, pointing with his other hand at the next ledge. "Looks like fur or something, maybe some desert silk?"

Amina nodded. "Aye." Said one of the other two.

"The fact that we can see that means that nest is unattended." He said. Then he pointed at a ledge slightly higher up and to the right. "See how that ledge is clean? No fluff or mess." Again they nodded. "Griffins keep a clean house. Especially when they have eggs or babes. It's how they avoid being spotted. A clean ledge means that a nest is probably occupied. But the slings let you find out."

He spun the weighted rope in a fashion that reminded Amina of James's preferred weapon.

"You still check the fluffy ones though." He said as he swung the sling up over him at the nearer ledge. It struck the rock face just below the ledge with a loud KRACK! He waited a moment. "See?" He asked as he wound up again. "No reaction. Now watch this." He swung again, and again the weighted end slammed into the rock face, this time right under the second ledge.

Something rushed out of the opening that they still couldn't see beyond the ledge. And in the blink of an eye a massive, red furred and brown feathered griffin was latched onto the side of the cliff. It screamed at them in an earsplitting screech similar to a hawks as its front claws raked at the air between it and them.

Instinctively Amina's off hand gripped the cliff as her sword hand gripped at her hilt. The sound of scrabbling rocks let her know that the others were reacting in similar fashions.

"Relax!" Alixan said with an open hand gesturing for them to stay still. His eyes locked on those of the griffin. "Relaaaaax...." He said in a voice that seemed directed at the beast rather than them. "We're fiiiiiine. He's just protecting his young." He still spoke in the soothing voice, even though the message was directed at them. "He won't go more than a few yards from it. We know he's here now. We can go around."

The whole time he spoke the griffin beat its wings angrily, its feathers and fur puffed up, as it continued to screech at them.

Alixan kept his eyes locked on it as he slowly crawled away from the ledge it was under.

"Climb away from it. But don't look away from it for more than a second or so." He said as he released one of his climbing spikes and moved it. "And for the love of the gods move slowly."

They all followed his directions. After a few minutes, and a few yards of growing distance, the griffin eventually went back into its nest. Though it kept its head poking out and watching them with its keen bird eyes.

Once they'd all had a chance to catch their breaths and get their heartbeats under control Alixan leaned back again.

"So." He said as he pointed up at a point nearly two thirds of a mile higher. "See where the rock changes to that white color?" He asked.

The nodded again. Though Amina could see that one of the other two looked a lot paler now.

Alixan nodded along with them.

"That's the end of the nesting region." He said with that same grin from earlier. "Our goal is just past there. In the swarm." He said with a finger pointed straight up at the cloud of flying griffins. "Between here and there we have a dark mage's rune field of griffin nests. And we realistically CAN'T travel too closely together. We'll either have to split up, or proceed with massive gaps between each of us. Otherwise we'll piss off all the new parents." He winked at Amina as he said the last bit.

"Right." Said the climber who'd spoken up earlier. "That's the difficult bit."

"Yes." Alixan said. "One last warning."

They all looked at him curiously.

"If you hit your sling and the father- the males always tend the nests by the way. But if the father DOESN'T come out. And only pops his head out. Get as far away as possible."

"Why?" Amina asked.

Alixan pointed over at the ledge where they'd just angered the griffin. As if on cue, a massive griffin easily twice the size of that one landed just over the ledge and dropped off the carcass of a half eaten drake. Amina was glad to see that it wasn't dark purple or furred.

"Because it means that mommy dearest is nearby enough that daddy isn't worried about intruders." He said as he locked eyes with the massive griffin that was now looking at them with an angry, yet wary, eye. "And she's a lot meaner when she wants to be."

\----------

James stood back on the elevating platform next to Glag and Baly, and her guards, as the whole assembly rose back up to the surface.

"How did you find my homeland Mr. Choi?" She asked as she ran a hand over Glag's head.

"With your help mostly." He joked with a smile he knew she couldn't see. She smiled behind her veil, though he couldn't see that through the miasma either. "But seriously..... it was a fascinating place." He said earnestly. "Not sure if the canyon full of deadly gas is really my aesthetic of choice. But... the fact that you and your people have not only survived there, but also thrived there. It's incredible. And despite what must be a difficult way of life," He said as she nodded amiably. "Your people also seem incredibly friendly and generous. Wish I could have shared dinner and drinks with them."

"Maybe some day." She said hopefully. "And my people are like that for a simple reason."

James looked at her curiously, though all he saw through the purple miasma was her outline. She waved around her at that very miasma.

"As you've said. Life in the crag is difficult." She continued. "My people have a saying. 'If the air is already deadly, why add hostility?'"

James chuckled. "Guess that's fair." He said. "Still. I've enjoyed my time here. I hope I can come back and visit some day."

She nodded. "You and your family will always be welcome in my home." She said. Then she cocked her head a bit. "Though you'll need a few more of those suits. How is it holding up by the way?"

James looked at his readout absently. "That actually reminds me." He said as he noticed that he still had nearly one hundred seventy four hours left. He reached into the sealed pouch built into his left sleeve and pulled on the small yellow tab there. A section of his sleeve, that was roughly four inches in either direction, peeled off, leaving a line of sticky adhesive behind. On the other side of it was a small clear plastic layer, and inside was a small, single use, patch kit. There were a handful of them scattered throughout the suit's surface.

He handed it to her and she looked at it curiously, making him wonder for the hundredth time how she saw through the haze.

"What is this?" She asked as she inspected it.

"It's a small piece of the same material the outer layer of my suit is made of." He informed her. "And the stuff inside the clear layer is a packet of adhesive and a few other things. If my suit were to get breached I would use that to patch up the damage."

"Do you not need this?" She asked. Even as she said it the sky above them grew easier to see, or at least the torches at the top of the elevator did.

"Oh, I've got like.... at least seven more of those." He said simply. "Plus a full repair kit in the pack in my drake's saddle bags."

"Why are you giving it to me?" She asked.

He looked confused for a moment. "So you and your people, and maybe the prince's, can see if you're able to make anything similar." He said. "You said you've longed for a way to get more visitors in the Crag. I... I can't give you the suit." He said with a slight grimace. "I only have the one. Plus there's some stuff in these that I don't think my leadership would like me giving away. But... the most important part of it is the suit material. I think you guys can probably magic up a breathing apparatus that's probably even better than mine though." He leaned closer and tapped at his filter pack. "This thing's good. But between you and me, it is starting to smell um.... well.... a bit too sweaty... in here." He said with a grin.

The Voice of Crag listened to him before leaning back and bellowing hearty laughter. For a moment James wondered if maybe he'd been a bit too familiar with the world leader. Then she clutched the small piece of rubber and adhesive close to her chest.

"I thank you mister Choi." She said. "Both for a most sincere gift. And for one of the most sincere conversations I've had in years."

The elevator rumbled to a clanging stop, startling James even as he realized that he could SEE again.

Gorna and the Lady Melady were both waiting at the platform, along with a few other members of Alixan's staff, and several of Baly's orc staff.

"Ah Lady Melady." Baly said happily as the two women embraced for a moment, it was a touch awkward as Baly was nearly two feet taller than the half elf swords-woman. "Did you bring it?" She asked as she quickly held Melady back a bit.

"I'm afraid I forgot them." The tall human woman said with a not-terribly-convincing look of upset on her face. Then she smiled. "Of course I did dear." As if by magic, and James couldn't rule that out, a large tin appeared from behind her back.

"Oh!" The Voice of Crag exclaimed. "I do so love your people's spiced fruits. I will have to fend the children off with a stick when I get back down there."

The two of them continued talking as James simply smiled and walked over to Gorna, who was looking at him curiously. It took him a moment to realize why.

James pulled the velcro around his neck loose and quickly unrolled the seal around it. He ripped the helmet/hood off in a rush.

"OH THAT SMELLS SO GOOD!" He yelled, drawing the attention of the others without care as he took long, deep, breaths of the fresh air. "Ooooooh... yeah....." He said with satisfaction as Glag grabbed at the headpiece curiously. James let him have it without even thinking as he continued savoring fresh air. Then he turned to Gorna. "She still up there?" He asked.

"My lady is not expected to return until the morning." She said with a hint of sorrow.

James looked up at the massive spire in question.

"She'll be alright." He said.

And hoped like hell he was right.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1362z2t/wait_is_this_just_gate_352/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (351/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey I'm back. How's everyone been? And what do you know. James DOESN'T fuck something up for a change. Aaaaaw. Our little specialist is growing up.

Enjoy.

\~

"Alright. This next part is the difficult bit." Alixan said as he leaned back in his harness, stretching his hands a bit.

Amina followed suit, giving her line one last tighten before also setting back a bit and kicking out her right leg to work out a cramp there. The two other climbers rested in similar ways. The other two had fallen behind. The dwarf had decided he'd had enough and stopped at the worm trail, promising to head back down once he was rested. The other had been noncommittal either way, but had seemed broken by the climb.

"You mean the nearly two miles of climbing WEREN'T the hard part?" One of the others asked.

"Not at all." Alixan said with a grin that only Amina could hear in his voice.

He pointed at something in the sky and they all looked as something blurred past overhead. A moment later it banked in and they all watched a massive griffin with green fur on its rear half rushed into a hidden opening in the side of the spire.

"Now we're in the nesting region." He added. "You all have the slings we gave you. Right?"

Amina nodded as she watched him pull one out and begin feeding it out. When it was at full length he looked back at them.

"See that bit of fluff at the edge of that opening there?" He said, pointing with his other hand at the next ledge. "Looks like fur or something, maybe some desert silk?"

Amina nodded. "Aye." Said one of the other two.

"The fact that we can see that means that nest is unattended." He said. Then he pointed at a ledge slightly higher up and to the right. "See how that ledge is clean? No fluff or mess." Again they nodded. "Griffins keep a clean house. Especially when they have eggs or babes. It's how they avoid being spotted. A clean ledge means that a nest is probably occupied. But the slings let you find out."

He spun the weighted rope in a fashion that reminded Amina of James's preferred weapon.

"You still check the fluffy ones though." He said as he swung the sling up over him at the nearer ledge. It struck the rock face just below the ledge with a loud KRACK! He waited a moment. "See?" He asked as he wound up again. "No reaction. Now watch this." He swung again, and again the weighted end slammed into the rock face, this time right under the second ledge.

Something rushed out of the opening that they still couldn't see beyond the ledge. And in the blink of an eye a massive, red furred and brown feathered griffin was latched onto the side of the cliff. It screamed at them in an earsplitting screech similar to a hawks as its front claws raked at the air between it and them.

Instinctively Amina's off hand gripped the cliff as her sword hand gripped at her hilt. The sound of scrabbling rocks let her know that the others were reacting in similar fashions.

"Relax!" Alixan said with an open hand gesturing for them to stay still. His eyes locked on those of the griffin. "Relaaaaax...." He said in a voice that seemed directed at the beast rather than them. "We're fiiiiiine. He's just protecting his young." He still spoke in the soothing voice, even though the message was directed at them. "He won't go more than a few yards from it. We know he's here now. We can go around."

The whole time he spoke the griffin beat its wings angrily, its feathers and fur puffed up, as it continued to screech at them.

Alixan kept his eyes locked on it as he slowly crawled away from the ledge it was under.

"Climb away from it. But don't look away from it for more than a second or so." He said as he released one of his climbing spikes and moved it. "And for the love of the gods move slowly."

They all followed his directions. After a few minutes, and a few yards of growing distance, the griffin eventually went back into its nest. Though it kept its head poking out and watching them with its keen bird eyes.

Once they'd all had a chance to catch their breaths and get their heartbeats under control Alixan leaned back again.

"So." He said as he pointed up at a point nearly two thirds of a mile higher. "See where the rock changes to that white color?" He asked.

The nodded again. Though Amina could see that one of the other two looked a lot paler now.

Alixan nodded along with them.

"That's the end of the nesting region." He said with that same grin from earlier. "Our goal is just past there. In the swarm." He said with a finger pointed straight up at the cloud of flying griffins. "Between here and there we have a dark mage's rune field of griffin nests. And we realistically CAN'T travel too closely together. We'll either have to split up, or proceed with massive gaps between each of us. Otherwise we'll piss off all the new parents." He winked at Amina as he said the last bit.

"Right." Said the climber who'd spoken up earlier. "That's the difficult bit."

"Yes." Alixan said. "One last warning."

They all looked at him curiously.

"If you hit your sling and the father- the males always tend the nests by the way. But if the father DOESN'T come out. And only pops his head out. Get as far away as possible."

"Why?" Amina asked.

Alixan pointed over at the ledge where they'd just angered the griffin. As if on cue, a massive griffin easily twice the size of that one landed just over the ledge and dropped off the carcass of a half eaten drake. Amina was glad to see that it wasn't dark purple or furred.

"Because it means that mommy dearest is nearby enough that daddy isn't worried about intruders." He said as he locked eyes with the massive griffin that was now looking at them with an angry, yet wary, eye. "And she's a lot meaner when she wants to be."

\----------

James stood back on the elevating platform next to Glag and Baly, and her guards, as the whole assembly rose back up to the surface.

"How did you find my homeland Mr. Choi?" She asked as she ran a hand over Glag's head.

"With your help mostly." He joked with a smile he knew she couldn't see. She smiled behind her veil, though he couldn't see that through the miasma either. "But seriously..... it was a fascinating place." He said earnestly. "Not sure if the canyon full of deadly gas is really my aesthetic of choice. But... the fact that you and your people have not only survived there, but also thrived there. It's incredible. And despite what must be a difficult way of life," He said as she nodded amiably. "Your people also seem incredibly friendly and generous. Wish I could have shared dinner and drinks with them."

"Maybe some day." She said hopefully. "And my people are like that for a simple reason."

James looked at her curiously, though all he saw through the purple miasma was her outline. She waved around her at that very miasma.

"As you've said. Life in the crag is difficult." She continued. "My people have a saying. 'If the air is already deadly, why add hostility?'"

James chuckled. "Guess that's fair." He said. "Still. I've enjoyed my time here. I hope I can come back and visit some day."

She nodded. "You and your family will always be welcome in my home." She said. Then she cocked her head a bit. "Though you'll need a few more of those suits. How is it holding up by the way?"

James looked at his readout absently. "That actually reminds me." He said as he noticed that he still had nearly one hundred seventy four hours left. He reached into the sealed pouch built into his left sleeve and pulled on the small yellow tab there. A section of his sleeve, that was roughly four inches in either direction, peeled off, leaving a line of sticky adhesive behind. On the other side of it was a small clear plastic layer, and inside was a small, single use, patch kit. There were a handful of them scattered throughout the suit's surface.

He handed it to her and she looked at it curiously, making him wonder for the hundredth time how she saw through the haze.

"What is this?" She asked as she inspected it.

"It's a small piece of the same material the outer layer of my suit is made of." He informed her. "And the stuff inside the clear layer is a packet of adhesive and a few other things. If my suit were to get breached I would use that to patch up the damage."

"Do you not need this?" She asked. Even as she said it the sky above them grew easier to see, or at least the torches at the top of the elevator did.

"Oh, I've got like.... at least seven more of those." He said simply. "Plus a full repair kit in the pack in my drake's saddle bags."

"Why are you giving it to me?" She asked.

He looked confused for a moment. "So you and your people, and maybe the prince's, can see if you're able to make anything similar." He said. "You said you've longed for a way to get more visitors in the Crag. I... I can't give you the suit." He said with a slight grimace. "I only have the one. Plus there's some stuff in these that I don't think my leadership would like me giving away. But... the most important part of it is the suit material. I think you guys can probably magic up a breathing apparatus that's probably even better than mine though." He leaned closer and tapped at his filter pack. "This thing's good. But between you and me, it is starting to smell um.... well.... a bit too sweaty... in here." He said with a grin.

The Voice of Crag listened to him before leaning back and bellowing hearty laughter. For a moment James wondered if maybe he'd been a bit too familiar with the world leader. Then she clutched the small piece of rubber and adhesive close to her chest.

"I thank you mister Choi." She said. "Both for a most sincere gift. And for one of the most sincere conversations I've had in years."

The elevator rumbled to a clanging stop, startling James even as he realized that he could SEE again.

Gorna and the Lady Melady were both waiting at the platform, along with a few other members of Alixan's staff, and several of Baly's orc staff.

"Ah Lady Melady." Baly said happily as the two women embraced for a moment, it was a touch awkward as Baly was nearly two feet taller than the half elf swords-woman. "Did you bring it?" She asked as she quickly held Melady back a bit.

"I'm afraid I forgot them." The tall human woman said with a not-terribly-convincing look of upset on her face. Then she smiled. "Of course I did dear." As if by magic, and James couldn't rule that out, a large tin appeared from behind her back.

"Oh!" The Voice of Crag exclaimed. "I do so love your people's spiced fruits. I will have to fend the children off with a stick when I get back down there."

The two of them continued talking as James simply smiled and walked over to Gorna, who was looking at him curiously. It took him a moment to realize why.

James pulled the velcro around his neck loose and quickly unrolled the seal around it. He ripped the helmet/hood off in a rush.

"OH THAT SMELLS SO GOOD!" He yelled, drawing the attention of the others without care as he took long, deep, breaths of the fresh air. "Oooooooh... yeah....." He said with satisfaction as Glag grabbed at the headpiece curiously. James let him have it without even thinking as he continued savoring fresh air. Then he turned to Gorna. "She still up there?" He asked.

"My lady is not expected to return until the morning." She said with a hint of sorrow.

James looked up at the massive spire in question.

"She'll be alright." He said.

And hoped like hell he was right.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1362w6c/wait_is_this_just_gate_352/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (350/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I know I've been gone. I'm fine. Medical issue is all but resolved. But Jury duty is back on for three more days. Be back friday if I have the mental energy left. Then ideally back to normal next week.

Until then, enjoy.

EDIT/PS: The Voice/Baly is voiced by Susan Sarandon. I have spoken.

\~

"You alright back there?" Alixan asked as he rotated in his harness so that he could look back and down at Amina and the three other people that had come along with them.

"I'm fine!" Amina yelled back as she set another piton into one of the numerous holes left by either previous climbers or by perching griffins. She struggled for a moment as the concealing cloak she was wearing got in her way, but after a smack from her hammer the piton set.

"Fine here." Said one of the other hikers, a Hisstian by the name of Gromek. The few others signaled the same. Though both Alixan and Amina doubted the status of the last two climbers, both of whom looked exhausted. One of them at least had the advantage of already having wings, so a fall wouldn't kill them unless something went wrong. The dwarf was another matter entirely.

"Hourly reminder." Alixan said as he turned back around and adjusted his cloak for a moment. "This is done at your own will and your own pace. You can turn around at any time. Or drop your marker and get retrieved by my men. You can also take breaks for as long as you want. No time limit. Your safety and survival are between you and the griffins." Then he placed his foot on the next foothold and began climbing again.

Amina shook her head for a moment and cleared it. Then she began climbing as well.

And she tried not to pay attention to the writhing mass of life that flew above them all in a murmuration larger than the entire capital city.

Somewhere up there was a griffin just for her.

"We're almost at the worm-trail." Alixan said. "Another few hundred feet and we'll take lunch there."

Amina redoubled her efforts.

\--------------------------

"Very few plants live here in the Crag." The Voice of Crag, Baly, said as she saw James's wide eyes through the front of his visor. "Only one of them is any good at building things. And even then, mostly as a fabric."

"Sooo.... ivory?" James asked as he looked at the palace.

"Is one of our most common building materials. Especially from before we'd made contact with the surface world and established trade." She replied as she pulled him back into motion again. "Which is when the palace was built."

"What.... makes a piece of ivory that big?" He asked, legitimate fear in his voice.

"Nothing." She answered easily. "It is not one piece but many. Fused via magical manipulation."

"So.... Bones?"

"Bones." She answered.

And in spite of the eeriness of that fact, James couldn't deny that the craftsmanship of the building was incredible.

The other buildings they'd passed on the way through the town, and it's vastly diminished miasma, had barely qualified to be called buildings. Most of them were more akin to tents that reinforced the Bedouin vibes that Baly's robes and facial coverings had reminded him of. And the few actual ESTABLISHED buildings had mostly been made of solidified clay or mud of some kind, further reinforcing the sense that he was in the old middle east somehow.

The palace on the other hand, was nothing like any of them.

It wasn't quite a pagoda. It wasn't tall enough for starters. Nor was it as massive as the sprawling estate of the Vatrian emperor or the Castle grounds of King Farrick. But the shape was similar enough to a pagoda that James couldn't dismiss the name in his mind. Also, rather than a massive spire or spike at its apex, it had a massive spiraling horn that appeared to be made of some kind of copper, and wound down to the side of the top most level.

She stopped them directly outside the gate to the (somewhat) modest compound.

"\[The voice returns to the throat of its people.\]" She said in the language James had heard her and the other orcs in the town speaking amongst each other. He silently congratulated himself for remembering to put on his medallion BEFORE he put on his M.O.P.P. gear.

The guards there, looking indistinguishable from the two flanking them on the trip through town, bowed slightly and moved aside.

Then they moved swiftly back into their original position, massive dual sided swords crossed, and barring entry to the small throng of orcs that had fawned over James as he'd walked through the town.

His suit still read almost one hundred and ninety hours.

"Welcome to my palace." Baly said as she released his hand and gestured out at the yard in front of him.

James had seen images of pre-war Japanese gardens that wouldn't have held a candle to what lay within the walls.

"Wooooah." He said as he quickly strode over to one of the small ponds within. Behind him, Glag picked up a handful of the small, smooth, black rocks that were evenly spread throughout the courtyard. "A rock garden?"

"You're familiar with them?" Baly asked as she saw him kneel over to inspect the water. "Careful." She warned as she saw him reach out to touch it.

"No fish?" He asked as he looked back over at her. "Guessing the miasma kills them?"

The water in front of him splashed a bit, causing him to look back at it. He immediately leapt up and back as something squirmed back into the water, disappointed at not being able to reach his outstretched hand.

"What the hell was that?" He asked as he peered at the little, semi-iridescent, slimy tail that slunk back into the dark water.

"Crag eels." She said as she pulled something from a hidden pouch and tossed it into the water. "One of the few creatures that can survive down here besides us." She tossed the object, a piece of dried meat, into the water.

James's eyes went wide as he watched the entirety of the pond explode into motion as the morsel neared its surface. When it landed the water broke out into a feeding frenzy, and James thought he heard teeth snapping and gnashing, and soon saw the surface of the water froth with greenish color.

"Are they?" He began.

"They sometimes make the mistake of biting each other. Then things get somewhat..... disgusting." She said calmly. "We should move away. You can't smell this. Or at least I assume not, in that suit. But I assure you it gets quite horrendous."

James saw no issue with leaving the startlingly carnivorous pond where it was. Glag reached down and tried to touch the water. One of the eels reached up to nip at his hand, before quickly recoiling back.

"Glag. Leave that alone." James said, causing the rock monster to look at him curiously, as he turned to move away.

"You know of rock gardens?" Baly asked as she walked beside him, calm compared to his sudden unease.

"Um.. yeah." He answered as he looked around at the, admittedly intimidating, primarily black rock garden around them. There were a few large boulders scattered around the yard. Unlike the rock gardens he'd seen in pictures, these weren't solitary, but rather seemed to function as display pieces for various trophies, ranging from animal skulls to ancient looking weapons, to one statue that reminded him of the statue of David, only smaller and of one of the fish people he'd seen before. "Few differences." He added. "The ones on my world are typically white or grey stones. Sometimes sort of... sand colored. But... I've seen a few images of darker variants. They got really popular for a while after um.... some issues we had with water."

She looked at him curiously at the mention of the water. But she assumed it was something that required extensive explanation. Which meant it could be discussed later.

"We prefer them because of the lack of plants." She admitted. "This one was designed by my grandfather. The eels were my father's, a gift to my mother."

"I'd say that that's impressive." James said hesitantly. "But the eels kind of threw me off there." He thought for a moment. "What do you intend to leave for your children? Do you.... have children?" He thought for another moment. "Sorry. Is that too personal of a question?"

"It's fine." She said as she sat on one of the unadorned boulders. "And I haven't married yet. But I was thinking..... a small fountain... perhaps with seats built in around its edges."

James dusted off one of the ones next to her and sat down. Glag stomped over and looked at him for a moment, then reached down and attempted to dust off some of the black rocks on the ground before slamming down on them on his butt. Baly chuckled at the sight, even as James watched him curiously.

"How did you bond a Glag?" The Voice asked as she saw the small sandstone elemental make itself comfy, or at least its version of it, in her rock garden.

"I turned him into a meteor." James said simply. "Kind of... broke... an arena."

Her eyebrows rose at that. She'd already known about his little debacle in Vatria. What good world leader wouldn't by now? But to hear him confirm it was a bit different.

"I understand the emperor is quite cross with you." She said. "And next you travel south into the land of zealots?"

"In my defense, I already paid the repair bill." He said with a shrug. And he had, a letter with the disclosed amount had been waiting for him in Alixan's office. It had had a lot of zeroes in it. "And yeah. I've been told about the people south of here. I already know to stay on my toes, and let Amina do all the talking."

She let out a small laugh. "Speaking of children and your new wife." She said, causing him to startle a bit. "You're expecting a child?"

"You could tell?" He asked.

Her eyes showed that she was smiling underneath her face coverings again.

"Can you not sense the magic welling within her?" Baly asked with a hand over her stomach. "Little concentration spot where it's growing."

He had, so he nodded. "Was gonna ask Alixan about that." He admitted. "Wasn't a hundred percent sure on it. That's normal?"

"It is." She replied with nod. She looked at him as he looked out at the pond, which was finally settling down. "You're nervous. Will it be your first?"

He gulped inside the suit. Then nodded.

"You two love each other."

"Yeah." He replied.

"That wasn't a question." She shot back. "Anyone who sees you two interact knows it. And nervousness is normal for a first time parent.... Which makes her current choice of endeavor curious."

James looked up into the miasma obscured sky in ,what he hoped was, the direction towards the massive spire his wife was currently climbing with little more than ropes and spikes.

"Yeah." He said solemnly as he looked back down at the garden. "Yeah I've been meaning to talk to her about that."

"Take it from someone who speaks on behalf of her people." The Voice said. "Clear communication is key."

James nodded.

They sat like that for a few silent minutes. James quietly scolded Glag as he ate several of the small black rocks. Then a gong sounded in the distance.

"That is the signal for evening meal." Baly said as she stood and held her hand out for him once more. "Come. Join me. My people have already marveled at your suit. Let's let them ACTUALLY meet you."

"That poses some slight logistical issues." He said as he gestured to Glag, who quickly stood up and took his hand. "I can't um.... well, I can't eat any EXTERNAL food in this thing."

\----------

Driscoll watched from a balcony as Vickers and Batista led the remaining P.O.W.s through morning P.T. The two of them were leading them through the last few stretches before they would leave for a run.

Behind them Five was rapidly climbing up and down different sections of the castle's outer wall, seemingly using the various crenelations and other markers as checkpoints as she rapidly scuttled up and down its side. He knew she was likely going to join them on the run. She... had a lot of energy now.

He looked down at his hands.

The claws on them weren't as long or as sharp as the ones Vickers now had. Nor were his hands anywhere near as muscular. None of him was for that matter. But his hands were significantly larger, with long fingers. He worried at a small bit of his fur that had gotten stuck in the small bit of skin right at the base of the nails.

His ears flicked forward and his head quickly turned at the sound of a whistle. Batista was signalling for the group to begin following him while Vickers bounded the twenty yards or so and up to the top of the wall. He was yelling something at Five about leaving the castle guards alone. Driscoll wondered at the fact that he could hear that even from here.

He watched as the group turned to follow the former sergeant, though a few of them lingered behind a bit. Some of them watching Vickers' display of athleticism, some of them simply complaining about having to run.

Those are ACTUAL soldiers. He thought as he looked at them. Even the complainers. Though they're probably actually air force, or maybe navy. What am I now? He wondered as he looked down at his legs.

He thought about it for another few minutes. Until long after the PT group had gone through the side gate and began running out in the more rural part of the capital. He could still smell the sweat from the group lingering on the air.

"Fuck if I know." He said softly as he planted a hand on the railing in front of him and vaulted over it. He dropped the fifty or so feet and landed in a crouch that looked like something from a superhero movie. Same as initial boot sequence. He thought as he stood up and loped into an easy job that was likely faster than any of the POW's could sprint at. One foot in front of the other until you've crossed the room. Rinse and repeat until calibrated.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1351igc/wait_is_this_just_gate_351/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (350/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I know I've been gone. I'm fine. Medical issue is all but resolved. But Jury duty is back on for three more days. Be back friday if I have the mental energy left. Then ideally back to normal next week.

Until then, enjoy.

EDIT/PS: The Voice/Baly is voiced by Susan Sarandon. I have spoken.

\~

"You alright back there?" Alixan asked as he rotated in his harness so that he could look back and down at Amina and the three other people that had come along with them.

"I'm fine!" Amina yelled back as she set another piton into one of the numerous holes left by either previous climbers or by perching griffins. She struggled for a moment as the concealing cloak she was wearing got in her way, but after a smack from her hammer the piton set.

"Fine here." Said one of the other hikers, a Hisstian by the name of Gromek. The few others signaled the same. Though both Alixan and Amina doubted the status of the last two climbers, both of whom looked exhausted. One of them at least had the advantage of already having wings, so a fall wouldn't kill them unless something went wrong. The dwarf was another matter entirely.

"Hourly reminder." Alixan said as he turned back around and adjusted his cloak for a moment. "This is done at your own will and your own pace. You can turn around at any time. Or drop your marker and get retrieved by my men. You can also take breaks for as long as you want. No time limit. Your safety and survival are between you and the griffins." Then he placed his foot on the next foothold and began climbing again.

Amina shook her head for a moment and cleared it. Then she began climbing as well.

And she tried not to pay attention to the writhing mass of life that flew above them all in a murmuration larger than the entire capital city.

Somewhere up there was a griffin just for her.

"We're almost at the worm-trail." Alixan said. "Another few hundred feet and we'll take lunch there."

Amina redoubled her efforts.

\---

"Very few plants live here in the Crag." The Voice of Crag, Baly, said as she saw James's wide eyes through the front of his visor. "Only one of them is any good at building things. And even then, mostly as a fabric."

"Sooo.... ivory?" James asked as he looked at the palace.

"Is one of our most common building materials. Especially from before we'd made contact with the surface world and established trade." She replied as she pulled him back into motion again. "Which is when the palace was built."

"What.... makes a piece of ivory that big?" He asked, legitimate fear in his voice.

"Nothing." She answered easily. "It is not one piece but many. Fused via magical manipulation."

"So.... Bones?"

"Bones." She answered.

And in spite of the eeriness of that fact, James couldn't deny that the craftsmanship of the building was incredible.

The other buildings they'd passed on the way through the town, and it's vastly diminished miasma, had barely qualified to be called buildings. Most of them were more akin to tents that reinforced the Bedouin vibes that Baly's robes and facial coverings had reminded him of. And the few actual ESTABLISHED buildings had mostly been made of solidified clay or mud of some kind, further reinforcing the sense that he was in the old middle east somehow.

The palace on the other hand, was nothing like any of them.

It wasn't quite a pagoda. It wasn't tall enough for starters. Nor was it as massive as the sprawling estate of the Vatrian emperor or the Castle grounds of King Farrick. But the shape was similar enough to a pagoda that James couldn't dismiss the name in his mind. Also, rather than a massive spire or spike at its apex, it had a massive spiraling horn that appeared to be made of some kind of copper, and wound down to the side of the top most level.

She stopped them directly outside the gate to the (somewhat) modest compound.

"\[The voice returns to the throat of its people.\]" She said in the language James had heard her and the other orcs in the town speaking amongst each other. He silently congratulated himself for remembering to put on his medallion BEFORE he put on his M.O.P.P. gear.

The guards there, looking indistinguishable from the two flanking them on the trip through town, bowed slightly and moved aside.

Then they moved swiftly back into their original position, massive dual sided swords crossed, and barring entry to the small throng of orcs that had fawned over James as he'd walked through the town.

His suit still read almost one hundred and ninety hours.

"Welcome to my palace." Baly said as she released his hand and gestured out at the yard in front of him.

James had seen images of pre-war Japanese gardens that wouldn't have held a candle to what lay within the walls.

"Wooooah." He said as he quickly strode over to one of the small ponds within. Behind him, Glag picked up a handful of the small, smooth, black rocks that were evenly spread throughout the courtyard. "A rock garden?"

"You're familiar with them?" Baly asked as she saw him kneel over to inspect the water. "Careful." She warned as she saw him reach out to touch it.

"No fish?" He asked as he looked back over at her. "Guessing the miasma kills them?"

The water in front of him splashed a bit, causing him to look back at it. He immediately leapt up and back as something squirmed back into the water, disappointed at not being able to reach his outstretched hand.

"What the hell was that?" He asked as he peered at the little, semi-iridescent, slimy tail that slunk back into the dark water.

"Crag eels." She said as she pulled something from a hidden pouch and tossed it into the water. "One of the few creatures that can survive down here besides us." She tossed the object, a piece of dried meat, into the water.

James's eyes went wide as he watched the entirety of the pond explode into motion as the morsel neared its surface. When it landed the water broke out into a feeding frenzy, and James thought he heard teeth snapping and gnashing, and soon saw the surface of the water froth with greenish color.

"Are they?" He began.

"They sometimes make the mistake of biting each other. Then things get somewhat..... disgusting." She said calmly. "We should move away. You can't smell this. Or at least I assume not, in that suit. But I assure you it gets quite horrendous."

James saw no issue with leaving the startlingly carnivorous pond where it was. Glag reached down and tried to touch the water. One of the eels reached up to nip at his hand, before quickly recoiling back.

"Glag. Leave that alone." James said, causing the rock monster to look at him curiously, as he turned to move away.

"You know of rock gardens?" Baly asked as she walked beside him, calm compared to his sudden unease.

"Um.. yeah." He answered as he looked around at the, admittedly intimidating, primarily black rock garden around them. There were a few large boulders scattered around the yard. Unlike the rock gardens he'd seen in pictures, these weren't solitary, but rather seemed to function as display pieces for various trophies, ranging from animal skulls to ancient looking weapons, to one statue that reminded him of the statue of David, only smaller and of one of the fish people he'd seen before. "Few differences." He added. "The ones on my world are typically white or grey stones. Sometimes sort of... sand colored. But... I've seen a few images of darker variants. They got really popular for a while after um.... some issues we had with water."

She looked at him curiously at the mention of the water. But she assumed it was something that required extensive explanation. Which meant it could be discussed later.

"We prefer them because of the lack of plants." She admitted. "This one was designed by my grandfather. The eels were my father's, a gift to my mother."

"I'd say that that's impressive." James said hesitantly. "But the eels kind of threw me off there." He thought for a moment. "What do you intend to leave for your children? Do you.... have children?" He thought for another moment. "Sorry. Is that too personal of a question?"

"It's fine." She said as she sat on one of the unadorned boulders. "And I haven't married yet. But I was thinking..... a small fountain... perhaps with seats built in around its edges."

James dusted off one of the ones next to her and sat down. Glag stomped over and looked at him for a moment, then reached down and attempted to dust off some of the black rocks on the ground before slamming down on them on his butt. Baly chuckled at the sight, even as James watched him curiously.

"How did you bond a Glag?" The Voice asked as she saw the small sandstone elemental make itself comfy, or at least its version of it, in her rock garden.

"I turned him into a meteor." James said simply. "Kind of... broke... an arena."

Her eyebrows rose at that. She'd already known about his little debacle in Vatria. What good world leader wouldn't by now? But to hear him confirm it was a bit different.

"I understand the emperor is quite cross with you." She said. "And next you travel south into the land of zealots?"

"In my defense, I already paid the repair bill." He said with a shrug. And he had, a letter with the disclosed amount had been waiting for him in Alixan's office. It had had a lot of zeroes in it. "And yeah. I've been told about the people south of here. I already know to stay on my toes, and let Amina do all the talking."

She let out a small laugh. "Speaking of children and your new wife." She said, causing him to startle a bit. "You're expecting a child?"

"You could tell?" He asked.

Her eyes showed that she was smiling underneath her face coverings again.

"Can you not sense the magic welling within her?" Baly asked with a hand over her stomach. "Little concentration spot where it's growing."

He had, so he nodded. "Was gonna ask Alixan about that." He admitted. "Wasn't a hundred percent sure on it. That's normal?"

"It is." She replied with nod. She looked at him as he looked out at the pond, which was finally settling down. "You're nervous. Will it be your first?"

He gulped inside the suit. Then nodded.

"You two love each other."

"Yeah." He replied.

"That wasn't a question." She shot back. "Anyone who sees you two interact knows it. And nervousness is normal for a first time parent.... Which makes her current choice of endeavor curious."

James looked up into the miasma obscured sky in ,what he hoped was, the direction towards the massive spire his wife was currently climbing with little more than ropes and spikes.

"Yeah." He said solemnly as he looked back down at the garden. "Yeah I've been meaning to talk to her about that."

"Take it from someone who speaks on behalf of her people." The Voice said. "Clear communication is key."

James nodded.

They sat like that for a few silent minutes. James quietly scolded Glag as he ate several of the small black rocks. Then a gong sounded in the distance.

"That is the signal for evening meal." Baly said as she stood and held her hand out for him once more. "Come. Join me. My people have already marveled at your suit. Let's let them ACTUALLY meet you."

"That poses some slight logistical issues." He said as he gestured to Glag, who quickly stood up and took his hand. "I can't um.... well, I can't eat any EXTERNAL food in this thing."

\----------

Driscoll watched from a balcony as Vickers and Batista led the remaining P.O.W.s through morning P.T. The two of them were leading them through the last few stretches before they would leave for a run.

Behind them Five was rapidly climbing up and down different sections of the castle's outer wall, seemingly using the various crenelations and other markers as checkpoints as she rapidly scuttled up and down its side. He knew she was likely going to join them on the run. She... had a lot of energy now.

He looked down at his hands.

The claws on them weren't as long or as sharp as the ones Vickers now had. Nor were his hands anywhere near as muscular. None of him was for that matter. But his hands were significantly larger, with long fingers. He worried at a small bit of his fur that had gotten stuck in the small bit of skin right at the base of the nails.

His ears flicked forward and his head quickly turned at the sound of a whistle. Batista was signalling for the group to begin following him while Vickers bounded the twenty yards or so and up to the top of the wall. He was yelling something at Five about leaving the castle guards alone. Driscoll wondered at the fact that he could hear that even from here.

He watched as the group turned to follow the former sergeant, though a few of them lingered behind a bit. Some of them watching Vickers' display of athleticism, some of them simply complaining about having to run.

Those are ACTUAL soldiers. He thought as he looked at them. Even the complainers. Though they're probably actually air force, or maybe navy. What am I now? He wondered as he looked down at his legs.

He thought about it for another few minutes. Until long after the PT group had gone through the side gate and began running out in the more rural part of the capital. He could still smell the sweat from the group lingering on the air.

"Fuck if I know." He said softly as he planted a hand on the railing in front of him and vaulted over it. He dropped the fifty or so feet and landed in a crouch that looked like something from a superhero movie. Same as initial boot sequence. He thought as he stood up and loped into an easy jog that was likely faster than any of the POW's could sprint at. One foot in front of the other until you've crossed the room. Rinse and repeat until calibrated.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1351gn8/wait_is_this_just_gate_351/?utm_source=share&utm_medium=android_app&utm_name=androidcss&utm_term=1&utm_content=share_button)

Wait, is this just GATE? (349/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Driscoll may seem ignorant. But he's gone nearly two decades not knowing anything outside his suit. It's a strange new world for him.

Enjoy.

\~

As James and Baly, AKA the Voice of Crag, walked through the miasma at the bottom of the Crag he began to understand the reason walking hand in hand was so significant to the Orcs here.

He.... could not.... see.... anything.

The clear visor on his helmet/hood was all but useless. All he could see was the dark, constantly shifting, purple haze of the miasma. It was so dark that it was effectively black. He was reminded of footage he'd seen of some of the deep sea operations that guys like Vickers, and potentially the Muck Marchers, had undergone during the wars. Deep dives at night where visibility had been all but nonexistent.

And yet The Voice walked with pure confidence. Her stride never seemed to slow or stumble in the slightest, and the few times when he caught glimpses of the dark forms that he assumed were her guards, they seemed relaxed.

She also seemed to understand his needs. After roughly half an hour she paused and spoke.

"Do you need rest?" She asked, causing him to wonder if he had stumbled or gave some sign of exhaustion, though he was certain that he hadn't.

"I'm doing okay." He replied. "Feeling a touch claustrophobic. But that's not too surprising given my current situation."

"How is your suit working?"

James pulled his hand free of Glag's and pressed the readout on his wrist up against his visor.

>Filt. Stat. = 98.5%Air Circ.= goodRec./Exf. Time = 198.7HRS

There were a few other stats to read. But they were mostly things for a medic to check in case he got hit in a fight, and would only be important in this situation if any of them turned red.

"Everything is reading fine." He said. "Far as the suit is concerned I'm totally okay."

"Glad to hear." Baly said. "Shall we continue? It's only another mile or so."

"Let's get to it." James said as he held his hand out. Glag took it, though James wasn't sure how he could see.

Thirty minutes later and James felt the ground beneath his feet change. He also saw light, albeit faintly.

"We are here." Baly said as she slowed. She pulled James's hand and placed it on a rope. "Pull." She said.

James did, and felt that it was attached to an incredible amount of weight. But he kept pulling.

BONG!!!!

James practically leaped at the sound of the massive ringing noise.

"One more time." She said.

James followed the instructions not jumping, as much, this time when the massive gonging noise sounded.

The purple in front of his visor cleared a little bit as the light he'd seen earlier brightened significantly.

Suddenly James wasn't looking at an inky, swirling, so dark it was almost black, purple miasma. Instead he was looking at a street lined in houses that reminded him of pagodas only smaller. The miasma was still there, but it was reduced. It had been reduced from a zero visibility fog, to what was now closer to a light mist. He still couldn't see more than a hundred yards or so. But he could see.

And even in that small radius of visibility, James saw more Orcs, in more shapes, colorations, and sizes, than James had seen in his entire time at the capital.

"THE VOICE RETURNS!" One of Baly's guards announced loudly. "AND BRINGS THE FIRST UPWORLDER TO EVER VISIT UNDER THEIR OWN POWER AND WITH NO MAGIC!"

This caused all the people on the bustling street to pause and gawk.

Then they began to approach.

"Congratulations James." Baly said as she patted his hand and stepped forward to address her people. "You're a pioneer."

\----------

Driscoll sat on the chair as Dr. Shaw went over all his vitals and muscular reflexes.

He didn't understand the purpose of it. Dr. Shaw WAS a doctor, sure, but his medical education was primarily focused on advanced prosthetics, and of course, cyberization. He wasn't exactly a physical therapist or anything. Hell, he even deferred to the other two Toolies when it came to surgical matters. he was closer to an engineer than to an actual medical practitioner.

Still. He'd made a point of giving both him and Five a once over every few days as they underwent the full cycle of their monthly transformation.

"Were we... just weapons?" Driscoll asked as the doctor checked the range of motion.

Dr. Shaw looked up, surprised at the unexpected question. Then went back to his inspection.

"Course you were." He said firmly as he moved up to Driscoll's knee.

Driscoll looked at him with mild shock.

"Have been since the second you let the first few doctors cut you up so you could fit into a suit. Hell before that even. When you signed you name on the dotted line saying you were willing to die for the chance to walk again. And willin' to kill to pay for it." Shaw finished.

"What's that make you?" Driscoll asked, mildly offended at how plainly the man had stated something that he'd only recently become insecure about.

"A gunsmith." Shaw said easily. "Or a tank mechanic. Or an old school sword and shield blacksmith. I just have a bit of medical knowledge to help."

"That's all?" Driscoll asked.

Shaw sat back and looked at Driscoll, who was now several feet taller than the doctor, rather than just a few inches.

"Son I didn't make the deep sea suits y'all wear." Shaw said with a sigh. "I didn't come up with the surgeries or the medical setup that put y'all in em or kept you alive with half your bodies missing. I didn't sign on until the program had already been up and running for three years."

"Still. You kept us up and moving." Driscoll countered.

"What was I supposed to do?" Shaw shot back. "Government was paying me enough to keep my kids out of the slums and away from the shores. And you expect me to see a child in a mechanical suit, one barely older than my youngest more often than not, and NOT do what I can to help keep em alive? I may not have ever approved of the mission. But I myself wasn't the one pullin triggers. I was just fixing the ones that did."

The two of them sat in silence for a while as the doctor continued his checks.

"What am I now?" Driscoll asked. Causing the doctor to look at him again, though this time with less surprise.

"Hammer don't stop being a hammer just because it switches from nails to chisels. Gun don't stop being a gun just because it shoots deer instead of people." Shaw said.

"So you still just see me as a weapon?" Driscoll asked.

"I see you as the thing THEY made you all those years ago. Aint nothin' wrong with calling something what it is." Shaw answered. "The only difference is that now that you've undergone this transformation of yours, I don't see why you gotta answer to anyone. Don't see why you ever gotta pick up a gun ever again, save for choosin' to."

Driscoll lifted his leg up, showing off the magical anklet there.

"Still got one master." He said with just a bit of venom.

Shaw sat back and looked at the anklet for a moment. Then pressed the leg back down.

"I don't know this Vickers too well outside of how he had us caring for you." Shaw said, somewhat more softly now. "So I guess you'd be a better person to ask this question than me. But if you CHOSE not to fight. To just sit back and enjoy the new life. Would he FORCE a weapon into your hand? I think that's the difference. Choi sure wouldn't. Got the sense that that little guy was just fine letting you go whichever way you went."

Driscoll thought about that question. And for once, legitimately didn't know the answer.

"Everything's looking good Driscoll." Shaw said as he finished writing the last of his notes on the chart he'd been writing on during the checkup. "You can go relax."

Driscoll nodded and got up to put his robes back on.

Dr. Shaw made to leave, but stopped in the door.

"You know." He began as he looked back at Driscoll. "Of your squad, you're the last one to ask any of us that." He counted off on his fingers. "Doc was first. Few of the others asked a few years later. Rodriguez asked about two years ago." He shrugged. "Five asked back when we were saving her from the damage she got out in the desert. Though I doubt she remembers."

Then he walked out, closing the door behind him and leaving Driscoll to think of what that said of him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12y0phn/wait_is_this_just_gate_350/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (349/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Driscoll may seem ignorant. But he's gone nearly two decades not knowing anything outside his suit. It's a strange new world for him.

Enjoy.

\~

As James and Baly, AKA the Voice of Crag, walked through the miasma at the bottom of the Crag he began to understand the reason walking hand in hand was so significant to the Orcs here.

He.... could not.... see.... anything.

The clear visor on his helmet/hood was all but useless. All he could see was the dark, constantly shifting, purple haze of the miasma. It was so dark that it was effectively black. He was reminded of footage he'd seen of some of the deep sea operations that guys like Vickers, and potentially the Muck Marchers, had undergone during the wars. Deep dives at night where visibility had been all but nonexistent.

And yet The Voice walked with pure confidence. Her stride never seemed to slow or stumble in the slightest, and the few times when he caught glimpses of the dark forms that he assumed were her guards, they seemed relaxed.

She also seemed to understand his needs. After roughly half an hour she paused and spoke.

"Do you need rest?" She asked, causing him to wonder if he had stumbled or gave some sign of exhaustion, though he was certain that he hadn't.

"I'm doing okay." He replied. "Feeling a touch claustrophobic. But that's not too surprising given my current situation."

"How is your suit working?"

James pulled his hand free of Glag's and pressed the readout on his wrist up against his visor.

>Filt. Stat. = 98.5%
>
>Air Circ.= good
>
>Rec./Exf. Time = 198.7HRS

There were a few other stats to read. But they were mostly things for a medic to check in case he got hit in a fight, and would only be important in this situation if any of them turned red.

"Everything is reading fine." He said. "Far as the suit is concerned I'm totally okay."

"Glad to hear." Baly said. "Shall we continue? It's only another mile or so."

"Let's get to it." James said as he held his hand out. Glag took it, though James wasn't sure how he could see.

Thirty minutes later and James felt the ground beneath his feet change. He also saw light, albeit faintly.

"We are here." Baly said as she slowed. She pulled James's hand and placed it on a rope. "Pull." She said.

James did, and felt that it was attached to an incredible amount of weight. But he kept pulling.

BONG!!!!

James practically leaped at the sound of the massive ringing noise.

"One more time." She said.

James followed the instructions not jumping, as much, this time when the massive gonging noise sounded.

The purple in front of his visor cleared a little bit as the light he'd seen earlier brightened significantly.

Suddenly James wasn't looking at an inky, swirling, so dark it was almost black, purple miasma. Instead he was looking at a street lined in houses that reminded him of pagodas only smaller. The miasma was still there, but it was reduced. It had been reduced from a zero visibility fog, to what was now closer to a light mist. He still couldn't see more than a hundred yards or so. But he could see.

And even in that small radius of visibility, James saw more Orcs, in more shapes, colorations, and sizes, than James had seen in his entire time at the capital.

"THE VOICE RETURNS!" One of Baly's guards announced loudly. "AND BRINGS THE FIRST UPWORLDER TO EVER VISIT UNDER THEIR OWN POWER AND WITH NO MAGIC!"

This caused all the people on the bustling street to pause and gawk.

Then they began to approach.

"Congratulations James." Baly said as she patted his hand and stepped forward to address her people. "You're a pioneer."

\----------

Driscoll sat on the chair as Dr. Shaw went over all his vitals and muscular reflexes.

He didn't understand the purpose of it. Dr. Shaw WAS a doctor, sure, but his medical education was primarily focused on advanced prosthetics, and of course, cyberization. He wasn't exactly a physical therapist or anything. Hell, he even deferred to the other two Toolies when it came to surgical matters. he was closer to an engineer than to an actual medical practitioner.

Still. He'd made a point of giving both him and Five a once over every few days as they underwent the full cycle of their monthly transformation.

"Were we... just weapons?" Driscoll asked as the doctor checked the range of motion.

Dr. Shaw looked up, surprised at the unexpected question. Then went back to his inspection.

"Course you were." He said firmly as he moved up to Driscoll's knee.

Driscoll looked at him with mild shock.

"Have been since the second you let the first few doctors cut you up so you could fit into a suit. Hell before that even. When you signed you name on the dotted line saying you were willing to die for the chance to walk again. And willin' to kill to pay for it." Shaw finished.

"What's that make you?" Driscoll asked, mildly offended at how plainly the man had stated something that he'd only recently become insecure about.

"A gunsmith." Shaw said easily. "Or a tank mechanic. Or an old school sword and shield blacksmith. I just have a bit of medical knowledge to help."

"That's all?" Driscoll asked.

Shaw sat back and looked at Driscoll, who was now several feet taller than the doctor, rather than just a few inches.

"Son I didn't make the deep sea suits y'all wear." Shaw said with a sigh. "I didn't come up with the surgeries or the medical setup that put y'all in em or kept you alive with half your bodies missing. I didn't sign on until the program had already been up and running for three years."

"Still. You kept us up and moving." Driscoll countered.

"What was I supposed to do?" Shaw shot back. "Government was paying me enough to keep my kids out of the slums and away from the shores. And you expect me to see a child in a mechanical suit, one barely older than my youngest more often than not, and NOT do what I can to help keep em alive? I may not have ever approved of the mission. But I myself wasn't the one pullin triggers. I was just fixing the ones that did."

The two of them sat in silence for a while as the doctor continued his checks.

"What am I now?" Driscoll asked. Causing the doctor to look at him again, though this time with less surprise.

"Hammer don't stop being a hammer just because it switches from nails to chisels. Gun don't stop being a gun just because it shoots deer instead of people." Shaw said.

"So you still just see me as a weapon?" Driscoll asked.

"I see you as the thing THEY made you all those years ago. Aint nothin' wrong with calling something what it is." Shaw answered. "The only difference is that now that you've undergone this transformation of yours, I don't see why you gotta answer to anyone. Don't see why you ever gotta pick up a gun ever again, save for choosin' to."

Driscoll lifted his leg up, showing off the magical anklet there.

"Still got one master." He said with just a bit of venom.

Shaw sat back and looked at the anklet for a moment. Then pressed the leg back down.

"I don't know this Vickers too well outside of how he had us caring for you." Shaw said, somewhat more softly now. "So I guess you'd be a better person to ask this question than me. But if you CHOSE not to fight. To just sit back and enjoy the new life. Would he FORCE a weapon into your hand? I think that's the difference. Choi sure wouldn't. Got the sense that that little guy was just fine letting you go whichever way you went."

Driscoll thought about that question. And for once, legitimately didn't know the answer.

"Everything's looking good Driscoll." Shaw said as he finished writing the last of his notes on the chart he'd been writing on during the checkup. "You can go relax."

Driscoll nodded and got up to put his robes back on.

Dr. Shaw made to leave, but stopped in the door.

"You know." He began as he looked back at Driscoll. "Of your squad, you're the last one to ask any of us that." He counted off on his fingers. "Doc was first. Few of the others asked a few years later. Rodriguez asked about two years ago." He shrugged. "Five asked back when we were saving her from the damage she got out in the desert. Though I doubt she remembers."

Then he walked out, closing the door behind him and leaving Driscoll to think of what that said of him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12y0m2k/wait_is_this_just_gate_350/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (348/?)

Previous

Writer's note: AAAaaaayyyy James only KIND OF put his foot in his mouth.

And hey look. Veliry is still being a boss ass little baddy. Nice.

Enjoy.

\~

"How are you doing?"

"Uhhh... So far so good." James replied as he peeked down at the small interface on his wrist. "Everything is reading okay."

"Not feeling dizzy or light headed?" The Voice asked.

"A little warmer than I like." James said with a chuckle. "But that's mostly just the suit and being nervous..... I hope."

"It's been nearly an hour. Shall we continue?" She asked.

James looked up at the platform some thirty or forty feet above them. He could see Gorna and Lady Melady, plus a few of Alixan's soldiers, standing at the edge and looking down at them. Though they were obscured by the pink mist between them and where James stood.

"Yeah." He said with only mildly uncertainty. "Might as well."

The Voice nodded and one of her guards tapped on the rope suspending the elevator. A moment later they began lowering again.

"Mind if I take a sample?" James asked after a few seconds.

"Of?" The Voice asked curiously.

James gestured around them. "The miasma." He answered. "Been kinda curious as to what it is and how it works. Maybe one of the people on Earth can figure it out."

"Go ahead." She replied. "My people believe that it is a gift from the gods. Meant to grant my people a safe place to live. Free from the outside world's influence if we so choose."

James gritted his teeth. The Voice must have heard it.

"You disapprove?" She asked.

James considered it for a moment. He didn't want to have a repeat of what had happened in Vatria. But he also didn't want to have to uphold a lie while he was down here. If he got this out of the way now and things went badly he could always have the elevator head back up and he could go back. But in a few hours that would stop being an option.

"I'm.... not a huge fan of the gods." He said simply.

"The prince has mentioned that you've.... literally... had run ins with them." She said. "And your arm confirms that to some extent."

"I have."

"And you dislike them?" She asked.

"For several reasons." He answered. "Is that an issue?"

"Not at all." She said, much to his surprise. "I am my people's spiritual leader. But not their religious leader. I mentioned wanting to find a way to have non-orc people capable of getting to the Crag without dying. If I really believed that the miasma was a gift from the gods then why would I do that?"

James thought of it. It was a good point.

"Who a person worships or doesn't is their choice and nobody else's." She continued. "Just don't let it cause any chaos in my homeland and there shouldn't be an issue."

"Glad to hear." He said. Then he turned a bit. "By the way. What's your ACTUAL name? In my head I've been thinking of you as THE VOICE... but that feels awkward."

The guards around her tensed, albeit only slightly. The Voice's eyes smiled again as she looked at him.

"You are an interesting one Mr. Choi." She said, her tone showing amusement. "It is Baly. Though I caution you to never let any of my people hear you call me that."

James winced a bit. "Did I just screw up something culturally?" He asked. "If so I'm sorry. I have a tendency to do that."

"A small one unique to my station." She admitted, still smiling. "But one that I have no issue with given that I highly doubt that you and the princess will make a habit of visiting. Besides, I've never understood that rule. And don't worry. You've done nothing worth stressing about." She looked at her nearest guard as she said this. The guard didn't say anything, but did make a point of turning to look away. James got the sense that that was her telling the two large orcs to simply ignore what had just happened.

The elevator touched down with a loud rumbling impact that made James wobble a bit.

"This is the first sub-level stop." Baly said as she held her hand out for him once more. "We have to transfer over to the next elevator. Come along Glag."

Glag looked at James, who nodded, and the two of them joined the Voice, Glag still holding onto his other hand.

James looked up as they walked the few yards to the next elevator. He couldn't even see the sky anymore, and had to guess that they'd dropped close to half a mile, if not more.

How deep is the Crag? He wondered as they stepped onto the next elevator platform.

\----------

"Ooookay." Veliry said as she finally managed to get where she'd been trying to go.

It had been a few days since she'd left Jadesport. Luckily the area outside the city where the bombs had dropped had been all but cleared by the army. Nothing had really survived the bombing. But there had still been dead burned trees for a few months after the battle. Now there was just miles and miles of open land, with the occasional stump or bit of newly grown scrub brush.

She'd had her enchanted carriage fit with wider, slightly textured, wagon wheels to help with the traversal of the area, especially since a lot of it was muddy now. But her horse had had no issues. She'd just had to take it slow.

She pulled the carriage up to one of the stumps left behind and used a hammer to sink a hooked spike into it. Then she pulled the horse out of it's harness and tied its bit to the spike.

"Be good Smepliesauce." She said as she patted the horse's muzzle and fished through one of her pockets for a salted piece of the fruit in question. The horse grunted happily as it munched on the salted fruit that was their namesake.

Then she began walking out and away from the horse and carriage and into the open land.

She walked for about an hour, judging that to be far enough that she wouldn't have to worry about the horse and carriage getting caught up in what she was about to do. She sat on a small rock outcropping for a moment and rubbed her feet. They hurt so much these days.

"Okay little one." She said while looking down at her belly with a pointed finger. She had noticed over the past week or so that that once flat stomach now had just a bit of roundness to it. "Do me a favor and just.... let me use my magic. Nobody is around and I'm not in danger. I just need to try something."

After another minute of resting her feet she stood up, grunting a bit as she did, and walked a few paces away from the rock she'd been resting on.

Then she began focusing. She'd been training for the past few weeks to try to get her powers back online. But the baby she was carrying had made it difficult beyond belief.

Still. She'd managed to get at least a few of her abilities to work with some level of reliability.

Like her flight.

The magical tattoos on her legs lit up with the light blue that they had been inked in as she began to slowly but surely rise up above the ground. She started slowly at first, making sure that the energy flow stayed nice and steady, but also making sure she didn't take too much from the baby either.

Once she got ten feet off the ground she sped up a bit until she got about fifty feet in the air. Then she focused on just hovering and keeping her eyes closed.

Now the hard part. She thought. Stay quiet in there for me okay.

She drew more energy into herself, and felt it begin coursing down her arms and settle in her hands. She focused it there and let it keep building, still focusing on keeping it flowing into her, and AROUND the unborn child, before getting to her hands.

When it had built up to a sufficient amount she initiated a spin. Nothing too fast. Roughly a full rotation every two seconds.

Then, as she angled her feet slightly back to preemptively counter the coming recoil, she brought her hands together and released the pent up magic there.

Once again, just like back in her lab, there was a loud whooshing noise, and she felt heat and wind blowing past her. This time she'd braced herself against the recoil of the spell as it pushed back against her. But she kept spinning too.

She kept the massive beam active for as long as she could, slowly lowering as she did until eventually she became exhausted and had to admit she was spent.

Her feet touched the ground ever so softly and she opened her eyes.

And was surrounded by some of the densest forest she'd ever seen in her life.

There were no animals. But she almost couldn't see the sky from how dense the trees and bushes and lichens were.

"Huh." She said in mild surprise. "Might've over done it a bit. But at least it worked."

Then she began working her way out of the only bit of forest for at least thirty miles in any direction.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12mfkc7/wait_is_this_just_gate_349/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (348/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: AAAaaaayyyy James only KIND OF put his foot in his mouth.

And hey look. Veliry is still being a boss ass little baddy. Nice.

Enjoy.

\~

"How are you doing?"

"Uhhh... So far so good." James replied as he peeked down at the small interface on his wrist. "Everything is reading okay."

"Not feeling dizzy or light headed?" The Voice asked.

"A little warmer than I like." James said with a chuckle. "But that's mostly just the suit and being nervous..... I hope."

"It's been nearly an hour. Shall we continue?" She asked.

James looked up at the platform some thirty or forty feet above them. He could see Gorna and Lady Melady, plus a few of Alixan's soldiers, standing at the edge and looking down at them. Though they were obscured by the pink mist between them and where James stood.

"Yeah." He said with only mildly uncertainty. "Might as well."

The Voice nodded and one of her guards tapped on the rope suspending the elevator. A moment later they began lowering again.

"Mind if I take a sample?" James asked after a few seconds.

"Of?" The Voice asked curiously.

James gestured around them. "The miasma." He answered. "Been kinda curious as to what it is and how it works. Maybe one of the people on Earth can figure it out."

"Go ahead." She replied. "My people believe that it is a gift from the gods. Meant to grant my people a safe place to live. Free from the outside world's influence if we so choose."

James gritted his teeth. The Voice must have heard it.

"You disapprove?" She asked.

James considered it for a moment. He didn't want to have a repeat of what had happened in Vatria. But he also didn't want to have to uphold a lie while he was down here. If he got this out of the way now and things went badly he could always have the elevator head back up and he could go back. But in a few hours that would stop being an option.

"I'm.... not a huge fan of the gods." He said simply.

"The prince has mentioned that you've.... literally... had run ins with them." She said. "And your arm confirms that to some extent."

"I have."

"And you dislike them?" She asked.

"For several reasons." He answered. "Is that an issue?"

"Not at all." She said, much to his surprise. "I am my people's spiritual leader. But not their religious leader. I mentioned wanting to find a way to have non-orc people capable of getting to the Crag without dying. If I really believed that the miasma was a gift from the gods then why would I do that?"

James thought of it. It was a good point.

"Who a person worships or doesn't is their choice and nobody else's." She continued. "Just don't let it cause any chaos in my homeland and there shouldn't be an issue."

"Glad to hear." He said. Then he turned a bit. "By the way. What's your ACTUAL name? In my head I've been thinking of you as THE VOICE... but that feels awkward."

The guards around her tensed, albeit only slightly. The Voice's eyes smiled again as she looked at him.

"You are an interesting one Mr. Choi." She said, her tone showing amusement. "It is Baly. Though I caution you to never let any of my people hear you call me that."

James winced a bit. "Did I just screw up something culturally?" He asked. "If so I'm sorry. I have a tendency to do that."

"A small one unique to my station." She admitted, still smiling. "But one that I have no issue with given that I highly doubt that you and the princess will make a habit of visiting. Besides, I've never understood that rule. And don't worry. You've done nothing worth stressing about." She looked at her nearest guard as she said this. The guard didn't say anything, but did make a point of turning to look away. James got the sense that that was her telling the two large orcs to simply ignore what had just happened.

The elevator touched down with a loud rumbling impact that made James wobble a bit.

"This is the first sub-level stop." Baly said as she held her hand out for him once more. "We have to transfer over to the next elevator. Come along Glag."

Glag looked at James, who nodded, and the two of them joined the Voice, Glag still holding onto his other hand.

James looked up as they walked the few yards to the next elevator. He couldn't even see the sky anymore, and had to guess that they'd dropped close to half a mile, if not more.

How deep is the Crag? He wondered as they stepped onto the next elevator platform.

\----------

"Ooookay." Veliry said as she finally managed to get where she'd been trying to go.

It had been a few days since she'd left Jadesport. Luckily the area outside the city where the bombs had dropped had been all but cleared by the army. Nothing had really survived the bombing. But there had still been dead burned trees for a few months after the battle. Now there was just miles and miles of open land, with the occasional stump or bit of newly grown scrub brush.

She'd had her enchanted carriage fit with wider, slightly textured, wagon wheels to help with the traversal of the area, especially since a lot of it was muddy now. But her horse had had no issues. She'd just had to take it slow.

She pulled the carriage up to one of the stumps left behind and used a hammer to sink a hooked spike into it. Then she pulled the horse out of it's harness and tied its bit to the spike.

"Be good Smepliesauce." She said as she patted the horse's muzzle and fished through one of her pockets for a salted piece of the fruit in question. The horse grunted happily as it munched on the salted fruit that was their namesake.

Then she began walking out and away from the horse and carriage and into the open land.

She walked for about an hour, judging that to be far enough that she wouldn't have to worry about the horse and carriage getting caught up in what she was about to do. She sat on a small rock outcropping for a moment and rubbed her feet. They hurt so much these days.

"Okay little one." She said while looking down at her belly with a pointed finger. She had noticed over the past week or so that that once flat stomach now had just a bit of roundness to it. "Do me a favor and just.... let me use my magic. Nobody is around and I'm not in danger. I just need to try something."

After another minute of resting her feet she stood up, grunting a bit as she did, and walked a few paces away from the rock she'd been resting on.

Then she began focusing. She'd been training for the past few weeks to try to get her powers back online. But the baby she was carrying had made it difficult beyond belief.

Still. She'd managed to get at least a few of her abilities to work with some level of reliability.

Like her flight.

The magical tattoos on her legs lit up with the light blue that they had been inked in as she began to slowly but surely rise up above the ground. She started slowly at first, making sure that the energy flow stayed nice and steady, but also making sure she didn't take too much from the baby either.

Once she got ten feet off the ground she sped up a bit until she got about fifty feet in the air. Then she focused on just hovering and keeping her eyes closed.

Now the hard part. She thought. Stay quiet in there for me okay.

She drew more energy into herself, and felt it begin coursing down her arms and settle in her hands. She focused it there and let it keep building, still focusing on keeping it flowing into her, and AROUND the unborn child, before getting to her hands.

When it had built up to a sufficient amount she initiated a spin. Nothing too fast. Roughly a full rotation every two seconds.

Then, as she angled her feet slightly back to preemptively counter the coming recoil, she brought her hands together and released the pent up magic there.

Once again, just like back in her lab, there was a loud whooshing noise, and she felt heat and wind blowing past her. This time she'd braced herself against the recoil of the spell as it pushed back against her. But she kept spinning too.

She kept the massive beam active for as long as she could, slowly lowering as she did until eventually she became exhausted and had to admit she was spent.

Her feet touched the ground ever so softly and she opened her eyes.

And was surrounded by some of the densest forest she'd ever seen in her life.

There were no animals. But she almost couldn't see the sky from how dense the trees and bushes and lichens were.

"Huh." She said in mild surprise. "Might've over done it a bit. But at least it worked."

Then she began working her way out of the only bit of forest for at least thirty miles in any direction.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12mfhxc/wait_is_this_just_gate_349/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (347/?)

Previous

Writer's Note: James is once again doing things that no human has ever done before. (At least not in the world he's in.)

Jenkins gets to see her dad. And Vickers spits some truth.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James stood at the top of the lift platform with the Voice of Crag and Glag next to him.

The Voice was done with her visit to the Griffin's tooth and was due to be back at her home so she could resume her duties as... well... the Voice of Crag. James had mentioned in passing during the first nigh's feast, that he had some gear that might allow him to visit the Orccrag, though he'd also admitted that he wasn't completely certain it would work. The Voice had demanded that he make the attempt. She had been trying for years, with Alixan's help, to create a system that would allow outsiders to come into the Crag for trade and other visits.

Now he was standing on the platform looking down into the dark purple mist as the elevator rose up.

He was sweating in his gen six M.O.P.P. gear. He held the collapsible combination helmet and hood in his hands and already had the filter display strapped to his left wrist. He'd only opened the plastic seal on the suit about twenty minutes ago so everything was THEORETICALLY in perfect condition, and when he'd done a test seal and cycle the little display had read all green. So he had a little under two hundred hours of filter life before he had to get out of the crag.

But that tidbit he'd learned about all the animals the mist killed not rotting still had him on edge. He couldn't think of a lot of things that could kill and preserve that way. But he'd already said he would make the attempt.

The plan was simple. They'd get on the elevator, lower down to just below the mist table, then wait about an hour and see how he did. If he passed out or anything else negative happened they'd reverse immediately and get him to a healer. If nothing happened they'd continue down.

Luckily both the Voice and Alixan had assured him that as long as anyone exposed to the gas was recovered fast enough there would be no lasting effects. If anything, all the victims of the gas who had survived spoke of a rather pleasant sleep and feeling well rested.

James looked behind him to where lady Melady, and a reluctant Gorna, looked on in anticipation.

"Almost here." The voice said, sure enough when James looked down he saw the outline of the elevator platform.

He wished Amina was here.

But she and Alixan had decided to use the opportunity of James's potentially extended absence to undergo something they'd called "The Tooth's Bite".

To James the whole thing had reminded him of that old movie from before he was born about the blue people fighting the military. It hadn't been a good movie, so he couldn't remember the name of it. But it had had a scene that reminded him of what the two siblings had explained.

Long and short, Amina was going to climb the Griffin's tooth and get herself a new griffin. Preferably one that was larger and much deadlier than the ones the Royal Guard used as standard.

James just hoped she didn't die. Though he doubted she would.

Mostly he was just worried about the baby. He'd been tempted to bring it up. But the look of excitement in Amina's eyes had made him back down. Still, he'd resolved to have a word with her about it. He didn't want to keep her on a leash or anything like that. But he had noticed over the past few days that she was in fact beginning to undergo the physical changes that all pregnancies had. And it had just reminded him of how careful they needed to be.

The elevator rumbled up until it was even with the platform, breaking him from his thoughts.

Who am I to tell anyone to be safe? He thought with a sigh. I'm walking into the damn crevasse of imminent doom wearing a MILITARY GRADE body condom. I'm stupid as shit.

The Voice stepped onto the platform with her two guards and held out her hand.

James took a deep breath, placed the helmet/hood on his head, pulled the hood down, pressed the velcro at its edges down onto their mates, then rolled the material twice (just like training), causing it to tighten as it doubled over a few times, and pressed a different set of velcro down. A quick tap on the display attached to his wrist told it to begin filtering.

He took the Voice's hand and stepped up next to her. Glag stepped up next to him, and his hand grabbed onto James's. James looked down at the rock monster, who was looking up at him with what he thought was concern. James just smiled and nodded.

Then the elevator began lowering.

\----------

Samantha sat in the small meeting room tapping her feet. Her tail wagged, causing a soft thumping noise against the back of her chair as she worried at the edge of her hoodie with her hands.

After a few minutes the door opened and her father, wearing a hospital visitors badge, walked in with a small tray with cups of coffee and a bag of what her nose told her were doughnuts.

She shot up to her feet immediately and moved to hug him. But she froze as she saw him reflexively flinch back.

She'd forgotten, for just a second, what she looked like now.

The two of them stared at each other for what felt like hours, though they were just a few seconds. Then her father placed the food down on the small table to his left and moved toward her with his arms open.

Samantha moved in and wrapped him in her arms. She felt him tense a little bit. But then he wrapped her up in as close to a bear hug as he could manage. It didn't have the same effect as it had when she was human, and also almost six inches shorter than him, as opposed to the opposite now. But the feeling of his embrace, and the smell of the aftershave he'd been wearing her entire life (overwhelming as it was for her now) made her feel at home for the first time in years.

The two of them stayed that way for several long minutes, pretending they didn't feel the gentle sobs of the other as they did.

Her father was the first one to break the embrace, pulling back ever so slightly and looking her in the eyes. She wanted to shy away from the gaze, partly because she didn't know what he would see there, and also because she could feel her instincts trying to take it as a challenge.

But then he smiled and pulled her back into another hug.

"Oh my little Sammy." He said as he hugged her to him again.

And her tail began wagging again.

\-------------------------

"So what did we learn today?" Vickers asked as he sat down with his tray of food.

Five and Driscoll both spoke up at the same time.

"That you're a dick." Driscoll said as he paused mid-bite.

"If you're shooting at were-folk, lead a bit more." Five said as she nibbled on one of the fruit and nut filled pastries. Driscoll glared at her.

Vickers speared a bit of mostly raw pork on his fork. "Accurate on both accounts. But wrong."

"Learned that doc CAN in fact make something that works for my eyes." Five said.

"Yeah. You improved quite a bit once he got it dialed in. We're still gonna be doing some drills though." Vickers admitted. "Your aim was still shaky as hell. What was the real lesson though?"

Driscoll sighed as he crossed his arms.

"Never walk onto a live range." He said begrudgingly.

"Attaboy." Vickers said with a fake smile before practically swallowing the slab of meat on his fork. He wiped his mouth a bit as Five watched the display, frozen like a statue even though she had food in her mouth. "You're not armored anymore. Either of you." He said. "I know that in your suits you were probably capable of going out and picking flowers on a live range without even noticing the incoming fire. But you're not in those anymore."

"We know that." Driscoll said, still angry. "You didn't have to have five shoot me in the ribs."

"Oh quit whining." Vickers shot back. "It was a training round. She only hit you with one of the fifteen. And I bet the bruise is already damn near gone." He gestured at both of them. "This is why I'm not letting you go on any ops until you've been through training. A normal soldier. Not even a special operations operative like us, just any old grunt who's been to boot and back, would NEVER step foot past the firing line, live fire or not, unless the range had been declared cold." Then he gestured to Five. "And that same soldier would know better than to shoot even a training round at one of their battle buddies. Not unless they were kitted out with a face shield and cup."

"Wait." Five said, broken out of what Vickers was beginning to think of as her prey-freeze. "You told me to shoot him."

"Sure did." Vickers said. "And for what its worth, it was good shooting. But you didn't even hesitate, and shot at your buddy."

"Cause I was told to." She said, now getting almost as angry as Driscoll.

"That's part of the problem." Vickers said. "Hell. That's been the main cause of you guys' beef with the Petravians too."

"What are you talking about?" Driscoll demanded. His spoon was bending in his hand as he squeezed it.

"You two have all this tactical knowledge. All this teamwork built into your brains. You can perform covert operations like they're second nature." Vickers said. "But you've also got no common sense... or uh... soldier's sense." He shook his head. "That feels wrong saying that. But it's accurate..... Did you guys ever even question any of the orders you were given out in the desert?" He asked, causing the two of them to glance at each other. "Like... even just... in your heads. Or behind closed doors."

Five was going to say something. But Vickers continued.

"If my team leader back on Earth had handed me a mag full of training rounds and told me to shoot one of our team members like that, I'd've called him out on that shit." Vickers said. "And I'd've checked the mag to make sure I wasn't bein' set up." He looked at five. "How'd you know I didn't slip a live round in there?" He asked. "Or what would've happened if I had? What if it had been silver tipped?"

This time Driscoll tried to speak up.

"Also if my team leader had ordered me to smoke a bunch of cops just because they were arresting some random Navy boys I woulda relieved him of duty." Vickers said, and the parallel that he was drawing was obvious to them. "Don't get me wrong. I'll kill folks for fuckin with me and my crew. But they gotta do something pretty heinous to earn a bullet."

"What? Like those bandits that made you so rich?" Driscoll shot back. They'd been given the declassified parts of Vickers' file before they'd ever come to this world. Including a break down of the stuff he'd done since coming here.

"You mean the guys that killed one of my traveling companions and COULD have killed me?" Vickers asked rhetorically before sipping on his coffee a bit.

Driscoll just stared at him angrily.

"It's not that simple." Five said in a hushed tone. She was about to say more. But Vickers once again beat her to it.

"I know it's not." He said coolly. "At the end of the day they had given you your lives back. And they controlled you via the suits. I'm guessing that if you'd stepped out of line they would have had no problem ensuring that you couldn't do it again. Or stepping anywhere for that matter."

"Yeah." Five said even more softly.

"I've seen the way the Toolies care about you guys. Even if they try not to show it." The SEAL said. "And I get it. I do. Even if I haven't ever experienced that myself."

"Than why are you grilling us like this?" Driscoll asked.

"Because in order for either of you to move forward. We're going to have to break that indoctrination of yours." Vickers said while staring the still aggravated fox down. "You are just as dangerous now as you ever were in your suits. And just as durable too. Just in different ways. Plus you now have the ability to accidentally turn people into were-folk too if you're not careful. And trust me when I say that you do NOT want to get caught doing that." He set his coffee down. "Part of the condition of letting you two be converted was ensuring that I kept you in line, and made sure you understood the laws here. And part of THAT is ensuring that good ole Uncle Sam can't just say a key phrase and cause you guys to go all Benicio Del Toro on the castle." He said with a small laugh. "Orders are one thing. But blind obedience is another." He held up the purple control that linked with their ankle bracelets. "Believe it or not. I want to be able to put this down without having to pick it back up again."

Driscoll didn't get the reference, though he did know who Del Toro was.

"I'm not even a wolf." Five said as she thought about what Vickers had said.

"Beside the point." Vickers replied as he stood up. "I've gotta go check in with Werner. She's been a lot peppy-er these past few weeks. Evening class is at fourteen hundred. Get some rest. Think it over."

Then he left them there to do just that.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12l59s5/wait_is_this_just_gate_348/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (347/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's Note: James is once again doing things that no human has ever done before. (At least not in the world he's in.)

Jenkins gets to see her dad. And Vickers spits some truth.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James stood at the top of the lift platform with the Voice of Crag and Glag next to him.

The Voice was done with her visit to the Griffin's tooth and was due to be back at her home so she could resume her duties as... well... the Voice of Crag. James had mentioned in passing during the first nigh's feast, that he had some gear that might allow him to visit the Orccrag, though he'd also admitted that he wasn't completely certain it would work. The Voice had demanded that he make the attempt. She had been trying for years, with Alixan's help, to create a system that would allow outsiders to come into the Crag for trade and other visits.

Now he was standing on the platform looking down into the dark purple mist as the elevator rose up.

He was sweating in his gen six M.O.P.P. gear. He held the collapsible combination helmet and hood in his hands and already had the filter display strapped to his left wrist. He'd only opened the plastic seal on the suit about twenty minutes ago so everything was THEORETICALLY in perfect condition, and when he'd done a test seal and cycle the little display had read all green. So he had a little under two hundred hours of filter life before he had to get out of the crag.

But that tidbit he'd learned about all the animals the mist killed not rotting still had him on edge. He couldn't think of a lot of things that could kill and preserve that way. But he'd already said he would make the attempt.

The plan was simple. They'd get on the elevator, lower down to just below the mist table, then wait about an hour and see how he did. If he passed out or anything else negative happened they'd reverse immediately and get him to a healer. If nothing happened they'd continue down.

Luckily both the Voice and Alixan had assured him that as long as anyone exposed to the gas was recovered fast enough there would be no lasting effects. If anything, all the victims of the gas who had survived spoke of a rather pleasant sleep and feeling well rested.

James looked behind him to where lady Melady, and a reluctant Gorna, looked on in anticipation.

"Almost here." The voice said, sure enough when James looked down he saw the outline of the elevator platform.

He wished Amina was here.

But she and Alixan had decided to use the opportunity of James's potentially extended absence to undergo something they'd called "The Tooth's Bite".

To James the whole thing had reminded him of that old movie from before he was born about the blue people fighting the military. It hadn't been a good movie, so he couldn't remember the name of it. But it had had a scene that reminded him of what the two siblings had explained.

Long and short, Amina was going to climb the Griffin's tooth and get herself a new griffin. Preferably one that was larger and much deadlier than the ones the Royal Guard used as standard.

James just hoped she didn't die. Though he doubted she would.

Mostly he was just worried about the baby. He'd been tempted to bring it up. But the look of excitement in Amina's eyes had made him back down. Still, he'd resolved to have a word with her about it. He didn't want to keep her on a leash or anything like that. But he had noticed over the past few days that she was in fact beginning to undergo the physical changes that all pregnancies had. And it had just reminded him of how careful they needed to be.

The elevator rumbled up until it was even with the platform, breaking him from his thoughts.

Who am I to tell anyone to be safe? He thought with a sigh. I'm walking into the damn crevasse of imminent doom wearing a MILITARY GRADE body condom. I'm stupid as shit.

The Voice stepped onto the platform with her two guards and held out her hand.

James took a deep breath, placed the helmet/hood on his head, pulled the hood down, pressed the velcro at its edges down onto their mates, then rolled the material twice (just like training), causing it to tighten as it doubled over a few times, and pressed a different set of velcro down. A quick tap on the display attached to his wrist told it to begin filtering.

He took the Voice's hand and stepped up next to her. Glag stepped up next to him, and his hand grabbed onto James's. James looked down at the rock monster, who was looking up at him with what he thought was concern. James just smiled and nodded.

Then the elevator began lowering.

\----------

Samantha sat in the small meeting room tapping her feet. Her tail wagged, causing a soft thumping noise against the back of her chair as she worried at the edge of her hoodie with her hands.

After a few minutes the door opened and her father, wearing a hospital visitors badge, walked in with a small tray with cups of coffee and a bag of what her nose told her were doughnuts.

She shot up to her feet immediately and moved to hug him. But she froze as she saw him reflexively flinch back.

She'd forgotten, for just a second, what she looked like now.

The two of them stared at each other for what felt like hours, though they were just a few seconds. Then her father placed the food down on the small table to his left and moved toward her with his arms open.

Samantha moved in and wrapped him in her arms. She felt him tense a little bit. But then he wrapped her up in as close to a bear hug as he could manage. It didn't have the same effect as it had when she was human, and also almost six inches shorter than him, as opposed to the opposite now. But the feeling of his embrace, and the smell of the aftershave he'd been wearing her entire life (overwhelming as it was for her now) made her feel at home for the first time in years.

The two of them stayed that way for several long minutes, pretending they didn't feel the gentle sobs of the other as they did.

Her father was the first one to break the embrace, pulling back ever so slightly and looking her in the eyes. She wanted to shy away from the gaze, partly because she didn't know what he would see there, and also because she could feel her instincts trying to take it as a challenge.

But then he smiled and pulled her back into another hug.

"Oh my little Sammy." He said as he hugged her to him again.

And her tail began wagging again.

\-------------------------

"So what did we learn today?" Vickers asked as he sat down with his tray of food.

Five and Driscoll both spoke up at the same time.

"That you're a dick." Driscoll said as he paused mid-bite.

"If you're shooting at were-folk, lead a bit more." Five said as she nibbled on one of the fruit and nut filled pastries. Driscoll glared at her.

Vickers speared a bit of mostly raw pork on his fork. "Accurate on both accounts. But wrong."

"Learned that doc CAN in fact make something that works for my eyes." Five said.

"Yeah. You improved quite a bit once he got it dialed in. We're still gonna be doing some drills though." Vickers admitted. "Your aim was still shaky as hell. What was the real lesson though?"

Driscoll sighed as he crossed his arms.

"Never walk onto a live range." He said begrudgingly.

"Attaboy." Vickers said with a fake smile before practically swallowing the slab of meat on his fork. He wiped his mouth a bit as Five watched the display, frozen like a statue even though she had food in her mouth. "You're not armored anymore. Either of you." He said. "I know that in your suits you were probably capable of going out and picking flowers on a live range without even noticing the incoming fire. But you're not in those anymore."

"We know that." Driscoll said, still angry. "You didn't have to have five shoot me in the ribs."

"Oh quit whining." Vickers shot back. "It was a training round. She only hit you with one of the fifteen. And I bet the bruise is already damn near gone." He gestured at both of them. "This is why I'm not letting you go on any ops until you've been through training. A normal soldier. Not even a special operations operative like us, just any old grunt who's been to boot and back, would NEVER step foot past the firing line, live fire or not, unless the range had been declared cold." Then he gestured to Five. "And that same soldier would know better than to shoot even a training round at one of their battle buddies. Not unless they were kitted out with a face shield and cup."

"Wait." Five said, broken out of what Vickers was beginning to think of as her prey-freeze. "You told me to shoot him."

"Sure did." Vickers said. "And for what its worth, it was good shooting. But you didn't even hesitate, and shot at your buddy."

"Cause I was told to." She said, now getting almost as angry as Driscoll.

"That's part of the problem." Vickers said. "Hell. That's been the main cause of you guys' beef with the Petravians too."

"What are you talking about?" Driscoll demanded. His spoon was bending in his hand as he squeezed it.

"You two have all this tactical knowledge. All this teamwork built into your brains. You can perform covert operations like they're second nature." Vickers said. "But you've also got no common sense... or uh... soldier's sense." He shook his head. "That feels wrong saying that. But it's accurate..... Did you guys ever even question any of the orders you were given out in the desert?" He asked, causing the two of them to glance at each other. "Like... even just... in your heads. Or behind closed doors."

Five was going to say something. But Vickers continued.

"If my team leader back on Earth had handed me a mag full of training rounds and told me to shoot one of our team members like that, I'd've called him out on that shit." Vickers said. "And I'd've checked the mag to make sure I wasn't bein' set up." He looked at five. "How'd you know I didn't slip a live round in there?" He asked. "Or what would've happened if I had? What if it had been silver tipped?"

This time Driscoll tried to speak up.

"Also if my team leader had ordered me to smoke a bunch of cops just because they were arresting some random Navy boys I woulda relieved him of duty." Vickers said, and the parallel that he was drawing was obvious to them. "Don't get me wrong. I'll kill folks for fuckin with me and my crew. But they gotta do something pretty heinous to earn a bullet."

"What? Like those bandits that made you so rich?" Driscoll shot back. They'd been given the declassified parts of Vickers' file before they'd ever come to this world. Including a break down of the stuff he'd done since coming here.

"You mean the guys that killed one of my traveling companions and COULD have killed me?" Vickers asked rhetorically before sipping on his coffee a bit.

Driscoll just stared at him angrily.

"It's not that simple." Five said in a hushed tone. She was about to say more. But Vickers once again beat her to it.

"I know it's not." He said coolly. "At the end of the day they had given you your lives back. And they controlled you via the suits. I'm guessing that if you'd stepped out of line they would have had no problem ensuring that you couldn't do it again. Or stepping anywhere for that matter."

"Yeah." Five said even more softly.

"I've seen the way the Toolies care about you guys. Even if they try not to show it." The SEAL said. "And I get it. I do. Even if I haven't ever experienced that myself."

"Than why are you grilling us like this?" Driscoll asked.

"Because in order for either of you to move forward. We're going to have to break that indoctrination of yours." Vickers said while staring the still aggravated fox down. "You are just as dangerous now as you ever were in your suits. And just as durable too. Just in different ways. Plus you now have the ability to accidentally turn people into were-folk too if you're not careful. And trust me when I say that you do NOT want to get caught doing that." He set his coffee down. "Part of the condition of letting you two be converted was ensuring that I kept you in line, and made sure you understood the laws here. And part of THAT is ensuring that good ole Uncle Sam can't just say a key phrase and cause you guys to go all Benicio Del Toro on the castle." He said with a small laugh. "Orders are one thing. But blind obedience is another." He held up the purple control that linked with their ankle bracelets. "Believe it or not. I want to be able to put this down without having to pick it back up again."

Driscoll didn't get the reference, though he did know who Del Toro was.

"I'm not even a wolf." Five said as she thought about what Vickers had said.

"Beside the point." Vickers replied as he stood up. "I've gotta go check in with Werner. She's been a lot peppy-er these past few weeks. Evening class is at fourteen hundred. Get some rest. Think it over."

Then he left them there to do just that.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12l55uk/wait_is_this_just_gate_348/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (346/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Like I said. The Voice of Crag isn't gonna be who or what James expects.

Also Vickers is officially in the "papa were/spec ops" roll now.

Also I made a bit of an announcement this weekend if you missed it. So don't be surprised if I get a little inconsistent or if any previous chapters get edited or moved around. That said, everything about that is kinda TBD right now.

In the meantime enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So tell me of your world young Hero." The Voice of Crag said as she sat side saddle on Steve's back behind James.

Amina had relegated to riding behind Alixan, despite Gorna's protests, and was watching the two of them very carefully. She didn't have too much to worry about though, the Voice wasn't exactly close to him, instead she sat several feet behind James and simply kept a hand on the back of his saddle to steady herself.

"Well." James began with a glance back. "It's honestly pretty similar to this one. At least at ground level anyways." He pointed at the rings that dominated the sky, and nodded toward the two moons that had just barely begun to peak over the horizon. "We don't have the rings. And only one moon. But if it wasn't for those it would be difficult to tell them apart without taking a really close look." He looked back and was surprised to see that she was actually writing what he said down in a small notebook. He wondered at that. But, it wasn't like he was telling secrets or anything. "And up until a few months ago we didn't have any magic either. Though, apparently that's changed."

"No magic?" She asked, her writing having paused. "How is that possible?"

James was tempted to tell her what they'd learned from "Not Roylan" last year. Or from Moon and Defiance. But then he remembered that the Voice of Crag was a spiritual leader for the Orcs and decided to keep that to himself. He didn't know what kind of impact that might have on another nation's religions. He'd already made that mistake in Vatria, and that had gotten a bit sketchy.

"Don't uh.... don't know." He said. Amina glanced over at him and he winked at her. She nodded ever so slightly. "That's a bit higher than my pay grade."

"Hmmm." She said as she began writing again. "And how did your people progress without it?" She asked after a moment. "I've heard tales of you and your fellow Earth Realmers having fantastic technology and weapons."

"Well. That's the key really." He answered. "We focused on technology. That was our path to survival."

"Interesting." She said in response. "And how do you find this world's level of technology?"

James thought of that for a moment. Nobody had asked him that before. And he had definitely not expected it from the spiritual leader of a nation of Orcs. But then again he had to remember that while there were lots of parallels between this world and Earth's idea of fantasy, they definitely had their differences.

"It's uh... it's difficult to compare really." He said. "On the one hand, you guys are functionally in what my world's historians would consider the medieval age. You... use swords, and shields, and bows and arrows. You ride on horses and other creatures. There are certain things that don't exist in this world... YET... And yet there are also certain things that ALREADY exist in this world when they didn't during my worlds equivalent time period."

"Like what?" She asked curiously as she scooted forward on Steve's back a bit.

James looked back uncomfortably.

"Well. I'm not sure what I CAN and CANNOT tell you." He started. "But Vatria just unveiled a flying ship. My people didn't get flight until well WELL after the medieval period. Though a few inventors had ideas. You guys don't have long distance communication outside of a few very difficult, and somewhat unreliable, spells. You still rely on riders and the post they carry."

She was back to scrabbling in her book again.

"You guys knowledge of healing is limited to your understanding of magic and basically just... magically reversing damage. Your bodies repel most diseases and sicknesses because of their magical nature. But I was the one that first introduced the mages and healers in the capital to the concept of bacteria and cellular structures."

"What are those?" She asked, a look of confusion in her eyes.

"Very small things that can't be seen with the naked eye." He said. "Which reminds me. I have some questions about how your people survive in the Crag."

"Oh?" She wondered.

James was about to mention his question about food spoilage when Alixan made an excited noise and kicked his griffin into a long, bounding leap through the air. In his distraction at the conversation, James hadn't noticed how close they'd gotten to the base of the Griffin's Tooth. Or that there was a rather ornate carriage rolling towards its front gate.

"Ah. Prince Alixan's betrothed." The Voice said with smiling eyes as she looked over and past James. "I do so hope that she brought some of her land's spiced fruits."

"Alixan has a betrothed?" James asked in confusion.

"I told you about that a while ago dear." Amina said as she eyed the way the Voice was now leaning over him. He himself was looking at her arm, which rested on his shoulder with surprising lightness for her size, in confusion.

Ahead of them Alixan opened the door to the carriage and held out his hand to the person inside. He was practically bowed over to talk to them, his massive frame standing almost six inches higher than the carriage itself.

A moment later a tall elvish woman, very nearly as tall as the prince himself, stepped out of the carriage. She wore the robes of a mage, but carried two long swords on each hip, four in total.

Alixan planted a kiss on her cheek, which she returned in kind, then he lead her over to them as James slid down Steve's side and offered a hand to the Voice.

"A welcome surprise everyone." The prince said. "My bride to be-" He motioned to James while looking at her for a moment. "Or as James's people would say, FIANCE, has arrived earlier than expected. James, Lady Gorna, friend Glag, this is Lady Melady of the order of the Dyeriss." He said as he gestured at each of them. "My lady this is Captain James Choi of Earth. I've told you a bit about him.

Despite her height, and the four swords on her waist, Lady Melady did a sort of curtsy type greeting that looked almost balletic.

"It is a pleasure to meet you all." She said in a voice that was higher than James had expected. "And good to see you great speaker." She said to the Voice. Then she turned to Amina. "And Princess. It has been too long."

Amina smiled and James knew just from seeing it that it was not an ACTUAL smile.

Aw crap. He thought as he watched his wife greet the newcomer.

\------------------

Vickers stood behind Five as she picked up and held his modified Colt-Tavor rifle in hands that moved well enough, but clearly weren't completely accustomed to handling a weapon.

Strapped to her face was a monocle made of red/green polarized glass that was easily recognizable as being part of the helmets that he'd handed Dr. Shaw. A set of cables ran down from the back of the securing strap to a pack on her belt. That powered it and also acted as a sort of antenna for the communications it was picking up.

"Alright. Sight in on the head of the dummy." He said as he looked over Shaw's shoulder at the tablet he was using to refine the programming of the device.

Five lifted the rifle up with only a little awkwardness. Vickers watched as the, almost video game style, aiming reticle on the field moved up and began to waver around on the dumy's torso and head.

"Hold it steady please." Shaw requested.

Vickers glanced back and forth between the tablet and the were-squirrel a few times. Then he walked over and grabbed the former muck marcher's arm with one hand, and the butt stock of the rifle with the other.

"It's too long." Five said with obvious annoyance in her voice. "These arms aren't as long as you and the boss's."

Vickers pressed the release button on the underside of the stock and pulled three of the extension sections out with audible snaps as the plastic popped off and then reformed. Then he pressed the plate of the stock back in, released the pressure on the button, and slapped it.

"I know." He said as he released his hold on the rifle. Which was now almost six inches shorter on its back end. "Try now."

Five pressed the rifle back into the meat of her shoulder again and he saw a bit of a grin as she pressed her cheek up against it.

"Much better." Shaw said happily.

"Oh that's not as awkward as I expected." She said with a bit of relief.

"Eh your aims a bit steadier." Vickers said. "But you'll also get your nose bloodied if you ride that far up."

"Huh?" She said in confusion.

"Open your left eye." Vickers said flatly. "Shoulda been open to start. But look at where the charging handle's gonna go and where your big ass squirrel nose is sitting."

Five did as she was told, then held the weapon out at arms length like it had turned into a venomous snake.

"Relax. That's part of why we're doing this." Vickers reassured her. "To figure out what you'll need to do to adapt to our gear."

"And how to adapt our gear to you." Shaw said with annoyance. Then he pointed out past them. "The dummy please."

"Oh. Sorry." Five said as she re-shouldered the rifle again. This time she kept her nose an inch or so further back and angled up a bit higher. Vickers figured that would keep her schnozz safe so long as she remembered to do that when it came down to fight time.

"Don't shoot!" Driscoll said as he jogged in front of them, weaving between the dummies in a weaving, back and forth, motion that reminded Vickers of old hockey training drills when he'd been a kid. When he got to the opposite end of the dummy field he jumped over the wooden fence there, barely even needing to leap to clear it with his long legs.

"STAY OFF THE RANGE!" Vickers yelled angrily.

"You're not even loaded!" Driscoll yelled as he vaulted over a set of crates near the Quartermaster's armory. There was a crashing noise from the other side. Then Vickers saw the red-fading-to-black tufts of his ears pop up. "That was already like that!" Driscoll said as he began running again, just in time to avoid the grasping arm of the massive orcish quartermaster himself as he burst out of the side of the building yelling at the retreating runner.

Vickers would have to remind him of proper range safety later.

Maybe by letting Five actually shoot at him. After all, it wasn't like any normal bullets would KILL the were-fox anymore.

Still. He was happy to see the lanky man moving much more gracefully, crash or not. The training was beginning to work.

"Uh... Doc Shaw. I think the focus is shifting." Five said, drawing Vickers' focus back to the current issue.

"No." Dr. Shaw replied. "That's your eye shifting. I kind of knew that your new physiology might do that. Quit trying to look straight. You're a damn squirrel now. Your eyes are made more for keeping you aware of your surroundings."

"Just let your eyes relax." Vickers said. "This aint a sniper rifle. It's an assault rifle with a little reflex on it. All you gotta do is look. If your eye doesn't line up right then we'll send a shopping list to the Colonel and try out new layouts until it works." Then he turned back to the doctor. "How's it reading the aim at least?"

"Tracking's fine." He said. Then he ran his stylus across one of the settings. "Hows that?" He asked.

Five sighed. "It's better than the headache that was giving me. But I'll be aiming at right field if that's how my eye goes now."

"Trial and error." Vickers said. "We'll figure it."

"Plus it'll work better once we get the second lens on line." Shaw said. "The other two are working on that now."

"One step closer." Vickers said with a nod. Then he saw Driscoll coming around again, having already gone all the way around the castle again.

Fuckin' fast. He thought. Once he gets the magic juice flowing through him all the way, he's gonna move like a bat out of hell.

He reached into one of the pouches on his vest and pulled out a magazine full of green rubbery bullets.

"Here." He said as he handed it to Five. "When he buzzes the tower this time let's make him shit himself a bit." He said with a grin.

Five flinched back at first in an instinctive reaction to his toothy grin. Then she saw the green bullets and grinned herself.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12k3cwv/wait_is_this_just_gate_347/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (346/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Like I said. The Voice of Crag isn't gonna be who or what James expects.

Also Vickers is officially in the "papa were/spec ops" roll now.

Also I made a bit of an announcement on r/GATEhouse this weekend. So don't be surprised if I get a little inconsistent or if any previous chapters get edited or moved around. That said, everything about that is kinda TBD right now.

In the meantime enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So tell me of your world young Hero." The Voice of Crag said as she sat side saddle on Steve's back behind James.

Amina had relegated to riding behind Alixan, despite Gorna's protests, and was watching the two of them very carefully. She didn't have too much to worry about though, the Voice wasn't exactly close to him, instead she sat several feet behind James and simply kept a hand on the back of his saddle to steady herself.

"Well." James began with a glance back. "It's honestly pretty similar to this one. At least at ground level anyways." He pointed at the rings that dominated the sky, and nodded toward the two moons that had just barely begun to peak over the horizon. "We don't have the rings. And only one moon. But if it wasn't for those it would be difficult to tell them apart without taking a really close look." He looked back and was surprised to see that she was actually writing what he said down in a small notebook. He wondered at that. But, it wasn't like he was telling secrets or anything. "And up until a few months ago we didn't have any magic either. Though, apparently that's changed."

"No magic?" She asked, her writing having paused. "How is that possible?"

James was tempted to tell her what they'd learned from "Not Roylan" last year. Or from Moon and Defiance. But then he remembered that the Voice of Crag was a spiritual leader for the Orcs and decided to keep that to himself. He didn't know what kind of impact that might have on another nation's religions. He'd already made that mistake in Vatria, and that had gotten a bit sketchy.

"Don't uh.... don't know." He said. Amina glanced over at him and he winked at her. She nodded ever so slightly. "That's a bit higher than my pay grade."

"Hmmm." She said as she began writing again. "And how did your people progress without it?" She asked after a moment. "I've heard tales of you and your fellow Earth Realmers having fantastic technology and weapons."

"Well. That's the key really." He answered. "We focused on technology. That was our path to survival."

"Interesting." She said in response. "And how do you find this world's level of technology?"

James thought of that for a moment. Nobody had asked him that before. And he had definitely not expected it from the spiritual leader of a nation of Orcs. But then again he had to remember that while there were lots of parallels between this world and Earth's idea of fantasy, they definitely had their differences.

"It's uh... it's difficult to compare really." He said. "On the one hand, you guys are functionally in what my world's historians would consider the medieval age. You... use swords, and shields, and bows and arrows. You ride on horses and other creatures. There are certain things that don't exist in this world... YET... And yet there are also certain things that ALREADY exist in this world when they didn't during my worlds equivalent time period."

"Like what?" She asked curiously as she scooted forward on Steve's back a bit.

James looked back uncomfortably.

"Well. I'm not sure what I CAN and CANNOT tell you." He started. "But Vatria just unveiled a flying ship. My people didn't get flight until well WELL after the medieval period. Though a few inventors had ideas. You guys don't have long distance communication outside of a few very difficult, and somewhat unreliable, spells. You still rely on riders and the post they carry."

She was back to scrabbling in her book again.

"You guys knowledge of healing is limited to your understanding of magic and basically just... magically reversing damage. Your bodies repel most diseases and sicknesses because of their magical nature. But I was the one that first introduced the mages and healers in the capital to the concept of bacteria and cellular structures."

"What are those?" She asked, a look of confusion in her eyes.

"Very small things that can't be seen with the naked eye." He said. "Which reminds me. I have some questions about how your people survive in the Crag."

"Oh?" She wondered.

James was about to mention his question about food spoilage when Alixan made an excited noise and kicked his griffin into a long, bounding leap through the air. In his distraction at the conversation, James hadn't noticed how close they'd gotten to the base of the Griffin's Tooth. Or that there was a rather ornate carriage rolling towards its front gate.

"Ah. Prince Alixan's betrothed." The Voice said with smiling eyes as she looked over and past James. "I do so hope that she brought some of her land's spiced fruits."

"Alixan has a betrothed?" James asked in confusion.

"I told you about that a while ago dear." Amina said as she eyed the way the Voice was now leaning over him. He himself was looking at her arm, which rested on his shoulder with surprising lightness for her size, in confusion.

Ahead of them Alixan opened the door to the carriage and held out his hand to the person inside. He was practically bowed over to talk to them, his massive frame standing almost six inches higher than the carriage itself.

A moment later a tall elvish woman, very nearly as tall as the prince himself, stepped out of the carriage. She wore the robes of a mage, but carried two long swords on each hip, four in total.

Alixan planted a kiss on her cheek, which she returned in kind, then he lead her over to them as James slid down Steve's side and offered a hand to the Voice.

"A welcome surprise everyone." The prince said. "My bride to be-" He motioned to James while looking at her for a moment. "Or as James's people would say, FIANCE, has arrived earlier than expected. James, Lady Gorna, friend Glag, this is Lady Melady of the order of the Dyeriss." He said as he gestured at each of them. "My lady this is Captain James Choi of Earth. I've told you a bit about him.

Despite her height, and the four swords on her waist, Lady Melady did a sort of curtsy type greeting that looked almost balletic.

"It is a pleasure to meet you all." She said in a voice that was higher than James had expected. "And good to see you great speaker." She said to the Voice. Then she turned to Amina. "And Princess. It has been too long."

Amina smiled and James knew just from seeing it that it was not an ACTUAL smile.

Aw crap. He thought as he watched his wife greet the newcomer.

\------------------

Vickers stood behind Five as she picked up and held his modified Colt-Tavor rifle in hands that moved well enough, but clearly weren't completely accustomed to handling a weapon.

Strapped to her face was a monocle made of red/green polarized glass that was easily recognizable as being part of the helmets that he'd handed Dr. Shaw. A set of cables ran down from the back of the securing strap to a pack on her belt. That powered it and also acted as a sort of antenna for the communications it was picking up.

"Alright. Sight in on the head of the dummy." He said as he looked over Shaw's shoulder at the tablet he was using to refine the programming of the device.

Five lifted the rifle up with only a little awkwardness. Vickers watched as the, almost video game style, aiming reticle on the field moved up and began to waver around on the dumy's torso and head.

"Hold it steady please." Shaw requested.

Vickers glanced back and forth between the tablet and the were-squirrel a few times. Then he walked over and grabbed the former muck marcher's arm with one hand, and the butt stock of the rifle with the other.

"It's too long." Five said with obvious annoyance in her voice. "These arms aren't as long as you and the boss's."

Vickers pressed the release button on the underside of the stock and pulled three of the extension sections out with audible snaps as the plastic popped off and then reformed. Then he pressed the plate of the stock back in, released the pressure on the button, and slapped it.

"I know." He said as he released his hold on the rifle. Which was now almost six inches shorter on its back end. "Try now."

Five pressed the rifle back into the meat of her shoulder again and he saw a bit of a grin as she pressed her cheek up against it.

"Much better." Shaw said happily.

"Oh that's not as awkward as I expected." She said with a bit of relief.

"Eh your aims a bit steadier." Vickers said. "But you'll also get your nose bloodied if you ride that far up."

"Huh?" She said in confusion.

"Open your left eye." Vickers said flatly. "Shoulda been open to start. But look at where the charging handle's gonna go and where your big ass squirrel nose is sitting."

Five did as she was told, then held the weapon out at arms length like it had turned into a venomous snake.

"Relax. That's part of why we're doing this." Vickers reassured her. "To figure out what you'll need to do to adapt to our gear."

"And how to adapt our gear to you." Shaw said with annoyance. Then he pointed out past them. "The dummy please."

"Oh. Sorry." Five said as she re-shouldered the rifle again. This time she kept her nose an inch or so further back and angled up a bit higher. Vickers figured that would keep her schnozz safe so long as she remembered to do that when it came down to fight time.

"Don't shoot!" Driscoll said as he jogged in front of them, weaving between the dummies in a weaving, back and forth, motion that reminded Vickers of old hockey training drills when he'd been a kid. When he got to the opposite end of the dummy field he jumped over the wooden fence there, barely even needing to leap to clear it with his long legs.

"STAY OFF THE RANGE!" Vickers yelled angrily.

^("You're not even loaded!") Driscoll yelled as he vaulted over a set of crates near the Quartermaster's armory. There was a crashing noise from the other side. Then Vickers saw the red-fading-to-black tufts of his ears pop up. "^(That was already like that!") Driscoll said as he began running again, just in time to avoid the grasping arm of the massive orcish quartermaster himself as he burst out of the side of the building yelling at the retreating runner.

Vickers would have to remind him of proper range safety later.

Maybe by letting Five actually shoot at him. After all, it wasn't like any normal bullets would KILL the were-fox anymore.

Still. He was happy to see the lanky man moving much more gracefully, crash or not. The training was beginning to work.

"Uh... Doc Shaw. I think the focus is shifting." Five said, drawing Vickers' focus back to the current issue.

"No." Dr. Shaw replied. "That's your eye shifting. I kind of knew that your new physiology might do that. Quit trying to look straight. You're a damn squirrel now. Your eyes are made more for keeping you aware of your surroundings."

"Just let your eyes relax." Vickers said. "This aint a sniper rifle. It's an assault rifle with a little reflex on it. All you gotta do is look. If your eye doesn't line up right then we'll send a shopping list to the Colonel and try out new layouts until it works." Then he turned back to the doctor. "How's it reading the aim at least?"

"Tracking's fine." He said. Then he ran his stylus across one of the settings. "Hows that?" He asked.

Five sighed. "It's better than the headache that was giving me. But I'll be aiming at right field if that's how my eye goes now."

"Trial and error." Vickers said. "We'll figure it."

"Plus it'll work better once we get the second lens on line." Shaw said. "The other two are working on that now."

"One step closer." Vickers said with a nod. Then he saw Driscoll coming around again, having already gone all the way around the castle again.

Fuckin' fast. He thought. Once he gets the magic juice flowing through him all the way, he's gonna move like a bat out of hell.

He reached into one of the pouches on his vest and pulled out a magazine full of green rubbery bullets.

"Here." He said as he handed it to Five. "When he buzzes the tower this time let's make him shit himself a bit." He said with a grin.

Five flinched back at first in an instinctive reaction to his toothy grin. Then she saw the green bullets and grinned herself.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12k3avg/wait_is_this_just_gate_347/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (345/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah, a weekend update. I got most of this done yesterday and then ran out of free time, so I'm finishing it now.

No, James does not have a crush. He may be kinda dumb. But he aint that dumb. He's mostly just confused by the nature of Orccrag Orcs. Think of this meeting like his first few with Alixan. He just doesn't know what's going on.

Also Jenkins starts making some headway.

Enjoy.

PS: I'll flesh it out more later, but imagine the Voice and her guards dressed like old school Bedouin people. With a heavy emphasis on dark blue and purple cloth.

\~

The "Voice of Crag" as Alixan had called her, was not what James had expected.

Admittedly his view of Orcs was mostly based on the surly Quartermaster at the King's castle, a large, one eyed man named Kraug. Between him and the handful of other orcs James had dealt with on a semi-regular basis had given James a sort of generic English hoodlum vibe. Like something from the old Sherlock Holmes movies, or that one English gangster series that his dad had apparently been a fan of.

The Voice of Crag was nothing like any of them. And as he thought of it, James realized that made sense. According to Alixan the Crag was the birthplace of Orcs in this world. One Earth it would be their equivalent to the portion of Africa that had been determined to be the "Cradle of Humanity". Of course people living thousands of miles away for centuries, or even millenia, wouldn't look or act the same as the ones here.

"So this is the summoned hero and new prince?" The tall, almost fully covered, orc woman said as she stepped off of the lift and approached.

Kraug was... well... he was a brute. Just looking at him could tell a person that. Talking with him for a few minutes simply confirmed it. And according to both Amina AND Kela he had once been a brutally capable wielder of a massive war-hammer. Until a battle had cost him his eye, and also earned him a bride and some resulting children.

The Voice of Crag was nothing like that. She had the same general physiology as any other Orc James had ever seen. This included being nearly seven feet tall, having dark greenish brown skin (though he could only see that on her hands and around her eyes), incredibly long arms, and broad shoulders that any pro football coach would beg for on their lineman.

But where Kraug and the other Orcs James knew were somewhat hunched, likely from the limitations of the buildings they were accustomed to, The Voice of Crag stood tall and sure. Where other Orcs were boisterous and jolly, or else sullen and silent, The Voice spoke in as refined of a manner as any of the nobles James had met in this world. He got the same sense of sureness from her when she spoke that he got when he heard The King speak, or the late General Krick or Secretary Grant. But there was a calmness there that he wasn't used to on politicians or military personnel.

She also had eyes the same dark purple as the deadly gas that filled her home.

Alixan broke him out of his observations as the tall, veiled, Orc leader finally got to within a few feet of them.

"So it is, Great Speaker." He said with a small bow. "And his new wife, my younger sister Amina. And their traveling companions." He added as he gestured to Gorna and Glag. It is good to see you again."

She bowed her head to Alixan in return. "It has been far too long since I have gazed upon the sky clearly." She said. Then her eyes moved in a way that made it obvious that she was smiling. "Or upon the face of a friend."

Then she turned to regard James and the others again.

"I welcome you to my home." She said with a slight tilt of her head. "Or at least as close to it as you can safely come." She turned back to the prince. "I take it there's to be a feast?"

Alixan smiled widely. "We've also got some Cedonian Gold in one of our cold rooms for you."

Once again the massive orc's eyes implied a smile had formed on her face.

"You know me too well." She said. Then she held her hand out to James.

James looked at Amina, who was staring at the offered hand in confusion. Then he looked at Alixan.

"It is customary for the Voice of Crag to walk in hand with whoever the highest ranking person in the area is." He said. Then he raised an eyebrow in question. "Which I was fairly certain was me."

"Hero summoned by gods outranks crown prince." She replied coolly.

James gritted his teeth at that, remembering how Alixan had said she was her people's spiritual leader.

But he had learned his lesson from Vatria, and he took the offered hand.

He had a feeling that it was going to be a long night.

\----------

"So ummmm... How did everyone... like the trip?" Samantha asked as she stood up in front of all the werewolves. She... wasn't terribly fond of public speaking. "Have a good time?"

There was a bit of a murmur as everyone talked to the people around them a bit, some nodded heads, as usual a handful in the back of the room looked more annoyed than anything. Same as every group meeting. She could hear a handful of mentions of squirrels.

"I'm glad to hear that it went well. I know I enjoyed getting to stretch my legs a bit." She looked down at the note-card with the details that had been given to her by Dr. Munro. "We've got some really good news." She said with a smile. "Starting next week we will be allowed to have monitored visits from our friends and loved ones. Um... People with spouses will even be given time in a secure cottage for um.... Well you know." She said with a slight grin.

There was a hissing noise from one of the wolves to her left that had two of his fingers in his mouth. He looked confused for a moment before trying again, with the same result.

"Damn. I guess we can't whistle anymore." He said with a look of mild disappointment. This drew short lived laughter from most of them. Luckily the one who'd attempted to whistle was part of the laughing.

"Anyways. You guys can discuss that when you have the family meetings next week. Um... there will be some limitations and precautions necessary if you do opt for that. Just... safety and health stuff mainly." She said. The laughter had helped her relax a little bit. "Um the big one though." She began, causing everyone to focus a bit more. "Is that... starting this next month the doctors are going to be going over everyone's notes and running us all through a series of group assessments. Mainly interviews with the doctors as a group."

This caused even the wolves at the back to sit forward with curiosity.

"And if the doctors determine that you have um... adjusted... well enough. They'll be letting us out into the surrounding community here at Sturgis on a TRIAL basis. We'll be monitored, and escorted. Both for the safety of the community AND-" She said with a raised finger as she saw some of them getting ready to speak up. "For OUR safety. They've assured me that we'll be allowed to go anywhere we want. And do.... almost anything we want. Within reason. They just don't want any of us having anything go wrong. No repeats of what happened when we became this way."

There were mumbles and questions and more than a few happy faces. But there were also some LESS than happy faces.

"What's next?" One of the back row wolves asked. "Leashes? We've been here over six months now."

"Yeah. And what are the criteria for these panels of judges? Cause that's what it sounds like." Another one asked.

Samantha held her hands up in a warding gesture as the questions began to ramp up. She... hadn't been prepared for any of this.

Luckily Dr. Munro stepped in.

"Everyone please." She said loudly as she stepped up next to Samantha. "Please. Settle down."

It still took a few moments before the roar settled down to a gentle murmur.

"We're not your captors." She said. "We're not your wardens. This isn't a prison."

"Sure seems like it some times." The first of the back wolves said.

"I know." She said. "I know. But at the end of the day we are a HOSPITAL." She gestured at the few other doctors in the room. "Our priority is the health and safety of the community around us. And our number one priority is the health and safety of our patients. And that's YOU." She said with a gesture at the wolves.

She waited a few moments to let everyone sit on that.

"We are in uncharted territory with you guys." She continued. "We want nothing more than to let you all go back to your normal lives. To the extent that you can now. But we had to fight hard to keep the military from keeping you as ACTUAL prisoners. The only reason they didn't is because of how public the wolf outbreak was, and the fact that that pack of wild ones managed to get away and split up."

"Shoulda gone with them." Someone whispered.

"Do you really believe that mister Schmidt?" She asked testily. "Cause from what I was told of your case, one of your biggest reasons for letting the hospital take you in was because you didn't want to kill anyone. And that's what THEY were doing. What they're still doing according to the news."

Schmidt grumbled, but remained quiet.

"You're all here because you couldn't, or wouldn't, let yourselves do that for one reason or another." The doctor said. "We're here to help convince the government that if you go out into the public, that will remain the case. That's all we're trying to do. That and help you adjust to your new lives."

Fletcher, one of the few non-wolves in the room who also wasn't a doctor, spoke up.

"That said, any of you that desires to be discharged may do so." He said. "But you would be doing so at your own risk. And I guarantee that the government would be watching you like a hawk for any slip ups. And by now you've all seen how they handled the other wolves. Wouldn't expect much less if I were you."

"They're gonna do that anyways." Someone closer to the front said. They didn't sound as angry as the back row, mostly just concerned.

"Probably." Samantha said. "I would. And I was one of them before this happened." She shrugged. "We're dangerous now. Whether we like it or not. And, as we all saw out at the lake, we AREN'T in complete control of our brains anymore. And if that...." She took a deep breath. "Goddess.... decides to mess with us. We might not even be able to do anything about it. I mean. I told the other guy to fuck off and he STILL made me into the....." She looked over to Dr. Munro. "What did they end up calling me?" She asked uncomfortably.

"Wonder Wolf." The doctor said.

Samantha groaned. "That's terrible." She said to herself, her eyes unfocused as they stared at the podium. Then she took a deep breath and looked back out. "Look. We have to acknowledge that there's merit to not just.... LETTING us run around without making sure we've got a handle on this. And the first steps is trial runs."

There was grumbling. But most of them had to admit the logic in it.

"What about me?" Said their youngest member, a young boy of only eight years old named Tommy who, thanks to the wolf outbreak, was an orphan now. His downcast eyes and trembling voice made everyone stop talking and reconsider. "I don't... have anywhere to go."

Suddenly everyone else's complaints seemed stupid.

Mrs. Ramirez, a fifty two year old florist who had been turned into a wolf while watering her shop's plants for the night, wrapped her arm around the boy. She'd become a sort of adoptive mother to Tommy since that night.

"You can come with me mijo." She said with a gentle hug.

Samantha moved past the podium and knelt down in front of the two of them. She lifted the young wolf's head up a bit with her chin.

"And maybe we can go back to the lake every now and then." She said with a smile. "I saw how much you liked swimming in it." She looked off to the side and Dr. Munro nodded with a smile. "Wanna do that?"

Tommy nodded.

"That's another thing." She said as she stood back up and moved back to the podium. "I know its... awkward.... And probably cliche since we're wolves now. But we should probably stick close to each other. Look out for each other. Just in case anything goes wrong even while we're out and about."

The back wolves began grumbling again, but she beat them to the chase.

"I'm not saying we have to be friends. And for god's sake I'm not gonna call us a pack." She reassured them. "We're not gonna be that cliche.... But I do think we should at least stay as.... well... this." She said, gesturing at the lot of them. "A support group. After all, we're the only ones who know what we're going through. Even once we're out of here." She looked at Fletcher, and tried not to stare. But she needed the lawyer to know she was talking to the hospital. "And we WILL all get out of her eventually. We should stay in touch. Exchange info and maybe do a monthly meeting, even if only online." She shrugged. "Plus it'll let us keep tabs on each other in case something happens to any of us. By the Government or by just.... people being assholes."

Despite not being fans of the whole situation, even the wolves in the back row could admit that that was probably a good idea.

As the meeting slowly relaxed and opened up to people talking about how they were doing, Dr. Munro stood off to the side suppressing a smile.

She was glad to see that she'd been right about Samantha and her role in the werewolf group.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12i0bnf/wait_is_this_just_gate_346/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (345/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah, a weekend update. I got most of this done yesterday and then ran out of free time, so I'm finishing it now.

No, James does not have a crush. He may be kinda dumb. But he aint that dumb. He's mostly just confused by the nature of Orccrag Orcs. Think of this meeting like his first few with Alixan. He just doesn't know what's going on.

Also Jenkins starts making some headway.

Enjoy.

PS: I'll flesh it out more later, but imagine the Voice and her guards dressed like old school Bedouin people. With a heavy emphasis on dark blue and purple cloth.

\~

The "Voice of Crag" as Alixan had called her, was not what James had expected.

Admittedly his view of Orcs was mostly based on the surly Quartermaster at the King's castle, a large, one eyed man named Kraug. Between him and the handful of other orcs James had dealt with on a semi-regular basis had given James a sort of generic English hoodlum vibe. Like something from the old Sherlock Holmes movies, or that one English gangster series that his dad had apparently been a fan of.

The Voice of Crag was nothing like any of them. And as he thought of it, James realized that made sense. According to Alixan the Crag was the birthplace of Orcs in this world. One Earth it would be their equivalent to the portion of Africa that had been determined to be the "Cradle of Humanity". Of course people living thousands of miles away for centuries, or even millenia, wouldn't look or act the same as the ones here.

"So this is the summoned hero and new prince?" The tall, almost fully covered, orc woman said as she stepped off of the lift and approached.

Kraug was... well... he was a brute. Just looking at him could tell a person that. Talking with him for a few minutes simply confirmed it. And according to both Amina AND Kela he had once been a brutally capable wielder of a massive war-hammer. Until a battle had cost him his eye, and also earned him a bride and some resulting children.

The Voice of Crag was nothing like that. She had the same general physiology as any other Orc James had ever seen. This included being nearly seven feet tall, having dark greenish brown skin (though he could only see that on her hands and around her eyes), incredibly long arms, and broad shoulders that any pro football coach would beg for on their lineman.

But where Kraug and the other Orcs James knew were somewhat hunched, likely from the limitations of the buildings they were accustomed to, The Voice of Crag stood tall and sure. Where other Orcs were boisterous and jolly, or else sullen and silent, The Voice spoke in as refined of a manner as any of the nobles James had met in this world. He got the same sense of sureness from her when she spoke that he got when he heard The King speak, or the late General Krick or Secretary Grant. But there was a calmness there that he wasn't used to on politicians or military personnel.

She also had eyes the same dark purple as the deadly gas that filled her home.

Alixan broke him out of his observations as the tall, veiled, Orc leader finally got to within a few feet of them.

"So it is, Great Speaker." He said with a small bow. "And his new wife, my younger sister Amina. And their traveling companions." He added as he gestured to Gorna and Glag. It is good to see you again."

She bowed her head to Alixan in return. "It has been far too long since I have gazed upon the sky clearly." She said. Then her eyes moved in a way that made it obvious that she was smiling. "Or upon the face of a friend."

Then she turned to regard James and the others again.

"I welcome you to my home." She said with a slight tilt of her head. "Or at least as close to it as you can safely come." She turned back to the prince. "I take it there's to be a feast?"

Alixan smiled widely. "We've also got some Cedonian Gold in one of our cold rooms for you."

Once again the massive orc's eyes implied a smile had formed on her face.

"You know me too well." She said. Then she held her hand out to James.

James looked at Amina, who was staring at the offered hand in confusion. Then he looked at Alixan.

"It is customary for the Voice of Crag to walk in hand with whoever the highest ranking person in the area is." He said. Then he raised an eyebrow in question. "Which I was fairly certain was me."

"Hero summoned by gods outranks crown prince." She replied coolly.

James gritted his teeth at that, remembering how Alixan had said she was her people's spiritual leader.

But he had learned his lesson from Vatria, and he took the offered hand.

He had a feeling that it was going to be a long night.

\----------

"So ummmm... How did everyone... like the trip?" Samantha asked as she stood up in front of all the werewolves. She... wasn't terribly fond of public speaking. "Have a good time?"

There was a bit of a murmur as everyone talked to the people around them a bit, some nodded heads, as usual a handful in the back of the room looked more annoyed than anything. Same as every group meeting. She could hear a handful of mentions of squirrels.

"I'm glad to hear that it went well. I know I enjoyed getting to stretch my legs a bit." She looked down at the note-card with the details that had been given to her by Dr. Munro. "We've got some really good news." She said with a smile. "Starting next week we will be allowed to have monitored visits from our friends and loved ones. Um... People with spouses will even be given time in a secure cottage for um.... Well you know." She said with a slight grin.

There was a hissing noise from one of the wolves to her left that had two of his fingers in his mouth. He looked confused for a moment before trying again, with the same result.

"Damn. I guess we can't whistle anymore." He said with a look of mild disappointment. This drew short lived laughter from most of them. Luckily the one who'd attempted to whistle was part of the laughing.

"Anyways. You guys can discuss that when you have the family meetings next week. Um... there will be some limitations and precautions necessary if you do opt for that. Just... safety and health stuff mainly." She said. The laughter had helped her relax a little bit. "Um the big one though." She began, causing everyone to focus a bit more. "Is that... starting this next month the doctors are going to be going over everyone's notes and running us all through a series of group assessments. Mainly interviews with the doctors as a group."

This caused even the wolves at the back to sit forward with curiosity.

"And if the doctors determine that you have um... adjusted... well enough. They'll be letting us out into the surrounding community here at Sturgis on a TRIAL basis. We'll be monitored, and escorted. Both for the safety of the community AND-" She said with a raised finger as she saw some of them getting ready to speak up. "For OUR safety. They've assured me that we'll be allowed to go anywhere we want. And do.... almost anything we want. Within reason. They just don't want any of us having anything go wrong. No repeats of what happened when we became this way."

There were mumbles and questions and more than a few happy faces. But there were also some LESS than happy faces.

"What's next?" One of the back row wolves asked. "Leashes? We've been here over six months now."

"Yeah. And what are the criteria for these panels of judges? Cause that's what it sounds like." Another one asked.

Samantha held her hands up in a warding gesture as the questions began to ramp up. She... hadn't been prepared for any of this.

Luckily Dr. Munro stepped in.

"Everyone please." She said loudly as she stepped up next to Samantha. "Please. Settle down."

It still took a few moments before the roar settled down to a gentle murmur.

"We're not your captors." She said. "We're not your wardens. This isn't a prison."

"Sure seems like it some times." The first of the back wolves said.

"I know." She said. "I know. But at the end of the day we are a HOSPITAL." She gestured at the few other doctors in the room. "Our priority is the health and safety of the community around us. And our number one priority is the health and safety of our patients. And that's YOU." She said with a gesture at the wolves.

She waited a few moments to let everyone sit on that.

"We are in uncharted territory with you guys." She continued. "We want nothing more than to let you all go back to your normal lives. To the extent that you can now. But we had to fight hard to keep the military from keeping you as ACTUAL prisoners. The only reason they didn't is because of how public the wolf outbreak was, and the fact that that pack of wild ones managed to get away and split up."

^("Shoulda gone with them.") Someone whispered.

"Do you really believe that mister Schmidt?" She asked testily. "Cause from what I was told of your case, one of your biggest reasons for letting the hospital take you in was because you didn't want to kill anyone. And that's what THEY were doing. What they're still doing according to the news."

Schmidt grumbled, but remained quiet.

"You're all here because you couldn't, or wouldn't, let yourselves do that for one reason or another." The doctor said. "We're here to help convince the government that if you go out into the public, that will remain the case. That's all we're trying to do. That and help you adjust to your new lives."

Fletcher, one of the few non-wolves in the room who also wasn't a doctor, spoke up.

"That said, any of you that desires to be discharged may do so." He said. "But you would be doing so at your own risk. And I guarantee that the government would be watching you like a hawk for any slip ups. And by now you've all seen how they handled the other wolves. Wouldn't expect much less if I were you."

"They're gonna do that anyways." Someone closer to the front said. They didn't sound as angry as the back row, mostly just concerned.

"Probably." Samantha said. "I would. And I was one of them before this happened." She shrugged. "We're dangerous now. Whether we like it or not. And, as we all saw out at the lake, we AREN'T in complete control of our brains anymore. And if that...." She took a deep breath. "Goddess.... decides to mess with us. We might not even be able to do anything about it. I mean. I told the other guy to fuck off and he STILL made me into the....." She looked over to Dr. Munro. "What did they end up calling me?" She asked uncomfortably.

"Wonder Wolf." The doctor said.

Samantha groaned. "That's terrible." She said to herself, her eyes unfocused as they stared at the podium. Then she took a deep breath and looked back out. "Look. We have to acknowledge that there's merit to not just.... LETTING us run around without making sure we've got a handle on this. And the first steps is trial runs."

There was grumbling. But most of them had to admit the logic in it.

"What about me?" Said their youngest member, a young boy of only eight years old named Tommy who, thanks to the wolf outbreak, was an orphan now. His downcast eyes and trembling voice made everyone stop talking and reconsider. "I don't... have anywhere to go."

Suddenly everyone else's complaints seemed stupid.

Mrs. Ramirez, a fifty two year old florist who had been turned into a wolf while watering her shop's plants for the night, wrapped her arm around the boy. She'd become a sort of adoptive mother to Tommy since that night.

"You can come with me mijo." She said with a gentle hug.

Samantha moved past the podium and knelt down in front of the two of them. She lifted the young wolf's head up a bit with her chin.

"And maybe we can go back to the lake every now and then." She said with a smile. "I saw how much you liked swimming in it." She looked off to the side and Dr. Munro nodded with a smile. "Wanna do that?"

Tommy nodded.

"That's another thing." She said as she stood back up and moved back to the podium. "I know its... awkward.... And probably cliche since we're wolves now. But we should probably stick close to each other. Look out for each other. Just in case anything goes wrong even while we're out and about."

The back wolves began grumbling again, but she beat them to the chase.

"I'm not saying we have to be friends. And for god's sake I'm not gonna call us a pack." She reassured them. "We're not gonna be that cliche.... But I do think we should at least stay as.... well... this." She said, gesturing at the lot of them. "A support group. After all, we're the only ones who know what we're going through. Even once we're out of here." She looked at Fletcher, and tried not to stare. But she needed the lawyer to know she was talking to the hospital. "And we WILL all get out of here eventually. We should stay in touch. Exchange info and maybe do a monthly meeting, even if only online." She shrugged. "Plus it'll let us keep tabs on each other in case something happens to any of us. By the Government or by just.... people being assholes."

Despite not being fans of the whole situation, even the wolves in the back row could admit that that was probably a good idea.

As the meeting slowly relaxed and opened up to people talking about how they were doing, Dr. Munro stood off to the side suppressing a smile.

She was glad to see that she'd been right about Samantha and her role in the werewolf group.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12i0892/wait_is_this_just_gate_346/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (344/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Orcs are not going to be what you think they are. Also, Vickers proves for the ten millionth time that he is the master of forethought.

Enjoy.

\~

"So all the orcs in the world come from here?" James asked as Steve walked alongside Alixan's newest griffin. This one looked like the one he'd lost outside Jadesport, but it's plumage shimmered with a slightly red sheen instead of the blue that the former had had.

"Where they originate from." Alixan replied. "Obviously there are plenty of orcs out there who've never even seen this place. But as far as anyone's records, or the Orcish sagas, can recall; this is where they started."

"And they're tribal in nature?" James followed up. "Like with clan chief's and things like that?" The resemblance, at least hierarchically, to the orcs of his world's literature was a little too on the nose for his liking.

"Yes and no." Alixan said with a wave of his hand. "Their leader is called the Voice of Crag. She's more of a spiritual leader than anything. And they're tribal. But also nomadic."

"The crag doesn't have a lot of naturally occurring resources." Amina chimed in from behind him. "They rely very heavily on the meat of animals that fall pray to the miasma. They bolster that by trading refined materials and able bodied warriors with us and anyone willing to make deals on the far western end of the crag where it meets the ocean."

"So they move around for food?" James asked.

"Primarily." Alixan replied. "They set up camp in one of the major gorges and gathering parties go out to claim anything they find within, or around the crag's edge."

"Doesn't all that meat go bad?" He wondered.

"The stuff on the surface level does." Alixan said with a bit of a grimace. "But they still take the bones and anything salvageable. The creatures that fall WITHIN the Crag don't though."

James thought about that for a moment. How could dead animals NOT rot? That didn't make any sense. Unless the miasma itself could kill even bacteria, viruses, and fungus, and at a cellular level too. But the animals would still have a ton of gut bacteria and stuff inside them. He thought. How's the gas getting to that stuff? Then he remembered that even the smartest people on the King's staff had needed him to explain the concept of cells and atoms. Aaaaand he decided to shelve that question for later.

"Do the Orcs.... farm?" He asked. "Like plants and crops?"

"Mmmm there's a few species of plant that are able to survive down there. I don't think they're edible, though I do believe they use them to make soup stocks and broths. Could be wrong though." Alixan said with a shrug. "We sure can't eat them."

The group of them, Alixan, James, Amina, Gorna, and Glag, plus a small cohort of Alixan's Griffin riders flying overhead arrived at the massive wooden platform that stood elevated by about twenty feet above the edge of the Crag. One side of it was easy, slightly taller than normal, wooden stairs that would have looked at home on any house's deck back on Earth. The other half of the structure was a wide open ramp, and James could see indentations worn in, he was certain, by hundreds or even thousands of carts and wagons being hauled up and down them.

He expected for them to hitch their mounts up somewhere and climb the steps on foot. But no hitching posts or tie downs were visible, and Alixan simply kept riding his griffin up the side. So James guided Steve up the ramp next to the prince.

"Why's this thing so tall?" He asked as they rode up for the last bit.

"The gas." Alixan replied simply. "It does overflow sometimes, albeit not impressively. And it probably will when the lift rises. This keeps it from affecting us or our beasts." He said with a pat of his griffins neck.

"Ah. Makes sense." James replied.

When they got to the top James finally saw a place to hitch Steve and rode him that way, Amina slid off before he did, and Gorna followed closely behind her.

The lift was.... well... James hadn't seen anything like it in this world before. It was a fully functioning elevator, minus the music and light up buttons. As he peered over the railing and down into the Crag, he couldn't see where it's line led. The miasma was just too thick to see more than a few yards into it.

"Go ahead and let them know we're ready!" Alixan signalled the guards near the lift. One of them nodded and picked up something that looked like a massive war-club or something. He slammed it against the line down three times, then placed his hand on it.

A moment later the massive wheel that the line wrapped around began to rotate noisily as the lift began to ascend.

James really hoped that he'd do better with this world leader than he had with his last two.

\----------

Vickers walked down the halls of the castle at a brisk pace, carrying the bundle under his arms as carefully as he could.

He'd alerted castle's lead soldier, the massive elf known as the Guardian, and had been allowed to confirm his suspicion by smelling one of the samples that had been recovered after their small skirmish with the Agency's massive Golem construct.

Now he had a slightly different plan.

He'd drafted up a quick request on some paper and handed it to the Guardian, asking her to relay it to the King whenever he woke and was made aware of the situation. He honestly didn't expect it to be approved. But it was worth a shot. In the meantime he had to try to get a jump on the situation.

He greeted the two guards outside of the suite.

"Official business." He said. "Bit of an emergency... ish." He said as the guards looked at him curiously. But they stepped aside.

He entered the suite that had been set aside for Driscoll, Five, and their three remaining toolies, who were effectively their caregivers and makeshift therapists now that they didn't require their suits. The three people had known them longer than anyone else in the castle. One of them was even part of the team that had put Five in her original cybernetic body years ago.

And if he was honest, those three were the ones he needed right now.

He wasn't surprised to see Driscoll and Five already waiting for him. Driscoll was, like him, effectively nocturnal now. And even if he wasn't dawn was only an hour or so away now, and Five had insane energy levels.

"What'd you find?" Driscoll asked as the two of them locked eyes for a moment. Then he nodded at the bundle. "Highly doubt it was those."

"No it wasn't. It was the thing that you were willing to convert to fight." Vickers admitted. Then he turned to Five. "Mind grabbin' your doc?" He asked.

Five looked at him curiously, then hopped over to the door that the senior of the three toolies resided behind. She knocked on the door and then listened closely, a moment later she poked her head into the room and spoke to the man inside.

"You found the Agency?" Driscoll said, the anger in his voice evident. "Here?"

"Yeah." Vickers. Then he pointed at the wooden cup on the small table next to Driscoll. "Toss me that."

Driscoll looked at the cup then picked it up. Vickers held his hand up and waited. Then the fox wound back just a bit, before he snapped his long arm forward quickly.

Vickers' eyes didn't even flinch as the cup sailed wide to the right of him.

It wasn't even close.

Driscoll looked down at his arm in confusion.

"That definitely should have hit you." He said as he flexed his arm and hand.

"Five would probably do better." Vickers replied nonchalantly. "But that's pretty much what I expected." He nodded as five led a pajama suited lead Toolie, by the name of Doctor Shaw, out of his room.

"How can I help you chief?" He asked. "I can't imagine there's much use for a man whose job is no longer relevant."

Vickers unraveled the bundle a little bit and pulled out one of the helmets from one of the Miffy suits they'd recovered from the desert. Most of the helmets had been destroyed in the battle. But this one was remarkably intact, and the other one in the bundle was only damaged by a slightly diamond shaped stab wound through its face plate.

He gestured with it toward the two new were-folk.

"You think that, with enough scrap from the downed suits, you could make something to fit these two? Maybe like a visor or something?" He asked. "We got shit headin' towards a fan and we might not have time for these two to finish familiarizing themselves with the new hardware."

Shaw took the intact helmet in his hands and examined it.

"D-R-U-Five five seven X-ray." He said as he examined it. "With pinhole visual interface."

"Rod." Five said solemnly.

"We won't wear that." Driscoll chimed in as he stared at the helmet.

"You will." Vickers said sternly. "Doc here will refit it to work with your new facial structures. Make a visor or a sweet set of goggles or something. Give it a power source, and get it up and running. Even if only as a point and shoot reticle."

"We're NOT wearing that." Driscoll repeated.

"You wanna hunt the Agency?" Vickers asked as he handed the remaining helmet to Shaw and turned to face the two new Folk. "Cause if so this is how you do it."

"We don't need to wear the deathmasks of our friends to do it!" Five said harshly.

"Can you even AIM a weapon without them?" Vickers shot back even more harshly. "Did either of you ever even touch a weapon before you got into those tin cans? Cause I'll bet you hadn't. And now you got new INHUMAN bodies that you aint even used to."

"We only got these bodies so we could live." Driscoll countered. "And because you said it would help me hunt those pieces of shit down."

"And it will. And if we had a month or two to move I'd be cool with that." Vickers said. "But we don't. The Agency decided to shit on our front porch and now we're runnin' after 'em-" He pointed at Shaw. "almost literally in our PJ's. So unless you're certain you can hold up in a fight in your current state. You ether wear the damn helmets.... Or you sit on the fuckin' bench until next time."

"He's right." Dr. Shaw weighed in unexpectedly.

"What?" Driscoll asked incredulously.

"We did motor testing with you when you got back earlier remember?" The doctor asked. "Your reflexes are good but your hand eye coordination is garbage right now." He shook his head. "The Chief is correct. Given a few months you'd likely be more than capable of fighting as efficiently as before. But not yet."

Five nodded hesitantly.

"You too?" Driscoll asked with disbelief.

"He's right Driz." She said. "And about the weapons thing too. I never touched a gun in my life before I got in the suit. Never would've either. And we... well. We can't exactly say we have muscle memory about it... caaaauuuse we never used muscles to do anything."

THAT finally got through to him. It was one thing for Vickers to say it. And another for doc Shaw to say it. Neither of them knew what being IN one of the suits was like.

But Five did.

"Think about it boss." She said. "How would you hit a target moving on a jetski from the back of a hover insertion bird?"

He sighed, realizing with that one question exactly what she meant.

"Engage high mobility interception ballistics, gyro stabilize arms, account for visible wave form interference." He said, as if answering an instructor back in training.

"Fire on green." They both said at once.

Then five turned to Vickers. "How would you hit a guy on a jetski in that situation?" She asked.

"Weapon?" He asked back.

"Standard CT."

He shrugged. "Lead em by a few yards. Wait for the turbulence to die down in my bird. Spray a burst or two and adjust as needed."

She held one of her hands up in his direction.

Driscoll deflated.

He knew intellectually that that was effectively what the commands he'd listed would have told a suit to do. But he had to admit that he himself didn't actually know HOW to do those things. Vickers clearly did.

Hell, a few days earlier he'd been struggling to walk. He still did a bit.

He sighed.

"Fine." He said finally.

"I know it sucks." Vickers said with genuine sympathy. "But it's the only way I can think of to keep you guys in the fight until we can get you properly trained up. Suit or no suit you guys still have years of tactical experience over anyone in this castle besides myself. Hell, you got a lot more than Choi. Your minds will be your biggest asset until we can get you used to these new bodies."

Driscoll nodded. He had to smile a bit as Five jumped up and tapped a knuckle to his forehead on one of the downward nods.

"I'll take proper care of these." Dr. Shaw said, holding up the two helmets for emphasis. "And I'll make sure to pay respect to the others."

"Thanks doc." He said.

He still hadn't completely had a chance to deal with the loss of his team. Between the Agency's kidnapping him, the drug induced haze he'd had to stay in to survive afterwords, and the transformation into his new form. He hadn't had a chance to properly grieve his lost friends. And now he was going to be wearing one of their faces.

He turned and looked at Vickers.

"What did you find?" He asked.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12fufwk/wait_is_this_just_gate_345/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (344/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Orcs are not going to be what you think they are. Also, Vickers proves for the ten millionth time that he is the master of forethought.

Enjoy.

\~

"So all the orcs in the world come from here?" James asked as Steve walked alongside Alixan's newest griffin. This one looked like the one he'd lost outside Jadesport, but it's plumage shimmered with a slightly red sheen instead of the blue that the former had had.

"Where they originate from." Alixan replied. "Obviously there are plenty of orcs out there who've never even seen this place. But as far as anyone's records, or the Orcish sagas, can recall; this is where they started."

"And they're tribal in nature?" James followed up. "Like with clan chief's and things like that?" The resemblance, at least hierarchically, to the orcs of his world's literature was a little too on the nose for his liking.

"Yes and no." Alixan said with a wave of his hand. "Their leader is called the Voice of Crag. She's more of a spiritual leader than anything. And they're tribal. But also nomadic."

"The crag doesn't have a lot of naturally occurring resources." Amina chimed in from behind him. "They rely very heavily on the meat of animals that fall pray to the miasma. They bolster that by trading refined materials and able bodied warriors with us and anyone willing to make deals on the far western end of the crag where it meets the ocean."

"So they move around for food?" James asked.

"Primarily." Alixan replied. "They set up camp in one of the major gorges and gathering parties go out to claim anything they find within, or around the crag's edge."

"Doesn't all that meat go bad?" He wondered.

"The stuff on the surface level does." Alixan said with a bit of a grimace. "But they still take the bones and anything salvageable. The creatures that fall WITHIN the Crag don't though."

James thought about that for a moment. How could dead animals NOT rot? That didn't make any sense. Unless the miasma itself could kill even bacteria, viruses, and fungus, and at a cellular level too. But the animals would still have a ton of gut bacteria and stuff inside them. He thought. How's the gas getting to that stuff? Then he remembered that even the smartest people on the King's staff had needed him to explain the concept of cells and atoms. Aaaaand he decided to shelve that question for later.

"Do the Orcs.... farm?" He asked. "Like plants and crops?"

"Mmmm there's a few species of plant that are able to survive down there. I don't think they're edible, though I do believe they use them to make soup stocks and broths. Could be wrong though." Alixan said with a shrug. "We sure can't eat them."

The group of them, Alixan, James, Amina, Gorna, and Glag, plus a small cohort of Alixan's Griffin riders flying overhead arrived at the massive wooden platform that stood elevated by about twenty feet above the edge of the Crag. One side of it was easy, slightly taller than normal, wooden stairs that would have looked at home on any house's deck back on Earth. The other half of the structure was a wide open ramp, and James could see indentations worn in, he was certain, by hundreds or even thousands of carts and wagons being hauled up and down them.

He expected for them to hitch their mounts up somewhere and climb the steps on foot. But no hitching posts or tie downs were visible, and Alixan simply kept riding his griffin up the side. So James guided Steve up the ramp next to the prince.

"Why's this thing so tall?" He asked as they rode up for the last bit.

"The gas." Alixan replied simply. "It does overflow sometimes, albeit not impressively. And it probably will when the lift rises. This keeps it from affecting us or our beasts." He said with a pat of his griffins neck.

"Ah. Makes sense." James replied.

When they got to the top James finally saw a place to hitch Steve and rode him that way, Amina slid off before he did, and Gorna followed closely behind her.

The lift was.... well... James hadn't seen anything like it in this world before. It was a fully functioning elevator, minus the music and light up buttons. As he peered over the railing and down into the Crag, he couldn't see where it's line led. The miasma was just too thick to see more than a few yards into it.

"Go ahead and let them know we're ready!" Alixan signalled the guards near the lift. One of them nodded and picked up something that looked like a massive war-club or something. He slammed it against the line down three times, then placed his hand on it.

A moment later the massive wheel that the line wrapped around began to rotate noisily as the lift began to ascend.

James really hoped that he'd do better with this world leader than he had with his last two.

\----------

Vickers walked down the halls of the castle at a brisk pace, carrying the bundle under his arms as carefully as he could.

He'd alerted castle's lead soldier, the massive elf known as the Guardian, and had been allowed to confirm his suspicion by smelling one of the samples that had been recovered after their small skirmish with the Agency's massive Golem construct.

Now he had a slightly different plan.

He'd drafted up a quick request on some paper and handed it to the Guardian, asking her to relay it to the King whenever he woke and was made aware of the situation. He honestly didn't expect it to be approved. But it was worth a shot. In the meantime he had to try to get a jump on the situation.

He greeted the two guards outside of the suite.

"Official business." He said. "Bit of an emergency... ish." He said as the guards looked at him curiously. But they stepped aside.

He entered the suite that had been set aside for Driscoll, Five, and their three remaining toolies, who were effectively their caregivers and makeshift therapists now that they didn't require their suits. The three people had known them longer than anyone else in the castle. One of them was even part of the team that had put Five in her original cybernetic body years ago.

And if he was honest, those three were the ones he needed right now.

He wasn't surprised to see Driscoll and Five already waiting for him. Driscoll was, like him, effectively nocturnal now. And even if he wasn't dawn was only an hour or so away now, and Five had insane energy levels.

"What'd you find?" Driscoll asked as the two of them locked eyes for a moment. Then he nodded at the bundle. "Highly doubt it was those."

"No it wasn't. It was the thing that you were willing to convert to fight." Vickers admitted. Then he turned to Five. "Mind grabbin' your doc?" He asked.

Five looked at him curiously, then hopped over to the door that the senior of the three toolies resided behind. She knocked on the door and then listened closely, a moment later she poked her head into the room and spoke to the man inside.

"You found the Agency?" Driscoll said, the anger in his voice evident. "Here?"

"Yeah." Vickers. Then he pointed at the wooden cup on the small table next to Driscoll. "Toss me that."

Driscoll looked at the cup then picked it up. Vickers held his hand up and waited. Then the fox wound back just a bit, before he snapped his long arm forward quickly.

Vickers' eyes didn't even flinch as the cup sailed wide to the right of him.

It wasn't even close.

Driscoll looked down at his arm in confusion.

"That definitely should have hit you." He said as he flexed his arm and hand.

"Five would probably do better." Vickers replied nonchalantly. "But that's pretty much what I expected." He nodded as five led a pajama suited lead Toolie, by the name of Doctor Shaw, out of his room.

"How can I help you chief?" He asked. "I can't imagine there's much use for a man whose job is no longer relevant."

Vickers unraveled the bundle a little bit and pulled out one of the helmets from one of the Miffy suits they'd recovered from the desert. Most of the helmets had been destroyed in the battle. But this one was remarkably intact, and the other one in the bundle was only damaged by a slightly diamond shaped stab wound through its face plate.

He gestured with it toward the two new were-folk.

"You think that, with enough scrap from the downed suits, you could make something to fit these two? Maybe like a visor or something?" He asked. "We got shit headin' towards a fan and we might not have time for these two to finish familiarizing themselves with the new hardware."

Shaw took the intact helmet in his hands and examined it.

"D-R-U-Five five seven X-ray." He said as he examined it. "With pinhole visual interface."

"Rod." Five said solemnly.

"We won't wear that." Driscoll chimed in as he stared at the helmet.

"You will." Vickers said sternly. "Doc here will refit it to work with your new facial structures. Make a visor or a sweet set of goggles or something. Give it a power source, and get it up and running. Even if only as a point and shoot reticle."

"We're NOT wearing that." Driscoll repeated.

"You wanna hunt the Agency?" Vickers asked as he handed the remaining helmet to Shaw and turned to face the two new Folk. "Cause if so this is how you do it."

"We don't need to wear the deathmasks of our friends to do it!" Five said harshly.

"Can you even AIM a weapon without them?" Vickers shot back even more harshly. "Did either of you ever even touch a weapon before you got into those tin cans? Cause I'll bet you hadn't. And now you got new INHUMAN bodies that you aint even used to."

"We only got these bodies so we could live." Driscoll countered. "And because you said it would help me hunt those pieces of shit down."

"And it will. And if we had a month or two to move I'd be cool with that." Vickers said. "But we don't. The Agency decided to shit on our front porch and now we're runnin' after 'em-" He pointed at Shaw. "almost literally in our PJ's. So unless you're certain you can hold up in a fight in your current state. You ether wear the damn helmets.... Or you sit on the fuckin' bench until next time."

"He's right." Dr. Shaw weighed in unexpectedly.

"What?" Driscoll asked incredulously.

"We did motor testing with you when you got back earlier remember?" The doctor asked. "Your reflexes are good but your hand eye coordination is garbage right now." He shook his head. "The Chief is correct. Given a few months you'd likely be more than capable of fighting as efficiently as before. But not yet."

Five nodded hesitantly.

"You too?" Driscoll asked with disbelief.

"He's right Driz." She said. "And about the weapons thing too. I never touched a gun in my life before I got in the suit. Never would've either. And we... well. We can't exactly say we have muscle memory about it... caaaauuuse we never used muscles to do anything."

THAT finally got through to him. It was one thing for Vickers to say it. And another for doc Shaw to say it. Neither of them knew what being IN one of the suits was like.

But Five did.

"Think about it boss." She said. "How would you hit a target moving on a jetski from the back of a hover insertion bird?"

He sighed, realizing with that one question exactly what she meant.

"Engage high mobility interception ballistics, gyro stabilize arms, account for visible wave form interference." He said, as if answering an instructor back in training.

"Fire on green." They both said at once.

Then five turned to Vickers. "How would you hit a guy on a jetski in that situation?" She asked.

"Weapon?" He asked back.

"Standard CT."

He shrugged. "Lead em by a few yards. Wait for the turbulence to die down in my bird. Spray a burst or two and adjust as needed."

She held one of her hands up in his direction.

Driscoll deflated.

He knew intellectually that that was effectively what the commands he'd listed would have told a suit to do. But he had to admit that he himself didn't actually know HOW to do those things. Vickers clearly did.

Hell, a few days earlier he'd been struggling to walk. He still did a bit.

He sighed.

"Fine." He said finally.

"I know it sucks." Vickers said with genuine sympathy. "But it's the only way I can think of to keep you guys in the fight until we can get you properly trained up. Suit or no suit you guys still have years of tactical experience over anyone in this castle besides myself. Hell, you got a lot more than Choi. Your minds will be your biggest asset until we can get you used to these new bodies."

Driscoll nodded. He had to smile a bit as Five jumped up and tapped a knuckle to his forehead on one of the downward nods.

"I'll take proper care of these." Dr. Shaw said, holding up the two helmets for emphasis. "And I'll make sure to pay respect to the others."

"Thanks doc." He said.

He still hadn't completely had a chance to deal with the loss of his team. Between the Agency's kidnapping him, the drug induced haze he'd had to stay in to survive afterwords, and the transformation into his new form. He hadn't had a chance to properly grieve his lost friends. And now he was going to be wearing one of their faces.

He turned and looked at Vickers.

"What did you find?" He asked.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12fuakj/wait_is_this_just_gate_345/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (343/?)

Previous

Writer's note: First ever 100% Vickers chapter.

Enjoy

\~\~\~

He quickly put his pistol away and pulled out his identification papers before stepping out into the street. About ten yards from the post one of the guards spotted him.

"Evening sir." The soldier said as they tapped on their buddies shoulder. "Bit late for a stroll. Everything okay?"

"Yeah." Vickers replied, offering the papers to the young orc sergeant. "Just following a bit of a trail."

The sergeant looked over the papers, nodding as she saw his status as a companion to the summoned hero, and a visitor from Earth.

"Anything we need to worry about?" She asked curiously as she handed the papers back and held her hand out for the logbook. She started writing down about the encounter.

"Don't know yet." He admitted. "Anything weird come through here today? Any of the wolves or other folk on duty notice any strange smells?"

She finished writing the last little bit of info about Vickers visit down before signing her name. "'Fraid you'll have to be more specific sir." She said as she began to leaf through the other pages to see what else had been reported throughout the day. "Five Drakrid riders. One woolyyong wagon. A troupe of druids. Some kind of Elven bard with weird paint on his face." She looked at him with a bit of sympathy as she pointed at the road leading out of the city. "This is one of our big entrances. The road you're on leads to both the new refugee district AND the tail end of Trade Road."

Vickers nodded. He'd figured as much.

"Well, how bout a group of new recruits?" He asked. "Led by a Sergeant, looked like an elf woman."

The sergeant looked back at the logs.

"Got one described that way." She said. "But I'm not really supposed to let people know bout stuff like that. Friend of the hero or not."

He nodded again. It made sense not to talk about troop movements, even if they were just recruits.

"They come WITH anyone that you can tell me about?" He asked with a look of desperation.

She sighed as she thought about it. Then she looked back at the log entry.

"Few wagons full of Refugees and laborers from the east." She said. Then she pointed back at the intersection where he knew the scent trails had split. "Woulda split up there and went their separate ways I reckon. Probably just traveled together out of convenience."

"Thank you." He said with a small bow. "If you log this too just put a note in there for Clerk Tedrias to associate it with that group's visit too."

"Uhhh. Sure... sir." She said hesitantly. She wasn't completely certain if the hero or his companions had any say in how they did anything. The hero himself might now that he was married into the royal family. But that kind of thing wasn't a normal concern for most guards. "I'll get right on that."

She watched as Vickers turned and began walking down the road she'd indicated. Then he entered the shade of one of the buildings and seem to disappear into the darkness. She tried to watch to see where he went, but saw no sign of him.

"Don't go trying to hide from that guy apparently." The other guard on duty, Prabin, said as he took the log book from her. "Weird bunch of folks those Earthers."

"Yeah, as if you've ever met one of em before." She, partly, agreed as she turned back. "We'd better make sure nobody comes up dead or missing for the next couple days."

Vickers listened from where he'd slunk into the shadows. He reminded himself that being noticed AND remembered by guards was occasionally useful in an operation. It wasn't something that came up too often. But sometimes you had to be seen to get stuff done.

Besides, the guard sergeant had given him some good intel. Now he knew that he was looking for a few wagons and a group of refugees. That didn't narrow his search down too much. He'd already know that the path led to the refugee housing. But it was better than simply following ONLY his nose.

Once the guards had returned to their post fully, though the sergeant kept occasionally glancing in his general direction, he moved fast and low and silent down the narrow side street and back up to the roofs.

His hunt continued.

And only an hour or so later, the air was pungent with the scent of the thing he'd been tracking. At least to him it was.

It smelled coppery, rotten and like it was full of old stone and vinegar. He could feel magic soaking into the area in a wave. And as he took the fullness of the scent into his mind, clinging to the side of a small bell tower and hiding in its shadow, he knew what it was.

It was blood.

But not just blood. It was old blood. Blood that had been mixed with some kind of chemicals and other materials. Something foul and disgusting and oozing with-

Wait. He thought as the recognition struck him like lightning. Blood.... Stone.... Magic?

He stared down, his eyes widening in realization, at the rows upon rows of houses and temporary tents and wagon beds that made up the refugee portion of the city while the King's men continued to rebuild.

The golems.

The hair on running down his back stood on edge immediately as he thought the word and felt the truth of it.

He'd shot one of these things in the face right before blowing up the agency. He'd smelled it then, even though his human nose and mind hadn't had the precision to catalog it like he could now. Then he'd saved Choi from a massive version of the thing that had actually been a blended group of them working together. He'd been literally elbow deep in the golem then, as he'd literally punched it to bits.

And now, with his new nose and animal instincts, he had smelled it again. And the animal inside of him hadn't been putting him on the hunt for prey. It had warned him of a dangerous intruder to his territory. Something it knew from HIS mind was a threat and needed to be dealt with.

His large reflective eyes quickly scanned the area around him as he became acutely aware that if one of THOSE was here than that likely meant that the Agency was too.

With Choi gone he couldn't count on an accidental explosion or a poorly timed duel, or something like that to unveil them by mistake. Nor could he count on a blight monster leading him straight to them.

They were here. Mixed into the tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of people that lived in the capital. And they'd come with their golems, and as part of a group of travelers.

And they had people infiltrating the castle guard.

He looked around one last time, as if doing so might suddenly unveil a golem just walking around in the open.

Then he bolted for the castle, ignoring any sense of stealth once he got far enough away that the scent of the golem had faded. Leaping, rolling, and sliding across roofs with no sense of care for anyone sleeping inside.

He had to alert the King's people.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12e0qaj/wait_is_this_just_gate_344/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (343/?)

Previous / First

Writer's note: First ever 100% Vickers chapter.

Enjoy

\~

Vickers stalked across the roofs and down the side alleys of the Petravian capital like a wraith as he followed the scent from the castle.

His keen hearing and the reflective layers in his eyes allowed him to avoid the occasional nocturnal people that he came across, the people who worked night jobs, the tavern goers, and the occasional guard patrols, with incredible ease. The only people who seemed to notice him were the occasional were-folk that he came across. And they mostly seemed to simply acknowledge him and then return to their duties. Though most of them still kept their heads pointed his way, or at least their ears.

He felt mild annoyance any time that happened. The part of his brain that wasn't quite his anymore didn't like it when things noticed him. And it liked it even less when they noticed him and DIDN'T panic. The wolves were the worst. They not only noticed him, but routinely locked eyes with him and engaged in short lived staring contests. He hated having to be the one to break the lock.

But, so far as he could tell, none of them were his problem.

He kept on the scent.

As he neared the outskirts of town he came across a problem. At one of the main crossroads, just inside of the eastern city entrance, he came across branches in the path that the scent had taken. The path he was on led, naturally, back the way he'd come to the castle.

But branching off down a significantly wider street was a scent path MUCH stronger than the one he'd followed.

That annoying animal part of his brain told him that THIS was the path to follow, to hell with the one leading out past the guard post and out of the city. His prey had gone THAT way, toward the refugee housing of the city.

But he had to do his diligence.

Vickers dropped from the rooftop into the alley next to it. His shoe-less feet made barely a whisper as he landed on the dirt there.

He quickly put his pistol away and pulled out his identification papers before stepping out into the street. About ten yards from the post one of the guards spotted him.

"Evening sir." The soldier said as they tapped on their buddies shoulder. "Bit late for a stroll. Everything okay?"

"Yeah." Vickers replied, offering the papers to the young orc sergeant. "Just following a bit of a trail."

The sergeant looked over the papers, nodding as she saw his status as a companion to the summoned hero, and a visitor from Earth.

"Anything we need to worry about?" She asked curiously as she handed the papers back and held her hand out for the logbook. She started writing down about the encounter.

"Don't know yet." He admitted. "Anything weird come through here today? Any of the wolves or other folk on duty notice any strange smells?"

She finished writing the last little bit of info about Vickers visit down before signing her name. "'Fraid you'll have to be more specific sir." She said as she began to leaf through the other pages to see what else had been reported throughout the day. "Five Drakrid riders. One woolyyong wagon. A troupe of druids. Some kind of Elven bard with weird paint on his face." She looked at him with a bit of sympathy as she pointed at the road leading out of the city. "This is one of our big entrances. The road you're on leads to both the new refugee district AND the tail end of Trade Road."

Vickers nodded. He'd figured as much.

"Well, how bout a group of new recruits?" He asked. "Led by a Sergeant, looked like an elf woman."

The sergeant looked back at the logs.

"Got one described that way." She said. "But I'm not really supposed to let people know bout stuff like that. Friend of the hero or not."

He nodded again. It made sense not to talk about troop movements, even if they were just recruits.

"They come WITH anyone that you can tell me about?" He asked with a look of desperation.

She sighed as she thought about it. Then she looked back at the log entry.

"Few wagons full of Refugees and laborers from the east." She said. Then she pointed back at the intersection where he knew the scent trails had split. "Woulda split up there and went their separate ways I reckon. Probably just traveled together out of convenience."

"Thank you." He said with a small bow. "If you log this too just put a note in there for Clerk Tedrias to associate it with that group's visit too."

"Uhhh. Sure... sir." She said hesitantly. She wasn't completely certain if the hero or his companions had any say in how they did anything. The hero himself might now that he was married into the royal family. But that kind of thing wasn't a normal concern for most guards. "I'll get right on that."

She watched as Vickers turned and began walking down the road she'd indicated. Then he entered the shade of one of the buildings and seem to disappear into the darkness. She tried to watch to see where he went, but saw no sign of him.

"Don't go trying to hide from that guy apparently." The other guard on duty, Prabin, said as he took the log book from her. "Weird bunch of folks those Earthers."

"Yeah, as if you've ever met one of em before." She, partly, agreed as she turned back. "We'd better make sure nobody comes up dead or missing for the next couple days."

Vickers listened from where he'd slunk into the shadows. He reminded himself that being noticed AND remembered by guards was occasionally useful in an operation. It wasn't something that came up too often. But sometimes you had to be seen to get stuff done.

Besides, the guard sergeant had given him some good intel. Now he knew that he was looking for a few wagons and a group of refugees. That didn't narrow his search down too much. He'd already know that the path led to the refugee housing. But it was better than simply following ONLY his nose.

Once the guards had returned to their post fully, though the sergeant kept occasionally glancing in his general direction, he moved fast and low and silent down the narrow side street and back up to the roofs.

His hunt continued.

And only an hour or so later, the air was pungent with the scent of the thing he'd been tracking. At least to him it was.

It smelled coppery, rotten and like it was full of old stone and vinegar. He could feel magic soaking into the area in a wave. And as he took the fullness of the scent into his mind, clinging to the side of a small bell tower and hiding in its shadow, he knew what it was.

It was blood.

But not just blood. It was old blood. Blood that had been mixed with some kind of chemicals and other materials. Something foul and disgusting and oozing with-

Wait. He thought as the recognition struck him like lightning. Blood.... Stone.... Magic?

He stared down, his eyes widening in realization, at the rows upon rows of houses and temporary tents and wagon beds that made up the refugee portion of the city while the King's men continued to rebuild.

The golems.

The hair on running down his back stood on edge immediately as he thought the word and felt the truth of it.

He'd shot one of these things in the face right before blowing up the agency. He'd smelled it then, even though his human nose and mind hadn't had the precision to catalog it like he could now. Then he'd saved Choi from a massive version of the thing that had actually been a blended group of them working together. He'd been literally elbow deep in the golem then, as he'd literally punched it to bits.

And now, with his new nose and animal instincts, he had smelled it again. And the animal inside of him hadn't been putting him on the hunt for prey. It had warned him of a dangerous intruder to his territory. Something it knew from HIS mind was a threat and needed to be dealt with.

His large reflective eyes quickly scanned the area around him as he became acutely aware that if one of THOSE was here than that likely meant that the Agency was too.

With Choi gone he couldn't count on an accidental explosion or a poorly timed duel, or something like that to unveil them by mistake. Nor could he count on a blight monster leading him straight to them.

They were here. Mixed into the tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of people that lived in the capital. And they'd come with their golems, and as part of a group of travelers.

And they had people infiltrating the castle guard.

He looked around one last time, as if doing so might suddenly unveil a golem just walking around in the open.

Then he bolted for the castle, ignoring any sense of stealth once he got far enough away that the scent of the golem had faded. Leaping, rolling, and sliding across roofs with no sense of care for anyone sleeping inside.

He had to alert the King's people.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12e0n05/wait_is_this_just_gate_344/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (342/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James has always been cheesy for Amina. But let's be real. Given his power set, we'd all do the same thing for our significant others. Least I would anyways.

SUPERMAN THAT completely respectable woman whom I care about deeply.

Enjoy.

\~

"So... that's a view." James said as he and Amina offloaded their bags and belongings in the room Alixan had set aside for them.

"Alixan was always a bit of a show off." Amina replied as she dropped her bag on the bed and joined him next to the window overlooking the small porch/perch outside their room.

It was nearly nightfall now and the sun was setting almost directly in front of their room's view. Dead center in the view was the Draidian township, it's large walls casting long shadows toward the spire they were currently in. To the left of that was the massive void of the Crag, which swirled with the deadly gas that made it virtually impassible for humans. And to the right, albeit distantly, was the edge of the forest that they'd emerged from earlier in the day. Behind all of it the planets rings caught the light of the setting sun and refracted it just a bit, causing an almost aurora like light show just above the horizon.

"Does the sun always do that with the rings?" James asked. "Never seen it do that before."

"This far south." Amina said as she pulled James's pack off his shoulders for him. "And this high up off the ground? Yes."

James thought for a moment.

"Does.... going higher let you see more of that?" He asked.

"It does."

"And your brother said that the griffins wouldn't attack us unless we went near their nests. Right?" He followed up.

"Yeah." She replied. "Why?"

"Come with me." He said as he held his hand out, and placed the other on the handle of the door leading out to the open air.

She took it without hesitation, she always would, and James pulled her out onto the balcony with him.

"Trust me?" He asked.

"Of course."

"Then hold on. I've wanted to do this for a while now." He said, then nodded at the light show. "That's as good a reason as any to do it."

"What are you going to do?" She asked as she moved closer, and his wolf arm wrapped around her.

"Steal a move from a ton of super hero movies." He said with a wink. Then he began to sing softly. "Come fly with me. Let's fly. Let's fly away." He began with a smile.

And that was what they did.

\------------------------

Vickers walked slowly, and calmly, as he moved through the castle courtyard.

He paused every few yards and took long, deep, breaths through his nose, drinking in the scents of the day so that his not fully jaguar nose could focus on them.

The nightly guard patrol crossed his path once, challenged him, and he simply explained that he'd had a long day and was out for a walk to relax and get some fresh air. He was wearing simple pants and one of his military undershirts, and he had no bag or weapons (that could be seen). So they let him go and told him not to make any kind of commotion. Vickers nodded and continued on.

The scent was strongest near the gate, and over near the barracks and training yards. But he'd already expected that.

He figured, as long as they were with the other soldiers and under watch, they would be fairly safe. He'd already told the king's staff that he was following a hunch he had, and to keep an eye on the new recruits. But he had also admitted that he wasn't sure what the hunch was yet, just that he had one.

Vickers walked out the side gate that he and the two Muck Marchers had entered earlier, letting the guards there know that he'd be back in the morning. They logged it in their books and jokingly told him to have a pint in their memory. Vickers chuckled a bit, and lied back that he would.

Then he began walking into the city, still occasionally slowing down to sniff the air.

Once he was out of the sight of the walls, he pulled his bottomless bag out from where it had been tucked into his pant leg, retrieved his pistol, shield, and short sword, and equipped them to his torso and waist.

Then he disappeared into the shadow of a shop of some kind.

And began to hunt.

\----------

"Okay. I know that both jaguars AND Navy SEALS are stealth oriented killers." Five said from where she and Driscoll were perched (one of them more comfortably than the other) in one of the trees just outside the castle courtyard. "But even I think that's cliche as fuck."

"Doesn't matter." Driscoll replied. "We were right. He's hunting something. Has been since before we even got back today."

"And?" Five asked. "That's his problem. I don't know about you foxes. But I don't think squirrels are nocturnal. At least I'm not. We should go back." She said before yawning. "Besides. We're still getting used to having bodies again. We'll only slow him down."

As if on cue they watched with only a little awe as the massive were-jaguar leapt up to the roof of one of the buildings with a single, massive, jump. He also landed with almost no sound at all. Then he began stalking across the rooftops.

"You're probably right." Driscoll said. "Though its not like the guards to our rooms know we're gone. They didn't bar our windows, they clearly didn't expect us to leap from them."

"Good thing the chief wasn't lying about that ability." She said as they dropped from the tree and began silently bounding forward in the same direction as Vickers, using the streets instead of the roofs.

Driscoll was, naturally, much faster than Five in their new forms. He was taller and longer limbed, so his strides took him much further much easier. But he was also lanky and, as she'd pointed out already, still getting used to the new body. He also had to duck or dodge some of the low hanging shop signs to avoid hitting his head. He also struggled with the cobbling of the streets, which was awkward for his disproportionately small feet.

She, on the other hand, scrambled on all fours. The result was that she legitimately looked like a massive squirrel, and was able to dart over, under, and around, all the obstacles that he had to avoid the hard way, and was also more than capable of running up and down buildings, allowing her to cut off entire blocks as they traveled. Plus, she had taken to her new body much more comfortably than he had.

Still, they made good time, and his nose kept them on the chief's trail as the massive man leaped and bounded across rooftops, stopping occasionally to scent the air.

Or at least they were making good time, until they ran down one of the many streets of the capital and a massive hulking form slammed into the ground right in front of Driscoll with a low growl.

"What are you doing out here?" Vickers asked as he stood up to his full form. He still only came up to Driscoll's shoulders. But the intimidation was still there as the feline eyes glared at both of them. "You should have turned back. I didn't think you'd make it past that tree."

"You knew we followed you?" Five asked as she perched on a nearby cart. She flinched back as Vickers turned that angry gaze on her.

"I've smelled you since just after I left my room." He replied. "I figured it was just you two being curious. But you need to go back."

"Where are you going?" Driscoll asked as he stalked around the Chief and looked at his weapons and shield. "And why are you armed?"

"I don't know where." Vickers replied a little angrily. "THAT'S why I'm armed."

"Why though?" Five asked as she absent mindedly groomed one of her ears with her hand.

"A fucking hunch." Vickers shot back. "Now go back or I'll call the guards." Then he pulled out the little purple glowing device linked to the bands around their ankles. "And drag you back myself."

The two of them flinched back just a little.

"We just want to help." Driscoll said hesitantly. "And learn what we're capable of."

"Then meet me in the training yard at ass crack o' dawn o'clock." Vickers said with zero remorse. "Go back now or I DRAG. YOU. BACK." He hissed out through clenched teeth. "I don't even know if what I'm thinking is right or not. Might just be some weird ass perfume or something."

"You're sneaking out of the castle armed for battle for some weird ass perfume?" Five asked with a grin. "Your wolf girlfriend back in town? Didn't know you guys fought for foreplay. Course I don't know much about you guys anyways."

Vickers sighed. Then pressed the button on the purple device.

Five was pulled from the side of the cart in a crash, even as Driscoll slammed onto his back and began sliding on the ground.

"I told you to go back." He said as he began walking back toward the castle. "Now checking this damn hunch is gonna take me all the way to dawn. God dammit."

"Okay okay!" Driscoll half yelled. "Quit with the magic bullshit!"

Vickers kept walking, causing the two of them slide along the cobbled street even as Five scrabbled desperately for a hold.

"Gonna head back to the castle?" He asked as he kept his thumb on the device.

Heads were starting to poke out of windows now, causing Vickers to get even more annoyed.

But he kept walking.

"Nothing to see here folks." He said to a dwarven couple that popped out of their upstairs window. "Just bringing back some escaped criminals."

"We're not..." Driscoll began to retort. Then he remembered that they were actually P.O.W.s. "Okay. Technically we're prisoners. But not THAT kind of prisoner."

"Tomato, tomato." Vickers said, making a point of NOT pronouncing them differently. "Are you gonna go back to the castle?"

"YES!" The both of them replied at once.

Vickers took his thumb off the device. The force pulling at their ankles ceased immediately and Five quickly scrambled over behind the corner of a small flower shop that was currently closed.

"Aaaaah." Vickers said with a pointed finger.

"Don't use that!" She begged, and Vickers actually felt a pang of regret at the fear in it. "That thing... and your size... made the squirrel part of me freak the fuck out!"

Vickers deflated a bit as he turned away. He waved at a couple of the people looking out their windows and put on a fake smile that he ensured didn't have any teeth.

"The fox part of me wasn't too keen on that either." Driscoll weighed in.

Vickers put the device back in his pocket.

"Go back to the castle." He said simply. "You said you would. Hold to that. You trusted my decision to have you turned. Trust this one. Go back."

Driscoll dusted himself off as he stood up, leaning on a bit of fencing as he did. "We will." He said once he'd stood up fully.

Vickers waited for a moment, watching as they slowly moved past him. Normally he would have thought that they looked like they had their tails between their legs. But in Driscoll's case he actually did.

"Sorry about that." He said as Five moved near him. "I didn't think of that when I used it."

"It's fine." She said quickly and quietly. "It's fine."

Then the two of them left, heading the way they'd come. Vickers watched them go.

"Remember your own fuckin lessons idiot." He said to himself.

Then he raised his head, took a long sniff of the air.

And went back to work.

\--------------------

"It would appear." Marcos said in his haltingly slow, age old, way of speaking as he closed the dusty tome he'd just finished reading. "That your child... undeveloped as it is... is going to be quite strong in the ways of magic."

"I kind of figured that part." Veliry said as she closed the book she was also reading. It hadn't been as helpful as its title had made her think. Though she had learned that several magically inclined creatures practically lactated magical breast milk right after birth that greatly bolstered the newborn baby's body.

"It's an uncommon issue." Marcos explained. "Not aided by your link to the druidic ways of magic now." He said with a point of an old crooked finger at her antlers. "But at the very least the magical surge does have some precedent."

"It does?" She wondered.

The elder wizard, and her former teacher, nodded. "As the healers told you, the baby siphons a bit of your natural magical flow as it develops." He reminded her. "And in your case, both the mother AND the father, were quite gifted in the ways of magic."

"Yes." She said somewhat solemnly. "Joseph was still new to it. But... he was much more powerful than he had any right to be."

"Yes." Marcos agreed. "And a brilliant mind from what I saw the few times I saw him train with you. Plus the doorways." He nodded a bit. "And that rather... unusual... way he had of flying..... An odd pair of brothers. Mother is a mage too? A healer I understand."

"Yes." Veliry concurred. "Quite a good one according to Master Farstorm."

"Hmm yes." Marcos said. "Father comes from a family of naturally talented mages. Mother is a prodigy mage herself. The child will likely follow the same route. Should they choose to do so."

"That still doesn't explain the surge." Veliry countered. "Or the druidic manifestation. It was supposed to be my deathbolt spell. Instead it was a beam of pure LIFE energy."

"Yes well... your body went through a maelstrom of different energies. Life... death... rebirth... nature... the dimensional magic of the doors. And you almost died from it." Marcos replied. "And now you've got that little leechling in you mixing all those energies even more so it can grow up strong in magic like its parents." Then he tapped at the book. "Plus it's trying to protect you."

"Protect me?" She wondered. "What do you mean?"

"Well think about it." He said. "If you can't use magic what are you going to do if an attack occurs here?"

She shrugged. "Probably hide in my lab and let my door kill anyone who tries to get in."

"A wise choice. And not joining in on that battle makes you, and by extension the child, less likely to die." He responded.

"But I can use magic." She countered. "I just had to focus. Had to get angry... at myself."

"And in an emergency. A TRUE emergency. You would likely be able to do so again." He shot back. "And if you did?...." He gestured for her to finish the thought.

"I would.... unleash a massive blast like before." She said as her eyebrows rose.

"And you and the child would likely be saved as a result." The old mage said with a smile. Then he pointed at the book again. "Re'Eidras the Blue. Temin of the Southern Sands. And one of the King's own ancestors." He said. "Same kind of thing happened. Just... not with the druidic flare."

Veliry picked the book up and looked at it curiously.

"Uncommon problems for uncommon people: Extraordinary magic users and the strange ailments they faced?" She asked. "Is this from the college?"

"It is." Marcos said, still smiling. "I have quite a few of their books." Then he pointed at her. "You'll probably be in that book if they ever decide to update it."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12d10a4/wait_is_this_just_gate_343/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (342/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James has always been cheesy for Amina. But let's be real. Given his power set, we'd all do the same thing for our significant others. Least I would anyways.

SUPERMAN THAT completely respectable woman whom I care about deeply.

Enjoy.

\~

"So... that's a view." James said as he and Amina offloaded their bags and belongings in the room Alixan had set aside for them.

"Alixan was always a bit of a show off." Amina replied as she dropped her bag on the bed and joined him next to the window overlooking the small porch/perch outside their room.

It was nearly nightfall now and the sun was setting almost directly in front of their room's view. Dead center in the view was the Draidian township, it's large walls casting long shadows toward the spire they were currently in. To the left of that was the massive void of the Crag, which swirled with the deadly gas that made it virtually impassible for humans. And to the right, albeit distantly, was the edge of the forest that they'd emerged from earlier in the day. Behind all of it the planets rings caught the light of the setting sun and refracted it just a bit, causing an almost aurora like light show just above the horizon.

"Does the sun always do that with the rings?" James asked. "Never seen it do that before."

"This far south." Amina said as she pulled James's pack off his shoulders for him. "And this high up off the ground? Yes."

James thought for a moment.

"Does.... going higher let you see more of that?" He asked.

"It does."

"And your brother said that the griffins wouldn't attack us unless we went near their nests. Right?" He followed up.

"Yeah." She replied. "Why?"

"Come with me." He said as he held his hand out, and placed the other on the handle of the door leading out to the open air.

She took it without hesitation, she always would, and James pulled her out onto the balcony with him.

"Trust me?" He asked.

"Of course."

"Then hold on. I've wanted to do this for a while now." He said, then nodded at the light show. "That's as good a reason as any to do it."

"What are you going to do?" She asked as she moved closer, and his wolf arm wrapped around her.

"Steal a move from a ton of super hero movies." He said with a wink. Then he began to sing softly. "Come fly with me. Let's fly. Let's fly away." He began with a smile.

And that was what they did.

\------------------------

Vickers walked slowly, and calmly, as he moved through the castle courtyard.

He paused every few yards and took long, deep, breaths through his nose, drinking in the scents of the day so that his not fully jaguar nose could focus on them.

The nightly guard patrol crossed his path once, challenged him, and he simply explained that he'd had a long day and was out for a walk to relax and get some fresh air. He was wearing simple pants and one of his military undershirts, and he had no bag or weapons (that could be seen). So they let him go and told him not to make any kind of commotion. Vickers nodded and continued on.

The scent was strongest near the gate, and over near the barracks and training yards. But he'd already expected that.

He figured, as long as they were with the other soldiers and under watch, they would be fairly safe. He'd already told the king's staff that he was following a hunch he had, and to keep an eye on the new recruits. But he had also admitted that he wasn't sure what the hunch was yet, just that he had one.

Vickers walked out the side gate that he and the two Muck Marchers had entered earlier, letting the guards there know that he'd be back in the morning. They logged it in their books and jokingly told him to have a pint in their memory. Vickers chuckled a bit, and lied back that he would.

Then he began walking into the city, still occasionally slowing down to sniff the air.

Once he was out of the sight of the walls, he pulled his bottomless bag out from where it had been tucked into his pant leg, retrieved his pistol, shield, and short sword, and equipped them to his torso and waist.

Then he disappeared into the shadow of a shop of some kind.

And began to hunt.

\----------

"Okay. I know that both jaguars AND Navy SEALS are stealth oriented killers." Five said from where she and Driscoll were perched (one of them more comfortably than the other) in one of the trees just outside the castle courtyard. "But even I think that's cliche as fuck."

"Doesn't matter." Driscoll replied. "We were right. He's hunting something. Has been since before we even got back today."

"And?" Five asked. "That's his problem. I don't know about you foxes. But I don't think squirrels are nocturnal. At least I'm not. We should go back." She said before yawning. "Besides. We're still getting used to having bodies again. We'll only slow him down."

As if on cue they watched with only a little awe as the massive were-jaguar leapt up to the roof of one of the buildings with a single, massive, jump. He also landed with almost no sound at all. Then he began stalking across the rooftops.

"You're probably right." Driscoll said. "Though its not like the guards to our rooms know we're gone. They didn't bar our windows, they clearly didn't expect us to leap from them."

"Good thing the chief wasn't lying about that ability." She said as they dropped from the tree and began silently bounding forward in the same direction as Vickers, using the streets instead of the roofs.

Driscoll was, naturally, much faster than Five in their new forms. He was taller and longer limbed, so his strides took him much further much easier. But he was also lanky and, as she'd pointed out already, still getting used to the new body. He also had to duck or dodge some of the low hanging shop signs to avoid hitting his head. He also struggled with the cobbling of the streets, which was awkward for his disproportionately small feet.

She, on the other hand, scrambled on all fours. The result was that she legitimately looked like a massive squirrel, and was able to dart over, under, and around, all the obstacles that he had to avoid the hard way, and was also more than capable of running up and down buildings, allowing her to cut off entire blocks as they traveled. Plus, she had taken to her new body much more comfortably than he had.

Still, they made good time, and his nose kept them on the chief's trail as the massive man leaped and bounded across rooftops, stopping occasionally to scent the air.

Or at least they were making good time, until they ran down one of the many streets of the capital and a massive hulking form slammed into the ground right in front of Driscoll with a low growl.

"What are you doing out here?" Vickers asked as he stood up to his full form. He still only came up to Driscoll's shoulders. But the intimidation was still there as the feline eyes glared at both of them. "You should have turned back. I didn't think you'd make it past that tree."

"You knew we followed you?" Five asked as she perched on a nearby cart. She flinched back as Vickers turned that angry gaze on her.

"I've smelled you since just after I left my room." He replied. "I figured it was just you two being curious. But you need to go back."

"Where are you going?" Driscoll asked as he stalked around the Chief and looked at his weapons and shield. "And why are you armed?"

"I don't know where." Vickers replied a little angrily. "THAT'S why I'm armed."

"Why though?" Five asked as she absent mindedly groomed one of her ears with her hand.

"A fucking hunch." Vickers shot back. "Now go back or I'll call the guards." Then he pulled out the little purple glowing device linked to the bands around their ankles. "And drag you back myself."

The two of them flinched back just a little.

"We just want to help." Driscoll said hesitantly. "And learn what we're capable of."

"Then meet me in the training yard at ass crack o' dawn o'clock." Vickers said with zero remorse. "Go back now or I DRAG. YOU. BACK." He hissed out through clenched teeth. "I don't even know if what I'm thinking is right or not. Might just be some weird ass perfume or something."

"You're sneaking out of the castle armed for battle for some weird ass perfume?" Five asked with a grin. "Your wolf girlfriend back in town? Didn't know you guys fought for foreplay. Course I don't know much about you guys anyways."

Vickers sighed. Then pressed the button on the purple device.

Five was pulled from the side of the cart in a crash, even as Driscoll slammed onto his back and began sliding on the ground.

"I told you to go back." He said as he began walking back toward the castle. "Now checking this damn hunch is gonna take me all the way to dawn. God dammit."

"Okay okay!" Driscoll half yelled. "Quit with the magic bullshit!"

Vickers kept walking, causing the two of them slide along the cobbled street even as Five scrabbled desperately for a hold.

"Gonna head back to the castle?" He asked as he kept his thumb on the device.

Heads were starting to poke out of windows now, causing Vickers to get even more annoyed.

But he kept walking.

"Nothing to see here folks." He said to a dwarven couple that popped out of their upstairs window. "Just bringing back some escaped criminals."

"We're not..." Driscoll began to retort. Then he remembered that they were actually P.O.W.s. "Okay. Technically we're prisoners. But not THAT kind of prisoner."

"Tomato, tomato." Vickers said, making a point of NOT pronouncing them differently. "Are you gonna go back to the castle?"

"YES!" The both of them replied at once.

Vickers took his thumb off the device. The force pulling at their ankles ceased immediately and Five quickly scrambled over behind the corner of a small flower shop that was currently closed.

"Aaaaah." Vickers said with a pointed finger.

"Don't use that!" She begged, and Vickers actually felt a pang of regret at the fear in it. "That thing... and your size... made the squirrel part of me freak the fuck out!"

Vickers deflated a bit as he turned away. He waved at a couple of the people looking out their windows and put on a fake smile that he ensured didn't have any teeth.

"The fox part of me wasn't too keen on that either." Driscoll weighed in.

Vickers put the device back in his pocket.

"Go back to the castle." He said simply. "You said you would. Hold to that. You trusted my decision to have you turned. Trust this one. Go back."

Driscoll dusted himself off as he stood up, leaning on a bit of fencing as he did. "We will." He said once he'd stood up fully.

Vickers waited for a moment, watching as they slowly moved past him. Normally he would have thought that they looked like they had their tails between their legs. But in Driscoll's case he actually did.

"Sorry about that." He said as Five moved near him. "I didn't think of that when I used it."

"It's fine." She said quickly and quietly. "It's fine."

Then the two of them left, heading the way they'd come. Vickers watched them go.

"Remember your own fuckin lessons idiot." He said to himself.

Then he raised his head, took a long sniff of the air.

And went back to work.

\--------------------

"It would appear." Marcos said in his haltingly slow, age old, way of speaking as he closed the dusty tome he'd just finished reading. "That your child... undeveloped as it is... is going to be quite strong in the ways of magic."

"I kind of figured that part." Veliry said as she closed the book she was also reading. It hadn't been as helpful as its title had made her think. Though she had learned that several magically inclined creatures practically lactated magical breast milk right after birth that greatly bolstered the newborn baby's body.

"It's an uncommon issue." Marcos explained. "Not aided by your link to the druidic ways of magic now." He said with a point of an old crooked finger at her antlers. "But at the very least the magical surge does have some precedent."

"It does?" She wondered.

The elder wizard, and her former teacher, nodded. "As the healers told you, the baby siphons a bit of your natural magical flow as it develops." He reminded her. "And in your case, both the mother AND the father, were quite gifted in the ways of magic."

"Yes." She said somewhat solemnly. "Joseph was still new to it. But... he was much more powerful than he had any right to be."

"Yes." Marcos agreed. "And a brilliant mind from what I saw the few times I saw him train with you. Plus the doorways." He nodded a bit. "And that rather... unusual... way he had of flying..... An odd pair of brothers. Mother is a mage too? A healer I understand."

"Yes." Veliry concurred. "Quite a good one according to Master Farstorm."

"Hmm yes." Marcos said. "Father comes from a family of naturally talented mages. Mother is a prodigy mage herself. The child will likely follow the same route. Should they choose to do so."

"That still doesn't explain the surge." Veliry countered. "Or the druidic manifestation. It was supposed to be my deathbolt spell. Instead it was a beam of pure LIFE energy."

"Yes well... your body went through a maelstrom of different energies. Life... death... rebirth... nature... the dimensional magic of the doors.

And you almost died from it." Marcos replied. "And now you've got that little leechling in you mixing all those energies even more so it can grow up strong in magic like its parents." Then he tapped at the book. "Plus it's trying to protect you."

"Protect me?" She wondered. "What do you mean?"

"Well think about it." He said. "If you can't use magic what are you going to do if an attack occurs here?"

She shrugged. "Probably hide in my lab and let my door kill anyone who tries to get in."

"A wise choice. And not joining in on that battle makes you, and by extension the child, less likely to die." He responded.

"But I can use magic." She countered. "I just had to focus. Had to get angry... at myself."

"And in an emergency. A TRUE emergency. You would likely be able to do so again." He shot back. "And if you did?...." He gestured for her to finish the thought.

"I would.... unleash a massive blast like before." She said as her eyebrows rose.

"And you and the child would likely be saved as a result." The old mage said with a smile. Then he pointed at the book again. "Re'Eidras the Blue. Temin of the Southern Sands. And one of the King's own ancestors." He said. "Same kind of thing happened. Just... not with the druidic flare."

Veliry picked the book up and looked at it curiously.

"Uncommon problems for uncommon people: Extraordinary magic users and the strange ailments they faced?" She asked. "Is this from the college?"

"It is." Marcos said, still smiling. "I have quite a few of their books." Then he pointed at her. "You'll probably be in that book if they ever decide to update it."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12d0wti/wait_is_this_just_gate_343/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (341/?)

Previous /
Glag

Writer's note: Like I said, I have jury duty this week. So things might get sporadic. I spent the first half of the day dealing with that. Hence the short chapter.

Also. Reminder that the crown prince is considered one of the strongest mages in the kingdom. And Vickers' perspective should remind you of something HE went through before.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"WELCOME!!! WELCOME!!!" Alixan announced as James and Amina's party entered the main gate of the fortress of Draidia at the base of the massive, natural, spire that housed the nation's griffin population. The massive, part giant, Crown Prince smiled wide as he approached the party with open arms. "And with new party members." He said as he wrapped Amina in a massive bear hug, lifting her off the ground. "Is that a Glag?"

"Glag." Glag replied.

"Well that answers that." The prince replied. Then he released her and swept James up into a similar hug.

"Hi...." James said awkward. "Brother.... in law??" He said with a questioning look at Amina, who simply smiled.

"Oh just call me Xan." He said as he dropped James down. Then he moved in front of Gorna and bowed slightly, one leg forward while his read leg bent a bit. "And who might you be?" He asked.

Gorna matched the bow, bending forward slightly with the same leg positioning. "Gorna Daggerdancer of the Northern Range."

"Welcome lady of the north." Alixan replied as he stood up. "It's not often that we get northern horders down here in the Petravian south. How did James convince you to join them for the trip?"

"Not me." James said.

Alixan looked over at Amina, whose face was intentionally blank as she looked away.

"Minaaaaaa?" Alixan said mischievously. "What did you dooooo?"

James interrupted, saving his wife.

"Haaaave you met Glag?" He asked with a flourish to his new sandstone companion.

"Several." Alixan said. "They're quite common here near the Crag. Whether it was this Glag or not is another question entirely."

"Glag." Glag replied as Alixan easily lifted the small (compared to him) rock monster and held him up at arms length for a moment. "Good to meet you Glag." He said with a light shake of the minor elemental.

"Glag. Glag glag." Glag replied before the prince placed him back down.

"Well. Welcome to Draidia." The prince said. "Follow me. I'll show you to your rooms. I'll have to have a centaur capable set of quarters readied for you Lady Daggerdancer. Who's Glag following?"

"That one is me." James admitted.

"Beat him in a fight?" Alixan wondered. Then he paused, causing them to halt their walk. "Wait. Is that what happened in the Vatrian Warrior Tournament?"

"I turned him into an asteroid." James said with a grin.

"Glaaaaag."

Alixan looked back and forth between James and his rocky companion for a moment.

"Nice." He said simply. Then he looked back at Gorna and pointed at his little sister. "Same?"

Gorna blushed. "She.... rode me." She replied. "And defeated me."

The crown prince turned back to his sister with a huge grin.

"Don't even start." She said before he had a chance.

Alixan instead spun on his heels and kept guiding them to the room.

"When are you going to tell father that you're pregnant?" He said instead.

"ALIXAN!" Amina exclaimed as she jogged to keep up with her significantly taller sibling, striking him on the shoulder as she did.

\--------------------------------

Vickers and the two former Muck Marchers were on their last few blocks before reaching the castle when he sensed something amiss.

He'd gotten used to sensory overload within the first few weeks of having his new form. He'd grown accustomed to smelling things that, as a standard human, he'd never smelled before. So a new smell wasn't exactly unexpected as a Petravian soldier marched past with a group of what he knew were fresh recruits.

The smell wasn't NEW... per se. If anything the thing about this scent that caught his attention was the fact that it was familiar to him. But he couldn't place it.

Something nagged at his brain, caught between human memories and animal instincts and analysis that screamed danger.

The hair running down his back, short as it was, bristled as he felt his claws flex.

"Chief?" Driscoll asked curiously. "What's wrong?"

Vickers took a deep inhale, letting the scent go deep into his mind.

"Nothing." He said. " Just an odd smell. New for me. Come on. Let's get you guys settled."

But as they walked, he watched the Sergeant and her recruits warily.

"All new smells to me." Five said from where she was walking, a large bar of nuts and seeds with honey in her hand. "I did NOT... realize that so many of you guys walk around with piss on your pants."

"The last few drops only come out AFTER you zip." Vickers said with a look of annoyance.

"I'm just glad to have a dick again." Driscoll said. "Even if it does itch a bit. Fucking fur."

"I'm beginning to regret this." Vickers said so flatly that it was obviously sarcastic. "Also I just realized that I was missing out on SO MANY dickless insults for you."

"Fuck you." Driscoll shot back.

Vickers waved at the guards as they walked through the side gate to the castle. They recognized him easily enough.

"Two new members of the Folk." He said to the guard that looked at his papers. They had the imprint of Choi's medallion on them, tying him to the Captain for castle access purposes. "They're also Earthers like me."

"Glad things went well." The soldier replied. "We were told to expect you. Take em to the administrators to get their papers fixed."

"Got it." He said. Then he nodded at the group of recruits heading over to the soldier barracks. "New meat?"

"Aye, coming from the east coast." The soldier answered. "Next training cycle."

"Hmm. Cool." Vickers said, not sure what else to say. "Well. I'll get these two to the admins."

East coast? He thought. What have I smelled like that over in the east?

"Oh I'm climbing that." Five said as she saw the tower on this side of the castle's battlements. "I'm so climbing that."

"NOT." Vickers said, halting her in her path. "Until we get your shit updated."

"Also. We need to learn what we are AND aren't capable of before we start doing things that can kill us." Driscoll said.

"Try not to worry about the dying part." Vickers said. "At least... not from falling."

The two others looked at him curiously.

"I... kinda jumped off the roof one day." He said. "Had to test." They still stared at him. "Hurts the feet. But not much more than that."

"Okay... we're BOTH climbing that thing." Driscoll said.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12c1p1d/wait_is_this_just_gate_342/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (341/?)

Previous /
GLAGGGG! /
First

Writer's note: Like I said over on r/GATEhouse I have jury duty this week. So things might get sporadic. I spent the first half of the day dealing with that. Hence the short chapter.

Also. Reminder that the crown prince is considered one of the strongest mages in the kingdom. And Vickers' perspective should remind you of something HE went through before.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"WELCOME!!! WELCOME!!!" Alixan announced as James and Amina's party entered the main gate of the fortress of Draidia at the base of the massive, natural, spire that housed the nation's griffin population. The massive, part giant, Crown Prince smiled wide as he approached the party with open arms. "And with new party members." He said as he wrapped Amina in a massive bear hug, lifting her off the ground. "Is that a Glag?"

"Glag." Glag replied.

"Well that answers that." The prince replied. Then he released her and swept James up into a similar hug.

"Hi...." James said awkward. "Brother.... in law??" He said with a questioning look at Amina, who simply smiled.

"Oh just call me Xan." He said as he dropped James down. Then he moved in front of Gorna and bowed slightly, one leg forward while his read leg bent a bit. "And who might you be?" He asked.

Gorna matched the bow, bending forward slightly with the same leg positioning. "Gorna Daggerdancer of the Northern Range."

"Welcome lady of the north." Alixan replied as he stood up. "It's not often that we get northern horders down here in the Petravian south. How did James convince you to join them for the trip?"

"Not me." James said.

Alixan looked over at Amina, whose face was intentionally blank as she looked away.

"Minaaaaaa?" Alixan said mischievously. "What did you dooooo?"

James interrupted, saving his wife.

"Haaaave you met Glag?" He asked with a flourish to his new sandstone companion.

"Several." Alixan said. "They're quite common here near the Crag. Whether it was this Glag or not is another question entirely."

"Glag." Glag replied as Alixan easily lifted the small (compared to him) rock monster and held him up at arms length for a moment. "Good to meet you Glag." He said with a light shake of the minor elemental.

"Glag. Glag glag." Glag replied before the prince placed him back down.

"Well. Welcome to Draidia." The prince said. "Follow me. I'll show you to your rooms. I'll have to have a centaur capable set of quarters readied for you Lady Daggerdancer. Who's Glag following?"

"That one is me." James admitted.

"Beat him in a fight?" Alixan wondered. Then he paused, causing them to halt their walk. "Wait. Is that what happened in the Vatrian Warrior Tournament?"

"I turned him into an asteroid." James said with a grin.

"Glaaaaag."

Alixan looked back and forth between James and his rocky companion for a moment.

"Nice." He said simply. Then he looked back at Gorna and pointed at his little sister. "Same?"

Gorna blushed. "She.... rode me." She replied. "And defeated me."

The crown prince turned back to his sister with a huge grin.

"Don't even start." She said before he had a chance.

Alixan instead spun on his heels and kept guiding them to the room.

"When are you going to tell father that you're pregnant?" He said instead.

"ALIXAN!" Amina exclaimed as she jogged to keep up with her significantly taller sibling, striking him on the shoulder as she did.

\------------------------------

Vickers and the two former Muck Marchers were on their last few blocks before reaching the castle when he sensed something amiss.

He'd gotten used to sensory overload within the first few weeks of having his new form. He'd grown accustomed to smelling things that, as a standard human, he'd never smelled before. So a new smell wasn't exactly unexpected as a Petravian soldier marched past with a group of what he knew were fresh recruits.

The smell wasn't NEW... per se. If anything the thing about this scent that caught his attention was the fact that it was familiar to him. But he couldn't place it.

Something nagged at his brain, caught between human memories and animal instincts and analysis that screamed danger.

The hair running down his back, short as it was, bristled as he felt his claws flex.

"Chief?" Driscoll asked curiously. "What's wrong?"

Vickers took a deep inhale, letting the scent go deep into his mind.

"Nothing." He said. " Just an odd smell. New for me. Come on. Let's get you guys settled."

But as they walked, he watched the Sergeant and her recruits warily.

"All new smells to me." Five said from where she was walking, a large bar of nuts and seeds with honey in her hand. "I did NOT... realize that so many of you guys walk around with piss on your pants."

"The last few drops only come out AFTER you zip." Vickers said with a look of annoyance.

"I'm just glad to have a dick again." Driscoll said. "Even if it does itch a bit. Fucking fur."

"I'm beginning to regret this." Vickers said so flatly that it was obviously sarcastic. "Also I just realized that I was missing out on SO MANY dickless insults for you."

"Fuck you." Driscoll shot back.

Vickers waved at the guards as they walked through the side gate to the castle. They recognized him easily enough.

"Two new members of the Folk." He said to the guard that looked at his papers. They had the imprint of Choi's medallion on them, tying him to the Captain for castle access purposes. "They're also Earthers like me."

"Glad things went well." The soldier replied. "We were told to expect you. Take em to the administrators to get their papers fixed."

"Got it." He said. Then he nodded at the group of recruits heading over to the soldier barracks. "New meat?"

"Aye, coming from the east coast." The soldier answered. "Next training cycle."

"Hmm. Cool." Vickers said, not sure what else to say. "Well. I'll get these two to the admins."

East coast? He thought. What have I smelled like that over in the east?

"Oh I'm climbing that." Five said as she saw the tower on this side of the castle's battlements. "I'm so climbing that."

"NOT." Vickers said, halting her in her path. "Until we get your shit updated."

"Also. We need to learn what we are AND aren't capable of before we start doing things that can kill us." Driscoll said.

"Try not to worry about the dying part." Vickers said. "At least... not from falling."

The two others looked at him curiously.

"I... kinda jumped off the roof one day." He said. "Had to test." They still stared at him. "Hurts the feet. But not much more than that."

"Okay... we're BOTH climbing that thing." Driscoll said.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12c1jfz/wait_is_this_just_gate_342/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (340/?)

Previous

Writer's note: In Army basic training it's very common to be referred to as fuzzy fuzzy tennis balls by the training cadre because of the shaven heads.

Well. Smeplies look like orange colored kiwis before they're skinned and doused in salt. So... yeah.

Anyways.... DUN DUN DUN

Enjoy.

\~

"Is that it down there?" James asked as they finally managed to crest the hill they'd been riding up the past thirty minutes or so. "Is that Draidia?"

"Close." Amina said as she peered over his head. "That's the outer burbs- as you call them at the capital- to Draidia." She pointed at the massive vertical spire that rose up nearly a mile to the left of the large, sprawling, town. "That is actually Draidia."

"I thought you said the massive spire was the Griffin's tooth?" He asked.

Amina rummaged in James's bag for a moment before removing the high tech sun glasses that had once belonged to Vickers. She also pulled out his tablet and turned both on before handing them to him.

Gorna galloped ahead a bit. "By the gods it's massive." She said in surprise. "I'd heard tales. But it still boggles the mind."

James shrugged. He didn't wanna be a killjoy and mention that some skyscrapers back home, those still standing after the war anyways, were taller by a decent amount. Still, it was the tallest thing he'd seen in this world.

Instead he put the glasses on and used the controls to zoom in on the thing.

"Look down near the base of it." Amina instructed him as she watched the feed on the tablet. James did as he was told. "That's Draidia. Specifically the castle and base that Alixan uses to defend it in case of attack. See how it's built INTO the Griffin's tooth?

"Yeah. Kinda like some of the Buddhist temples and old Native American desert villages in my world. But like... castle-y."

"You can see all that from here?" Gorna asked as she slowed to join them, looking at the round sunglasses curiously. Amina gestured her over and angled the tablet so she could see. Her eyes widened at the sight of the display.

"Now zoom out a bit." Amina said to James. "Pan out and to the right."

James did, and saw the sparse buildings outside of its wall. Most of them appeared to be tents similar to the ones that James had seen the Petravian army use. Though a lot of them were bordered in black, similar to Alixan's personal army uniforms.

"That's Draidia proper." Amina said. "It's mostly a military camp for Alixan's army, the central Petravian troops we dispatch to bolster them, and sometimes mercenary companies. Though Xan doesn't like relying on them. And I don't see any either."

"Why's it all Military?" James asked curiously. "And why is the civilian population kept separated?"

"The Meridians." Amina said simply. "They have a tendency to send infiltrators and priests to try to get into the civilian population. Xan keeps the city swept clean with constant sweeps of both ground and air troops. But they still get in. They look and talk just like Petravians do. But they don't have the resources to infiltrate Xan's army. He changes the standard uniform every three months. Anyone not matching is captured and interrogated."

And suddenly all of James's uniform inspections throughout the years seemed downright easy.

"Sucks for the grunts." He said.

"Now, pan up and to the left a bit." She said. "See that depression? Can you zoom in on the structure next to it."

James turned the dial on the glasses. The image zoomed, but also got a touch grainier.

"That is the entrance to the Orcragg." She said. "That's the massive canyon that you see behind it."

James zoomed out a bit. The canyon was easy to see from where they were at. But the size and width of it, interrupted only occasionally by spires or small mountains, put the Grand Canyon to shame. This thing had to be at least three or four times it's size.

And it looked like it was full of green tea.

"That green stuff inside is the miasma." She educated him. "Comes from underground. And it's another reason to keep the civilian city far back away from it."

"Lethal?" James asked.

"Oh yeah." She replied. "Few breaths of the stuff won't kill you. But it will probably knock you out. And if it does, odds are you'll get stuck breathing more and more. That's what does the trick?"

"And Orcs don't have that problem?" He asked. He knew from previous conversations that there was some kind of massive Orc based Chiefdom down there in that canyon somewhere. One that was allied with the Petravian kingdom.

"Completely immune." Amina said. "Dwarves can stomach it too. Though they only RESIST the stuff. More than an hour or two in it and they drop too." Then she patted Steve's flank, causing the drake to look back just a bit. "Steve's immune too." Then she tapped a finger on James's temple. "But... DO NOT... EVEN CONSIDER... TESTING. YOUR. IMMUNITY." She said, slowly emphasizing each word.

"Huh. And the Meridians are on the other side?" He wondered, ignoring the jab. "How do they sneak into the civilian populace?"

"Figure that out and Alixan will probably give you every ounce of gold and silver he has at his disposal. And your choice of any griffin in the tooth." She replied. "He's been trying to figure it out ever since he came down here. Hell, before then even."

James panned up while zooming out a bit, when he found the massive earthen spire he kept slowly angling his neck back until he came across some kind of writhing cloud near its peak.

"And there's the griffins." Amina said.

"What?" James asked. Then he quickly began scrolling the zoom in.

Sure enough, the moving cloud was a massive, constantly moving, chaotic, mass of griffins of all sizes and patterns, flying through the sky around the top quarter of the formation.

"By the gods." Gorna said, causing James's jaw to clench a bit as he ground his teeth. But he ignored it.

"There's a reason our army has such a large supply of griffins." Amina said. "And why we set a defensive position here."

"That's a lot of fuckin skykitties." James said. Then he kicked Steve into a faster trot. "Let's get down there."

\----------

Just before dusk a small group of travelers arrived by the eastern road into the Petravian capital.

The leader of the group was a tall, somewhat sickly looking, man of about forty. He rode the seat of his wagon next to a large orc who was armed as the convoy guard. Several men and women marched with them, behind a tall elf who wore a royal soldier's uniform. The ones following her had the shaved heads and simple leather armor and red tunics that marked them as fresh trainees for the guard. The second wagon had several more people and a few large, padlocked, chests.

They stopped at the first checkpoint into the city as the soldiers there moved up to inspect them.

The man in the lead wagon calmed his thoughts and tightened the control on his other bodies, ensuring that only HIS body spoke.

The Soldier among them strode up confidently, pulling a set of papers from a pouch on her belt.

"Evening." The Sergeant of the checkpoint greeted them. "Sergeant." He said with a nod to the elf.

"Sergeant." She replied back as she handed him the papers. "New recruits from the coast."

The checkpoint sergeant looked over the papers, then at the recruits. He nodded with a shrug as he handed the papers back. "Log it." He said to the other guards. One of them was walking down the side of the two wagons, the other wrote the report in the logs. "What're you lot here for?" He asked the man in the wagon.

"We've got some supplies for the Estland Trading Company." Patril said as he focused on being the only body speaking. "Second wagon has some of the straggling refugees from Jadesport. The ones that couldn't find work. Company's bringing em here as favors to their kin."

The Checkpoint Sergeant craned his head back and looked at the second wagon, it was mainly full of what looked like married couples and supplies.

"Medas?" He queried.

"Nothin' impressive Sarge." The younger soldier said as he came walking around the back of the wagons back to the check point. "Just travellin' folks."

"Fair enough." The Sergeant said. "Can't say you'll find home here. We're still dealing with recovery too. But there's always work somewhere." He turned back to the third guard still sitting with the log book. "Refugees and Estland Co. Log it." He said as he stepped aside. "Welcome to the capital. And get some rest. Not to be rude, but you're looking mighty bedraggled my friend."

"That's the plan." Patril said with a smile as he snapped the wagon back into motion.

"Sergeant. You know where to take those lot." The Checkpoint Sergeant said to his Elven counterpart. "Welcome to the royal army smeplie heads." He said as he clapped one on the shoulder. "Serve well."

And just like that, The Agency was back in the capital in force.

[\[Glag\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/128wod0/wait_is_this_just_glag_glagglag/)

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12b0yrc/wait_is_this_just_gate_341/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (340/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: In Army basic training it's very common to be referred to as fuzzy fuzzy tennis balls by the training cadre because of the shaven heads.

Well. Smeplies look like orange colored kiwis before they're skinned and doused in salt. So... yeah.

Anyways.... DUN DUN DUN

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"Yeah. Kinda like some of the Buddhist temples and old Native American desert villages in my world. But like... castle-y."

"You can see all that from here?" Gorna asked as she slowed to join them, looking at the round sunglasses curiously. Amina gestured her over and angled the tablet so she could see. Her eyes widened at the sight of the display.

"Now zoom out a bit." Amina said to James. "Pan out and to the right."

James did, and saw the sparse buildings outside of its wall. Most of them appeared to be tents similar to the ones that James had seen the Petravian army use. Though a lot of them were bordered in black, similar to Alixan's personal army uniforms.

"That's Draidia proper." Amina said. "It's mostly a military camp for Alixan's army, the central Petravian troops we dispatch to bolster them, and sometimes mercenary companies. Though Xan doesn't like relying on them. And I don't see any either."

"Why's it all Military?" James asked curiously. "And why is the civilian population kept separated?"

"The Meridians." Amina said simply. "They have a tendency to send infiltrators and priests to try to get into the civilian population. Xan keeps the city swept clean with constant sweeps of both ground and air troops. But they still get in. They look and talk just like Petravians do. But they don't have the resources to infiltrate Xan's army. He changes the standard uniform every three months. Anyone not matching is captured and interrogated."

And suddenly all of James's uniform inspections throughout the years seemed downright easy.

"Sucks for the grunts." He said.

"Now, pan up and to the left a bit." She said. "See that depression? Can you zoom in on the structure next to it."

James turned the dial on the glasses. The image zoomed, but also got a touch grainier.

"That is the entrance to the Orcragg." She said. "That's the massive canyon that you see behind it."

James zoomed out a bit. The canyon was easy to see from where they were at. But the size and width of it, interrupted only occasionally by spires or small mountains, put the Grand Canyon to shame. This thing had to be at least three or four times it's size.

And it looked like it was full of green tea.

"That green stuff inside is the miasma." She educated him. "Comes from underground. And it's another reason to keep the civilian city far back away from it."

"Lethal?" James asked.

"Oh yeah." She replied. "Few breaths of the stuff won't kill you. But it will probably knock you out. And if it does, odds are you'll get stuck breathing more and more. That's what does the trick?"

"And Orcs don't have that problem?" He asked. He knew from previous conversations that there was some kind of massive Orc based Chiefdom down there in that canyon somewhere. One that was allied with the Petravian kingdom.

"Completely immune." Amina said. "Dwarves can stomach it too. Though they only RESIST the stuff. More than an hour or two in it and they drop too." Then she patted Steve's flank, causing the drake to look back just a bit. "Steve's immune too." Then she tapped a finger on James's temple. "But... DO NOT... EVEN CONSIDER... TESTING. YOUR. IMMUNITY." She said, slowly emphasizing each word.

"Huh. And the Meridians are on the other side?" He wondered, ignoring the jab. "How do they sneak into the civilian populace?"

"Figure that out and Alixan will probably give you every ounce of gold and silver he has at his disposal. And your choice of any griffin in the tooth." She replied. "He's been trying to figure it out ever since he came down here. Hell, before then even."

James panned up while zooming out a bit, when he found the massive earthen spire he kept slowly angling his neck back until he came across some kind of writhing cloud near its peak.

"And there's the griffins." Amina said.

"What?" James asked. Then he quickly began scrolling the zoom in.

Sure enough, the moving cloud was a massive, constantly moving, chaotic, mass of griffins of all sizes and patterns, flying through the sky around the top quarter of the formation.

"By the gods." Gorna said, causing James's jaw to clench a bit as he ground his teeth. But he ignored it.

"There's a reason our army has such a large supply of griffins." Amina said. "And why we set a defensive position here."

"That's a lot of fuckin skykitties." James said. Then he kicked Steve into a faster trot. "Let's get down there."

\----------

Just before dusk a small group of travelers arrived by the eastern road into the Petravian capital.

The leader of the group was a tall, somewhat sickly looking, man of about forty. He rode the seat of his wagon next to a large orc who was armed as the convoy guard. Several men and women marched with them, behind a tall elf who wore a royal soldier's uniform. The ones following her had the shaved heads and simple leather armor and red tunics that marked them as fresh trainees for the guard. The second wagon had several more people and a few large, padlocked, chests.

They stopped at the first checkpoint into the city as the soldiers there moved up to inspect them.

The man in the lead wagon calmed his thoughts and tightened the control on his other bodies, ensuring that only HIS body spoke.

The Soldier among them strode up confidently, pulling a set of papers from a pouch on her belt.

"Evening." The Sergeant of the checkpoint greeted them. "Sergeant." He said with a nod to the elf.

"Sergeant." She replied back as she handed him the papers. "New recruits from the coast."

The checkpoint sergeant looked over the papers, then at the recruits. He nodded with a shrug as he handed the papers back. "Log it." He said to the other guards. One of them was walking down the side of the two wagons, the other wrote the report in the logs. "What're you lot here for?" He asked the man in the wagon.

"We've got some supplies for the Estland Trading Company." Patril said as he focused on being the only body speaking. "Second wagon has some of the straggling refugees from Jadesport. The ones that couldn't find work. Company's bringing em here as favors to their kin."

The Checkpoint Sergeant craned his head back and looked at the second wagon, it was mainly full of what looked like married couples and supplies.

"Medas?" He queried.

"Nothin' impressive Sarge." The younger soldier said as he came walking around the back of the wagons back to the check point. "Just travellin' folks."

"Fair enough." The Sergeant said. "Can't say you'll find home here. We're still dealing with recovery too. But there's always work somewhere." He turned back to the third guard still sitting with the log book. "Refugees and Estland Co. Log it." He said as he stepped aside. "Welcome to the capital. And get some rest. Not to be rude, but you're looking mighty bedraggled my friend."

"That's the plan." Patril said with a smile as he snapped the wagon back into motion.

"Sergeant. You know where to take those lot." The Checkpoint Sergeant said to his Elven counterpart. "Welcome to the royal army smeplie heads." He said as he clapped one on the shoulder. "Serve well."

And just like that, The Agency was back in the capital in force.

[\[Glag\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/128wm2r/wait_is_this_just_glag_glagglag/)
[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12b0rh6/wait_is_this_just_gate_341/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (339/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James in the last section. And like 90% of you guys too.

Also. It may not seem like a Vickers move. But you guys should know by now that if nothing else, he's self aware.

Enjoy.

*\~\~\~

bite. Then she hung from her feet, sticking out from the building at almost a ninety degree angle, as she licked her hands clean.

Driscoll stared at the pastry with mild disgust. Vickers simply stared at Five in mild amazement. He had to admit just a tiny bit of jealousy at the incredible physical feat.

"I just said that that guy doesn't wash his hands." He said with a grimace. "I don't want that."

Vickers shrugged and popped his into his mouth. "More for me." He said. "It's not like we get diseases any more." His hand was still holding out the extra pastry. "And y'all aint bubble babies anymore."

Driscoll stared at it a bit longer. Then sighed as he reluctantly took it.

He took a bite and his eyes widened in surprise. Then he quickly scarfed down the last few bites.

"Was that raw meat?" He asked in disbelief. "That's so not safe ON TOP of the hand washing thing."

"Almost every vendor in this world has options for members of our kind." Vickers answered calmly. "Hers was Chock Full O' Nuts."

"And delicious." Five weighed in as she scampered down to keep up with the two significantly taller men, her bushy tail twitching rapidly. "I could have twenty of em."

"How do they bake it raw?" Driscoll asked curiously.

"According to Choi they freeze the meat with magic. Then its layered in caramelized sugar or solidified butter before its wrapped in the pastry itself." Vickers said. "Some places, namely the more successful ones, have precisely enchanted needles that they stick in the meat to keep it cold even when baking.

"Huh. That's.... actually clever." Driscoll admitted. "You know a lot about this stuff."

"For the same reason that you can probably list off pressures and temps for the deepest parts of different oceans. Or why any of us three can look at a wall and know exactly what kind of incoming fire it can protect us from." Vickers replied as he held an arm out to stop the two of them and let a carriage pass before they crossed the street. "Or why you can probably look at a pile of parts and machinery and know what to pull from what so you can do emergency repairs on those suits of yours."

"Necessary for survival in the field." Five said, beating Driscoll to the punch. "Useful intel if caught out on your own."

"Well." Vickers said with a tilt of his head. "Yes and no. I doubt that BAKING methods will ever be the difference between life and death for any of us. That's mostly just a cat being curious. But it is still useful."

The three of them walked in silence for a bit. People greeted them kindly, especially Driscoll and Five, both of whom were wearing the white robes that marked them as newly converted. When they passed close enough to members of the folk, they would frequently greet them with a hand on their shoulders as they passed. Driscoll returned the greetings somewhat awkwardly, whereas Five mostly flinched back until she realized what was happening. Instincts were difficult to grow accustomed to.

"Another thing that will be useful." Vickers said as they went around a corner. "Is also relearning gentleness."

"Gentleness?" Five asked. "Odd coming from the man that caved my chest in with fire and ice."

Vickers grinned a bit at the memory, causing her to shy away a bit before he covered his teeth again.

"How did that smile make you feel?" He asked.

She glared at him for a moment. "Cheap shot." She shot back.

"And yet it is something I have to be aware of now." Vickers lectured. "My smile is disconcerting even for normal people. For a prey-drive person like you, or for kids or something it's even worse." He flexed an arm and the leather of his jacket groaned from the strain. "I can be scary without even using my ACTUAL strength. I have to be careful with it."

Driscoll nodded understanding.

"Remember the egg test Five?" He asked.

"Uuuuugh. Took me weeks to pass that." She admitted.

"Same. And yet only a few weeks ago you could have juggled ten of them with your suit without even cracking any." Driscoll countered. "That's what the Chief is talking about."

"That some thing where you had to carry an egg without breaking it?" Vickers asked, legitimately curious. He still didn't know a lot about the Muck Marchers or their training.

"Through an obstacle course." Five answered. "Then once you passed that you had to do it again through a kill house."

Even without a multi-million dollar mechanical suit that worked based on nervous system input, Vickers couldn't imagine passing that test easily. Though he was tempted to try.

"Then yeah." He said instead of revealing his thoughts. "That's pretty much what I'm trying to say. First time I shook someone's hand after my change, well a normal person's hand anyways, I damn near crushed the poor guys bones. And to me it felt light enough to leave soda can undented."

The two of them already knew what he was talking about. They'd both already done small tests of their strength before they'd been released from the house. Driscoll had crushed a piece of thick walled pottery into dust with hardly any strain at all, and the singular cut he sustained had healed in a matter of moments. Five had pulled a coconut like fruit from the food supply she'd been given, and had cracked it open in seconds using only her hands and teeth. The nut meat inside had tasted oddly like a cross between walnut and some kind of light mango flavor. She wanted more of them.

"So." Vickers said, breaking them both out of their thoughts. "First things first." He stopped in front of a door and they looked up to see a sign that, while they couldn't understand it, clearly indicated some kind of tailor. "Let's get you guys some proper clothes ordered. Then let's get to the castle and see what you're actually capable of. On either side of the equation."

Then he opened the door for them and beckoned them in.

\----------

"Alright guys." James said with a huge grin as he approached the campfire. "I got it."

He quickly stepped aside to reveal Glag.

"Hello Glag." Amina said sarcastically. "Glad you could join us."

"Glag." The rock monster replied.

"Watch this." James said, ignoring the jab. "Glag! Are you made of rock?"

"Glag!" He replied while raising his hand up above his head.

"Are you made of water?" James asked.

"Glag." This time he lowered his hand down almost to the ground. His arm stretched out and narrowed a bit, allowing him to do so without bending over.

"Eh?" James said as he gestured at Glag.

"Glag!" Glag said as he matched the gesture, which caused him to point both arms at the tent to his left.

"Glag did I drop you from the sky like a meteor?" James followed up.

Glag's arm rose. "Glag!" He said, sounding excited.

"Did Amina only win the tournament because of a technicality and not because she beat either of us?"

"He-!" Amina began.

"GLAG!" Glag said, his arm stretching out even higher.

"And could Amina have beat either of us on her own?"

"Glag." The arm dropped to the ground quickly, then began pounding at it like it was a locked door.

Amina huffed. "You taught him yes and no. Adorable." She said. "Useful. But I have doubts."

"Like what?" James asked. "I've been working on this with him all night."

Amina put on a big smile.

"Glag!" She said with intentionally cheesy enthusiasm. "Is James just a scrumptious little smeplie tart who smells like feet?"

"What?" James asked in confusion.

"Glag!" Glag replied as he raised his hand up.

"Hey!" James exclaimed.

"And is the Vatrian Emperor the strongest person in ALLLLL The world? Even stronger than James?" She asked. Still overly cheerful to the point of ridiculousness.

Glags arm stretched upward again as he exclaimed. "Glag Glag!"

Then she put on a deeper, more serious tone, and glared at the rock creature just a little. "And should we feed you all kinds of tasty tasty stones that will make you grow big and strong any time you need to fight."

Glags hand dropped back to the ground immediately. "Glaaaaag."

But James had gotten the idea.

He glared daggers at his wife.

"Not cool." He said calmly.

"Glags are simple things." She said. "They sense emotions and heartbeats and other signs of what creatures around them are doing. I know that much. But there's never been any research proving them as terribly intelligent James. I thought maybe the medallion might reveal some hidden nuance to his.... Glag... speech. But... I think he's just Glag."

Glag looked up at James with what could only be described as his version of puppy dog eyes.

"Don't listen to her Glag. I know you're smarter than that." He said reassuringly.

"Glag?" The monster asked as James turned him away from the fire and back to where they'd been working together.

"It's okay buddy. I know like.... four and a half languages. We can teach you one." He said.

Amina just shook her head as she watched the two of them walk down to the river.

"You really do love him don't you?" Gorna asked from where she was resting on a blanket a few feet to Amina's left. "It's not just a political marriage or something?" She looked somewhat downcast as she asked the questions.

"I've been telling you that this entire trip." Amina said simply. "James isn't royalty. He's not even terribly high ranked in his world. And he only has the rank he does have because of his... unique position. I gained next to nothing, politically speaking, by marrying him."

"When you fought against Glag in the arena." Gorna said. "You two moved as one. Almost without even speaking. You've traveled together? Fought together?"

"More than most people who've only known each other for about a year and a half." She replied. "Hell. We've damn near died for each other at least half a dozen times."

Gorna's eyes widened. "And you've only known each other that long?"

"And for the first six months or so we viewed each other as potential enemies." She said with a light chuckle. "I punched him in the face the first time I met him."

Gorna looked down as she twiddled her fingers. "I want a marriage like that." She said softly.

Amina looked at her with pity that she was glad the centaur didn't look over and see.

"You're traveling with us Gorna." She said. "As long as you call us friend, or at least ally, we'll gladly fight at your side."

"You would?" Gorna asked. "You barely know me."

"Doesn't matter to James. And I've come to be the same way." Amina responded as she saw James chasing Glag a bit and laughed. "You look out for the people around you. End of story."

Gorna thought of that for a moment. That wasn't something her people would ever say.

"Thank you." She said after a moment.

"But I'm still not marrying or sleeping with you." Amina said coldly as she pulled a piece of fish from the fire and began snacking on it.

"Easier if you did." The Centaur replied with a bit of a grin. "He can watch?"

"Nooooo." Amina said without even glancing at the dagger dancer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/12817d6/wait_is_this_just_gate_340/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (339/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James in the last section. And like 90% of you guys too.

Also. It may not seem like a Vickers move. But you guys should know by now that if nothing else, he's self aware.

Enjoy.

*\~\~\~

Vickers chuckled a bit as he handed a few coins to the vendor, then took three of the pastries. He tossed one up into the air. Five caught it from where she was hanging from a second floor window. She had adapted to her new body with remarkable speed. The pastry was gone in a single bite. Then she hung from her feet, sticking out from the building at almost a ninety degree angle, as she licked her hands clean.

Driscoll stared at the pastry with mild disgust. Vickers simply stared at Five in mild amazement. He had to admit just a tiny bit of jealousy at the incredible physical feat.

"I just said that that guy doesn't wash his hands." He said with a grimace. "I don't want that."

Vickers shrugged and popped his into his mouth. "More for me." He said. "It's not like we get diseases any more." His hand was still holding out the extra pastry. "And y'all aint bubble babies anymore."

Driscoll stared at it a bit longer. Then sighed as he reluctantly took it.

He took a bite and his eyes widened in surprise. Then he quickly scarfed down the last few bites.

"Was that raw meat?" He asked in disbelief. "That's so not safe ON TOP of the hand washing thing."

"Almost every vendor in this world has options for members of our kind." Vickers answered calmly. "Hers was Chock Full O' Nuts."

"And delicious." Five weighed in as she scampered down to keep up with the two significantly taller men, her bushy tail twitching rapidly. "I could have twenty of em."

"How do they bake it raw?" Driscoll asked curiously.

"According to Choi they freeze the meat with magic. Then its layered in caramelized sugar or solidified butter before its wrapped in the pastry itself." Vickers said. "Some places, namely the more successful ones, have precisely enchanted needles that they stick in the meat to keep it cold even when baking.

"Huh. That's.... actually clever." Driscoll admitted. "You know a lot about this stuff."

"For the same reason that you can probably list off pressures and temps for the deepest parts of different oceans. Or why any of us three can look at a wall and know exactly what kind of incoming fire it can protect us from." Vickers replied as he held an arm out to stop the two of them and let a carriage pass before they crossed the street. "Or why you can probably look at a pile of parts and machinery and know what to pull from what so you can do emergency repairs on those suits of yours."

"Necessary for survival in the field." Five said, beating Driscoll to the punch. "Useful intel if caught out on your own."

"Well." Vickers said with a tilt of his head. "Yes and no. I doubt that BAKING methods will ever be the difference between life and death for any of us. That's mostly just a cat being curious. But it is still useful."

The three of them walked in silence for a bit. People greeted them kindly, especially Driscoll and Five, both of whom were wearing the white robes that marked them as newly converted. When they passed close enough to members of the folk, they would frequently greet them with a hand on their shoulders as they passed. Driscoll returned the greetings somewhat awkwardly, whereas Five mostly flinched back until she realized what was happening. Instincts were difficult to grow accustomed to.

"Another thing that will be useful." Vickers said as they went around a corner. "Is also relearning gentleness."

"Gentleness?" Five asked. "Odd coming from the man that caved my chest in with fire and ice."

Vickers grinned a bit at the memory, causing her to shy away a bit before he covered his teeth again.

"How did that smile make you feel?" He asked.

She glared at him for a moment. "Cheap shot." She shot back.

"And yet it is something I have to be aware of now." Vickers lectured. "My smile is disconcerting even for normal people. For a prey-drive person like you, or for kids or something it's even worse." He flexed an arm and the leather of his jacket groaned from the strain. "I can be scary without even using my ACTUAL strength. I have to be careful with it."

Driscoll nodded understanding.

"Remember the egg test Five?" He asked.

"Uuuuugh. Took me weeks to pass that." She admitted.

"Same. And yet only a few weeks ago you could have juggled ten of them with your suit without even cracking any." Driscoll countered. "That's what the Chief is talking about."

"That some thing where you had to carry an egg without breaking it?" Vickers asked, legitimately curious. He still didn't know a lot about the Muck Marchers or their training.

"Through an obstacle course." Five answered. "Then once you passed that you had to do it again through a kill house."

Even without a multi-million dollar mechanical suit that worked based on nervous system input, Vickers couldn't imagine passing that test easily. Though he was tempted to try.

"Then yeah." He said instead of revealing his thoughts. "That's pretty much what I'm trying to say. First time I shook someone's hand after my change, well a normal person's hand anyways, I damn near crushed the poor guys bones. And to me it felt light enough to leave soda can undented."

The two of them already knew what he was talking about. They'd both already done small tests of their strength before they'd been released from the house. Driscoll had crushed a piece of thick walled pottery into dust with hardly any strain at all, and the singular cut he sustained had healed in a matter of moments. Five had pulled a coconut like fruit from the food supply she'd been given, and had cracked it open in seconds using only her hands and teeth. The nut meat inside had tasted oddly like a cross between walnut and some kind of light mango flavor. She wanted more of them.

"So." Vickers said, breaking them both out of their thoughts. "First things first." He stopped in front of a door and they looked up to see a sign that, while they couldn't understand it, clearly indicated some kind of tailor. "Let's get you guys some proper clothes ordered. Then let's get to the castle and see what you're actually capable of. On either side of the equation."

Then he opened the door for them and beckoned them in.

\--------------------

"Alright guys." James said with a huge grin as he approached the campfire. "I got it."

He quickly stepped aside to reveal Glag.

"Hello Glag." Amina said sarcastically. "Glad you could join us."

"Glag." The rock monster replied.

"Watch this." James said, ignoring the jab. "Glag! Are you made of rock?"

"Glag!" He replied while raising his hand up above his head.

"Are you made of water?" James asked.

"Glag." This time he lowered his hand down almost to the ground. His arm stretched out and narrowed a bit, allowing him to do so without bending over.

"Eh?" James said as he gestured at Glag.

"Glag!" Glag said as he matched the gesture, which caused him to point both arms at the tent to his left.

"Glag did I drop you from the sky like a meteor?" James followed up.

Glag's arm rose. "Glag!" He said, sounding excited.

"Did Amina only win the tournament because of a technicality and not because she beat either of us?"

"He-!" Amina began.

"GLAG!" Glag said, his arm stretching out even higher.

"And could Amina have beat either of us on her own?"

"Glag." The arm dropped to the ground quickly, then began pounding at it like it was a locked door.

Amina huffed. "You taught him yes and no. Adorable." She said. "Useful. But I have doubts."

"Like what?" James asked. "I've been working on this with him all night."

Amina put on a big smile.

"Glag!" She said with intentionally cheesy enthusiasm. "Is James just a scrumptious little smeplie tart who smells like feet?"

"What?" James asked in confusion.

"Glag!" Glag replied as he raised his hand up.

"Hey!" James exclaimed.

"And is the Vatrian Emperor the strongest person in ALLLLL The world? Even stronger than James?" She asked. Still overly cheerful to the point of ridiculousness.

Glags arm stretched upward again as he exclaimed. "Glag Glag!"

Then she put on a deeper, more serious tone, and glared at the rock creature just a little. "And should we feed you all kinds of tasty tasty stones that will make you grow big and strong any time you need to fight."

Glags hand dropped back to the ground immediately. "Glaaaaag."

But James had gotten the idea.

He glared daggers at his wife.

"Not cool." He said calmly.

"Glags are simple things." She said. "They sense emotions and heartbeats and other signs of what creatures around them are doing. I know that much. But there's never been any research proving them as terribly intelligent James. I thought maybe the medallion might reveal some hidden nuance to his.... Glag... speech. But... I think he's just Glag."

Glag looked up at James with what could only be described as his version of puppy dog eyes.

"Don't listen to her Glag. I know you're smarter than that." He said reassuringly.

"Glag?" The monster asked as James turned him away from the fire and back to where they'd been working together.

"It's okay buddy. I know like.... four and a half languages. We can teach you one." He said.

Amina just shook her head as she watched the two of them walk down to the river.

"You really do love him don't you?" Gorna asked from where she was resting on a blanket a few feet to Amina's left. "It's not just a political marriage or something?" She looked somewhat downcast as she asked the questions.

"I've been telling you that this entire trip." Amina said simply. "James isn't royalty. He's not even terribly high ranked in his world. And he only has the rank he does have because of his... unique position. I gained next to nothing, politically speaking, by marrying him."

"When you fought against Glag in the arena." Gorna said. "You two moved as one. Almost without even speaking. You've traveled together? Fought together?"

"More than most people who've only known each other for about a year and a half." She replied. "Hell. We've damn near died for each other at least half a dozen times."

Gorna's eyes widened. "And you've only known each other that long?"

"And for the first six months or so we viewed each other as potential enemies." She said with a light chuckle. "I punched him in the face the first time I met him."

Gorna looked down as she twiddled her fingers. "I want a marriage like that." She said softly.

Amina looked at her with pity that she was glad the centaur didn't look over and see.

"You're traveling with us Gorna." She said. "As long as you call us friend, or at least ally, we'll gladly fight at your side."

"You would?" Gorna asked. "You barely know me."

"Doesn't matter to James. And I've come to be the same way." Amina responded as she saw James chasing Glag a bit and laughed. "You look out for the people around you. End of story."

Gorna thought of that for a moment. That wasn't something her people would ever say.

"Thank you." She said after a moment.

"But I'm still not marrying or sleeping with you." Amina said coldly as she pulled a piece of fish from the fire and began snacking on it.

"Easier if you did." The Centaur replied with a bit of a grin. "He can watch?"

"Nooooo." Amina said without even glancing at the dagger dancer.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/12810wz/wait_is_this_just_gate_340/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (338/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Oh cool. Backstory.

And it'll definitely get overshadowed by Glag saying one word four times.

Enjoy.

\~

"So. Gorna. Tell me a bit about centaur culture." James said as he rode along down the road, Amina's arms loosely wrapped around his waist. "I don't know much about you guys. Petravus has them. But I haven't spoken to too many."

The centaur woman, who had been silently walking next to Steve as they traveled, scoffed. She'd made a point of ignoring James almost as hard as Amina had initially ignored her.

She'd also practically begged for Amina to ride on her back instead of on Steve's. James hadn't even weighed in on that conversation, simply holding his wolf hand down to Amina confidently. She hadn't even slowed down to consider the offer, much to the centaur's chagrin.

"I am not a school master interloper." She said venomously. James just shrugged and turned back to the road.

"Oh by the gods." Amina said in exasperation. She turned in the saddle, releasing her hold on James to look over at her devoted follower. "Gorna. James is my husband. It's one thing if you dislike him or avoid him. But I will not have you openly disrespect him. Understood?" James looked back at her curiously. He didn't care either way. But he nodded his appreciation.

Then he heard a slight rumbling, grinding noise from on the other side of Steve. Normally that sound would mean the massive drake was readying a breath of fire. But there was no heat with this rumble.

Glag on the other hand was looking in the direction of the centaur, his eyes looking much more aware than they normally did as he walked along. James wondered if he could sense Gorna somehow, since he couldn't SEE her past Steve's bulk.

Is he readying to defend me? He wondered.

But Glag simply kept walking and rumbling with that semi-observant look on his face as he, in his own way, glared in Gorna's direction.

The Centaur stamped at the ground with her hooves a bit, causing her to bounce up and down and make a small change in her direction before course correcting.

"Yes Mistress." She said angrily.

"It's obvious that you have no intention of letting this whole proposition thing go." Amina continued as she turned back and placed a hand on James's side again. "Despite my protestations and the extenuating circumstances around it. So until you eventually give up or find your conditions met, however that may occur, we are a traveling party. We need to at least be able to EXIST around each other and communicate." Then she pointed a harsh finger at the centaur. "And I've told you before; quit calling me Mistress. Amina is fine. Or Princess or General if you insist on formality."

"Yes Mi-" Gorna began, but Amina's finger rose back up at the sound. "Princess." She corrected herself.

"And you can just call me James." James added casually. "Or... I guess.... Captain. If you wanna do that formally too." He shook his head. "It's been a year and I still don't like that." He said softly to Amina.

The three of them rode in awkward silence for a few moments, with Glag simply walking along without tiring. He'd stopped rumbling too.

"I was... I am... not terribly... liked by my people." Gorna admitted quietly.

James turned to look at her with a raised eyebrow. Amina simply set her head on his shoulder on the side of the centaur. It was obvious from Gorna's downcast face that she didn't like admitting that.

"I am smaller than most centaurs. And a woman." She continued. "And I was never terribly good at fighting." James wanted to say something to the contrary of that, but was silenced by Amina squeezing him with the hand on his side. "At least not in the traditional ways of my people."

"You were certainly strong in our fight." Amina said.

"Yes. But... I rely on magic. And the enchantment on my daggers. I am only passably good with a bow and arrow. And, as you found out yourself, I struggle to compete in direct melee combat." Gorna countered with a hint of anger. "My people favor the sword and axe and spear, and I am not terribly capable with any of those to a sufficient degree."

"But not all centaurs are warriors." Amina said. "I know many that are craftsman, or artists. Many who take jobs as messengers or supply escorts or scouts."

"And again; I am smaller and weaker than most of my kind. And not terribly artistic either. And those last three jobs all require warrior skills. And most centaurs get picked for them before me."

"You are a little smaller than the handful of centaurs I've seen." James said. Gorna glared at him, but a warning glance from Amina kept her quiet. "But... I'm smaller than most humans. And I still almost won the tournament."

"No you didn't dear." Amina said quickly, causing him to try to look back at her with mock anger. But her head stayed locked where it was, preventing him from turning without getting a face full of hair, and her off hand grabbed the back of his head and pointed it straight. After a moment he reluctantly stopped struggling. "He is right though." She added. "Size isn't everything."

"Not to most." Gorna agreed. "I do know that now. Now that I'm older, and have traveled some. Traveled alone." She shook her head. "But... when I was young I was... for all intents and purposes exiled from my clan."

"What clan were you?" Amina asked.

"Northern Range Horde." Gorna said softly.

"Hmmm." Amina hummed. "They spawn a lot of mercenary companies. I can see them not being a fan of someone they deem as weak." She'd read a great many intelligence reports about the strength of the Northern Range Horde, and had even faced a company of one of their mercenary groups when she'd still just been a captain.

"I assume you didn't get your... Dagger Dancing... from them?" James asked.

"No." She admitted. "No. That I picked up from an Arbalestier I traveled with for a while. He used bolts that could change angle mid flight. Gave me the idea for the daggers."

"You were trying to win the tournament to get them to accept you?" James followed up.

Gorna looked over, a bit surprised at how well he'd read her intentions.

"Yes." She admitted.

The continued walking for a minute in silence.

"I'm not sorry that I beat you." Amina said after a few moments.

"Don't be." Gorna said. "The god of war desires combat. Survived defeat is simply a chance to grow in skill, and gain greater, more satisfying, victory in future battles."

Amina felt James stiffen. But she spoke before he could say anything.

"So long as the cost is low enough. Defeat grants more experience than victory." Amina agreed.

"Glag." Glag weighed in.

"Well said Glag." James remarked.

"Glag glag." Glag replied.

"By the way." Gorna said. "Why is that thing following you?"

"No idea." James admitted. "But I'm not looking to fight him about it."

"Glag." Glag said.

And the four of them continued down the road.

\------------------------

Samantha yawned as the van rumbled over the gravel road out of the recreational area.

"Huh." Fletcher said as he looked back from the passenger seat. "Looks like we finally found you guys' limits. Never seen any of you guys exhausted before."

^("Could see it a bit more often if you wanted.") She said softly.

"What?" He asked as he turned back, a look of confusion on his face.

"Nothing." She replied. She always got too candid when she was tired. "Just that it was the squirrel's fault."

"Heh. Yeah" He said in response. "You guys chased that thing for like, half an hour."

She laughed a bit. "At least until the food was done."

Fletcher turned a bit and looked back at the other werewolves. If any of them were still awake, he couldn't tell. The youngest one was curled into the crook of Mrs. Ramirez's shoulder. The older woman had taken the roll of the newly orphaned child's makeshift mother.

"They look up to you you know?" He asked quietly. He pointed at the rest of the small group. "Not just them either. But the rest too."

"Yeah right." She said as she looked out the window, her head vibrating against the glass.

"I'm serious." He said. "They listen to you." He pointed back again. "You didn't see the looks on their faces when we opened the cooler with all the meat in it. They were ready to rip that burger meat to shreds. And Esteves's arm would've come out unscathed if they had.'" He nodded at her. "You stopped them with nothing but words and a bit of a growl."

She thought back to it. Had that been how it had looked? To her it had just been her reminding them to act like people and not like the animals that that supposed "God" had tried to make them.

"No...." She said, shaking her head. "That was just.... no."

"Cliche or not." He said. "You're kinda the leader of.... well... the pack."

She looked away, her eyes darting around a bit as she thought about that for a moment.

"Don't want to be the pack leader." She said. "Didn't even want to be an NCO. Just wanted to get my criminology and then go CID."

"Didn't wanna be a werewolf either." He said.

"Don't remind me." She shot back.

Dr. Esteves stayed quiet in the drivers seat. Dr. Munro had warned him that Jenkins had a bit of a crush on the Lawyer.

"I didn't want to be a lawyer." He said. She looked over at him in surprise, her head tilting like it did now."Or live in Dakota. But... eh.... you make do."

"Really?" She asked curiously. "What did you want to do?"

He let out a chuckle. "I wanted to be a guitarist." He admitted. "Turns out I'm tone deaf. Aaaaaaand can't keep a beat to save my soul."

"And that..... made you a lawyer?" She asked.

"Eh... more like the tail end of a long series of dominoes." He said. "And it's not like it compares to what you guys are going through." Then he shrugged. "Plus. Like a lot of guys stories. It kinda involves a girl."

"Ah." She said. "Makes sense."

They rode in silence for a while.

"You're handling it well." He said after a while.

She looked over at him curiously.

"The whole... wolf thing." He explained. "I can't imagine what it's like. Losing everything. Even your own instincts."

She thought for a while. "Wasn't exactly fun she agreed. But.... now that I've been this way for a while. There are some upsides." She confessed.

"Yeah?" He wondered. "Like what? Bench pressing a pickup truck is pretty sweet I guess."

"That's one." She agreed. Then she looked back at the others. "But... well, I don't know about the whole LEADER thing... But... I think I might've been alone before... You know? Without realizing it. It's nice not to be. Dr. Munro ACTUALLY cares about me."

"She's like that." He said. "She got in trouble a few years back before all this for... well, that's her story to tell. But, lets just say that she'll definitely throw down to take care of her patients."

"Plus them." She said with a wave at the other wolves. "I'm glad you guys let us meet each other. It's nice not to be alone in all of this."

"Would you two just make out already?" One of the ones in the back asked with a slight raise of their head. They pointed at their ears. "Super hearing remember? Trying to sleep."

"True." Another one slurred through their exhaustion.

If it hadn't been for her fur, Samantha would have blushed. Fletcher just looked straight ahead, eyes wide.

Dr. Esteves tried not to chuckle, and ALMOST, succeeded.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1271xcm/wait_is_this_just_gate_339/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (338/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Oh cool. Backstory.

And it'll definitely get overshadowed by Glag saying one word four times.

Enjoy.

\~

"So. Gorna. Tell me a bit about centaur culture." James said as he rode along down the road, Amina's arms loosely wrapped around his waist. "I don't know much about you guys. Petravus has them. But I haven't spoken to too many."

The centaur woman, who had been silently walking next to Steve as they traveled, scoffed. She'd made a point of ignoring James almost as hard as Amina had initially ignored her.

She'd also practically begged for Amina to ride on her back instead of on Steve's. James hadn't even weighed in on that conversation, simply holding his wolf hand down to Amina confidently. She hadn't even slowed down to consider the offer, much to the centaur's chagrin.

"I am not a school master interloper." She said venomously. James just shrugged and turned back to the road.

"Oh by the gods." Amina said in exasperation. She turned in the saddle, releasing her hold on James to look over at her devoted follower. "Gorna. James is my husband. It's one thing if you dislike him or avoid him. But I will not have you openly disrespect him. Understood?" James looked back at her curiously. He didn't care either way. But he nodded his appreciation.

Then he heard a slight rumbling, grinding noise from on the other side of Steve. Normally that sound would mean the massive drake was readying a breath of fire. But there was no heat with this rumble.

Glag on the other hand was looking in the direction of the centaur, his eyes looking much more aware than they normally did as he walked along. James wondered if he could sense Gorna somehow, since he couldn't SEE her past Steve's bulk.

Is he readying to defend me? He wondered.

But Glag simply kept walking and rumbling with that semi-observant look on his face as he, in his own way, glared in Gorna's direction.

The Centaur stamped at the ground with her hooves a bit, causing her to bounce up and down and make a small change in her direction before course correcting.

"Yes Mistress." She said angrily.

"It's obvious that you have no intention of letting this whole proposition thing go." Amina continued as she turned back and placed a hand on James's side again. "Despite my protestations and the extenuating circumstances around it. So until you eventually give up or find your conditions met, however that may occur, we are a traveling party. We need to at least be able to EXIST around each other and communicate." Then she pointed a harsh finger at the centaur. "And I've told you before; quit calling me Mistress. Amina is fine. Or Princess or General if you insist on formality."

"Yes Mi-" Gorna began, but Amina's finger rose back up at the sound. "Princess." She corrected herself.

"And you can just call me James." James added casually. "Or... I guess.... Captain. If you wanna do that formally too." He shook his head. "It's been a year and I still don't like that." He said softly to Amina.

The three of them rode in awkward silence for a few moments, with Glag simply walking along without tiring. He'd stopped rumbling too.

"I was... I am... not terribly... liked by my people." Gorna admitted quietly.

James turned to look at her with a raised eyebrow. Amina simply set her head on his shoulder on the side of the centaur. It was obvious from Gorna's downcast face that she didn't like admitting that.

"I am smaller than most centaurs. And a woman." She continued. "And I was never terribly good at fighting." James wanted to say something to the contrary of that, but was silenced by Amina squeezing him with the hand on his side. "At least not in the traditional ways of my people."

"You were certainly strong in our fight." Amina said.

"Yes. But... I rely on magic. And the enchantment on my daggers. I am only passably good with a bow and arrow. And, as you found out yourself, I struggle to compete in direct melee combat." Gorna countered with a hint of anger. "My people favor the sword and axe and spear, and I am not terribly capable with any of those to a sufficient degree."

"But not all centaurs are warriors." Amina said. "I know many that are craftsman, or artists. Many who take jobs as messengers or supply escorts or scouts."

"And again; I am smaller and weaker than most of my kind. And not terribly artistic either. And those last three jobs all require warrior skills. And most centaurs get picked for them before me."

"You are a little smaller than the handful of centaurs I've seen." James said. Gorna glared at him, but a warning glance from Amina kept her quiet. "But... I'm smaller than most humans. And I still almost won the tournament."

"No you didn't dear." Amina said quickly, causing him to try to look back at her with mock anger. But her head stayed locked where it was, preventing him from turning without getting a face full of hair, and her off hand grabbed the back of his head and pointed it straight. After a moment he reluctantly stopped struggling. "He is right though." She added. "Size isn't everything."

"Not to most." Gorna agreed. "I do know that now. Now that I'm older, and have traveled some. Traveled alone." She shook her head. "But... when I was young I was... for all intents and purposes exiled from my clan."

"What clan were you?" Amina asked.

"Northern Range Horde." Gorna said softly.

"Hmmm." Amina hummed. "They spawn a lot of mercenary companies. I can see them not being a fan of someone they deem as weak." She'd read a great many intelligence reports about the strength of the Northern Range Horde, and had even faced a company of one of their mercenary groups when she'd still just been a captain.

"I assume you didn't get your... Dagger Dancing... from them?" James asked.

"No." She admitted. "No. That I picked up from an Arbalestier I traveled with for a while. He used bolts that could change angle mid flight. Gave me the idea for the daggers."

"You were trying to win the tournament to get them to accept you?" James followed up.

Gorna looked over, a bit surprised at how well he'd read her intentions.

"Yes." She admitted.

The continued walking for a minute in silence.

"I'm not sorry that I beat you." Amina said after a few moments.

"Don't be." Gorna said. "The god of war desires combat. Survived defeat is simply a chance to grow in skill, and gain greater, more satisfying, victory in future battles."

Amina felt James stiffen. But she spoke before he could say anything.

"So long as the cost is low enough. Defeat grants more experience than victory." Amina agreed.

"Glag." Glag weighed in.

"Well said Glag." James remarked.

"Glag glag." Glag replied.

"By the way." Gorna said. "Why is that thing following you?"

"No idea." James admitted. "But I'm not looking to fight him about it."

"Glag." Glag said.

And the four of them continued down the road.

\------------------------

Samantha yawned as the van rumbled over the gravel road out of the recreational area.

"Huh." Fletcher said as he looked back from the passenger seat. "Looks like we finally found you guys' limits. Never seen any of you guys exhausted before."

^("Could see it a bit more often if you wanted.") She said softly.

"What?" He asked as he turned back, a look of confusion on his face.

"Nothing." She replied. She always got too candid when she was tired. "Just that it was the squirrel's fault."

"Heh. Yeah" He said in response. "You guys chased that thing for like, half an hour."

She laughed a bit. "At least until the food was done."

Fletcher turned a bit and looked back at the other werewolves. If any of them were still awake, he couldn't tell. The youngest one was curled into the crook of Mrs. Ramirez's shoulder. The older woman had taken the roll of the newly orphaned child's makeshift mother.

"They look up to you you know?" He asked quietly. He pointed at the rest of the small group. "Not just them either. But the rest too."

"Yeah right." She said as she looked out the window, her head vibrating against the glass.

"I'm serious." He said. "They listen to you." He pointed back again. "You didn't see the looks on their faces when we opened the cooler with all the meat in it. They were ready to rip that burger meat to shreds. And Esteves's arm wouldn't've come out unscathed if they had.'" He nodded at her. "You stopped them with nothing but words and a bit of a growl."

She thought back to it. Had that been how it had looked? To her it had just been her reminding them to act like people and not like the animals that that supposed "God" had tried to make them.

"No...." She said, shaking her head. "That was just.... no."

"Cliche or not." He said. "You're kinda the leader of.... well... the pack."

She looked away, her eyes darting around a bit as she thought about that for a moment.

"Don't want to be the pack leader." She said. "Didn't even want to be an NCO. Just wanted to get my criminology and then go CID."

"Didn't wanna be a werewolf either." He said.

"Don't remind me." She shot back.

Dr. Esteves stayed quiet in the drivers seat. Dr. Munro had warned him that Jenkins had a bit of a crush on the Lawyer.

"I didn't want to be a lawyer." He said. She looked over at him in surprise, her head tilting like it did now."Or live in Dakota. But... eh.... you make do."

"Really?" She asked curiously. "What did you want to do?"

He let out a chuckle. "I wanted to be a guitarist." He admitted. "Turns out I'm tone deaf. Aaaaaaand can't keep a beat to save my soul."

"And that..... made you a lawyer?" She asked.

"Eh... more like the tail end of a long series of dominoes." He said. "And it's not like it compares to what you guys are going through." Then he shrugged. "Plus. Like a lot of guys stories. It kinda involves a girl."

"Ah." She said. "Makes sense."

They rode in silence for a while.

"You're handling it well." He said after a while.

She looked over at him curiously.

"The whole... wolf thing." He explained. "I can't imagine what it's like. Losing everything. Even your own instincts."

She thought for a while. "Wasn't exactly fun" She agreed. "But.... now that I've been this way for a while. There are some upsides." She confessed.

"Yeah?" He wondered. "Like what? Bench pressing a pickup truck is pretty sweet I guess."

"That's one." She agreed. Then she looked back at the others. "But... well, I don't know about the whole LEADER thing... But... I think I might've been alone before... You know? Without realizing it. It's nice not to be. Dr. Munro ACTUALLY cares about me."

"She's like that." He said. "She got in trouble a few years back before all this for... well, that's her story to tell. But, lets just say that she'll definitely throw down to take care of her patients."

"Plus them." She said with a wave at the other wolves. "I'm glad you guys let us meet each other. It's nice not to be alone in all of this."

"Would you two just make out already?" One of the ones in the back asked with a slight raise of their head. They pointed at their ears. "Super hearing remember? Trying to sleep."

"True." Another one slurred through their exhaustion.

If it hadn't been for her fur, Samantha would have blushed. Fletcher just looked straight ahead, eyes wide.

Dr. Esteves tried not to chuckle, and ALMOST, succeeded.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1271ves/wait_is_this_just_gate_339/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (337/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey. Veliry's getting in on the big change train too. Hell yeah.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Alright. This is Eastport." Tanier said as the ship pulled up to the tower at the end of the wall around the small port city, far to the south of Jadesport.

The three guards, wearing rather slobby Petravian guard uniforms, were clearly unsure of what to do at the sight of a flying ship. They were even more unsure of what to do at the sight of Amina in her armored General's uniform. She'd only put it on because she knew that the unexpected arrival would upset the local garrison. Especially with the ship flying Vatrian heraldry.

One of the guards remembered what they were supposed to do, and stood ramrod straight while saluting. The other two looked at him and then matched suite.

"Relax." Amina said as she returned the salute. "Have you already sent a runner?"

"Ye-Yes General." The one that saluted first replied.

As if on cue an overweight, scruffily bearded, guard captain came rushing up the stairs on the wall and approached them. He was still fastening his leather chest armor in place, and had his tabbard in hand to place over it.

Amina watched the man approach with a raised eyebrow. James stood a few steps behind her, still on the gangplank and winced. He'd seen disgraced NCO's that had responded to unexpected visits from command in similar fashion back on Earth.

"General!" He said with a hasty salute that Amina returned quickly.

"You're the commander of the port garrison?" She asked.

"Aye ma'am." He replied as he finished struggling with the last strap on his chest.

"Well." She said, choosing to ignore the sloppiness, though James knew she was going to fume over it later. "You can relax Captain....." She tilted her head and waved her hand, gesturing for him to tell her his name.

"Garibald ma'am." He said after a moment of confusion.

"Captain Garibald." She said with fake satisfaction. "Relax Captain Garibald. I only donned my uniform so you would know who I am. I'm currently on my post wedding trip. I'm sure news has reached here by now. I'm off duty."

The four guards visibly relaxed and James cringed a bit. That was one of the oldest officer tricks in the book.

Amina continued. "Let the people of the town know that nothing worth worrying about is occurring." She said. "My sister and her husband the ambassador are simply dropping us off. They'll be returning to the Vatrian Empire as soon as they have a chance to resupply."

"That's good to know ma'am." Garibald said. "We were worried that maybe we were under attack. Don't know how we would've fought a damn flying ship."

Amina's smile faker than a three dollar bill back on Earth.

"Well." She said icily. "You should have a wing of griffins." Garibald was about to reply, but she cut him off. "Go calm down the townsfolk Captain." She said with a note of finality that even the incompetent captain could pick up on.

"Aye ma'am." He replied with another salute before quickly running back down the stairs. He tried to put the last piece of his uniform on and almost fell down the stairs as a result.

She turned back to the other three soldiers, all of whom were clearly uncomfortable.

"Heads up men." She said as she let out a deep sigh. "Keep your uniforms straight and you might just be in for a promotion soon enough. Now, if you don't mind, is there a better place for us to tie this thing off?" She jerked her thumb over her shoulder at the flying ship.

The one who had saluted first pointed at a large landing pad across the docks that was clearly made for dragons and other flying creatures.

"The Drakrid landing pad has some tie downs and they have some resting stands for some of their larger beasts." He said somewhat uncertainly.

"Oh yeah." James said. "Some of them dragons and Wyrms struggle to land on the ground if they're big enough or too old. I should be able to get them to roll a set out." He nodded at Amina as she looked back at him. "Give me a few minutes."

To the surprise and awe of the three remaining soldiers, James simply stepped off the gangplank and into the air.

A loud whooshing noise emanated from him only a split second later as his jets kicked in and carried him over to the dock in question.

Amina calmly pointed at the soldier that had been first to salute, and answer the questions.

"Thank you....." She said, once again signalling for a name.

"Mien, Ma'am." He replied.

"Mien." She said. "You're in the lead."

Then she turned back and walked up the plank.

\------------------

"Oh god." Five said as she slowly walked down the stairs, holding Brin's hand for support. "It is so weird to feel scared of a person."

"Oh. Well. That's life now dear." Brin said with a pat of the former muck marcher's hand. "Downside of being part prey animal. Careful of the steps. We might be good at falling, but it's still unpleasant."

"Sorry about the scare." Vickers said. "Didn't think of how the new instincts would react to seeing me."

"All good chief." She said. "I'm still not over the whole 'having all four limbs again' thing." She flexed her two, somewhat short, arms for emphasis. "Oh, and the not being dead part. All the other stuff is just details."

Driscoll stood up at the sight of his teammate coming down the stairs. He did it a bit too suddenly, having only woken up a few hours before her and still not being adjusted yet, and he almost teetered over. He was going to have to relearn balance now that he didn't have a couple dozen strategically placed stabilizers doing it for him anymore. De'Lius caught him with a single massive hand and gave him a moment to steady himself.

"Boss?" She said as she saw him in the plain white robes that they were both wearing, each set tailored to MOSTLY match their forms.

"Yeah." He replied with a smile. She cringed back at the sight of it and he realized that the squirrel part of her brain was reacting to his new appearance. "Sorry." He said as he quickly covered his mouth with his hands. "Bout time you made it."

She shook her head, and lightly smacked her temple with one of her hands.

"No need to apologize." She said as she took in the room full of predator were-folk in front of her with large, concerned, squirrel eyes. "Gonna have to get used to that."

When she finally reached the bottom of the steps, her legs wobbling a bit from the strain, the two of them embraced in a quick hug. She barely reached his chest, only having gained an inch or two compared to her prior armored form, whereas he was closer to seven feet tall now. Then, thanks to old reflexes, he tapped his knuckles on her forehead. She reached to do the same, but came up short. It was a greeting unique to their, now former, kind.

"I am glad to see that you both survived the conversion." Commander De'Lius said with a slight nod. "And more importantly, that you did so with your sanity intact."

"Admittedly." Five replied. "The last part was a close call. That... sucked."

The commander nodded again. Then he turned to Vickers. "Well. With that all confirmed my obligation here is at an end Mister Vickers. The rest is up to you, Mrs. Brin, and Priest Denaria. I will take my leave." He made to walk out the door, then paused. "And if you see my daughter. Tell her to pay a visit every now and then."

"Will do." Vickers said. Then the two men nodded at each other, and the massive wolf stepped out into the night beyond. Vickers turned back. "Alright guys. It's...." he looked at his tablet for a moment. "roughly eleven pm. Let's let our guests head home for the night while we bunk down. First night is in the same room you changed in."

"Why?" Driscoll asked.

"Silver lining is still in place." Vickers replied. "Your body is still finishing up with the final touches on your transformation. Plus some of your new instincts might cause you to have adverse reactions to your um... Well let's just call it what it is: PTSD."

Denaria cocked an eyebrow at that. Brin didn't even seem to be paying much attention.

"What is that?" The unsettling were-fox asked curiously.

"A term from our world. A problem warriors tend to have if they've been in enough battles." Five replied promptly. "And I hadn't thought of how being part scaredy-squirrel might affect that."

"Ah." The priest said simply. "Well. It is late. I should check in with my temple before I retire. Lady Brin, do you require an escort home?" He asked with an offered arm.

"Oh no." She said with a smile. "I live the opposite way from the new temple of warmth. And only about half a mile. I'll be there in only a few moments."

"Then, like the commander, I shall take my leave as well." The tall fox said. He was out the door before any of them could even say anything.

"Anyone else profoundly creeped out by that man?" Brin asked a few moments later with mock cheeriness. "Or is that just me?"

"I think that's everyone." Five replied easily. "Though it could just be the squirrel in us."

"It's not." Vickers and Driscoll replied in accidental unison. They looked at each other curiously for a moment.

"Well alright then." Brin said with a smile. She hugged Five. "Welcome to the folk." She said happily. Then hugged Driscoll and Vickers as well. Then as she neared the door she pulled a small knife out of one of the pockets of her overalls. "I'm going to try not to fall prey to whatever HE might be up to out there." She said, still cheery as ever. "I'll see you lot in the morning."

Then she was out the door too.

"Are all of the.... were-folk... weird?" Driscoll asked as he slumped down onto an end table. "God having legs is tiring."

"I'm a were-jaguar AND... a SEAL." Vickers said. "Who punches people with ice fists. I don't think I'm a good measure of normal, per se."

"He's got a point." Five said. "Say, is there any food? Mrs. Brin gave me some. But I am starving."

"Same." Driscoll admitted.

"Welcome to ridiculous metabolisms." Vickers said as he moved toward the closet with the bottomless bags full of food for each of them.

And welcome to babysitting. He thought to himself. Again.

\------------------------

Focus. Veliry thought as she stared at the target dummy across her room. You've used this spell since you were ten. You can do this.

She felt the energy move through her body. No matter what she did. No matter what she pulled it from. Whether the warmth of the air, the motion of the wind outside, the movement of all the living bodies in the castle, or even the light of the sun outside her windows, it always did the same new thing.

The healers explanation of it made sense. But it still threw off her ability to control the flow of the energy within herself. She was effectively being forced to remap the flow of magic as it moved through her. And as her unborn child drew some of it into itself.

Luckily there HADN'T been any changes to that flow. Not even when she drew in more.

It just made focusing on her casts almost impossible. Made the use of the energy that managed to get past the child difficult. Difficult to route. Difficult to obtain enough to be useful. She only hoped it would go back to normal once she finally managed to give birth.

Come on little one. She thought pleadingly. Let me have enough to use.

She drew in more, pulling from several of the power sources she'd gathered in her lab. The large shard of elemental obsidian she'd poured energy into for weeks at a time, pouring a trickle into it each time she walked past it. So often that she'd practically done it without thinking before the shard had lit up red, marking it as being almost at capacity. The heart of a great sea serpent that had been slain by an enchanted harpoon and still beat within the jar it was stored in. She used it for any enchantment that needed a cooling effect, as she had never been good at ice magic. She pulled from one of the massive "Car Batteries" that she'd managed to salvage from a MIFFY that had been destroyed in the desert. That energy had always made her senses tingle whenever she drew it in, and it did now.

She felt all of that energy draw in, route down to her abdomen even if it was already in the pointing hand to begin with, then back to the hand.

COME ON!

A small, green spark emitted from the pointed finger.

DO IT!

Another spark, this one leaping in an arc to her cocked thumb.

"COME ON YOU BITCH!" She said to herself. "SHOOT A FUCKING BOLT!"

She focused everything on that finger, and felt the energy surge through her like a wave.

A wave that started in her midsection.

There was a noise so loud and so all encompassing that it was hard to tell what it was.

A torrent of lightning bolts, bluish-green like they had always been, but remarkably bright compared to their former inky darkness, sprayed from her pointing finger tip. They spread out in a massive cone so dense that it was almost a solid object.

And... they pushed her back.

Even the largest firearm she'd made, which James had quickly told her to tone down and refine with several upgrade suggestions, hadn't kicked like this spell did. She braced her arm with the other, non-casting, hand and felt herself being pushed across the lab until she slammed into one of her desks. Then the recoil continued pushing, forcing her to bend over backwards as she struggled to control where she was pointing.

"What the fu-" She tried to ask.

Then it stopped. It was as if someone had simply... shut it off. One second she had been struggling to even stay standing and aiming at the dummy from the force of the mass of death bolt energy she'd been shooting forward in a solid beam. Then her hand was simply pointing, with nothing coming out of it.

And the energy in her body was back to a normal, passive level.

She'd been trying to get it to that level. But something inside her had been feeding it in a seemingly nonstop upward charge. Then the upward charge had just... cut off.

She was standing, still bent backwards over the desk, wondering what had just happened, and trying to read the magical energy still lingering in the air from the spell.

Then she noticed how green the light in the room seemed.

She looked down from the ceiling to where the dummy was.

And she saw a veritable rain forest of plant life, illuminated by the small window nearby.

"What?" She asked nobody, since nobody was there.

The dummy, the wall behind the dummy, a little bit of the ceiling, and one hanging lantern that was nearby, were all coated in plant life. Lichens, vines, flowers, branches, and weeds of all kind and color were growing from them as if they had always been there. Even the glass of the window had some grass growing sideways out of it.

She looked down at her finger curiously, then tried to look up at her new antlers. Naturally they remained out of view, so she reached up and touched them.

And found that they were warm to the touch. In fact, they were almost hot.

"Oooooh." She said as she realized one of the problems with her magical abilities. "That's a bit of a problem."

Then she looked down at her belly and placed a hand on it.

"And don't think I didn't notice your part in that." She said. "We're gonna have to talk about that." She tilted her head a bit. "Whenever... you are capable of talking."

Then she began running out of her lab and towards Marcos's tower.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1264gv5/wait_is_this_just_gate_338/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (337/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey. Veliry's getting in on the big change train too. Hell yeah.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Alright. This is Eastport." Tanier said as the ship pulled up to the tower at the end of the wall around the small port city, far to the south of Jadesport.

The three guards, wearing rather slobby Petravian guard uniforms, were clearly unsure of what to do at the sight of a flying ship. They were even more unsure of what to do at the sight of Amina in her armored General's uniform. She'd only put it on because she knew that the unexpected arrival would upset the local garrison. Especially with the ship flying Vatrian heraldry.

One of the guards remembered what they were supposed to do, and stood ramrod straight while saluting. The other two looked at him and then matched suite.

"Relax." Amina said as she returned the salute. "Have you already sent a runner?"

"Ye-Yes General." The one that saluted first replied.

As if on cue an overweight, scruffily bearded, guard captain came rushing up the stairs on the wall and approached them. He was still fastening his leather chest armor in place, and had his tabbard in hand to place over it.

Amina watched the man approach with a raised eyebrow. James stood a few steps behind her, still on the gangplank and winced. He'd seen disgraced NCO's that had responded to unexpected visits from command in similar fashion back on Earth.

"General!" He said with a hasty salute that Amina returned quickly.

"You're the commander of the port garrison?" She asked.

"Aye ma'am." He replied as he finished struggling with the last strap on his chest.

"Well." She said, choosing to ignore the sloppiness, though James knew she was going to fume over it later. "You can relax Captain......." She tilted her head and waved her hand, gesturing for him to tell her his name.

"Garibald ma'am." He said after a moment of confusion.

"Captain Garibald." She said with fake satisfaction. "Relax Captain Garibald. I only donned my uniform so you would know who I am. I'm currently on my post wedding trip. I'm sure news has reached here by now. I'm off duty."

The four guards visibly relaxed and James cringed a bit. That was one of the oldest officer tricks in the book.

Amina continued. "Let the people of the town know that nothing worth worrying about is occurring." She said. "My sister and her husband the ambassador are simply dropping us off. They'll be returning to the Vatrian Empire as soon as they have a chance to resupply."

"That's good to know ma'am." Garibald said. "We were worried that maybe we were under attack. Don't know how we would've fought a damn flying ship."

Amina's smile faker than a three dollar bill back on Earth.

"Well." She said icily. "You should have a wing of griffins." Garibald was about to reply, but she cut him off. "Go calm down the townsfolk Captain." She said with a note of finality that even the incompetent captain could pick up on.

"Aye ma'am." He replied with another salute before quickly running back down the stairs. He tried to put the last piece of his uniform on and almost fell down the stairs as a result.

She turned back to the other three soldiers, all of whom were clearly uncomfortable.

"Heads up men." She said as she let out a deep sigh. "Keep your uniforms straight and you might just be in for a promotion soon enough. Now, if you don't mind, is there a better place for us to tie this thing off?" She jerked her thumb over her shoulder at the flying ship.

The one who had saluted first pointed at a large landing pad across the docks that was clearly made for dragons and other flying creatures.

"The Drakrid landing pad has some tie downs and they have some resting stands for some of their larger beasts." He said somewhat uncertainly.

"Oh yeah." James said. "Some of them dragons and Wyrms struggle to land on the ground if they're big enough or too old. I should be able to get them to roll a set out." He nodded at Amina as she looked back at him. "Give me a few minutes."

To the surprise and awe of the three remaining soldiers, James simply stepped off the gangplank and into the air.

A loud whooshing noise emanated from him only a split second later as his jets kicked in and carried him over to the dock in question.

Amina calmly pointed at the soldier that had been first to salute, and answer the questions.

"Thank you....." She said, once again signalling for a name.

"Mien, Ma'am." He replied.

"Mien." She said. "You're in the lead."

Then she turned back and walked up the plank.

\------------------

"Oh god." Five said as she slowly walked down the stairs, holding Brin's hand for support. "It is so weird to feel scared of a person."

"Oh. Well. That's life now dear." Brin said with a pat of the former muck marcher's hand. "Downside of being part prey animal. Careful of the steps. We might be good at falling, but it's still unpleasant."

"Sorry about the scare." Vickers said. "Didn't think of how the new instincts would react to seeing me."

"All good chief." She said. "I'm still not over the whole 'having all four limbs again' thing." She flexed her two, somewhat short, arms for emphasis. "Oh, and the not being dead part. All the other stuff is just details."

Driscoll stood up at the sight of his teammate coming down the stairs. He did it a bit too suddenly, having only woken up a few hours before her and still not being adjusted yet, and he almost teetered over. He was going to have to relearn balance now that he didn't have a couple dozen strategically placed stabilizers doing it for him anymore. De'Lius caught him with a single massive hand and gave him a moment to steady himself.

"Boss?" She said as she saw him in the plain white robes that they were both wearing, each set tailored to MOSTLY match their forms.

"Yeah." He replied with a smile. She cringed back at the sight of it and he realized that the squirrel part of her brain was reacting to his new appearance. "Sorry." He said as he quickly covered his mouth with his hands. "Bout time you made it."

She shook her head, and lightly smacked her temple with one of her hands.

"No need to apologize." She said as she took in the room full of predator were-folk in front of her with large, concerned, squirrel eyes. "Gonna have to get used to that."

When she finally reached the bottom of the steps, her legs wobbling a bit from the strain, the two of them embraced in a quick hug. She barely reached his chest, only having gained an inch or two compared to her prior armored form, whereas he was closer to seven feet tall now. Then, thanks to old reflexes, he tapped his knuckles on her forehead. She reached to do the same, but came up short. It was a greeting unique to their, now former, kind.

"I am glad to see that you both survived the conversion." Commander De'Lius said with a slight nod. "And more importantly, that you did so with your sanity intact."

"Admittedly." Five replied. "The last part was a close call. That... sucked."

The commander nodded again. Then he turned to Vickers. "Well. With that all confirmed my obligation here is at an end Mister Vickers. The rest is up to you, Mrs. Brin, and Priest Denaria. I will take my leave." He made to walk out the door, then paused. "And if you see my daughter. Tell her to pay a visit every now and then."

"Will do." Vickers said. Then the two men nodded at each other, and the massive wolf stepped out into the night beyond. Vickers turned back. "Alright guys. It's...." he looked at his tablet for a moment. "roughly eleven pm. Let's let our guests head home for the night while we bunk down. First night is in the same room you changed in."

"Why?" Driscoll asked.

"Silver lining is still in place." Vickers replied. "Your body is still finishing up with the final touches on your transformation. Plus some of your new instincts might cause you to have adverse reactions to your um... Well let's just call it what it is: PTSD."

Denaria cocked an eyebrow at that. Brin didn't even seem to be paying much attention.

"What is that?" The unsettling were-fox asked curiously.

"A term from our world. A problem warriors tend to have if they've been in enough battles." Five replied promptly. "And I hadn't thought of how being part scaredy-squirrel might affect that."

"Ah." The priest said simply. "Well. It is late. I should check in with my temple before I retire. Lady Brin, do you require an escort home?" He asked with an offered arm.

"Oh no." She said with a smile. "I live the opposite way from the new temple of warmth. And only about half a mile. I'll be there in only a few moments."

"Then, like the commander, I shall take my leave as well." The tall fox said. He was out the door before any of them could even say anything.

"Anyone else profoundly creeped out by that man?" Brin asked a few moments later with mock cheeriness. "Or is that just me?"

"I think that's everyone." Five replied easily. "Though it could just be the squirrel in us."

"It's not." Vickers and Driscoll replied in accidental unison. They looked at each other curiously for a moment.

"Well alright then." Brin said with a smile. She hugged Five. "Welcome to the folk." She said happily. Then hugged Driscoll and Vickers as well. Then as she neared the door she pulled a small knife out of one of the pockets of her overalls. "I'm going to try not to fall prey to whatever HE might be up to out there." She said, still cheery as ever. "I'll see you lot in the morning."

Then she was out the door too.

"Are all of the.... were-folk... weird?" Driscoll asked as he slumped down onto an end table. "God having legs is tiring."

"I'm a were-jaguar AND... a SEAL." Vickers said. "Who punches people with ice fists. I don't think I'm a good measure of normal, per se."

"He's got a point." Five said. "Say, is there any food? Mrs. Brin gave me some. But I am starving."

"Same." Driscoll admitted.

"Welcome to ridiculous metabolisms." Vickers said as he moved toward the closet with the bottomless bags full of food for each of them.

And welcome to babysitting. He thought to himself. Again.

\------------------------

Focus. Veliry thought as she stared at the target dummy across her room. You've used this spell since you were ten. You can do this.

She felt the energy move through her body. No matter what she did. No matter what she pulled it from. Whether the warmth of the air, the motion of the wind outside, the movement of all the living bodies in the castle, or even the light of the sun outside her windows, it always did the same new thing.

The healers explanation of it made sense. But it still threw off her ability to control the flow of the energy within herself. She was effectively being forced to remap the flow of magic as it moved through her. And as her unborn child drew some of it into itself.

Luckily there HADN'T been any changes to that flow. Not even when she drew in more.

It just made focusing on her casts almost impossible. Made the use of the energy that managed to get past the child difficult. Difficult to route. Difficult to obtain enough to be useful. She only hoped it would go back to normal once she finally managed to give birth.

Come on little one. She thought pleadingly. Let me have enough to use.

She drew in more, pulling from several of the power sources she'd gathered in her lab. The large shard of elemental obsidian she'd poured energy into for weeks at a time, pouring a trickle into it each time she walked past it. So often that she'd practically done it without thinking before the shard had lit up red, marking it as being almost at capacity. The heart of a great sea serpent that had been slain by an enchanted harpoon and still beat within the jar it was stored in. She used it for any enchantment that needed a cooling effect, as she had never been good at ice magic. She pulled from one of the massive "Car Batteries" that she'd managed to salvage from a MIFFY that had been destroyed in the desert. That energy had always made her senses tingle whenever she drew it in, and it did now.

She felt all of that energy draw in, route down to her abdomen even if it was already in the pointing hand to begin with, then back to the hand.

COME ON!

A small, green spark emitted from the pointed finger.

DO IT!

Another spark, this one leaping in an arc to her cocked thumb.

"COME ON YOU BITCH!" She said to herself. "SHOOT A FUCKING BOLT!"

She focused everything on that finger, and felt the energy surge through her like a wave.

A wave that started in her midsection.

There was a noise so loud and so all encompassing that it was hard to tell what it was.

A torrent of lightning bolts, bluish-green like they had always been, but remarkably bright compared to their former inky darkness, sprayed from her pointing finger tip. They spread out in a massive cone so dense that it was almost a solid object.

And... they pushed her back.

Even the largest firearm she'd made, which James had quickly told her to tone down and refine with several upgrade suggestions, hadn't kicked like this spell did. She braced her arm with the other, non-casting, hand and felt herself being pushed across the lab until she slammed into one of her desks. Then the recoil continued pushing, forcing her to bend over backwards as she struggled to control where she was pointing.

"What the fu-" She tried to ask.

Then it stopped. It was as if someone had simply... shut it off. One second she had been struggling to even stay standing and aiming at the dummy from the force of the mass of death bolt energy she'd been shooting forward in a solid beam. Then her hand was simply pointing, with nothing coming out of it.

And the energy in her body was back to a normal, passive level.

She'd been trying to get it to that level. But something inside her had been feeding it in a seemingly nonstop upward charge. Then the upward charge had just... cut off.

She was standing, still bent backwards over the desk, wondering what had just happened, and trying to read the magical energy still lingering in the air from the spell.

Then she noticed how green the light in the room seemed.

She looked down from the ceiling to where the dummy was.

And she saw a veritable rain forest of plant life, illuminated by the small window nearby.

"What?" She asked nobody, since nobody was there.

The dummy, the wall behind the dummy, a little bit of the ceiling, and one hanging lantern that was nearby, were all coated in plant life. Lichens, vines, flowers, branches, and weeds of all kind and color were growing from them as if they had always been there. Even the glass of the window had some grass growing sideways out of it.

She looked down at her finger curiously, then tried to look up at her new antlers. Naturally they remained out of view, so she reached up and touched them.

And found that they were warm to the touch. In fact, they were almost hot.

"Oooooh." She said as she realized one of the problems with her magical abilities. "That's a bit of a problem."

Then she looked down at her belly and placed a hand on it.

"And don't think I didn't notice your part in that." She said. "We're gonna have to talk about that." She tilted her head a bit. "Whenever... you are capable of talking."

Then she began running out of her lab and towards Marcos's tower.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1264fj1/wait_is_this_just_gate_338/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (336/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I wanted to start the week off with some innocent wholesomeness. So here's some goddam GLAG for you.

Enjoy.

\~

James lounged on the deck of Tanier and Ferria's flying ship enjoying the sunshine as it barely began to set, a tankard of ale in one hand and a Vatrian to Petravian translation guide in the other. It was one of the few things that he and Amina had had time to actually buy, among a few other small odds and ends, before he had accidentally plunged things back into chaos.

"Glag! Get back here!" He heard Amina exclaim as she chased the small rock monster around the ship in a circle. In her outstretched hands was James's green medallion on a chain. She slammed into one of the barrels that was tied down on the deck and it wobbled a bit. Fast as she was, Glag was small, and remarkably nimble. "Stay still you decrepit pile of boulders!" She demanded.

"Glag!" Glag exclaimed back.

"It's bad enough we had to rush our departure!" Tanier said from his position on the opposite end of the ship, near the wheel. "If you and your damnable Glag damage it, or any of the supplies, I will personally launch you over the railing!"

James chuckled a bit. Amina had asked him if his medallion had allowed him to understand Glag. James had, with only mild mischievousness in mind, told her that it hadn't, but that it might work if Glag wore it.

He'd left out the part where he'd already tried that before she'd even emerged from their room. It had turned out that either the medallion didn't work on Glag, or else he was simply saying "Glag." for the sake of saying it.

He'd also left out the part where Glag had attempted to devour the medallion, which was made of magically imbued Jade, and that James had then grown visibly scared and upset. Once Glag had pushed the Medallion back out of his form James had made him promise to never touch it again just in case. He'd explained how important it was and that he needed it more than almost any other gear he had. Glag had listened with what James had hoped was understanding.

And as Amina had first attempted to put the medallion on the stone creature, he had been proven correct in that hope.

The following game of tag had been going on for nearly thirty minutes now. Some of Tanier's crew were even placing bets.

"JAMES!" She exclaimed as she leapt over one of the various crates and missed Glag as he reversed his momentum almost instantly and rolled underneath her leap like a ball. "Help me out here!"

To make matters even funnier, Gorna the centaur was attempting to help her "mistress".

And she was not doing well.

"Oh! Hon, Gorna's got your back!" He said, hiding a smirk, as he pointed at the centaur with his ale hand. "Maybe this great challenge will be enough to count as having been served ably by her! Just... Just a thought." He sipped. "Besides I think I'm too drunk to catch him!" He fibbed as a few of the deckhands nearby laughed. "Keep trying though. I'm sure he'll tire soon."

As if on cue Glag rolled under and between Gorna's front and rear legs. Amina slammed into the centaur face first and was almost clothes-lined in the process.

"My lady!" Gorna exclaimed as she rushed to move out of the way AND help Amina up.

Amina ignored her and rolled under her then began looking for Glag.

"Over there Princess!" One of the deckhands said with a nod.

"Glag!" Glag exclaimed, and James thought he heard a hint of joy in the grating, rumbling voice. He was almost over near Tanier, having ascended the stairs to the next deck up in a leap.

"Dammit!" Amina hissed as she ran after him.

James just laughed and went back to reading the book. He had no intention of actually LEARNING Vatrian, but he figured a few key phrases might be useful down the road.

"GLAAAG!"Glag yelled as he heard a crash from somewhere behind Tanier and the ship's wheel.

"Oh shit." He said as he quickly placed the drink and book down and rushed over.

\-------------------------

Driscoll woke up to a sensation that was, at least partly, familiar. What wasn't familiar was the series of sensations accompanying it.

He was floating.

But he was also wet.

And he could smell the water and the..... flowers(?)... that were in it. And.... candles.

His suit could float just fine if it needed to. Reinforced balloons could be inflated or deflated as needed to help him get to the surface of the ocean if he needed to. They were primarily for recovery purposes. But many of his kind used them to assist with vertical traversal when in the deep ocean as well.

But if he was in his suit than how could he be wet? And how could he smell anything other than the cleaning moisturizer that their suit applied to their skin to keep it from drying out? Or the rubber seals and circuitry as they warmed up during times of action?

And how could he feel his.

MY HANDS AND LEGS!?!?!

He lurched up using only his back and the momentum from rocking his head, which temporarily dunked it back under the water.

"Woah!" A familiar, and much too loud, voice said as a hand clamped down on his collarbone. "Relax!"

By reflex Driscoll's hands clasped onto the large, clawed, furred, hand and attempted to dislodge it using the same nerve commands that he would have used in the suit. The result was that his hands began to squeeze, attempting to crush the arm of his would be assailant the way he would have in the suit. The hand holding him was massive, and even placed just above his sternum it almost wrapped around his neck.

There was a slight pop from the massive animal's arm.

"Ow." The familiar voice said calmly. Then a second, equally massive, hand grabbed his left hand. "Relax sardine."

And as the hand gripped his and slowly, but with incredible gentleness, pulled his hand away. Driscoll FELT the fur on the hands.

As if flipping a switch in his mind he realized he could also FEEL the one he'd been trying to get off of him too.

"What?" He asked. "What's happening?"

He looked around and realized that he was in a bath of some kind, though the tub was massive, inside a house.

And... he had hands.

They weren't.... Well, they weren't his hands. Not really. They couldn't be. He'd had his hands amputated nearly fifteen years ago due to chemical burns and necrosis.

Besides, these hands were massive, and covered in red fur that faded to black as it neared his... claws? They reminded him of images he'd seen of professional basketball players pre-war.

"Driscoll?" The voice asked. Driscoll looked at it and saw the feline featured face of Chief Vickers. "Relax." He said. "Lie back down."

"Vickers?" He asked. "It.... It worked?" He asked as he held his new hand up in front of his face and moved it. It actually moved when he told it to. And it had none of the micro-lag that they'd had to train to overcome when they'd first had their interfaces mapped into their suits.

Then he heard a splash and realized that he was feeling....

His head snapped down past Vickers' arm and saw legs. Actually, honest to god, legs.

Like the hands they were long. Incredibly long. Awkwardly, lankily, long actually. The joints had been rearranged in a way that was like a dogs or cats, and they ended in paws. They also had the same red-to-black fade as his hands, though the toes had white fur around the ends.

But when he told his right foot to kick it did, sending a small splash of water over the edge of the tub.

He felt a different wetness then, as his eyes welled up.

He had arms.

He had legs.

For the first time since he'd turned thirteen. Since he'd watched as a cloud of deadly gas and debris and other types of fallout had washed over the middle school parking lot his mom had just dropped him off at. He had a body all of his own. A working body.

"I.... I lived?" He asked. "It worked?"

"Yeah." Vickers said as he gently lowered the, now former, muck marcher back into the water gently and let him float there. "Yeah. You're good. Just gotta recover a bit."

He hadn't expected to survive the ordeal. Not after Vickers and the other two were-folk had explained what would happen, and how low his odds were. He'd expected his body to be overcome by the transformation and give up, or for his mind to break. On the latter, he had almost been proven right. He remembered the pain, as flesh began to tear and bones had begun to break. As implants used to keep him alive had been expelled violently, and his Can had been ejected like a champagne cork. He remembered the smell and remembered how, as he had thrashed about, he had placed his hands in something that was supposed to be inside it.

He remembered using lungs that could barely breath on their own to scream a wail of death that any metal front man would have died to have in their vocal arsenal.

Then he'd passed out.

And now in a warm tub full of fragrant water, who knew how many hours or days later, he was not only alive. He was whole again.

He was, for all intents and purposes, reborn.

Then he remembered that he hadn't undergone the process alone.

He reached up, still marveling at the concept of having a hand that he could FEEL, and tried to grab Vickers' sleeve. He miscalculated and ended up almost pushing the SEAL off of the edge of the tub. But he braced himself in time and looked down at Driscoll curiously.

"Five?" Driscoll asked. "Is she?..." He trailed off.

"Alive." Vickers said. "Still out though." He pulled something out of the bag he'd been rummaging in, and Driscoll smelled it somehow. "I'll check on her in a second for now-"

"Steak?" Driscoll asked. "Uncooked? But-" Without even realizing it he emitted a noise that wasn't quite a growl. But it was close. His head craned up and Vickers' eyes went wide.

"That is a LONG fuckin neck. Holy shit." The large were-jaguar said in surprise. Then he tossed the slice of meat up a bit, as if to a pet dog. Driscoll eagerly snapped it from the air with his teeth. "Well that's new nightmare fuel." He said softly to himself as he reached for more.

Driscoll gripped the steak with both hands and tore at it greedily, his teeth sinking in with ease and taking small chunks out with each bite.

That was when, as he slid another piece in with his new hands, he noticed just how pointed his teeth were. For that matter, as his hand explored his face, he noticed that he had a snout now. And pointed ears that were even more severe than those on Vickers' head.

Then he felt something his mind couldn't quite... understand.

It felt like something was poking him just above his butt. But... distant?

He reached behind himself and grabbed at his back and felt a tentacle.

"What the fuck is-" He exclaimed as he began trying to move again, splashing water everywhere.

"Relax!" Vickers said in a commanding tone. "it's just your tail!"

Driscoll managed to get a hold of the thing at almost the exact same moment Vickers made the announcement.

"I have a tail!?!" He asked incredulously.

"You're a damn fox!" Vickers shot back. "Of course you have a tail. I have a damn tail."

The door opened, causing both of the men inside to stiffen as old reflexes put them on alert at an unexpected intrusion.

"It sounds...." Said a deep voice that did not match the body of the person using it. "As though it may be MY time to take over with the lessons." Said a nearly seven foot tall, incredibly thin, were-fox as he slowly, almost hesitantly, entered the small room.

Driscoll could practically see the discomfort that the man caused in Vickers. As the Chief looked back down at Driscoll he winked.

"Sounds good." He said in a voice that was more eager than the man's face was. "I'll leave you in Priest Denaria's incredibly knowledgeable hands Mr. Driscoll. He knows more about being a fox than I do." He tapped a knuckle to Driscolls left shoulder. "I'll go check on your buddy."

Driscoll's hand shot out of the water and seized the arm before it could get to far away. Vickers looked back with a mixture of surprise and mild anger. Not a huge shock when startling a member of the special forces.

"Thank you." Driscoll said. "Thank you."

Vickers just patted the hand and nodded. "Just remember the deal." He said simply. Then he was out the door.

Denaria took Vickers' place once the door had shut. But he didn't sit down like Vickers had. Instead he simply stood, looking down at Driscoll. Driscoll was very faintly reminded of a cartoon character he'd seen as a kid, though he couldn't remember details. He thought the character had probably been a villain, or maybe a monster, but he wasn't sure. Either way the man was menacing. Not least of all because of his intense gaze.

"Congratulations on your successful conversion Mr. Driscoll." He said in that almost deep, somewhat echoing, voice. "And welcome to the Folk."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1256v2g/wait_is_this_just_gate_337/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (336/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I wanted to start the week off with some innocent wholesomeness. So here's some goddam GLAG for you.

Enjoy.

\~

James lounged on the deck of Tanier and Ferria's flying ship enjoying the sunshine as it barely began to set, a tankard of ale in one hand and a Vatrian to Petravian translation guide in the other. It was one of the few things that he and Amina had had time to actually buy, among a few other small odds and ends, before he had accidentally plunged things back into chaos.

"Glag! Get back here!" He heard Amina exclaim as she chased the small rock monster around the ship in a circle. In her outstretched hands was James's green medallion on a chain. She slammed into one of the barrels that was tied down on the deck and it wobbled a bit. Fast as she was, Glag was small, and remarkably nimble. "Stay still you decrepit pile of boulders!" She demanded.

"Glag!" Glag exclaimed back.

"It's bad enough we had to rush our departure!" Tanier said from his position on the opposite end of the ship, near the wheel. "If you and your damnable Glag damage it, or any of the supplies, I will personally launch you over the railing!"

James chuckled a bit. Amina had asked him if his medallion had allowed him to understand Glag. James had, with only mild mischievousness in mind, told her that it hadn't, but that it might work if Glag wore it.

He'd left out the part where he'd already tried that before she'd even emerged from their room. It had turned out that either the medallion didn't work on Glag, or else he was simply saying "Glag." for the sake of saying it.

He'd also left out the part where Glag had attempted to devour the medallion, which was made of magically imbued Jade, and that James had then grown visibly scared and upset. Once Glag had pushed the Medallion back out of his form James had made him promise to never touch it again just in case. He'd explained how important it was and that he needed it more than almost any other gear he had. Glag had listened with what James had hoped was understanding.

And as Amina had first attempted to put the medallion on the stone creature, he had been proven correct in that hope.

The following game of tag had been going on for nearly thirty minutes now. Some of Tanier's crew were even placing bets.

"JAMES!" She exclaimed as she leapt over one of the various crates and missed Glag as he reversed his momentum almost instantly and rolled underneath her leap like a ball. "Help me out here!"

To make matters even funnier, Gorna the centaur was attempting to help her "mistress".

And she was not doing well.

"Oh! Hon, Gorna's got your back!" He said, hiding a smirk, as he pointed at the centaur with his ale hand. "Maybe this great challenge will be enough to count as having been served ably by her! Just... Just a thought." He sipped. "Besides I think I'm too drunk to catch him!" He fibbed as a few of the deckhands nearby laughed. "Keep trying though. I'm sure he'll tire soon."

As if on cue Glag rolled under and between Gorna's front and rear legs. Amina slammed into the centaur face first and was almost clothes-lined in the process.

"My lady!" Gorna exclaimed as she rushed to move out of the way AND help Amina up.

Amina ignored her and rolled under her then began looking for Glag.

"Over there Princess!" One of the deckhands said with a nod.

"Glag!" Glag exclaimed, and James thought he heard a hint of joy in the grating, rumbling voice. He was almost over near Tanier, having ascended the stairs to the next deck up in a leap.

"Dammit!" Amina hissed as she ran after him.

James just laughed and went back to reading the book. He had no intention of actually LEARNING Vatrian, but he figured a few key phrases might be useful down the road.

"GLAAAG!"Glag yelled as he heard a crash from somewhere behind Tanier and the ship's wheel.

"Oh shit." He said as he quickly placed the drink and book down and rushed over.

\-------------------------

Driscoll woke up to a sensation that was, at least partly, familiar. What wasn't familiar was the series of sensations accompanying it.

He was floating.

But he was also wet.

And he could smell the water and the..... flowers(?)... that were in it. And.... candles.

His suit could float just fine if it needed to. Reinforced balloons could be inflated or deflated as needed to help him get to the surface of the ocean if he needed to. They were primarily for recovery purposes. But many of his kind used them to assist with vertical traversal when in the deep ocean as well.

But if he was in his suit than how could he be wet? And how could he smell anything other than the cleaning moisturizer that their suit applied to their skin to keep it from drying out? Or the rubber seals and circuitry as they warmed up during times of action?

And how could he feel his.

MY HANDS AND LEGS!?!?!

He lurched up using only his back and the momentum from rocking his head, which temporarily dunked it back under the water.

"Woah!" A familiar, and much too loud, voice said as a hand clamped down on his collarbone. "Relax!"

By reflex Driscoll's hands clasped onto the large, clawed, furred, hand and attempted to dislodge it using the same nerve commands that he would have used in the suit. The result was that his hands began to squeeze, attempting to crush the arm of his would be assailant the way he would have in the suit. The hand holding him was massive, and even placed just above his sternum it almost wrapped around his neck.

There was a slight pop from the massive animal's arm.

"Ow." The familiar voice said calmly. Then a second, equally massive, hand grabbed his left hand. "Relax sardine."

And as the hand gripped his and slowly, but with incredible gentleness, pulled his hand away. Driscoll FELT the fur on the hands.

As if flipping a switch in his mind he realized he could also FEEL the one he'd been trying to get off of him too.

"What?" He asked. "What's happening?"

He looked around and realized that he was in a bath of some kind, though the tub was massive, inside a house.

And... he had hands.

They weren't.... Well, they weren't his hands. Not really. They couldn't be. He'd had his hands amputated nearly fifteen years ago due to chemical burns and necrosis.

Besides, these hands were massive, and covered in red fur that faded to black as it neared his... claws? They reminded him of images he'd seen of professional basketball players pre-war.

"Driscoll?" The voice asked. Driscoll looked at it and saw the feline featured face of Chief Vickers. "Relax." He said. "Lie back down."

"Vickers?" He asked. "It.... It worked?" He asked as he held his new hand up in front of his face and moved it. It actually moved when he told it to. And it had none of the micro-lag that they'd had to train to overcome when they'd first had their interfaces mapped into their suits.

Then he heard a splash and realized that he was feeling....

His head snapped down past Vickers' arm and saw legs. Actually, honest to god, legs.

Like the hands they were long. Incredibly long. Awkwardly, lankily, long actually. The joints had been rearranged in a way that was like a dogs or cats, and they ended in paws. They also had the same red-to-black fade as his hands, though the toes had white fur around the ends.

But when he told his right foot to kick it did, sending a small splash of water over the edge of the tub.

He felt a different wetness then, as his eyes welled up.

He had arms.

He had legs.

For the first time since he'd turned thirteen. Since he'd watched as a cloud of deadly gas and debris and other types of fallout had washed over the middle school parking lot his mom had just dropped him off at. He had a body all of his own. A working body.

"I.... I lived?" He asked. "It worked?"

"Yeah." Vickers said as he gently lowered the, now former, muck marcher back into the water gently and let him float there. "Yeah. You're good. Just gotta recover a bit."

He hadn't expected to survive the ordeal. Not after Vickers and the other two were-folk had explained what would happen, and how low his odds were. He'd expected his body to be overcome by the transformation and give up, or for his mind to break. On the latter, he had almost been proven right. He remembered the pain, as flesh began to tear and bones had begun to break. As implants used to keep him alive had been expelled violently, and his Can had been ejected like a champagne cork. He remembered the smell and remembered how, as he had thrashed about, he had placed his hands in something that was supposed to be inside it.

He remembered using lungs that could barely breath on their own to scream a wail of death that any metal front man would have died to have in their vocal arsenal.

Then he'd passed out.

And now in a warm tub full of fragrant water, who knew how many hours or days later, he was not only alive. He was whole again.

He was, for all intents and purposes, reborn.

Then he remembered that he hadn't undergone the process alone.

He reached up, still marveling at the concept of having a hand that he could FEEL, and tried to grab Vickers' sleeve. He miscalculated and ended up almost pushing the SEAL off of the edge of the tub. But he braced himself in time and looked down at Driscoll curiously.

"Five?" Driscoll asked. "Is she?..." He trailed off.

"Alive." Vickers said. "Still out though." He pulled something out of the bag he'd been rummaging in, and Driscoll smelled it somehow. "I'll check on her in a second for now-"

"Steak?" Driscoll asked. "Uncooked? But-" Without even realizing it he emitted a noise that wasn't quite a growl. But it was close. His head craned up and Vickers' eyes went wide.

"That is a LONG fuckin neck. Holy shit." The large were-jaguar said in surprise. Then he tossed the slice of meat up a bit, as if to a pet dog. Driscoll eagerly snapped it from the air with his teeth. ^("Well that's new nightmare fuel.") He said softly to himself as he reached for more.

Driscoll gripped the steak with both hands and tore at it greedily, his teeth sinking in with ease and taking small chunks out with each bite.

That was when, as he slid another piece in with his new hands, he noticed just how pointed his teeth were. For that matter, as his hand explored his face, he noticed that he had a snout now. And pointed ears that were even more severe than those on Vickers' head.

Then he felt something his mind couldn't quite... understand.

It felt like something was poking him just above his butt. But... distant?

He reached behind himself and grabbed at his back and felt a tentacle.

"What the fuck is-" He exclaimed as he began trying to move again, splashing water everywhere.

"Relax!" Vickers said in a commanding tone. "it's just your tail!"

Driscoll managed to get a hold of the thing at almost the exact same moment Vickers made the announcement.

"I have a tail!?!" He asked incredulously.

"You're a damn fox!" Vickers shot back. "Of course you have a tail. I have a damn tail."

The door opened, causing both of the men inside to stiffen as old reflexes put them on alert at an unexpected intrusion.

"It sounds...." Said a deep voice that did not match the body of the person using it. "As though it may be MY time to take over with the lessons." Said a nearly seven foot tall, incredibly thin, were-fox as he slowly, almost hesitantly, entered the small room.

Driscoll could practically see the discomfort that the man caused in Vickers. As the Chief looked back down at Driscoll he winked.

"Sounds good." He said in a voice that was more eager than the man's face was. "I'll leave you in Priest Denaria's incredibly knowledgeable hands Mr. Driscoll. He knows more about being a fox than I do." He tapped a knuckle to Driscolls left shoulder. "I'll go check on your buddy."

Driscoll's hand shot out of the water and seized the arm before it could get to far away. Vickers looked back with a mixture of surprise and mild anger. Not a huge shock when startling a member of the special forces.

"Thank you." Driscoll said. "Thank you."

Vickers just patted the hand and nodded. "Just remember the deal." He said simply. Then he was out the door.

Denaria took Vickers' place once the door had shut. But he didn't sit down like Vickers had. Instead he simply stood, looking down at Driscoll. Driscoll was very faintly reminded of a cartoon character he'd seen as a kid, though he couldn't remember details. He thought the character had probably been a villain, or maybe a monster, but he wasn't sure. Either way the man was menacing. Not least of all because of his intense gaze.

"Congratulations on your successful conversion Mr. Driscoll." He said in that almost deep, somewhat echoing, voice. "And welcome to the Folk."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1256rv4/wait_is_this_just_gate_337/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (335/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Tuuurn and face the strange! Cha-Cha-Changes!

Enjoy.

\~

James trudged as he and Amina walked back to the airship.

Partly because they had, politely yet definitively, been asked to leave Vatria.

Partly because he'd almost single handedly ended the tournament but was NOT the champion of it.

And partly because he and Amina had two tag-alongs following them.

Amina, despite everything else was beaming with pride and a smile as she sat on top of Steve as James guided him through the streets of the capital towards the end of the palace grounds where her sister and the ambassador had docked the air ship. Around her neck was a loosely draped neck-piece made of a combinations of emeralds and sapphires, wrought in a bright silver. It was the tournament's version of a laurel or wreath. She also had a hefty bag of gold and silver stored in her bottomless bag now. Not that she was hurting for money.

On her back was the enchanted hammer that Raend had been using throughout the tournament. She'd stopped by to see the poor mercenary after the fight had concluded, and as the arena healers were busy trying to heal his leg. She'd offered to leave the hammer near him, but the brutally injured man had told her to get the hell away from him, and sworn off fighting for the rest of his life, so she'd held onto it.

James on the other hand, had not gotten off so lucky.

He'd been disqualified for breaking the flight ceiling set in the tournament's rules.

He had also caused an obscene amount of damage to the arena itself.

He'd gained two more penalty flags for how badly he'd damaged Glag, who had needed to be stabilized by several of the arena mages, and fed some of the broken bits of his own body so he could use them to regenerate. The sandstone creature hadn't been disqualified for breaking the ceiling since he hadn't done so of his own accord, but rather as the result of an opponent's attack.

As a result of the damage James had caused, the Arena was temporarily evacuated while it was evaluated to ensure it wasn't going to collapse into its lower passages. This coupled with Glag's , admittedly temporary, injuries meant that the match was over. With two penalty points against him due to injuring Raend as gruesomely as he had, and Amina with only one from when Glag had sent her flying, she had been declared the victor.

And James had been forced to sign a legal agreement to pay for the damages caused to the arena, or else be arrested until such time as restitution could be made on his behalf. The look on both Commander Tyrius's and the Emperor's face when he casually agreed to pay the cost and used his medallion to sign the papers was almost worth whatever drain was about to hit his bank account. he knew he was rich, though he wasn't certain to what extent. But he was fairly certain even HE would feel a bit of sting from this bill.

It didn't matter though. All things aside James was happy for Amina. She'd wanted to win the tournament pretty badly. Additionally, he wasn't a hundred percent certain he could've fought her all out if it had come down to the two of them, and he definitely wouldn't have wanted to see her face Glag alone, without him. Not in her current state.

The thought of that reminded him that they hadn't had a chance to see a life priestess yet. Things here had moved too... unpredictably... for that. But she was still getting the morning sickness, so there was that.

"Glag. Glag glag glag." The little rock monster said, seemingly happily, as he walked next to and just behind James. Even though he was wearing his medallion, and had been the entire final match, James still didn't understand him. Or it..... or.... whatever the hell Glag was.

After James had been reprimanded and signed the agreement to pay the bill for the arena, Glag had come rushing over from out of the fighting area. It had practically bowled both the Arena official and Commander Tyrius over as it ran to him. It had excitedly grabbed at his hand and jumped up and down. Exclaiming, as always, "Glag!" Excitedly.

James hadn't been able to convince the sentient sedimentary stone creature alone to leave him alone since then. Though he had managed to get it to understand that he didn't need to hold its hand as they walked which it had insisted on doing for the first mile or so.

Still. He didn't have it that bad. At least Glag, while talkative, didn't exactly expect conversation or make demands.

He peered over his shoulder at the large, dagger packing, centaur that was walking alongside Steve.

No amount of protest or debate had convinced Gorna that Amina didn't want anything to do with her. And the centaur woman had vowed to follow

Amina until she had made her decision as to how she wished to fulfill her proposal requirements serving as a servant until that time.

Now she was doing her best, medieval fantasy world version, impression of a member of the secret service. And her president was Amina.

He.... REALLY... hoped that she at least understood the boundary of a bedroom door.

For that matter he hoped Glag did too. And he kind of hoped that Glag didn't view him as some kind of spouse now. He'd have to ask Veliry if she understood rock monster whenever they got back home.

Amina was doing everything in her power to ignore the very existence of the centaur as she rode Steve, smile on her face, waving at the people who greeted her as they passed.

The same people that looked at James like he was a leper and seemed to part for him like the red sea.

At least.... He thought as they rounded a street corner and saw the entrance to the Palace that they needed to use. This place wasn't boring.

\----------

Vickers and De'Lius had just finished setting up the twin bedrooms and storing the two bottomless bags full of food for Five and Driscoll, when the front door of the house resounded with knocks.

"The two that are doing the biting?" Vickers asked. He could smell them, but he knew the Outer Light Commander could smell them better.

"Aye." He said. "I'll finish here. Go ahead and greet them.

Vickers followed the directions without even thinking about it.

On the other side were two people whose appearances he hadn't expected.

One was a tall.... very tall... lightly red furred man(?) in a set of robes that made Vickers think of catholic clergy, if a bit less ornate. He locked eyes with Vickers and his head cocked in a way that seemed utterly alien to him. Then, silently and swiftly he stepped past Vickers and into the house, still looking at him. Vickers backed up unconsciously as his, admittedly muted, animal instincts told him not to take his eyes off the man.

"A night brother." He said in a voice that was deeper than his slender build implied. "You are the one the Council letters told us to meet here."

"Name's Vickers." The SEAL said as he reached out his hand for a shake. The Fox man instinctively pulled back a bit as he stared at the hand. Then he gingerly took the hand and shook.

"Don't mind him." Said a warm, and somewhat old sounding, and rather plump, woman with large eyes and puffy cheeks. Even in her mostly human form she had a massive, bushy, tail. She was wearing an set of coveralls that were coated in flour and bits of food and he got the impression that she was a baker. She practically jittered with manic amounts of energy as she rapidly looked around the room, her massive tail twitching spasmodically.

When she hugged him it both took him by surprise, and made him a little uncomfortable.

"I'm Brin." She said with a smile that revealed a set of oversized buck teeth dominating her otherwise human mouth. "It's nice to meet you Mr. Vickers. Are the people we're converting already here?"

"Not yet." He said. "They should be showing up within the next hour or so. It's.... difficult to move them. Thank you for coming."

"Of course." The fox man said. "I cannot speak to Ms... Brin's... experience. But like the two you requested conversion for, I was saved by being converted."

"Oh I just converted so I could keep up with the man I ended up marryin'." Brin said cheerily.

Vickers nodded awkwardly at the two short stories. "Well. Thanks anyways." He said. "The Commander and I are still putting the finishing touches on the rooms for 'em. Take a seat, get comfortable. I imagine we'll know when they get here."

A little over forty five minutes later Vickers was proven right.

A loud rumbling preceded the wagons that were being used to transport the two muck marchers. They'd been encased in a pair of heavy duty gurneys that had rigid plastic canopies over them, keeping out the germs of the world around them.

"Oh my." Brin said as she nervously followed Vickers outside to greet them.

The wagons stopped just short of the door and the three remaining Toolies, accompanied by several out of uniform Earth soldiers and a pair of Petravian guards that had their restraint controls, began helping them get the gurneys down. A few minutes later they were being wheeled into the building.

"What are they?" The fox man, who had never given Vickers his name, asked.

"They're human." Commander De'Lius said as he looked at them curiously. "And....." His head cocked to the side, putting his left ear closer to the two pods. "Machines. And they are dying. Just as Chief Vickers' entreaty said."

"I wasn't lying." Vickers said defensively.

"I did not say you were." The old wolf said absently. "But you were most assuredly understating. How do they live?"

"We stick around talking much longer and they probably won't." Vickers said somewhat testily. "Let's get this done."

The lead Toolie, an older man by the name of Andrei Piotris stepped forward.

"Chief. Are you sure about this?" He asked with his hands up to stop Vickers. He looked over at the fox and squirrel. "I mean. Are you sure this is the best move?"

Vickers was about to reply, even reaching up to press the mans hands back down and gently move him aside. Then a hand weakly tapped at the inside of one of the pods.

Five was looking at the toolie.

>!"It's all good P."!< She said so softly that even Vickers' keener than normal hearing barely picked anything up. But the shaky thumbs up she held up was signal enough.

Then the hand fell back weakly as Five's eyes glassed over again.

Piotris seemed to deflate.

Vickers placed a hand on his shoulder.

"It's a shot at living." He said as the toolie looked at him. "The only shot really." He turned back to the Commander. "Help me get em out of the pods and into the rooms?"

De'Lius looked at him curiously for a moment. Then nodded.

"Poor things." Brin said. "Barely even living. Cut in half like that."

"It is a grotesqueness that I am amazed the gods even allowed to exist." The fox agreed, though Brin's glance at him implied that that was NOT what she had meant.

Less than ten minutes later and as the wagons, now filled only with the Earth and Petravian soldiers and the empty gurney pods, returned to the castle. Vickers and the other were-folk present, listened to the two Muck Marchers screaming as their bodies began attempting to violently rearrange themselves.

Vickers regretted the keen senses he'd been given.

A simplified shotgun, made with some spare parts from the little mage's supplies, sat on his lap. Four impromptu shells loaded with silver buckshot, made of chopped up silver coins, sat on the small table next to him.

Just in case.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1241y8v/wait_is_this_just_gate_336/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (335/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Tuuurn and face the strange! Cha-Cha-Changes!

Enjoy.

\~

James trudged as he and Amina walked back to the airship.

Partly because they had, politely yet definitively, been asked to leave Vatria.

Partly because he'd almost single handedly ended the tournament but was NOT the champion of it.

And partly because he and Amina had two tag-alongs following them.

Amina, despite everything else was beaming with pride and a smile as she sat on top of Steve as James guided him through the streets of the capital towards the end of the palace grounds where her sister and the ambassador had docked the air ship. Around her neck was a loosely draped neck-piece made of a combinations of emeralds and sapphires, wrought in a bright silver. It was the tournament's version of a laurel or wreath. She also had a hefty bag of gold and silver stored in her bottomless bag now. Not that she was hurting for money.

On her back was the enchanted hammer that Raend had been using throughout the tournament. She'd stopped by to see the poor mercenary after the fight had concluded, and as the arena healers were busy trying to heal his leg. She'd offered to leave the hammer near him, but the brutally injured man had told her to get the hell away from him, and sworn off fighting for the rest of his life, so she'd held onto it.

James on the other hand, had not gotten off so lucky.

He'd been disqualified for breaking the flight ceiling set in the tournament's rules.

He had also caused an obscene amount of damage to the arena itself.

He'd gained two more penalty flags for how badly he'd damaged Glag, who had needed to be stabilized by several of the arena mages, and fed some of the broken bits of his own body so he could use them to regenerate. The sandstone creature hadn't been disqualified for breaking the ceiling since he hadn't done so of his own accord, but rather as the result of an opponent's attack.

As a result of the damage James had caused, the Arena was temporarily evacuated while it was evaluated to ensure it wasn't going to collapse into its lower passages. This coupled with Glag's , admittedly temporary, injuries meant that the match was over. With two penalty points against him due to injuring Raend as gruesomely as he had, and Amina with only one from when Glag had sent her flying, she had been declared the victor.

And James had been forced to sign a legal agreement to pay for the damages caused to the arena, or else be arrested until such time as restitution could be made on his behalf. The look on both Commander Tyrius's and the Emperor's face when he casually agreed to pay the cost and used his medallion to sign the papers was almost worth whatever drain was about to hit his bank account. he knew he was rich, though he wasn't certain to what extent. But he was fairly certain even HE would feel a bit of sting from this bill.

It didn't matter though. All things aside James was happy for Amina. She'd wanted to win the tournament pretty badly. Additionally, he wasn't a hundred percent certain he could've fought her all out if it had come down to the two of them, and he definitely wouldn't have wanted to see her face Glag alone, without him. Not in her current state.

The thought of that reminded him that they hadn't had a chance to see a life priestess yet. Things here had moved too... unpredictably... for that. But she was still getting the morning sickness, so there was that.

"Glag. Glag glag glag." The little rock monster said, seemingly happily, as he walked next to and just behind James. Even though he was wearing his medallion, and had been the entire final match, James still didn't understand him. Or it..... or.... whatever the hell Glag was.

After James had been reprimanded and signed the agreement to pay the bill for the arena, Glag had come rushing over from out of the fighting area. It had practically bowled both the Arena official and Commander Tyrius over as it ran to him. It had excitedly grabbed at his hand and jumped up and down. Exclaiming, as always, "Glag!" Excitedly.

James hadn't been able to convince the sentient sedimentary stone creature alone to leave him alone since then. Though he had managed to get it to understand that he didn't need to hold its hand as they walked which it had insisted on doing for the first mile or so.

Still. He didn't have it that bad. At least Glag, while talkative, didn't exactly expect conversation or make demands.

He peered over his shoulder at the large, dagger packing, centaur that was walking alongside Steve.

No amount of protest or debate had convinced Gorna that Amina didn't want anything to do with her. And the centaur woman had vowed to follow Amina until she had made her decision as to how she wished to fulfill her proposal requirements serving as a servant until that time.

Now she was doing her best, medieval fantasy world version, impression of a member of the secret service. And her president was Amina.

He.... REALLY... hoped that she at least understood the boundary of a bedroom door.

For that matter he hoped Glag did too. And he kind of hoped that Glag didn't view him as some kind of spouse now. He'd have to ask Veliry if she understood rock monster whenever they got back home.

Amina was doing everything in her power to ignore the very existence of the centaur as she rode Steve, smile on her face, waving at the people who greeted her as they passed.

The same people that looked at James like he was a leper and seemed to part for him like the red sea.

At least.... He thought as they rounded a street corner and saw the entrance to the Palace that they needed to use. This place wasn't boring.

\----------

Vickers and De'Lius had just finished setting up the twin bedrooms and storing the two bottomless bags full of food for Five and Driscoll, when the front door of the house resounded with knocks.

"The two that are doing the biting?" Vickers asked. He could smell them, but he knew the Outer Light Commander could smell them better.

"Aye." He said. "I'll finish here. Go ahead and greet them.

Vickers followed the directions without even thinking about it.

On the other side were two people whose appearances he hadn't expected.

One was a tall.... very tall... lightly red furred man(?) in a set of robes that made Vickers think of catholic clergy, if a bit less ornate. He locked eyes with Vickers and his head cocked in a way that seemed utterly alien to him. Then, silently and swiftly he stepped past Vickers and into the house, still looking at him. Vickers backed up unconsciously as his, admittedly muted, animal instincts told him not to take his eyes off the man.

"A night brother." He said in a voice that was deeper than his slender build implied. "You are the one the Council letters told us to meet here."

"Name's Vickers." The SEAL said as he reached out his hand for a shake. The Fox man instinctively pulled back a bit as he stared at the hand. Then he gingerly took the hand and shook.

"Don't mind him." Said a warm, and somewhat old sounding, and rather plump, woman with large eyes and puffy cheeks. Even in her mostly human form she had a massive, bushy, tail. She was wearing an set of coveralls that were coated in flour and bits of food and he got the impression that she was a baker. She practically jittered with manic amounts of energy as she rapidly looked around the room, her massive tail twitching spasmodically.

When she hugged him it both took him by surprise, and made him a little uncomfortable.

"I'm Brin." She said with a smile that revealed a set of oversized buck teeth dominating her otherwise human mouth. "It's nice to meet you Mr. Vickers. Are the people we're converting already here?"

"Not yet." He said. "They should be showing up within the next hour or so. It's.... difficult to move them. Thank you for coming."

"Of course." The fox man said. "I cannot speak to Ms... Brin's... experience. But like the two you requested conversion for, I was saved by being converted."

"Oh I just converted so I could keep up with the man I ended up marryin'." Brin said cheerily.

Vickers nodded awkwardly at the two short stories. "Well. Thanks anyways." He said. "The Commander and I are still putting the finishing touches on the rooms for 'em. Take a seat, get comfortable. I imagine we'll know when they get here."

A little over forty five minutes later Vickers was proven right.

A loud rumbling preceded the wagons that were being used to transport the two muck marchers. They'd been encased in a pair of heavy duty gurneys that had rigid plastic canopies over them, keeping out the germs of the world around them.

"Oh my." Brin said as she nervously followed Vickers outside to greet them.

The wagons stopped just short of the door and the three remaining Toolies, accompanied by several out of uniform Earth soldiers and a pair of Petravian guards that had their restraint controls, began helping them get the gurneys down. A few minutes later they were being wheeled into the building.

"What are they?" The fox man, who had never given Vickers his name, asked.

"They're human." Commander De'Lius said as he looked at them curiously. "And....." His head cocked to the side, putting his left ear closer to the two pods. "Machines. And they are dying. Just as Chief Vickers' entreaty said."

"I wasn't lying." Vickers said defensively.

"I did not say you were." The old wolf said absently. "But you were most assuredly understating. How do they live?"

"We stick around talking much longer and they probably won't." Vickers said somewhat testily. "Let's get this done."

The lead Toolie, an older man by the name of Andrei Piotris stepped forward.

"Chief. Are you sure about this?" He asked with his hands up to stop Vickers. He looked over at the fox and squirrel. "I mean. Are you sure this is the best move?"

Vickers was about to reply, even reaching up to press the mans hands back down and gently move him aside. Then a hand weakly tapped at the inside of one of the pods.

Five was looking at the toolie.

>!"It's all good P."!< She said so softly that even Vickers' keener than normal hearing barely picked anything up. But the shaky thumbs up she held up was signal enough.

Then the hand fell back weakly as Five's eyes glassed over again.

Piotris seemed to deflate.

Vickers placed a hand on his shoulder.

"It's a shot at living." He said as the toolie looked at him. "The only shot really." He turned back to the Commander. "Help me get em out of the pods and into the rooms?"

De'Lius looked at him curiously for a moment. Then nodded.

"Poor things." Brin said. "Barely even living. Cut in half like that."

"It is a grotesqueness that I am amazed the gods even allowed to exist." The fox agreed, though Brin's glance at him implied that that was NOT what she had meant.

Less than ten minutes later and as the wagons, now filled only with the Earth and Petravian soldiers and the empty gurney pods, returned to the castle. Vickers and the other were-folk present, listened to the two Muck Marchers screaming as their bodies began attempting to violently rearrange themselves.

Vickers regretted the keen senses he'd been given.

A simplified shotgun, made with some spare parts from the little mage's supplies, sat on his lap. Four impromptu shells loaded with silver buckshot, made of chopped up silver coins, sat on the small table next to him.

Just in case.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1241tf3/wait_is_this_just_gate_336/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (334/?)

Previous

Samantha stepped out of the van hesitantly. Behind her three of the other werewolves from the hospital followed suit. It was near the new moon, so their bodies were as close to human as they could be. They still had slight snouts, and their ears were still higher than they would normally be, and mildly pointed. Their legs were still jointed like that of a wolf, but less noticeably.

Still, they wore the baggy, form concealing, sweatpants and hoodies that the hospital had supplied them with.

She stretched her legs and arms as far as they would go. Her joints didn't crackle or pop like they'd used to. But they'd driven for nearly two hours before arriving here, at a small lake that the government had cordoned off for their private use today. Unlike the others present, her military training made her acutely aware that there were likely drones somewhere keeping an eye on them in case they ran or something.

Her thoughts were quickly pushed aside as the first deep breath of fresh air, wild grass and woods, and lake water rode the wind into her nose. Even in her mostly human form her sense of smell was significantly better than normal.

Then she heard deep breaths being taken very close by. She opened her eyes and was surprised to see the other three standing beside, and a little behind, her also taking in deep scents with closed eyes like she just had.

She heard a rustling of plastic and paper and looked over to the van. The hospital lawyer, Mr. Richard Fletcher, and one of the doctors of one of the other werewolves present, a Dr. Esteves, were pulling a cooler and some supplies out of the back of the van. By habit, she made her way over to help.

Then she smelled something that made her senses go wild with hunger. It was apparent from the sudden shifting of feet behind her that the others had smelled it too.

"Ah dammit." Dr. Esteves said as he shook pinkish juices off of his sleeve. "Damn burger bag must've had a hole in it."

"Ms. Jenkins?" Fletcher asked curiously. "You okay? Are.... any of you okay?"

Samantha shook her head a bit. "Sorry." She said somewhat bashfully. "Just... a lot of smells out here. That raw beef smells.... good."

Through the open doors of the van she saw the doctor's eyes widen as he realized that he was covered in something the wolves wanted.

"We're good." She said. Then she looked back as one of the other three stepped up to almost even with her. "WE'RE.... GOOD." She said slowly but firmly, directing it at the younger wolf.

He was just a high schooler who'd been unfortunate enough to be in Sturgis on a roadtrip with his parents and younger sister when the incident had occurred. He was an orphan now.

"Yeah." The young man, Bradley, said as he flicked his nose a few times. "Sorry."

"It's all good." Fletcher said with only a mild hint of uncertainty. "Doc'll clean his hands off in a bit. And we'll make sure to keep some of the burgers a bit rare for you guys. It'll be a bit though. Why don't you guys roam a bit? Just remember the rules."

Then something unexpected occurred.

Something made one of the branches of a nearby tree move as it chattered noisily. Even with their reduced size and abilities, Samantha's ears, and all the ears of the other werewolves, instinctively attempted to turn to listen. Their heads snapped in that direction in unison that would have made military Honor Guard members jealous.

The squirrel chattered at them noisily from its branch as it picked at something, and something inside her told her that it was angry at having intruders on its territory.

That didn't matter to any of them as they quickly, quietly, and wordlessly began fanning out and slowly approached the tree it was in.

"Thaaaaat's not terrifying at all." Dr. Esteves said quietly.

Fletcher looked over his shoulder at the doctor. "You should probably hurry up about washing your hands." He said seriously.

Then he pulled out his phone and texted Dr. Munro.

>You were right. She's the leader of the pack.

\---------------------------

James groaned as hauled the chain-bound Glag into the sky. Jets of magically powered energy blasting from the bottoms of his feet as he channeled more and more power from the surrounding into his body and out of their soles.

Below him, Glag's semi-amorphous sandstone form writhed and wriggled, new limbs sprouting, seemingly at random as they struggled with the enchanted chain and the three blades pinning them onto him. But James had intentionally worked the chain so that in it's numerous loops around the elemental combatant it had formed simple knots. Additionally, while Glag eventually managed to loose Amina's dagger, it struggled with her sword. Curiously it seemed unaware that James's enchanted sword was even there.

Higher and higher they went. James looked back every few seconds to check on Glag and make sure that he hadn't managed to loose himself yet. Each time the arena got smaller, and smaller, and smaller. Eventually even the imperial palace began to look small, and it was nearly a mile across in either direction.

"Okay." He said with a grunt as he struggled to slow, then hover. "I think that's high enough." He looked down at the stone creature struggling below. It had managed to get a few lengths of chain loose, and was now hanging some twenty feet below instead of the ten or so that it had been when James had lifted off. But he still had at least another fifty feet of chain left before he was free, and James's sword was still embedded deeply into its side.

"GLAAAAG!" It bellowed at him angrily, its two large black eyes focused on him.

"Yeah glag you to bud." He shot back. "Wanna be back with your friends again?" He asked.

"GLAG?"

"Cool." James said as he blasted down past Glag, to the end of the chain, then under and back up. Glag wobbled a bit from the sudden redirection, and James used the shift in weight to begin swinging him back and forth, with each swing growing in angle and speed.

It took a minute or so, but eventually James was able to get the bundle of rock monster swinging enough that he was able to use his strength to swing him into a loop over him.

"Glaaaaaaa------aaaaaaGGG!" The confused thing yelled as it began to loop around James faster and faster. Parts of it began to crack and flake off as it was pressed into the magical chain by centrifugal gravity.

"DING!" James exclaimed loudly as he got the spin going about as fast as his equilibrium could handle. "EXPRESS ELEVATOR GOING DOWN! FIRST FLOOR! APPLIANCES! FURNITURE! MASSIVE CHUNKS OF BROKEN BOULDER!"

And as Glag attempted to speak his singular phrase once more in confusion, James released him like an old fashioned slingshot straight down.

"GLAAAAAAAAAAAAA^(AAAAAAAAgggggg!")

James paused for a second as he watched the elemental hurtle toward the ground. He took just a moment to get his stomach back in place.

"Oh that was a lot of spinning." He said to himself. Then he looked down. "Should probably make sure I aimed that right.

He flipped himself over with a quick burst from his feet.

BOOM!

And he began chasing the new asteroid known as Glag.

\----------

Amina craned her head up and back as she watched the sky. She wasn't the only one. Not even close.

She was effecctively the only combatant left in the arena at this point, Raend having quickly been retrieved by several of the arena staff and dragged back into the tunnels leading out so he could be attended by healers.

Glag's place on the announcers stand now had two flags in it as a result of the penalty his injury to the hammer wielding mercenary. Even now Amina hefted the massive, enchanted, hammer in her hands. She swung it up and down lazily so that it would strike the ground near her feet, keeping its enchantment active by extending it with each strike. She wanted it ready in case this didn't work against the Glag.

Something glinted in the sky above, and a faint noise could be heard coming from it.

"It's them!" Someone in the crowd exclaimed. She glanced that way and saw a were-eagle staring up at the object. Their eyes were much stronger than anyone else's, and sure enough a few others like them began sounding off with confirming exclamations.

Obviously. She thought. Who or what else would it be?

James wasn't going to be happy about the results of the impending attack. The announcer had made the statement of it only a few seconds after James and the trailing Glag had lifted off into the sky.

But at least she'd be champion. Assuming she could defeat the Glag in the few moments before it recovered. And that was assuming it COULD recover from this.

^("AAAAAAAAAA)AAAAAAAAAGGGG!!!" They all heard from above.

From where he was standing in his viewing box, the Emperor began to sign furiously to the arena mages. His translator gave the command in a yell.

"GET THE ARENA SHIELDS UP NOW!" She demanded in a tone that Amina hadn't heard her use the day before.

Amina's eyes went wide as she saw how fast the Glag was hurtling towards the ground. Then she saw the twin Jets of James's flying magic burning out from behind it and realized that he was PUSHING THE DAMN THING!

"JAMES YOU UTTER BAS-" She yelled to nobody in particular before dashing behind one of the few remaining pillars, ducking down behind her shield, and raising a magical shield on top of that, though she'd never been terribly good at conjuring them.

Amina had felt her share of insanely overpowered impacts in her life. She'd been hit in combat by creatures that could crush a man with a single blow, and been saved only by skill, luck, and armor.

She'd been on the receiving end of attacks by siege weapons of all kinds, including trebuchets. Though she'd only been NEAR the landing spot for the latter, and only so that she and a few of her fellow sergeants at the time could be familiar with what an impact from one of them was like in case they ever needed to maintain their bearing during a siege.

Then of course there had been the battles of Jadesport and, more directly, the battle in the desert, where she'd been yards away from the impact point of the insanely devastating earth weapons known as thermobarics.

Somehow, none of them compared to the sheer violence and destructive power that her husband caused when he, in the last hundred feet or so of his descent, released Glag to unleash havoc upon the arena below.

At first there was no noise save the confused and seemingly terrified, if such a thing were possible, cry of Glag as he yelled "GLAG!?!?!" one last time.

Then there was a cracking, rumbling, echoing thunder.

Amina felt her feet lurch beneath her as the entire ground seemed to suddenly drop an inch or so, causing her to stumble and her magical shield to fizzle out for a moment before she regained herself.

Cries of fear, confusion, and surprise roared up from the crowd, even as bits of stone shrapnel exploded out. They pattered and pinged off of the column Amina was hiding behind, and her shield and armor, as they ricocheted all over the place. But where they might have struck crowd members, they were instead deflected by the shield that the Arena mages had erected.

Dust and sand billowed throughout the arena in an explosion of particulates.

There was a shocked silence afterword, only broken by the low wooshing noise that was emanating from James's feet as he hovered some fifty feet off the ground. He had his hands on his hips, and his face bore a massive grin.

Amina stood up from where she'd been taking cover, then lurched as a loud cracking noise emanated from the ground.

Both of them looked at the crater that the Glag had impacted. A massive crack had spread from it towards one of the arena walls.

"James you imbecile!" Amina scolded him. "Why did you take him so bleeding high up? You've broken into the Arena's sub-floors!"

James pointed at the crater. "What? I was tryin' to break the tough sonufabitch!" He yelled back defensively.

"You broke the fucking Arena!" She shot back. "Get the hell down here!"

"CAPTAIN CHOI!" The voice of Commander Tyrius boomed from next to the Emperor and his translator. "CEASE THIS FOOLISHNESS AT ONCE! YOU HAVE BEEN DISQUALIFIED FROM THIS TOURNAMENT!" He demanded. "EXIT THROUGH WHAT'S LEFT OF THE FIGHTER'S TUNNEL IMMEDIATELY!"

"What?!" James asked in confusion as he lowered to the, now uneven, ground and stopped flying.

"James you idiot!" Amina yelled as she cuffed him on the neck. "You forgot the gods damned flight ceiling!"

James's face went blank as he was suddenly, and violently, reminded of the rules briefing before the tournament had started. All of the fighters had been required to attend. Contestants who could fly were limited to the height of the arena's banners, which was roughly one hundred feet off the ground, to keep them from simply staying out of their opponents range and casting spells or loosing arrows at them. At the time even he had admitted to himself that it would have been boring to watch fights like that.

"Oh." He said sullenly. "Dammit."

"Oh?" Amina asked sarcastically. "Just Oh?"

"My baaaaad." James said as he slunk past her and towards the tunnel in question.

^("Glaaaaag?") The shattered, and incredibly confused elemental said weakly from where he was stuck half embedded in one of the animal cages kept beneath the arena. Even unable to understand the creature's monosyllabic speech, everyone who heard it could hear how scared and confused it was.

As James sulked his way out of the arena like a dog with its tail between it's legs, Amina ran over with several of the Arena staff to try to figure out how bad the damage was.

To the arena and Glag.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11zxv7u/wait_is_this_just_gate_335/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (334/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look. Jenkins. Cool.

Also, once a lower enlisted, always a lower enlisted. Aint nothin they can't fuck up.

Enjoy.

\~

Samantha stepped out of the van hesitantly. Behind her three of the other werewolves from the hospital followed suit. It was near the new moon, so their bodies were as close to human as they could be. They still had slight snouts, and their ears were still higher than they would normally be, and mildly pointed. Their legs were still jointed like that of a wolf, but less noticeably.

Still, they wore the baggy, form concealing, sweatpants and hoodies that the hospital had supplied them with.

She stretched her legs and arms as far as they would go. Her joints didn't crackle or pop like they'd used to. But they'd driven for nearly two hours before arriving here, at a small lake that the government had cordoned off for their private use today. Unlike the others present, her military training made her acutely aware that there were likely drones somewhere keeping an eye on them in case they ran or something.

Her thoughts were quickly pushed aside as the first deep breath of fresh air, wild grass and woods, and lake water rode the wind into her nose. Even in her mostly human form her sense of smell was significantly better than normal.

Then she heard deep breaths being taken very close by. She opened her eyes and was surprised to see the other three standing beside, and a little behind, her also taking in deep scents with closed eyes like she just had.

She heard a rustling of plastic and paper and looked over to the van. The hospital lawyer, Mr. Richard Fletcher, and one of the doctors of one of the other werewolves present, a Dr. Esteves, were pulling a cooler and some supplies out of the back of the van. By habit, she made her way over to help.

Then she smelled something that made her senses go wild with hunger. It was apparent from the sudden shifting of feet behind her that the others had smelled it too.

"Ah dammit." Dr. Esteves said as he shook pinkish juices off of his sleeve. "Damn burger bag must've had a hole in it."

"Ms. Jenkins?" Fletcher asked curiously. "You okay? Are.... any of you okay?"

Samantha shook her head a bit. "Sorry." She said somewhat bashfully. "Just... a lot of smells out here. That raw beef smells.... good."

Through the open doors of the van she saw the doctor's eyes widen as he realized that he was covered in something the wolves wanted.

"We're good." She said. Then she looked back as one of the other three stepped up to almost even with her. "WE'RE.... GOOD." She said slowly but firmly, directing it at the younger wolf.

He was just a high schooler who'd been unfortunate enough to be in Sturgis on a roadtrip with his parents and younger sister when the incident had occurred. He was an orphan now.

"Yeah." The young man, Bradley, said as he flicked his nose a few times. "Sorry."

"It's all good." Fletcher said with only a mild hint of uncertainty. "Doc'll clean his hands off in a bit. And we'll make sure to keep some of the burgers a bit rare for you guys. It'll be a bit though. Why don't you guys roam a bit? Just remember the rules."

Then something unexpected occurred.

Something made one of the branches of a nearby tree move as it chattered noisily. Even with their reduced size and abilities, Samantha's ears, and all the ears of the other werewolves, instinctively attempted to turn to listen. Their heads snapped in that direction in unison that would have made military Honor Guard members jealous.

The squirrel chattered at them noisily from its branch as it picked at something, and something inside her told her that it was angry at having intruders on its territory.

That didn't matter to any of them as they quickly, quietly, and wordlessly began fanning out and slowly approached the tree it was in.

"Thaaaaat's not terrifying at all." Dr. Esteves said quietly.

Fletcher looked over his shoulder at the doctor. "You should probably hurry up about washing your hands." He said seriously.

Then he pulled out his phone and texted Dr. Munro.

>You were right. She's the leader of the pack.

\---

James groaned as hauled the chain-bound Glag into the sky. Jets of magically powered energy blasting from the bottoms of his feet as he channeled more and more power from the surrounding into his body and out of their soles.

Below him, Glag's semi-amorphous sandstone form writhed and wriggled, new limbs sprouting, seemingly at random as they struggled with the enchanted chain and the three blades pinning them onto him. But James had intentionally worked the chain so that in it's numerous loops around the elemental combatant it had formed simple knots. Additionally, while Glag eventually managed to loose Amina's dagger, it struggled with her sword. Curiously it seemed unaware that James's enchanted sword was even there.

Higher and higher they went. James looked back every few seconds to check on Glag and make sure that he hadn't managed to loose himself yet. Each time the arena got smaller, and smaller, and smaller. Eventually even the imperial palace began to look small, and it was nearly a mile across in either direction.

"Okay." He said with a grunt as he struggled to slow, then hover. "I think that's high enough." He looked down at the stone creature struggling below. It had managed to get a few lengths of chain loose, and was now hanging some twenty feet below instead of the ten or so that it had been when James had lifted off. But he still had at least another fifty feet of chain left before he was free, and James's sword was still embedded deeply into its side.

"GLAAAAG!" It bellowed at him angrily, its two large black eyes focused on him.

"Yeah glag you to bud." He shot back. "Wanna be back with your friends again?" He asked.

"GLAG?"

"Cool." James said as he blasted down past Glag, to the end of the chain, then under and back up. Glag wobbled a bit from the sudden redirection, and James used the shift in weight to begin swinging him back and forth, with each swing growing in angle and speed.

It took a minute or so, but eventually James was able to get the bundle of rock monster swinging enough that he was able to use his strength to swing him into a loop over him.

"Glaaaaaaa------aaaaaaGGG!" The confused thing yelled as it began to loop around James faster and faster. Parts of it began to crack and flake off as it was pressed into the magical chain by centrifugal gravity.

"DING!" James exclaimed loudly as he got the spin going about as fast as his equilibrium could handle. "EXPRESS ELEVATOR GOING DOWN! FIRST FLOOR! APPLIANCES! FURNITURE! MASSIVE CHUNKS OF BROKEN BOULDER!"

And as Glag attempted to speak his singular phrase once more in confusion, James released him like an old fashioned slingshot straight down.

"GLAAAAAAAAAAAAA^(AAAAAAAAgggggg!")

James paused for a second as he watched the elemental hurtle toward the ground. He took just a moment to get his stomach back in place.

"Oh that was a lot of spinning." He said to himself. Then he looked down. "Should probably make sure I aimed that right.

He flipped himself over with a quick burst from his feet.

BOOM!

And he began chasing the new asteroid known as Glag.

\----------

Amina craned her head up and back as she watched the sky. She wasn't the only one. Not even close.

She was effecctively the only combatant left in the arena at this point, Raend having quickly been retrieved by several of the arena staff and dragged back into the tunnels leading out so he could be attended by healers.

Glag's place on the announcers stand now had two flags in it as a result of the penalty his injury to the hammer wielding mercenary. Even now Amina hefted the massive, enchanted, hammer in her hands. She swung it up and down lazily so that it would strike the ground near her feet, keeping its enchantment active by extending it with each strike. She wanted it ready in case this didn't work against the Glag.

Something glinted in the sky above, and a faint noise could be heard coming from it.

"It's them!" Someone in the crowd exclaimed. She glanced that way and saw a were-eagle staring up at the object. Their eyes were much stronger than anyone else's, and sure enough a few others like them began sounding off with confirming exclamations.

Obviously. She thought. Who or what else would it be?

James wasn't going to be happy about the results of the impending attack. The announcer had made the statement of it only a few seconds after James and the trailing Glag had lifted off into the sky.

But at least she'd be champion. Assuming she could defeat the Glag in the few moments before it recovered. And that was assuming it COULD recover from this.

^("AAAAAAAAAA)AAAAAAAAAGGGG!!!" They all heard from above.

From where he was standing in his viewing box, the Emperor began to sign furiously to the arena mages. His translator gave the command in a yell.

"GET THE ARENA SHIELDS UP NOW!" She demanded in a tone that Amina hadn't heard her use the day before.

Amina's eyes went wide as she saw how fast the Glag was hurtling towards the ground. Then she saw the twin Jets of James's flying magic burning out from behind it and realized that he was PUSHING THE DAMN THING!

"JAMES YOU UTTER BAS-" She yelled to nobody in particular before dashing behind one of the few remaining pillars, ducking down behind her shield, and raising a magical shield on top of that, though she'd never been terribly good at conjuring them.

Amina had felt her share of insanely overpowered impacts in her life. She'd been hit in combat by creatures that could crush a man with a single blow, and been saved only by skill, luck, and armor.

She'd been on the receiving end of attacks by siege weapons of all kinds, including trebuchets. Though she'd only been NEAR the landing spot for the latter, and only so that she and a few of her fellow sergeants at the time could be familiar with what an impact from one of them was like in case they ever needed to maintain their bearing during a siege.

Then of course there had been the battles of Jadesport and, more directly, the battle in the desert, where she'd been yards away from the impact point of the insanely devastating earth weapons known as thermobarics.

Somehow, none of them compared to the sheer violence and destructive power that her husband caused when he, in the last hundred feet or so of his descent, released Glag to unleash havoc upon the arena below.

At first there was no noise save the confused and seemingly terrified, if such a thing were possible, cry of Glag as he yelled "GLAG!?!?!" one last time.

Then there was a cracking, rumbling, echoing thunder.

Amina felt her feet lurch beneath her as the entire ground seemed to suddenly drop an inch or so, causing her to stumble and her magical shield to fizzle out for a moment before she regained herself.

Cries of fear, confusion, and surprise roared up from the crowd, even as bits of stone shrapnel exploded out. They pattered and pinged off of the column Amina was hiding behind, and her shield and armor, as they ricocheted all over the place. But where they might have struck crowd members, they were instead deflected by the shield that the Arena mages had erected.

Dust and sand billowed throughout the arena in an explosion of particulates.

There was a shocked silence afterword, only broken by the low wooshing noise that was emanating from James's feet as he hovered some fifty feet off the ground. He had his hands on his hips, and his face bore a massive grin.

Amina stood up from where she'd been taking cover, then lurched as a loud cracking noise emanated from the ground.

Both of them looked at the crater that the Glag had impacted. A massive crack had spread from it towards one of the arena walls.

"James you imbecile!" Amina scolded him. "Why did you take him so bleeding high up? You've broken into the Arena's sub-floors!"

James pointed at the crater. "What? I was tryin' to break the tough sonufabitch!" He yelled back defensively.

"You broke the fucking Arena!" She shot back. "Get the hell down here!"

"CAPTAIN CHOI!" The voice of Commander Tyrius boomed from next to the Emperor and his translator. "CEASE THIS FOOLISHNESS AT ONCE! YOU HAVE BEEN DISQUALIFIED FROM THIS TOURNAMENT!" He demanded. "EXIT THROUGH WHAT'S LEFT OF THE FIGHTER'S TUNNEL IMMEDIATELY!"

"What?!" James asked in confusion as he lowered to the, now uneven, ground and stopped flying.

"James you idiot!" Amina yelled as she cuffed him on the neck. "You forgot the gods damned flight ceiling!"

James's face went blank as he was suddenly, and violently, reminded of the rules briefing before the tournament had started. All of the fighters had been required to attend. Contestants who could fly were limited to the height of the arena's banners, which was roughly one hundred feet off the ground, to keep them from simply staying out of their opponents range and casting spells or loosing arrows at them. At the time even he had admitted to himself that it would have been boring to watch fights like that.

"Oh." He said sullenly. "Dammit."

"Oh?" Amina asked sarcastically. "Just Oh?"

"My baaaaad." James said as he slunk past her and towards the tunnel in question.

^("Glaaaaag?") The shattered, and incredibly confused elemental said weakly from where he was stuck half embedded in one of the animal cages kept beneath the arena. Even unable to understand the creature's monosyllabic speech, everyone who heard it could hear how scared and confused it was.

As James sulked his way out of the arena like a dog with its tail between it's legs, Amina ran over with several of the Arena staff to try to figure out how bad the damage was.

To the arena and Glag

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11zxsxq/wait_is_this_just_gate_335/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (333/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Who needs to clean a shotgun when you can drive nails into solid wood with nothing but your hands?

And once again; Big CGI action sequence. Gotta love em.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

them under his care he hadn't been given very much information about them besides what was deemed necessary. "Plus one of them tried to kill me a few months ago. Didn't work out for her."

"Is she the one that is near death?"

"Ya." Vickers said simply.

"Is that fight why?" De'Lius followed up.

"Ya."

"Hmm." The Commander said.

The two of them worked in silence for several more minutes. Pressing the mesh in place then driving in nails to hold it. Then changing position and repeating.

"So um...." Vickers began after the silence had drawn on long enough to feel awkward. "What did uh... Atrafar tell you? About me?"

De'Lius paused for a moment. Then resumed working.

"Only that she'd converted a man from another world. That his were-form manifested into a night brother. And that he was remarkably apt at adjusting to his new body." The old wolf said as he drove in another nail with the pad of his thumb. "Said that he was one of the few people she'd ever met who could keep up with her in a fight even before he'd converted, and that she was curious to how capable he would be AFTER converting."

Vickers considered that for a few moments. It was true that the two of them had bonded over their ability to fight. Hell, their first night together had been right after spending several hours in a tavern's fighting ring, winning gold for beating people up.

"Yeah. That sounds like her alright." Vickers said. "Ever the warrior."

"She also wrote about how you saved her in the battle of the Druidic Forrest." De'Lius added. "And only a week or so after having been converted."

"That's... also accurate." Vickers said.

"All in all she seemed quite taken with you." De'Lius admitted.

"She did?" Vickers asked.

De'Lius stopped what he was doing and turned to face Vickers. Vickers in turn pulled the last two nails from his mouth and turned to match.

"Mister Vickers. I raised my daughter to be a warrior and follow in my footsteps. If she admits being impressed with someone's combat and survival abilities then it's as good as admitting she has a crush on them." The large wolf said. "She's a grown woman. Who she lies with or doesn't is no business of mine. A few years ago it might have been if it began interfering with her duties to the Outer Light. But, I'm retired."

"She didn't ask you to come here and help me?" Vickers wondered.

"She doesn't even know I'm here." De'Lius revealed. "She and the Conversion party still have another three or four towns to visit before their current circuit is completed and they head back to the Lunar Council City. The Council simply asked me to reactivate for a few weeks to come here, oversee an emergency conversion, and then return back to my home. My employers in Jadesport needed some of their goods delivered to the capital for distribution, and as their Head of Security I was allowed to come along as escort."

"Huh." Vickers said. The whole thing made sense to him. Minus one part. "I thought that service to the Outer Light was for life." He said. "Didn't know you could retire."

"For most that is the case." De'Lius confirmed. "Standard term of service is two centuries. Most Outer Light members are either killed or maimed beyond serviceability well before then. It's a dangerous job. I just got lucky is all."

"Did you say two centuries?" Vickers asked in surprise.

"Yes." De'Lius confirmed. "My family line is descended of elves and giants." He said with a gesture at his immense size. "Couple that with the regenerative properties of being a second generation member of the folk and I will likely live another century and a half. Maybe two. Assuming my current job doesn't get me killed."

"And Atrafar?" Vickers wondered.

"Eh." The old wolf huffed. "Her mother was descended from humans and dwarves. "She's a bit of a runt as a result. But she'll still live at least two, two and a half maybe." Then he saw the surprised expression on Vickers' face. "Relax. Even as a human you'll probably get a century and a half. So long as nothing kills ya first."

"Huh." Vickers grunted. He'd known about the extension of life. It made sense with the regeneration stuff. But he hadn't expected it to be THAT much of an extension.

"Come." De'Lius said. "We are nearly done with this room." He said as he pressed the last nail in place for his wall and began walking out to grab the supplies for the next room. "Tell me about these two you intend to convert."

Vickers quickly hammered the last two of his nails in place and then hustled to follow.

"Can't really tell you too much." He said as he caught up. "Government secrets and what not. One of em wants to be a squirrel apparently."

But he told what he could.

\---------------------------

"\[As is custom, the final match shall be the four warriors who have won their respective fighting brackets.\]" The announcer explained to the crowd for anyone unfamiliar. James was glad that he'd put his medallion back on, even if it was uncomfortable underneath his armor. "\[If a fighter's hit indicator is activated seven times they are eliminated and shall be locked in place, their body shielded by the last of the device's magic until the fight is over. Magic is allowed from the start. Still no intentionally lethal or injurious attacks allowed.\]" James ignored the way almost everyone seemed to focus on him for a moment. "\[One of the four remaining contestants is already at a two strike disadvantage.\]" This time everyone DID look at him.

James waved and smiled sarcastically.

Amina stood on her pedestal at the opposite side of the arena. Raend was on the one to James's right, his massive hammer already in hand and its head glowing with a faint bluish-white light. Glag stood in the same expressionless stupor as before across from the hammer wielding mercenary.

James began spinning his chain, his sword already attached to the end of it and eager to head toward Glag. Even the magic in the weapon was registering the odd, seemingly mindless, rock creature as the biggest threat now.

What the fuck is this guy? He wondered to himself.

"\[LADIES AND GENTLEMEN OF THE ARENA!\]" The announcer said, their explanation finished. Cheers began to rise from the crowd and James's eyes began to glow. Amina's matched across the way.

There was a deep grinding noise coming from Glag's pedestal.

"\[LET THE LAST FIGHT!\]" The announcer said as they raised the golden banner of the final match up. Then he dropped it in a flourish. "\[BEGIN!\]"

James flew over to the space where Glag had been in a flash, arriving in less time than it would have taken for a normal person to blink.

And struck nothing.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled at the same moment that he heard, and felt, a massive impact in the ground behind and to the side of him.

He turned and saw something that his mind immediately related to an old video game.

Sonic the fucking hedgehog? He thought.

"COME ON THEN!" He heard the smoky, baritone, voice of Raend yell in protest as he saw the man winding up with his hammer like he was about to hit a homerun.

Glag, who had only seconds before been staring into the arena like a brain-dead simpleton, was now rolling along the floor of the arena so fast that James honestly wasn't sure he'd be able to keep up with him without using magic.

Amina flew in in a flash and slammed her shield into the side of the rolling Glag, attempting to change his trajectory, but instead found herself bouncing off of it harmlessly and having to recover her footing as she staggered off to the side.

There was a loud impact, accompanied by a cracking noise that reminded James of when he'd cracked a geode in his middle school science class.

"ARGH!" Raend yelled in surprise as he flew back, his chest glowing blue as the device there marked him as being struck. In the announcer's box a black flag was placed next to his name. None were placed next to Glag's despite Raend having hit him head on with his hammer.

Then the mercenary slammed violently into the arena wall some twenty feet behind where he'd met the rock creature, causing a massive crack to form in the wall from the impact.

Another black flag went under his name.

They're even counting non-combat impacts? James realized. Shit.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled in warning.

Then James realized that the ball of living sandstone was headed his way.

He wasn't dumb enough to think that he could match the creature in strength the way the mercenary had tried. This despite his sword's protests to the contrary.

BOOM!

James rocketed up over the remarkably fast ball of sandstone and watched as it quickly altered it's trajectory with a slap of its outstretched arm against the ground. In a flash it was looping around in a tight hairpin turn and angling toward where Amina was standing with her shield and a fire blast readied in her hand.

James charged wind magic into his and his hand flashed forward.

The Pneumatic Punch impacted Glag at the same moment that Amina's lance of fire splashed off of his front side. The pneumatic punch had the desired effect, mostly, as it hit Glag and knocked a chunk of stone off of his side. But more importantly it threw his high speed roll off balance, causing it to wobble and change trajectory wildly before it could re-stabilize. As a result it flew past Amina's dodging form, missing her my mere inches.

But the arm it reached out for her didn't.

Glag swiped a massive, cudgel-like fist at Amina as he flew past. Only her enhanced reflexes and years of experience allowed her to escape unharmed, the hand clanging against her shield as she used the impact to move back several yards in a leap.

Glag slammed into one of the few stone columns and embedded himself into it, causing the whole thing to topple over on top of itself.

James poured more pneumatic punches into its temporarily halted form as he landed and began approaching.

"THIS IS FOR THAT FIRST HIT YOU BASTARD!" Raend yelled as he quickly stepped in and began hammering at the Glag fiercely. There were sickening crunches and groans from Glag as it weathered the offensive.

But James didn't see any flags being placed underneath his name when he looked over.

"YEARGH!" Raend exclaimed suddenly as his hammer was seized and he was lifted up in the air. James watched as one of his legs was slammed into the side of the arm holding him up as one of the pneumatic punches he'd sent impacted with the back of the mercenary's leg and accidentally made him kick Glag.

A black flag was placed under Raend's name.

"My bad!" James yelled.

Then Raend was flying.

James and Amina watched him soar over them and across the arena in a rush.

"AAAAAAAAHHHH!" He yelled as he flew over and landed in a heap.

Another black flag was placed under his name.

There was a loud rumbling grinding noise from where he'd come from.

And Glag began to stand up. As he did he took one of the massive chunks of column rubble and placed it in his mouth. It disappeared in seconds.

"Is he bigger?" James asked.

When the match had started Glag had been all of three feet tall, and a few feet wide.

But as James and Amina looked up they saw that he had grown to nearly ten feet tall.

"Yep." Amina said. "Warned you."

"YOU DIDN'T WARN ME THAT IT WOULD GET BIGGER!" He yelled in frustration as a pair of large spike protrusions formed on its shoulders. He pointed at the Glag as it reached up and broke the spikes off with each and and began reeling back to throw one. "OR THAT IT COULD DO THAT!"

"That is new." She admitted. "MOVE!"

"NO SHIT!" James yelled as he blasted over, grabbed her around the waist, and continued on, avoiding the nearly six foot long sandstone spike as it slammed into the space Amina had been in.

He kept his eyes on the massive half elemental, and as he did he saw something interesting.

Where his pneumatic punches had impacted there were still cracks in its outer layers. They weren't big. And most of them seemed to be healing at a rapid rate. But they were lingering.

"I've got an-" He began before having to blast into a redirect to avoid the second spike. "I have an idea."

James landed behind a pillar and set her down. Then he handed her the handle to his chain weapon.

"You've never seen Star Wars." He said as he lifted the sword at his end of it up.. "So just follow my lead." Then he looked at his sword. "You've got a part of my soul forged into you." He said to it hesitantly. "Do me a favor and prove it."

KRAKOOOSH!

Both of their eyes went wide as Amina ducked down instinctively.

James ignored the fact that he had just nearly been beheaded by a massive stone spear and reached up to absent mindedly brush some dust and debris out of his hair.

The top of the pillar they were behind had just been obliterated by Glag.

"That was our cue." He said as he led her out from behind the cover.

Raend charged in from behind Glag and began hammering at the back of its leg with his weapon. There was an odd glow around his hands and his hammer's head was shining with that same ethereal blue/white light from earlier again. A massive chunk of Glag's leg, what would have been his calf if he were made of flesh, flew off of him and rolled across the arena floor.

Glag turned with one of the spikes in his hand and grabbed it with his other hand to use it like a club. But Raend kept hammering.

Can it only focus on one direction at a time? James wondered. If so then thank you Raend.

"Hold on tight!" James instructed as he spun a length of the chain on his end and threw the sword at Glag. Before it could impact his hand flashed out and slammed a pneumatic punch into the space he'd aimed for.

The pneumatic punch impacted on the side of Glag's torso, throwing him off balance as he swung the club down at the hammer wielding mercenary. It ended up only getting a glancing blow on the man's shoulder, or at least it looked like a glancing blow. James had a feeling he wouldn't have shrugged that hit off as well. But it seemed to roll of of Raend's body like water as he continued hammering, taking progressively larger and larger chunks off with each swing.

Then James's sword sunk into the crack that had been left behind by his spell.

"NOW!" He yelled at Amina. He pointed to the side. "RUN!"

She nodded and began running, pulling the chain handle as tight as she could while she went. James ran the opposite direction, blasting more of the pneumatic punches at the thing to keep its attention.

Instead Glag continued assaulting Raend.

The Mercenary bean laughing as he ignored the incoming blows, focusing instead on repeatedly slamming his hammer into Glag, now focusing on his other leg as the first one had all but been severed by the blows. Even as James watched Glag's stability grew faulty and he teetered over a bit as the combination of Raend's assault, Amina's pulling, and James's blasts, began forcing him over to the side.

Curiously, though James was too focused to notice it, flags weren't being placed for Raend or Glag.

After a few moments of the scramble, and as Amina and the chain came around near James, Glag toppled over sideways. The move pulled Amina off her feet for a moment. She quickly got her feet back underneath her and kept the chain taut.

The Glag slammed to the ground in a cloud of sand and powdered stone. Raend didn't relent, slamming his hammer into it like he was driving railroad spikes.

"That it?" James asked, hopefully.

"Not a chance!" Amina yelled as she flew past him, throwing the rest of his chain at him as she closed the distance. She drew her sword as she leapt into the air and onto the fallen earth elemental.

She landed with her sword in a two handed stab and drove it into Glag's body, piercing one of the links of James's chain in the process. There was a grinding noise from inside Glag as it acknowledged what James hoped was a strike. But when he looked there still weren't any flags in the things space.

Amina was on the verge of drawing her dagger and adding another pinning point to the chain when Raend screamed again. This time it wasn't a scream of battle lust or surprise. Rather, it was a blood curdling sound of pain and unexpected fear.

The arena, which had been cheering the entire time, froze as they heard the sickening crunch of bone in Raend's leg.

One of Glag's hands had slammed the thing into the ground like a wrecking ball, and as Raend fell back it was clear that his leg was ruined. Blood dripped from the end of Glag's fist as it rose back up.

"Amina!" James yelled as he realized what was happening.

GLAG! GLAG! GLAG!

The crowd chanted.

Amina leapt up and away from the stone monster. But too late.

The other hand seemed to form from the very part of Glag she'd been standing on, readying her dagger to strike.

It hit her so fast and so violently that James couldn't tell whether or not she'd gotten her shield in the way as she flew past him. He didn't have time to check the flags.

"SONOFABITCH!" He yelled as he poured wind energy into the chain and made it wind around the extended arm.

Glag slammed the hand onto the ground and began to rise back up onto his feet. A new one emerged from his body to replace the damaged one, which his other leg stepped on and immediately began absorbing. As its arm hit the ground it pulled James forward and off balance.

It's like the blood golem. He realized as he staggered forward.

"Good." He said. "I beat that thing just fine."

BOOM!

James flew toward the thing, snaking his chain around it as he passed, and slid between its legs.

Glag spun to react, bring it's arm around to strike at him. But James didn't stop moving.

BOOM!

Up into the air, missing the swipe by a mile.

Bo-Pop! Po-Po-Pop!

He quickly flitted around the arm and back into the space he'd just left. Then slid down underneath it again.

"GLAAAAG!" It bellowed as James zipped around it's leg.

Then he stood up straight, the last ten feet or so of chain held taut between himself and the massive monster.

"Hey Glag!" He shouted and watched as the thing turned, completely oblivious of the meaning of the chain rattling around its body. "You ever think you were gonna fly?!?!"

The thing's head tilted. Though unlike a normal body the head simply rotated, as if it had a joint specifically for rotating its face.

"Glag." It said, and James thought that it sounded confused. Though it was hard to tell since his medallion apparently didn't translate Glag-ese or whatever.

"Get ready." James said.

Suddenly there was a flash of steel, crimson cloth, and a blue shield as Amina slammed into Glag's back, her dagger in one hand in a stabbing hold. Her shield followed up, slamming the dagger in like a nail.

That broke Glag out of it's confusion as he reeled and began trying to turn.

The second his left foot left the ground James moved.

BOOM!

He flew straight up, pulling Glag off of its feet.

Then he threw on the after burners.

FFFFFFOOOOOOOOOOOOOSH!

His arms strained against the mass of the elemental, and he began to wonder if he had enough lift to pull this off. He also faintly wondered if his chain would hold.

Beneath him, though he couldn't see it, Glag reached out to try to grab on to some of the rubble that he still hadn't absorbed.

This was made feeble by Amina walking calmly over near Raend's immobilized body and lifting his hammer. Then she walked back over near Glag, and began slamming the immense weapon into the arm.

With each hit she felt the magic within the enchanted weapon growing stronger.

She paused, for just a split second, as she realized what it was doing.

Then she redoubled her efforts.

"GLAAAAG!" Glag yelled in protest.

"SHUT!" She yelled as she took one last swing at its arm. The hammer's enchantment adding more and more force to each consecutive hit, while also making her swing faster. "UP!" She finished as the hammer head smashed through the last bit of rock keeping the arm attached to Glag's body.

Then he and James began to rise once and for all.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11z0ww9/wait_is_this_just_gate_334/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (333/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Who needs to clean a shotgun when you can drive nails into solid wood with nothing but your hands?

And once again; Big CGI action sequence. Gotta love em.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

technically they're considered Marines?" He wondered. Even with two of them under his care he hadn't been given very much information about them besides what was deemed necessary. "Plus one of them tried to kill me a few months ago. Didn't work out for her."

"Is she the one that is near death?"

"Ya." Vickers said simply.

"Is that fight why?" De'Lius followed up.

"Ya."

"Hmm." The Commander said.

The two of them worked in silence for several more minutes. Pressing the mesh in place then driving in nails to hold it. Then changing position and repeating.

"So um...." Vickers began after the silence had drawn on long enough to feel awkward. "What did uh... Atrafar tell you? About me?"

De'Lius paused for a moment. Then resumed working.

"Only that she'd converted a man from another world. That his were-form manifested into a night brother. And that he was remarkably apt at adjusting to his new body." The old wolf said as he drove in another nail with the pad of his thumb. "Said that he was one of the few people she'd ever met who could keep up with her in a fight even before he'd converted, and that she was curious to how capable he would be AFTER converting."

Vickers considered that for a few moments. It was true that the two of them had bonded over their ability to fight. Hell, their first night together had been right after spending several hours in a tavern's fighting ring, winning gold for beating people up.

"Yeah. That sounds like her alright." Vickers said. "Ever the warrior."

"She also wrote about how you saved her in the battle of the Druidic Forrest." De'Lius added. "And only a week or so after having been converted."

"That's... also accurate." Vickers said.

"All in all she seemed quite taken with you." De'Lius admitted.

"She did?" Vickers asked.

De'Lius stopped what he was doing and turned to face Vickers. Vickers in turn pulled the last two nails from his mouth and turned to match.

"Mister Vickers. I raised my daughter to be a warrior and follow in my footsteps. If she admits being impressed with someone's combat and survival abilities then it's as good as admitting she has a crush on them." The large wolf said. "She's a grown woman. Who she lies with or doesn't is no business of mine. A few years ago it might have been if it began interfering with her duties to the Outer Light. But, I'm retired."

"She didn't ask you to come here and help me?" Vickers wondered.

"She doesn't even know I'm here." De'Lius revealed. "She and the Conversion party still have another three or four towns to visit before their current circuit is completed and they head back to the Lunar Council City. The Council simply asked me to reactivate for a few weeks to come here, oversee an emergency conversion, and then return back to my home. My employers in Jadesport needed some of their goods delivered to the capital for distribution, and as their Head of Security I was allowed to come along as escort."

"Huh." Vickers said. The whole thing made sense to him. Minus one part. "I thought that service to the Outer Light was for life." He said. "Didn't know you could retire."

"For most that is the case." De'Lius confirmed. "Standard term of service is two centuries. Most Outer Light members are either killed or maimed beyond serviceability well before then. It's a dangerous job. I just got lucky is all."

"Did you say two centuries?" Vickers asked in surprise.

"Yes." De'Lius confirmed. "My family line is descended of elves and giants." He said with a gesture at his immense size. "Couple that with the regenerative properties of being a second generation member of the folk and I will likely live another century and a half. Maybe two. Assuming my current job doesn't get me killed."

"And Atrafar?" Vickers wondered.

"Eh." The old wolf huffed. "Her mother was descended from humans and dwarves. "She's a bit of a runt as a result. But she'll still live at least two, two and a half maybe." Then he saw the surprised expression on Vickers' face. "Relax. Even as a human you'll probably get a century and a half. So long as nothing kills ya first."

"Huh." Vickers grunted. He'd known about the extension of life. It made sense with the regeneration stuff. But he hadn't expected it to be THAT much of an extension.

"Come." De'Lius said. "We are nearly done with this room." He said as he pressed the last nail in place for his wall and began walking out to grab the supplies for the next room. "Tell me about these two you intend to convert."

Vickers quickly hammered the last two of his nails in place and then hustled to follow.

"Can't really tell you too much." He said as he caught up. "Government secrets and what not. One of em wants to be a squirrel apparently."

But he told what he could.

\---------------------------

"\[As is custom, the final match shall be the four warriors who have won their respective fighting brackets.\]" The announcer explained to the crowd for anyone unfamiliar. James was glad that he'd put his medallion back on, even if it was uncomfortable underneath his armor. "\[If a fighter's hit indicator is activated seven times they are eliminated and shall be locked in place, their body shielded by the last of the device's magic until the fight is over. Magic is allowed from the start. Still no intentionally lethal or injurious attacks allowed.\]" James ignored the way almost everyone seemed to focus on him for a moment. "\[One of the four remaining contestants is already at a two strike disadvantage.\]" This time everyone DID look at him.

James waved and smiled sarcastically.

Amina stood on her pedestal at the opposite side of the arena. Raend was on the one to James's right, his massive hammer already in hand and its head glowing with a faint bluish-white light. Glag stood in the same expressionless stupor as before across from the hammer wielding mercenary.

James began spinning his chain, his sword already attached to the end of it and eager to head toward Glag. Even the magic in the weapon was registering the odd, seemingly mindless, rock creature as the biggest threat now.

What the fuck is this guy? He wondered to himself.

"\[LADIES AND GENTLEMEN OF THE ARENA!\]" The announcer said, their explanation finished. Cheers began to rise from the crowd and James's eyes began to glow. Amina's matched across the way.

There was a deep grinding noise coming from Glag's pedestal.

"\[LET THE LAST FIGHT!\]" The announcer said as they raised the golden banner of the final match up. Then he dropped it in a flourish. "\[BEGIN!\]"

James flew over to the space where Glag had been in a flash, arriving in less time than it would have taken for a normal person to blink.

And struck nothing.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled at the same moment that he heard, and felt, a massive impact in the ground behind and to the side of him.

He turned and saw something that his mind immediately related to an old video game.

Sonic the fucking hedgehog? He thought.

"COME ON THEN!" He heard the smoky, baritone, voice of Raend yell in protest as he saw the man winding up with his hammer like he was about to hit a homerun.

Glag, who had only seconds before been staring into the arena like a brain-dead simpleton, was now rolling along the floor of the arena so fast that James honestly wasn't sure he'd be able to keep up with him without using magic.

Amina flew in in a flash and slammed her shield into the side of the rolling Glag, attempting to change his trajectory, but instead found herself bouncing off of it harmlessly and having to recover her footing as she staggered off to the side.

There was a loud impact, accompanied by a cracking noise that reminded James of when he'd cracked a geode in his middle school science class.

"ARGH!" Raend yelled in surprise as he flew back, his chest glowing blue as the device there marked him as being struck. In the announcer's box a black flag was placed next to his name. None were placed next to Glag's despite Raend having hit him head on with his hammer.

Then the mercenary slammed violently into the arena wall some twenty feet behind where he'd met the rock creature, causing a massive crack to form in the wall from the impact.

Another black flag went under his name.

They're even counting non-combat impacts? James realized. Shit.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled in warning.

Then James realized that the ball of living sandstone was headed his way.

He wasn't dumb enough to think that he could match the creature in strength the way the mercenary had tried. This despite his sword's protests to the contrary.

BOOM!

James rocketed up over the remarkably fast ball of sandstone and watched as it quickly altered it's trajectory with a slap of its outstretched arm against the ground. In a flash it was looping around in a tight hairpin turn and angling toward where Amina was standing with her shield and a fire blast readied in her hand.

James charged wind magic into his and his hand flashed forward.

The Pneumatic Punch impacted Glag at the same moment that Amina's lance of fire splashed off of his front side. The pneumatic punch had the desired effect, mostly, as it hit Glag and knocked a chunk of stone off of his side. But more importantly it threw his high speed roll off balance, causing it to wobble and change trajectory wildly before it could re-stabilize. As a result it flew past Amina's dodging form, missing her my mere inches.

But the arm it reached out for her didn't.

Glag swiped a massive, cudgel-like fist at Amina as he flew past. Only her enhanced reflexes and years of experience allowed her to escape unharmed, the hand clanging against her shield as she used the impact to move back several yards in a leap.

Glag slammed into one of the few stone columns and embedded himself into it, causing the whole thing to topple over on top of itself.

James poured more pneumatic punches into its temporarily halted form as he landed and began approaching.

"THIS IS FOR THAT FIRST HIT YOU BASTARD!" Raend yelled as he quickly stepped in and began hammering at the Glag fiercely. There were sickening crunches and groans from Glag as it weathered the offensive.

But James didn't see any flags being placed underneath his name when he looked over.

"YEARGH!" Raend exclaimed suddenly as his hammer was seized and he was lifted up in the air. James watched as one of his legs was slammed into the side of the arm holding him up as one of the pneumatic punches he'd sent impacted with the back of the mercenary's leg and accidentally made him kick Glag.

A black flag was placed under Raend's name.

"My bad!" James yelled.

Then Raend was flying.

James and Amina watched him soar over them and across the arena in a rush.

"AAAAAAAAHHHH!" He yelled as he flew over and landed in a heap.

Another black flag was placed under his name.

There was a loud rumbling grinding noise from where he'd come from.

And Glag began to stand up. As he did he took one of the massive chunks of column rubble and placed it in his mouth. It disappeared in seconds.

"Is he bigger?" James asked.

When the match had started Glag had been all of three feet tall, and a few feet wide.

But as James and Amina looked up they saw that he had grown to nearly ten feet tall.

"Yep." Amina said. "Warned you."

"YOU DIDN'T WARN ME THAT IT WOULD GET BIGGER!" He yelled in frustration as a pair of large spike protrusions formed on its shoulders. He pointed at the Glag as it reached up and broke the spikes off with each and and began reeling back to throw one. "OR THAT IT COULD DO THAT!"

"That is new." She admitted. "MOVE!"

"NO SHIT!" James yelled as he blasted over, grabbed her around the waist, and continued on, avoiding the nearly six foot long sandstone spike as it slammed into the space Amina had been in.

He kept his eyes on the massive half elemental, and as he did he saw something interesting.

Where his pneumatic punches had impacted there were still cracks in its outer layers. They weren't big. And most of them seemed to be healing at a rapid rate. But they were lingering.

"I've got an-" He began before having to blast into a redirect to avoid the second spike. "I have an idea."

James landed behind a pillar and set her down. Then he handed her the handle to his chain weapon.

"You've never seen Star Wars." He said as he lifted the sword at his end of it up.. "So just follow my lead." Then he looked at his sword. "You've got a part of my soul forged into you." He said to it hesitantly. "Do me a favor and prove it."

KRAKOOOSH!

Both of their eyes went wide as Amina ducked down instinctively.

James ignored the fact that he had just nearly been beheaded by a massive stone spear and reached up to absent mindedly brush some dust and debris out of his hair.

The top of the pillar they were behind had just been obliterated by Glag.

"That was our cue." He said as he led her out from behind the cover.

Raend charged in from behind Glag and began hammering at the back of its leg with his weapon. There was an odd glow around his hands and his hammer's head was shining with that same ethereal blue/white light from earlier again. A massive chunk of Glag's leg, what would have been his calf if he were made of flesh, flew off of him and rolled across the arena floor.

Glag turned with one of the spikes in his hand and grabbed it with his other hand to use it like a club. But Raend kept hammering.

Can it only focus on one direction at a time? James wondered. If so then thank you Raend.

"Hold on tight!" James instructed as he spun a length of the chain on his end and threw the sword at Glag. Before it could impact his hand flashed out and slammed a pneumatic punch into the space he'd aimed for.

The pneumatic punch impacted on the side of Glag's torso, throwing him off balance as he swung the club down at the hammer wielding mercenary. It ended up only getting a glancing blow on the man's shoulder, or at least it looked like a glancing blow. James had a feeling he wouldn't have shrugged that hit off as well. But it seemed to roll of of Raend's body like water as he continued hammering, taking progressively larger and larger chunks off with each swing.

Then James's sword sunk into the crack that had been left behind by his spell.

"NOW!" He yelled at Amina. He pointed to the side. "RUN!"

She nodded and began running, pulling the chain handle as tight as she could while she went. James ran the opposite direction, blasting more of the pneumatic punches at the thing to keep its attention.

Instead Glag continued assaulting Raend.

The Mercenary bean laughing as he ignored the incoming blows, focusing instead on repeatedly slamming his hammer into Glag, now focusing on his other leg as the first one had all but been severed by the blows. Even as James watched Glag's stability grew faulty and he teetered over a bit as the combination of Raend's assault, Amina's pulling, and James's blasts, began forcing him over to the side.

Curiously, though James was too focused to notice it, flags weren't being placed for Raend or Glag.

After a few moments of the scramble, and as Amina and the chain came around near James, Glag toppled over sideways. The move pulled Amina off her feet for a moment. She quickly got her feet back underneath her and kept the chain taut.

The Glag slammed to the ground in a cloud of sand and powdered stone. Raend didn't relent, slamming his hammer into it like he was driving railroad spikes.

"That it?" James asked, hopefully.

"Not a chance!" Amina yelled as she flew past him, throwing the rest of his chain at him as she closed the distance. She drew her sword as she leapt into the air and onto the fallen earth elemental.

She landed with her sword in a two handed stab and drove it into Glag's body, piercing one of the links of James's chain in the process. There was a grinding noise from inside Glag as it acknowledged what James hoped was a strike. But when he looked there still weren't any flags in the things space.

Amina was on the verge of drawing her dagger and adding another pinning point to the chain when Raend screamed again. This time it wasn't a scream of battle lust or surprise. Rather, it was a blood curdling sound of pain and unexpected fear.

The arena, which had been cheering the entire time, froze as they heard the sickening crunch of bone in Raend's leg.

One of Glag's hands had slammed the thing into the ground like a wrecking ball, and as Raend fell back it was clear that his leg was ruined. Blood dripped from the end of Glag's fist as it rose back up.

"Amina!" James yelled as he realized what was happening.

GLAG! GLAG! GLAG!

The crowd chanted.

Amina leapt up and away from the stone monster. But too late.

The other hand seemed to form from the very part of Glag she'd been standing on, readying her dagger to strike.

It hit her so fast and so violently that James couldn't tell whether or not she'd gotten her shield in the way as she flew past him. He didn't have time to check the flags.

"SONOFABITCH!" He yelled as he poured wind energy into the chain and made it wind around the extended arm.

Glag slammed the hand onto the ground and began to rise back up onto his feet. A new one emerged from his body to replace the damaged one, which his other leg stepped on and immediately began absorbing. As its arm hit the ground it pulled James forward and off balance.

It's like the blood golem. He realized as he staggered forward.

"Good." He said. "I beat that thing just fine."

BOOM!

James flew toward the thing, snaking his chain around it as he passed, and slid between its legs.

Glag spun to react, bring it's arm around to strike at him. But James didn't stop moving.

BOOM!

Up into the air, missing the swipe by a mile.

Bo-Pop! Po-Po-Pop!

He quickly flitted around the arm and back into the space he'd just left. Then slid down underneath it again.

"GLAAAAG!" It bellowed as James zipped around it's leg.

Then he stood up straight, the last ten feet or so of chain held taut between himself and the massive monster.

"Hey Glag!" He shouted and watched as the thing turned, completely oblivious of the meaning of the chain rattling around its body. "You ever think you were gonna fly?!?!"

The thing's head tilted. Though unlike a normal body the head simply rotated, as if it had a joint specifically for rotating its face.

"Glag." It said, and James thought that it sounded confused. Though it was hard to tell since his medallion apparently didn't translate Glag-ese or whatever.

"Get ready." James said.

Suddenly there was a flash of steel, crimson cloth, and a blue shield as Amina slammed into Glag's back, her dagger in one hand in a stabbing hold. Her shield followed up, slamming the dagger in like a nail.

That broke Glag out of it's confusion as he reeled and began trying to turn.

The second his left foot left the ground James moved.

BOOM!

He flew straight up, pulling Glag off of its feet.

Then he threw on the after burners.

FFFFFFOOOOOOOOOOOOOSH!

His arms strained against the mass of the elemental, and he began to wonder if he had enough lift to pull this off. He also faintly wondered if his chain would hold.

Beneath him, though he couldn't see it, Glag reached out to try to grab on to some of the rubble that he still hadn't absorbed.

This was made feeble by Amina walking calmly over near Raend's immobilized body and lifting his hammer. Then she walked back over near Glag, and began slamming the immense weapon into the arm.

With each hit she felt the magic within the enchanted weapon growing stronger.

She paused, for just a split second, as she realized what it was doing.

Then she redoubled her efforts.

"GLAAAAG!" Glag yelled in protest.

"SHUT!" She yelled as she took one last swing at its arm. The hammer's enchantment adding more and more force to each consecutive hit, while also making her swing faster. "UP!" She finished as the hammer head smashed through the last bit of rock keeping the arm attached to Glag's body.

Then he and James began to rise once and for all.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11z0v5a/wait_is_this_just_gate_334/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (332/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Short sections with updates about all kinds of people. And Vickers faces his greatest threat ever.

Enjoy.

\~

"So the last round is a four person free for all?" James asked as he saw the tournament finale.

"Yes." Amina said. "Once you've been struck seven times you'll be locked out of the fight and you'll be immobilized and shielded until it's over. Here's what's going to happen."

"So we're really not going to talk about the centaur in the room?" James asked.

"James focus." Amina said, ignoring his quip. "You, myself, and this Raend fellow are going to team up against the Glag."

"Okay so it as A... Glag?" James asked. "Glag isn't its name."

"It's both." Amina said simply. "That's neither here nor there. We need to work together to defeat the Glag or else we'll all be defeated within the first minute of the fight."

James's eyebrows furrowed at that. He looked over at the spot where the Glag(?) was standing in the corner of the room. Once again it seemed to be staring straight ahead with its mouth agape and drooling out the slurry of stone and saliva.

"That thing?" He asked. "You sure?"

"Okay." Amina said with her hands in front of her face in a prayer position as she took a deep breath. "James, that thing is a sentient variation of an earth elemental. It's faster than it looks. It's.... well... it's not SMARTER than it looks. But it is much more clever than you're probably giving it credit for. Besides which, remember what the devices on out chests are designed to signal for?"

James looked down at the small brass and crystal device. "Yeah. Hits." He said.

She poked his forehead with a finger. "Hits that would be lethal in a real fight." She reminded him. "Which for you and me means basically anything anyone in this tournament can throw at us. Now. Tell me. What's lethal for an elemental made of stone?"

"Oh." He said once he thought of the question for a moment.

"Yeah." She said. Then she made a face and her hand moved to her stomach.

James quickly looked around to see if anyone was watching, and when he saw the one other humanoid fighter in the room, presumably Raend, was busy reading a book, he turned to Amina and moved to provide her a bit of cover.

"You okay?" He asked.

Amina took several deep breaths and steeled herself a bit. "Yes. Though morning sickness is an incredibly inaccurate term."

"Need some water or something?" He asked. Then he thought of the hit she'd taken at the end of her fight with Gorna. "Say, maybe this wasn't a good idea. Having you in this tournament."

"Not a chance." She said as she spit a bit of saliva out into the nearby spittoon. "Besides. There's no way you win against that thing with only two people."

"Seriously?" James asked. "We are talking about that guy right?" He reiterated with a thumb over his shoulder as the two of them approached Raend.

Glag continued staring passively at the rack of spears that was in front of him.

\------------------------------

Vickers had just finished talking to the owner of the building that the letter had specified, the same one he had been converted in, when he heard a familiar armored gait approaching. He folded the letter from the council and put it in his back pocket, and was walking around the wagon with the silver barbed mesh that would line the rooms for Five and Driscoll when he ran into the owner of the familiar stride pattern.

"Well. Looks like we get to-" His voice trailed off as he looked at the unexpected arrival. Then he looked up higher. "You're not Atrafar." He said with a cocked eyebrow. The hand that had just put the letter away slid up his back until it was resting on his pistol. He'd had to break off and then file down the trigger guard to be able to use it again.

"No. No I'm not." The massive, grey and white muzzled, werewolf in Outer Light armor said with a cocked eyebrow of its own.

"The council sent you?" Vickers asked. "You're overseeing the conversion?"

The wolf looked down at his armor for a moment. "Looks that way." He said. "I assume that you're Chief Anthony Vickers?"

"Yeah." The SEAL answered as the large wolf began to slowly look him up and down.

After a few moments of awkward silence the newcomer spoke up again. "Night brothers are rare. You're smaller than she makes you sound." He said as he approached the wagon and casually lifted one of the silver mesh bundles with his gauntleted hand.

Vickers donned a confused expression. "Than who makes me sound?"

"My daughter." The wolf said as it carefully walked into the building with the bundle, grabbing one of the tool bags from the side of the wagon with his empty hand. "Atrafar. I'm Outer Light Commander De'Lius Dauntless. Retired. Though I've been recalled for the next few days." He said as he disappeared into the door. "Let's get to work."

Vickers tried to bite his lip, forgetting that his new facial structure didn't exactly allow that particular expression. "Fuck." He said under his breath.

He reached over to one of the remaining bundles on the wagon and tried to lift it. It took a bit of effort, and he wasn't able to one hand it like the Commander had. But eventually he got it onto his shoulder and went inside as well.

"Fuck fuck fuuuuuuck." He said as he went inside.

\------------------------

Werner slowly emerged from the third and final slumber to the sight of the healing ward's ceiling.

"There she is." Said the voice of Margaret Choi. "How are you Ambassador? Are you with us?"

Werner felt the back of the bed raising a bit, putting her into a slanted seated position.

"Yeah." She said before breaking into a yawn. "How did it go?"

"Well that really depends on you." Nurse Choi said. "As far as everything on our side is concerned the procedure went off without a hitch. How do you feel?"

She thought about it for a moment. "I fell okay I guess." Then a slightly more pressing issue presented itself. "I need to pee really badly."

"Well that's good." Nurse Choi replied. "I only removed your catheter about an hour ago. So that'll be a good chance to make sure that part went well. Though I'm sure it did. Come on and stand up."

Werner did as instructed and saw the Minotaur, Shrend, standing off to the side and looking at her charts. "Healer Farstorm." She greeted him.

"Welcome back Ambassador." Shrend said with a warm smile. "Things went well. Please follow Mrs. Choi and she'll get you where you need to go."

Ten minutes later, and much more relieved, she was back in the room and undergoing tests. They ran her through a familiar gamut of motor skill, walking stability, and various cognitive tests. Nurse Choi compared the results to the records that Earth had sent over for them.

By the time they were done it was nearly night again, and Werner was hovering on the border of breaking out into tears.

"Well Ambassador." Shrend said as he and Nurse Choi looked over the results and comparisons. "I don't want to count my drakes before they hatch. But if these results mean what Mrs. Choi says they do, then I think it's been a success. I really need to work on understanding English so I can read these more easily." He joked.

"I haven't scored that well since I was in my twenties." Werner said as she fought to keep her eyes dry.

"Well hopefully it stays that way for a long time." Nurse Choi said as she placed a hand on Werner's shoulder. The other hand grabbed a towel and handed it to her. "It's okay to be happy." She whispered softly.

Werner took the advice and let herself cry for a bit. The Nurse rubbed her back a little as she slowly got herself back under control and wiped her face.

"Thank you so much." She said between sobbing bouts.

"Oh. No need for that." Shrend said. "Healing and helping people is what we do. Now let's see about getting you back to your quarters and we'll have you back tomorrow for a bit more testing."

"Okay." She said as she let the nurse help her back to her feet.

She didn't stumble, or misstep at all in the ten or so minutes it took to get back. And by the time she got there she felt like she was floating.

\--------------------

"You want to do what?" King Farrick asked.

"I've been ordered to restart testing on transmittal of living specimens to Earth from Petravus your majesty." Col. Muhammed said flatly. "We've set up a pressure chamber that can handle that particular issue and help them depressurize. Plus we have reason to believe that our world has become magically saturated enough that even a Petravian citizen should be able to survive the trip. Though, obviously we'll be starting with Earth citizens."

She pressed a button and a series of windows appeared on his screen, showing videos of people performing feats of strength and speed similar to what some of the Earth people in the castle were capable of now. Some of the videos showed people performing magical spells, though they were all simply, fire and wind attacks, moving earth, summoning light. Some of them showed people accidentally dealing with the carnage that some of that resulted in. There was a news segment, with Petravian subtitles put in place for him, talking about something called an "Influencer" dying after they attempted to fly over something called the Grand Canyon.

"I had assumed as much." He said after a few minutes of watching the curious footage. No matter how many times he saw them, videos amazed him. "I take it that you intend to have the Ambassador send over a few of the people we released."

"That's the long term goal." She admitted openly. "For now we intend to start with small wildlife. Rats or something equivalent. We're not looking to risk any human, or humanoid, life just yet."

"Hmm. Fair enough." He concurred. "You might be happy to know that my healers say that Ambassador Werner has emerged from her final rejuvenation session and all signs point toward a healthy recovery."

The Colonel smiled, and for the first time King Farrick thought it might have been a genuine one.

"That's excellent news." She said. "If the therapy proves fully successful, or hell even partially, that will revolutionize the medical field on our world. Did Nurse Choi take notes?"

"Extensive ones." The King said. "As did our chief healer."

"I look forward to reading them. Whenever you're willing to send them."

The King leaned forward a bit, knowing that he was at an advantage in this exchange

"Tell me." He said as he continued watching the footage that was rapidly changing on his screen. "What kind of magical trouble are the people over there causing?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11xwvny/wait_is_this_just_gate_333/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (332/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Short sections with updates about all kinds of people. And Vickers faces his greatest threat ever.

Enjoy.

\~

"So the last round is a four person free for all?" James asked as he saw the tournament finale.

"Yes." Amina said. "Once you've been struck seven times you'll be locked out of the fight and you'll be immobilized and shielded until it's over. Here's what's going to happen."

"So we're really not going to talk about the centaur in the room?" James asked.

"James focus." Amina said, ignoring his quip. "You, myself, and this Raend fellow are going to team up against the Glag."

"Okay so it as A... Glag?" James asked. "Glag isn't its name."

"It's both." Amina said simply. "That's neither here nor there. We need to work together to defeat the Glag or else we'll all be defeated within the first minute of the fight."

James's eyebrows furrowed at that. He looked over at the spot where the Glag(?) was standing in the corner of the room. Once again it seemed to be staring straight ahead with its mouth agape and drooling out the slurry of stone and saliva.

"That thing?" He asked. "You sure?"

"Okay." Amina said with her hands in front of her face in a prayer position as she took a deep breath. "James, that thing is a sentient variation of an earth elemental. It's faster than it looks. It's.... well... it's not SMARTER than it looks. But it is much more clever than you're probably giving it credit for. Besides which, remember what the devices on out chests are designed to signal for?"

James looked down at the small brass and crystal device. "Yeah. Hits." He said.

She poked his forehead with a finger. "Hits that would be lethal in a real fight." She reminded him. "Which for you and me means basically anything anyone in this tournament can throw at us. Now. Tell me. What's lethal for an elemental made of stone?"

"Oh." He said once he thought of the question for a moment.

"Yeah." She said. Then she made a face and her hand moved to her stomach.

James quickly looked around to see if anyone was watching, and when he saw the one other humanoid fighter in the room, presumably Raend, was busy reading a book, he turned to Amina and moved to provide her a bit of cover.

"You okay?" He asked.

Amina took several deep breaths and steeled herself a bit. "Yes. Though morning sickness is an incredibly inaccurate term."

"Need some water or something?" He asked. Then he thought of the hit she'd taken at the end of her fight with Gorna. "Say, maybe this wasn't a good idea. Having you in this tournament."

"Not a chance." She said as she spit a bit of saliva out into the nearby spittoon. "Besides. There's no way you win against that thing with only two people."

"Seriously?" James asked. "We are talking about that guy right?" He reiterated with a thumb over his shoulder as the two of them approached Raend.

Glag continued staring passively at the rack of spears that was in front of him.

\------------------------------

Vickers had just finished talking to the owner of the building that the letter had specified, the same one he had been converted in, when he heard a familiar armored gait approaching. He folded the letter from the council and put it in his back pocket, and was walking around the wagon with the silver barbed mesh that would line the rooms for Five and Driscoll when he ran into the owner of the familiar stride pattern.

"Well. Looks like we get to-" His voice trailed off as he looked at the unexpected arrival. Then he looked up higher. "You're not Atrafar." He said with a cocked eyebrow. The hand that had just put the letter away slid up his back until it was resting on his pistol. He'd had to break off and then file down the trigger guard to be able to use it again.

"No. No I'm not." The massive, grey and white muzzled, werewolf in Outer Light armor said with a cocked eyebrow of its own.

"The council sent you?" Vickers asked. "You're overseeing the conversion?"

The wolf looked down at his armor for a moment. "Looks that way." He said. "I assume that you're Chief Anthony Vickers?"

"Yeah." The SEAL answered as the large wolf began to slowly look him up and down.

After a few moments of awkward silence the newcomer spoke up again. "Night brothers are rare. You're smaller than she makes you sound." He said as he approached the wagon and casually lifted one of the silver mesh bundles with his gauntleted hand.

Vickers donned a confused expression. "Than who makes me sound?"

"My daughter." The wolf said as it carefully walked into the building with the bundle, grabbing one of the tool bags from the side of the wagon with his empty hand. "Atrafar. I'm Outer Light Commander De'Lius Dauntless. Retired. Though I've been recalled for the next few days." He said as he disappeared into the door. "Let's get to work."

Vickers tried to bite his lip, forgetting that his new facial structure didn't exactly allow that particular expression. "Fuck." He said under his breath.

He reached over to one of the remaining bundles on the wagon and tried to lift it. It took a bit of effort, and he wasn't able to one hand it like the Commander had. But eventually he got it onto his shoulder and went inside as well.

"Fuck fuck fuuuuuuck." He said as he went inside.

\------------------------

Werner slowly emerged from the third and final slumber to the sight of the healing ward's ceiling.

"There she is." Said the voice of Margaret Choi. "How are you Ambassador? Are you with us?"

Werner felt the back of the bed raising a bit, putting her into a slanted seated position.

"Yeah." She said before breaking into a yawn. "How did it go?"

"Well that really depends on you." Nurse Choi said. "As far as everything on our side is concerned the procedure went off without a hitch. How do you feel?"

She thought about it for a moment. "I fell okay I guess." Then a slightly more pressing issue presented itself. "I need to pee really badly."

"Well that's good." Nurse Choi replied. "I only removed your catheter about an hour ago. So that'll be a good chance to make sure that part went well. Though I'm sure it did. Come on and stand up."

Werner did as instructed and saw the Minotaur, Shrend, standing off to the side and looking at her charts. "Healer Farstorm." She greeted him.

"Welcome back Ambassador." Shrend said with a warm smile. "Things went well. Please follow Mrs. Choi and she'll get you where you need to go."

Ten minutes later, and much more relieved, she was back in the room and undergoing tests. They ran her through a familiar gamut of motor skill, walking stability, and various cognitive tests. Nurse Choi compared the results to the records that Earth had sent over for them.

By the time they were done it was nearly night again, and Werner was hovering on the border of breaking out into tears.

"Well Ambassador." Shrend said as he and Nurse Choi looked over the results and comparisons. "I don't want to count my drakes before they hatch. But if these results mean what Mrs. Choi says they do, then I think it's been a success. I really need to work on understanding English so I can read these more easily." He joked.

"I haven't scored that well since I was in my twenties." Werner said as she fought to keep her eyes dry.

"Well hopefully it stays that way for a long time." Nurse Choi said as she placed a hand on Werner's shoulder. The other hand grabbed a towel and handed it to her. "It's okay to be happy." She whispered softly.

Werner took the advice and let herself cry for a bit. The Nurse rubbed her back a little as she slowly got herself back under control and wiped her face.

"Thank you so much." She said between sobbing bouts.

"Oh. No need for that." Shrend said. "Healing and helping people is what we do. Now let's see about getting you back to your quarters and we'll have you back tomorrow for a bit more testing."

"Okay." She said as she let the nurse help her back to her feet.

She didn't stumble, or misstep at all in the ten or so minutes it took to get back. And by the time she got there she felt like she was floating.

\----------

"You want to do what?" King Farrick asked.

"I've been ordered to restart testing on transmittal of living specimens to Earth from Petravus your majesty." Col. Muhammed said flatly. "We've set up a pressure chamber that can handle that particular issue and help them depressurize. Plus we have reason to believe that our world has become magically saturated enough that even a Petravian citizen should be able to survive the trip. Though, obviously we'll be starting with Earth citizens."

She pressed a button and a series of windows appeared on his screen, showing videos of people performing feats of strength and speed similar to what some of the Earth people in the castle were capable of now. Some of the videos showed people performing magical spells, though they were all simply, fire and wind attacks, moving earth, summoning light. Some of them showed people accidentally dealing with the carnage that some of that resulted in. There was a news segment, with Petravian subtitles put in place for him, talking about something called an "Influencer" dying after they attempted to fly over something called the Grand Canyon.

"I had assumed as much." He said after a few minutes of watching the curious footage. No matter how many times he saw them, videos amazed him. "I take it that you intend to have the Ambassador send over a few of the people we released."

"That's the long term goal." She admitted openly. "For now we intend to start with small wildlife. Rats or something equivalent. We're not looking to risk any human, or humanoid, life just yet."

"Hmm. Fair enough." He concurred. "You might be happy to know that my healers say that Ambassador Werner has emerged from her final rejuvenation session and all signs point toward a healthy recovery."

The Colonel smiled, and for the first time King Farrick thought it might have been a genuine one.

"That's excellent news." She said. "If the therapy proves fully successful, or hell even partially, that will revolutionize the medical field on our world. Did Nurse Choi take notes?"

"Extensive ones." The King said. "As did our chief healer."

"I look forward to reading them. Whenever you're willing to send them."

The King leaned forward a bit, knowing that he was at an advantage in this exchange

"Tell me." He said as he continued watching the footage that was rapidly changing on his screen. "What kind of magical trouble are the people over there causing?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11xwse8/wait_is_this_just_gate_333/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (331/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Y'all pretty much guessed right on centaur girl, and that's gonna cause more drama later. Also there's some baby stuff in this chapter.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"No!" Amina said as she rushed out of the pit through the tunnel to the fighter's area. "No! No! No!"

James met up with her almost at the same time as she actually entered the waiting area, having come from the stands from a similar downward tunnel. He looked confused as she rushed past him, unbuckling a few pieces of armor as she went, seemingly ignoring him.

"It is the law." Gorna demanded as she followed close behind the princess. "You bested me in single combat and rode me! Law demands that I am yours to command until someone can wrest me from you."

"What is goi-" James began.

"NO!" Amina said as she slammed her breastplate onto one of the many armor stands in the room. "It was a taunt during a fighting tournament. Things that go hand in hand. I had no intentions of engaging you in any kind of bond. I just wanted to win a fight."

Gorna didn't relent, stamping her hooves in frustration as she moved to cut the princess off on her way to the grinding wheels off to one side of the room.

"The accords make no concessions to situations. You have invoked a proposal." She said angrily. "You are honor bound to either marry me, lay me, or bond me as your servant, and steed, until such time as someone else comes along and invokes a proposal of their own. At which point you are required to test them in any way you see fit."

James's eyes went wide as he heard the three options. "Um." He began. But the two semi-combative women didn't even pay him any attention.

"I'm not doing any of those things." Amina said angrily. "One; I'm already married. Two; I'm already married." James raised a hand like he was trying to get a teacher's attention. Amina simply held a hand up in a gesture that told him not to even speak. He quickly nodded understanding and stayed quiet. "Three; I'm not in need of any bonded servants." She swallowed a bit, thoughts of her former pack bond with Kela running through her mind. "And I'm on my honeymoon. WITH MY HUSBAND!

"Hi." James said with an awkward smile and wave

Gorna looked at him dismissively, then back to Amina.

"I must abide by my people's rules." She said as Amina made a point of ignoring her in favor of sharpening her incredibly damaged sword. "I must serve you in some way."

"James darling." Amina said past the centaurs shoulders. "Do you have a spare long-sword in your bag?"

"Yeah." He said and reached over his shoulder and under his armor to access the bag. A moment later several feet of steel were emerging in his grip. He handed it to her, awkwardly squeezing between Gorna and the wall to get past her.

"Princess Amina. I cannot simply walk away from this. My life amongst my people would be forfeit. Especially since it occurred in such a public venue. I would be an outcast."

James winced. Even though he'd been focused on Amina, even cursory glances at the stands around him had revealed more than a few of the half horse people scattered among the crowd. It was true that there would be no DENYING that whatever had happened had happened.

Amina slipped on the grinder wheel, catching her finger in it, as Gorna spoke the words. She cursed for a moment before setting her blade edge back on it and pedaling the wheel into motion again.

Then she looked at the centaur.

"Gorna." She said stiffly. "Would you please retrieve my armor for me?"

Gorna didn't even hestitate, turning quickly and trotting the three or so steps over to the stand Amina had set it on, then back, and handing it to her.

Amina dropped it next to her feet.

"There. You've rendered me a service. And now I find your indenture as my servant... FULFILLED." Amina said with a note of finality.

"It's not that simple and you know it." Gorna said angrily.

James looked around at the other fighters, the vast majority of whom seemed to be making a point of NOT looking at the two arguing women. Minus one short and wide creature that James thought might have been made of sandstone. It stared at them with blank eyes and some kind of muddy saliva dripping from the edges of its mouth, which hung open. James looked at it curiously, wondering what it was. He was waiting for it to move, to even breath, when Amina called for him again.

"James." She called as she handed him her damaged sword. He looked at it and was surprised to find several large cracks running through it in different parts. He quickly slid it into the bag that he'd pulled the other one from. "Can you please help me with this?" She asked, pointing at Gorna.

"I have no idea what's going on." He admitted. "It sounds like some kinda werewolf packing thing like when I shot Kela." He grimaced at the thought. "And uh... yeah." He said softly as he looked up at the centaur, who was glowering down at him. "Neither of us is in a good spot, like.... emotionally.... to enter something like that any time soon. Soooooo.... Please... don't.... make us?" He said questioningly.

"The issue is not with you HERO." Gorna said testily. "Your wife is the one who invoked a rider's proposal. She must resolve it. Stay out of it."

"Do not speak to him like that." Amina said with a fierce look in her eyes.

"Apologies mistress." Gorna said with a bow.

"I'm not your mistress." Amina huffed. "I'm nobodies mistress. Please.... Leave me alone."

"I'm afraid the princess is at least correct on one front." Said a new voice. Or at least new to Amina and Gorna, James recognized it from the dressing down he'd gotten just before going up to watch Amina's match. It was the young dwarf that had read his tournament penalties and restrictions to him. "Miss Gorna Daggerdancer. Your time in the tournament is up. I have been patient. But I'm afraid I must ask you to gather your belongings and leave the fighters area so that the remaining contestants can ready themselves for their next matches."

Gorna glared down at the small Arena Staff member. Then stamped her hooves a bit more before moving toward where her personal belongings were.

"This isn't resolved Princess." She said as she left.

"Yes it is." Amina said with mock cheeriness. "Have a nice life. Better luck next tournament."

Once the centaur had been ushered out James turned back to Amina.

"Honey." He said very sternly. "What have I told you about bringing other people into our love life?"

Amina was about to say something cutting, but James continued.

"You gotta at least ask me first. Especially if they're part farm animal." He said.

Her face bore a shocked expression, then she pointed the dagger she'd been sharpening at him.

"James. That's more than a little bit racist." She said in surprise. "And very rude."

James placed the back of his hand on his forehead in a display of fake injury.

"Oh. Freshly married and my wife is already siding with her centaur girlfriend over me. What have I done to deserve such cruelty?" He asked in a Shakespearean tempo and accent. Then he made a show of walking away while clutching his heart. "And on our honeymoon!" He exclaimed over his shoulder

"She's not my girlfriend!" Amina demanded. Then she chuckled as she shook her head in exasperation.

James paused as he neared the slack jawed sandstone creature. It hadn't so much as moved from it's position, and its large black eyes seemed to be staring ahead at Amina, without actually seeing anything. It also didn't seem to be breathing, at least not as far as he could tell.

"What are you?" He asked curiously.

The creature turned to him, the motion causing a grinding noise that made James's ears hurt just a bit. It did so until it was looking up at him, drool still pouring from the sides of its mouth.

"Glag." It said simply.

"Is that what you are?" He asked. "Or your name?"

The creature, Glag potentially, moved its arm up to tap at its chest.

"Glag." It repeated.

James considered this for a moment. Then shrugged and said. "Well that was informative... Nice to meet you Glag."

"Glag." It repeated for a third time.

"Right." James said with a nod. Then he turned and continued on his way.

\----------

"Well." Said the healer as Veliry sat up and refastened the toggles on her robe. "You're with child alright."

"You're certain?" Veliry asked as she got the last toggle in place.

"Oh yes." The elderly woman said as she wrote on her notepad. "The life energy there is Very strong."

"It is?" Veliry asked in surprise.

"Oh very much so. In fact it's siphoned quite a bit of energy from you." She said with a smile.

"It has?" Veliry asked. She knew from her studies that pregnant women gave a portion of their magic to their babies while they were in the womb. But it wasn't supposed to be a lot. Not that that was her field of expertise.

"Relax dear." The healer assured her with a hand over hers. "It's likely just because you're a high level magic users. It's more than normal. But not what I would consider ABNORMAL. Although who knows with how its conception was um... how did you put it? Blessed?"

"Deity empowered." Veliry corrected absently.

"Right. Well... I'm going to call it blessed. Easier to say." The healer said with a light chuckle. "Plus I don't know much about Gods except that they exist."

Veliry ignored the nonsense. "It's siphoning a lot from me." She said, rewinding the conversation a bit. "But I don't HAVE a lot of magic to give right now. Practically none."

"That is true." The healer agreed. "But you've said yourself that you're working on getting it back. Right?"

"I am. But I can barely spark a candle right now." Veliry admitted.

"And maybe that level of weakness is necessary." The healer said.

"What do you mean?" Veliry asked.

The old woman seemed to think for a while.

"Well... It's not often. But sometimes... just every once in a while. When a woman gets pregnant. She'll find herself drained. Physically obviously, especially once they get to the point where they can't sleep for more than twenty minutes before the babe steps on their bladder, and they waddle around like a rhonetops." She chuckled and Veliry couldn't help but smile too. Though she wasn't looking forward to that part of the pregnancy. "But sometimes it's magical too." The healer continued. "Typically that will happen if the unborn child has some kind of.... well... I don't mean to worry you... but if they're sickly, or have a malformation. The magic floods into them, just like it does with our normal bodies, and attempts to fix the damage before it can set in permanently. Am I making sense?"

The thoughts of the developmental struggles Joey, the father, had gone through his entire life, and how they were a combination of unlucky genetics and brain chemistry, ran through her mind.

And suddenly she worried that their child might have to struggle through similar hardships, and hoped that the magic focusing on the unborn child would right the issue before it was born.

"You are." She said as she looked down at her stomach, which still hadn't grown, and likely wouldn't for another month or so.

"I wouldn't worry about it." The healer said with another congenial pat of her hand. "As long as the magical drain doesn't cut off unexpectedly... or increase dramatically AND unexpectedly.... I wouldn't worry about it. In the mean time, keep training, keep trying to grow your reserves. That will only help. And let us know if anything changes.

"I will." Veliry said with a smile that wasn't 100% authentic. "Say. Is Nurse Choi on shift today? I'd like to give her the.... um... good?... news."

The healer smiled. "She should have clocked in only a few minutes ago. Let's see if we can track her down and let her know how her grandson is developing."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11wx7p8/wait_is_this_just_gate_332/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (331/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Y'all pretty much guessed right on centaur girl, and that's gonna cause more drama later. Also there's some baby stuff in this chapter.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"No!" Amina said as she rushed out of the pit through the tunnel to the fighter's area. "No! No! No!"

James met up with her almost at the same time as she actually entered the waiting area, having come from the stands from a similar downward tunnel. He looked confused as she rushed past him, unbuckling a few pieces of armor as she went, seemingly ignoring him.

"It is the law." Gorna demanded as she followed close behind the princess. "You bested me in single combat and rode me! Law demands that I am yours to command until someone can wrest me from you."

"What is goi-" James began.

"NO!" Amina said as she slammed her breastplate onto one of the many armor stands in the room. "It was a taunt during a fighting tournament. Things that go hand in hand. I had no intentions of engaging you in any kind of bond. I just wanted to win a fight."

Gorna didn't relent, stamping her hooves in frustration as she moved to cut the princess off on her way to the grinding wheels off to one side of the room.

"The accords make no concessions to situations. You have invoked a proposal." She said angrily. "You are honor bound to either marry me, lay me, or bond me as your servant, and steed, until such time as someone else comes along and invokes a proposal of their own. At which point you are required to test them in any way you see fit."

James's eyes went wide as he heard the three options. "Um." He began. But the two semi-combative women didn't even pay him any attention.

"I'm not doing any of those things." Amina said angrily. "One; I'm already married. Two; I'm already married." James raised a hand like he was trying to get a teacher's attention. Amina simply held a hand up in a gesture that told him not to even speak. He quickly nodded understanding and stayed quiet. "Three; I'm not in need of any bonded servants." She swallowed a bit, thoughts of her former pack bond with Kela running through her mind. "And I'm on my honeymoon. WITH MY HUSBAND!

"Hi." James said with an awkward smile and wave

Gorna looked at him dismissively, then back to Amina.

"I must abide by my people's rules." She said as Amina made a point of ignoring her in favor of sharpening her incredibly damaged sword. "I must serve you in some way."

"James darling." Amina said past the centaurs shoulders. "Do you have a spare long-sword in your bag?"

"Yeah." He said and reached over his shoulder and under his armor to access the bag. A moment later several feet of steel were emerging in his grip. He handed it to her, awkwardly squeezing between Gorna and the wall to get past her.

"Princess Amina. I cannot simply walk away from this. My life amongst my people would be forfeit. Especially since it occurred in such a public venue. I would be an outcast."

James winced. Even though he'd been focused on Amina, even cursory glances at the stands around him had revealed more than a few of the half horse people scattered among the crowd. It was true that there would be no DENYING that whatever had happened had happened.

Amina slipped on the grinder wheel, catching her finger in it, as Gorna spoke the words. She cursed for a moment before setting her blade edge back on it and pedaling the wheel into motion again.

Then she looked at the centaur.

"Gorna." She said stiffly. "Would you please retrieve my armor for me?"

Gorna didn't even hestitate, turning quickly and trotting the three or so steps over to the stand Amina had set it on, then back, and handing it to her.

Amina dropped it next to her feet.

"There. You've rendered me a service. And now I find your indenture as my servant... FULFILLED." Amina said with a note of finality.

"It's not that simple and you know it." Gorna said angrily.

James looked around at the other fighters, the vast majority of whom seemed to be making a point of NOT looking at the two arguing women. Minus one short and wide creature that James thought might have been made of sandstone. It stared at them with blank eyes and some kind of muddy saliva dripping from the edges of its mouth, which hung open. James looked at it curiously, wondering what it was. He was waiting for it to move, to even breath, when Amina called for him again.

"James." She called as she handed him her damaged sword. He looked at it and was surprised to find several large cracks running through it in different parts. He quickly slid it into the bag that he'd pulled the other one from. "Can you please help me with this?" She asked, pointing at Gorna.

"I have no idea what's going on." He admitted. "It sounds like some kinda werewolf packing thing like when I shot Kela." He grimaced at the thought. "And uh... yeah." He said softly as he looked up at the centaur, who was glowering down at him. "Neither of us is in a good spot, like.... emotionally.... to enter something like that any time soon. Soooooo.... Please... don't.... make us?" He said questioningly.

"The issue is not with you HERO." Gorna said testily. "Your wife is the one who invoked a rider's proposal. She must resolve it. Stay out of it."

"Do not speak to him like that." Amina said with a fierce look in her eyes.

"Apologies mistress." Gorna said with a bow.

"I'm not your mistress." Amina huffed. "I'm nobodies mistress. Please.... Leave me alone."

"I'm afraid the princess is at least correct on one front." Said a new voice. Or at least new to Amina and Gorna, James recognized it from the dressing down he'd gotten just before going up to watch Amina's match. It was the young dwarf that had read his tournament penalties and restrictions to him. "Miss Gorna Daggerdancer. Your time in the tournament is up. I have been patient. But I'm afraid I must ask you to gather your belongings and leave the fighters area so that the remaining contestants can ready themselves for their next matches."

Gorna glared down at the small Arena Staff member. Then stamped her hooves a bit more before moving toward where her personal belongings were.

"This isn't resolved Princess." She said as she left.

"Yes it is." Amina said with mock cheeriness. "Have a nice life. Better luck next tournament."

Once the centaur had been ushered out James turned back to Amina.

"Honey." He said very sternly. "What have I told you about bringing other people into our love life?"

Amina was about to say something cutting, but James continued.

"You gotta at least ask me first. Especially if they're part farm animal." He said.

Her face bore a shocked expression, then she pointed the dagger she'd been sharpening at him.

"James. That's more than a little bit racist." She said in surprise. "And very rude."

James placed the back of his hand on his forehead in a display of fake injury.

"Oh. Freshly married and my wife is already siding with her centaur girlfriend over me. What have I done to deserve such cruelty?" He asked in a Shakespearean tempo and accent. Then he made a show of walking away while clutching his heart. "And on our honeymoon!" He exclaimed over his shoulder

"She's not my girlfriend!" Amina demanded. Then she chuckled as she shook her head in exasperation.

James paused as he neared the slack jawed sandstone creature. It hadn't so much as moved from it's position, and its large black eyes seemed to be staring ahead at Amina, without actually seeing anything. It also didn't seem to be breathing, at least not as far as he could tell.

"What are you?" He asked curiously.

The creature turned to him, the motion causing a grinding noise that made James's ears hurt just a bit. It did so until it was looking up at him, drool still pouring from the sides of its mouth.

"Glag." It said simply.

"Is that what you are?" He asked. "Or your name?"

The creature, Glag potentially, moved its arm up to tap at its chest.

"Glag." It repeated.

James considered this for a moment. Then shrugged and said. "Well that was informative... Nice to meet you Glag."

"Glag." It repeated for a third time.

"Right." James said with a nod. Then he turned and continued on his way.

\----------

"Well." Said the healer as Veliry sat up and refastened the toggles on her robe. "You're with child alright."

"You're certain?" Veliry asked as she got the last toggle in place.

"Oh yes." The elderly woman said as she wrote on her notepad. "The life energy there is Very strong."

"It is?" Veliry asked in surprise.

"Oh very much so. In fact it's siphoned quite a bit of energy from you." She said with a smile.

"It has?" Veliry asked. She knew from her studies that pregnant women gave a portion of their magic to their babies while they were in the womb. But it wasn't supposed to be a lot. Not that that was her field of expertise.

"Relax dear." The healer assured her with a hand over hers. "It's likely just because you're a high level magic users. It's more than normal. But not what I would consider ABNORMAL. Although who knows with how its conception was um... how did you put it? Blessed?"

"Deity empowered." Veliry corrected absently.

"Right. Well... I'm going to call it blessed. Easier to say." The healer said with a light chuckle. "Plus I don't know much about Gods except that they exist."

Veliry ignored the nonsense. "It's siphoning a lot from me." She said, rewinding the conversation a bit. "But I don't HAVE a lot of magic to give right now. Practically none."

"That is true." The healer agreed. "But you've said yourself that you're working on getting it back. Right?"

"I am. But I can barely spark a candle right now." Veliry admitted.

"And maybe that level of weakness is necessary." The healer said.

"What do you mean?" Veliry asked.

The old woman seemed to think for a while.

"Well... It's not often. But sometimes... just every once in a while. When a woman gets pregnant. She'll find herself drained. Physically obviously, especially once they get to the point where they can't sleep for more than twenty minutes before the babe steps on their bladder, and they waddle around like a rhonetops." She chuckled and Veliry couldn't help but smile too. Though she wasn't looking forward to that part of the pregnancy. "But sometimes it's magical too." The healer continued. "Typically that will happen if the unborn child has some kind of.... well... I don't mean to worry you... but if they're sickly, or have a malformation. The magic floods into them, just like it does with our normal bodies, and attempts to fix the damage before it can set in permanently. Am I making sense?"

The thoughts of the developmental struggles Joey, the father, had gone through his entire life, and how they were a combination of unlucky genetics and brain chemistry, ran through her mind.

And suddenly she worried that their child might have to struggle through similar hardships, and hoped that the magic focusing on the unborn child would right the issue before it was born.

"You are." She said as she looked down at her stomach, which still hadn't grown, and likely wouldn't for another month or so.

"I wouldn't worry about it." The healer said with another congenial pat of her hand. "As long as the magical drain doesn't cut off unexpectedly... or increase dramatically AND unexpectedly.... I wouldn't worry about it. In the mean time, keep training, keep trying to grow your reserves. That will only help. And let us know if anything changes.

"I will." Veliry said with a smile that wasn't 100% authentic. "Say. Is Nurse Choi on shift today? I'd like to give her the.... um... good?... news."

The healer smiled. "She should have clocked in only a few minutes ago. Let's see if we can track her down and let her know how her grandson is developing."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11wx56u/wait_is_this_just_gate_332/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (330/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey, a drawn out, detailed POV of Amina kicking ass. That's a nice change of pace. And she's learned some stuff from James. (not all of them are good)

And don't worry there's only like, a few more chapters of this tournament arc before we move on. Plus we're gonna check back in with Earth soon.

Enjoy.

\~

James listened along as the Arena staff member read off the penalties for his actions in the previous match.

"Each match will start with you at a two point disadvantage, one martial and one magic point each." The young dwarf said over their spectacles. "The erm... firearms... as you called them, have been banned from future matches."

James nodded and tucked the two pistols into the bottomless bag that he'd slung over his shoulder in anticipation of that. "Yep." He said as his medallion translated the languages for him.

"Additionally if any blood is intentionally drawn in any of your remaining matches they will be grounds for immediate disqualification and forfeiture of any rewards earned up to that point, including self-bets." The dwarf finished as they rolled the scroll up and tucked it into their robes. "Do you accept?"

"Even the self-bets?" James asked incredulously. Admittedly it was only a hundred gold. But he still didn't like that. "Even though those are put down OUTSIDE the arena?"

"If we allowed self-bets to stand when someone was KNOWINGLY injuring their opponents it would bring the bettors themselves into doubt." The dwarf replied. "Therefore those bets would be stricken to maintain the odds of the tournament."

James sighed. "Fine." He said as he looked around. "I accept."

"Witnessed?" The dwarf asked.

Commander Tyrius, having pushed the normal guard aside so that he could bear witness grumbled. "Witnessed." He said gruffly.

"Cool." James said as he cinched his armor back down over his bottomless bag to keep it safe. "I'm gonna go watch my wife's fight."

"Don't let it happen again." Tyrius rumbled.

James spun lazily as he walked, a huge FAKE smile on his face, and saluted sarcastically.

"ROGER THAT SIR!" He barked out in a rapidly modulated voice meant to make him sound goofy.

Then he spun back around and walked over toward the tunnel leading to the pit Amina was currently fighting in. After making his way up the steps and into the stands he took a seat. He made a point of ignoring how the handful of other fighters shifted uncomfortably. One even stood up and relocated.

Below the sound of spell blasts and clanging metal drew is focus.

He smiled, genuinely this time, as he watched her go to work.

\----------

Amina rushed forward, her shield deflecting the blasts of stone-laden wind easily as her opponent attempted, unsuccessfully, to maintain their distance.

A dagger spun through the air in an arc that shouldn't have been possible and whirred in to strike her from the side her shield wasn't defending. The blade of her sword flashed out and deflected it easily, only for the dagger to continue flying off in a wide arc that she knew would bring it back in mere moments.

She felt a tug from her shield as it attempted to ward off another projectile, but it was still being buffeted by the debris and wind magic. She'd gotten used to its pull though, and dove over one of the stone columns that had been brought down well before the current fight, and rolled underneath a second magically flying dagger.

Two down. She thought as she rapidly rolled back to her feet, using the pull of her shield as an impromptu axis of rotation as she did, then she flipped up in a sideways somersault as the third dagger arced in from above and buried itself in the sand where she'd just been standing.

Three! One more.

Her shield pulled up and to the side and she let it guide itself as her sword arm moved to take its place. Her sword's blade bisected a rock that was flying towards her just as two of the fingers gripping it loosened and pointed at the centaur that was her opponent. A blast of fire, hot and pinpointed into a beam, shot through the blast of wind and rock and struck out at the dagger dancing mage. At the same moment there was a loud clang as her shield deflected the last of the enchanted daggers.

She landed from the airborne spin, and was on the verge of rushing in to go for a hit, when the announcer spoke.

"YANTAS!" The elderly elf woman said from her spot above the pit. "PETRAVIUS!" And another white flag moved to Amina's side. She only needed two more for the match to be over. She'd already won, but the extra points would put her higher up in the tournament brackets.

Amina stood, knowing that this round was over, and looked over to see a large black scorch mark on the centaur's leg as they hobbled over to their starting position again, the four enchanted daggers slotting themselves back in their respective sheathes.

"You alright to continue?" She asked, partly mocking, but also legitimately concerned. She hadn't actually been aiming for their leg, simply trying to force them to trip up or slow down. So it had been a hot spell compared to most she'd sent at them.

Her opponent, Gorna, reached down and rubbed some of the singed hair off her leg and then spit on it.

"Fine." She said in a thick accent that reminded Amina of some of the zealots to the south of Petravus. Then she looked up at the announcer and nodded. Amina did the same.

When the flag dropped Gorna did something that Amina had been expecting earlier. As soon as the flag fell, her hands blurred down to the sheathed daggers and rapidly unleashed all four simultaneously, instead of staggering them like she had in previous rounds. Apparently the burned leg had finally pushed her to desperation.

The upside, as far as Amina was concerned as she began running forward, was that she would only have to defend from one concentrated attack from the blades, as opposed to four seemingly random ones.

The down side was that they were all coming in from four differently angled arcs, and at vastly different speeds.

Four different speeds and angles that Amina would have to defend from all at once, while also avoiding her opponent's magical attacks.

A normal warrior, having an animated defensive item like her shield, would likely have opted to stand their ground and go blow for blow with the offensive.

But Amina decided to take a page from James's playbook. She still didn't know what a playbook was. Football made no sense to her, even after he'd explained it in depth. It barely even involved feet. But that wasn't important right now.

Amina dashed forward, her shield ahead of her to defend from the incoming wind, debris, and lightning that Gorna was throwing at her, and her sword hand pointing backwards and blasting out wind magic in a jet. It was a trick James had taught her that he used to stabilize his flying.

She used it to run faster.

Gorna leaped back as fast as she could, her eyes wide in surprise at the unexpected offensive rush. But her quadrupedal body wasn't good at going backwards, and she ended up stumbling a bit. She tried to regain her footing and dodge to the side, when Amina did something even more unexpected.

"MEET ME BLADE TO BLADE!"

The princess yelled, throat glowing, in a voice that, at this range, made the centaur lose focus on her spells and clamp her hands over her ears. Behind Amina the four daggers wavered in their pursuing flight, two of them even clattering into each other and being forced into different arcs as a result.

Gorna cringed from the audio onslaught, her eyes closing reflexively from the hit she knew was coming.

But it didn't. Instead, something heavy landed on her back.

She looked back to see Princess Amina sitting on her like she was a horse.

"YOU DISRESPECTFUL BI-"

"Heads up." Amina said as she pointed in front of Gorna. "Incoming."

Then the realization hit Gorna.

She turned back just in time for two of her own daggers to slam into her chest plate, causing the magical device there to glow blue.

"YANTAS!" The announcer exclaimed. "PETRAVIUS!" And the second to last flag went to Amina's side.

"Thank you horsey." Amina said with a devious smile as she hopped off of Gorna's back and skipped over to her side of the pit.

"I OUGHT TO KILL YOU!" Gorna said venomously.

"Do try." Amina said. "Maybe it'll actually get you a point."

The two of them signaled their readiness again.

The flag dropped, and Gorna the Dagger Dancer unleashed her fiercest onslaught of the tournament.

Her four daggers once again blurred out of their sheathes and into the air. But instead of arcing out to the side, they came straight for Amina.

The largest difference however, was that instead of using her magic to attack Amina directly, Gorna used her wind magic with both hands to speed up her daggers, in much the same way that Amina had just used wind magic to speed up her charge only moments before.

The first of the enchanted blades slammed into Amina's shield like a hammer strike from an orc, and she found herself pushed back ever so slightly as the blade rebounded away. She didn't have time to track it however, as the second one met her shield only a split second after. What was worse was that the excess wind magic that was bolstering the projectiles was splashing against her shield like a non stop tidal wave.

She quickly found herself being pushed back against her will as her feet slid in the somewhat loose sand.

Well now. She thought as she focused on trying to track the arcing blades, which were still moving faster than before. It would appear that I legitimately struck a nerve there.

A third hammer blow from one of the daggers and her sword arm lashed out as she deflected the first blade, which had already returned for its second strike.

Her blade rung nearly as loudly as her shield had, just in time for the fourth dagger to hit it too. Then, despite her hand stinging from the impact, she had to spun underneath her shield and deflect the second dagger on its second strike.

I might have messed up by angering her. She thought as her shield struggled between wanting to defend against multiple rapid speed attacks.

wind enhanced, enchanted, controlled, daggers began hammering at her from all sides. It was all she could do to keep her sword and shield between them, and unlike James her sword wasn't enchanted. She could see the edges getting nicked and battered with each successful block. She started to augment the blade's defense by alternating it with blasts of wind jets from her fingers. On both hands when possible.

And to her surprise, Gorna began to move in.

"YOU DARE TO RIDE ME!?!?" She asked as her hands moved in front of her in slashing arcs as they manipulated the dancing blades like puppet strings. "AGAINST MY WILL!?!?!"

Amina was spinning like a child's top across the pit, shield moving mostly of its own volition as her sword blurred around her, and jets of high pressure wind lashed out in pin point strikes against the eager weapons.

"I WILL CRUSH YOU BENEATH MY HOOVES!" Gorna yelled.

As Amina neared one of the wooden columns in the arena, she improvised. Her left leg lashed out and struck the wood with the metal of her greaves leading. She wasn't as insanely strong as James, and especially not Vickers. But she was still superhuman compared to (pre-magic) Earth standards. That coupled with unknowingly slipping into a lesser form of the battle rage she'd entered in the desert, and the wood shattered like it was made of porcelain.

Amina made one last dodge of a dagger as the column fell, and threw her sword at Gorna to try and buy herself a moment. She also launched her shield up above her in a spin, sending it in the direction that it had been trying to go, and letting it guide itself somewhat on an intercept with the next strike.

As the numerous projectiles clashed against eachother, and as Gorna leapt aside to dodge the flying, Amina caught the falling wooden column with both hands and quickly heaved it overhead. She engaged her voice of authority again, even louder this time.

"CATCH!"

She yelled as she threw the entire nine feet or so of solid wood at Gorna lengthwise. The centaur's eyes once again went wide at the sight of the massive projectile. It was flying fast, but it's arc wasn't good, and it was flying low, towards her legs. She made to leap over the mass of wood.

But Amina hadn't stayed still to watch the column fly toward its target. She couldn't there were still, despite her distractions, daggers flying through the air much faster than they should have been.

Once again she charged.

Gorna realized her mistake just in time to pay for it. She cleared the flying column easily enough.

Then Amina's armored forearm slammed into her neck in a flying clothesline attack as she too flew through the air right behind the massive projectile.

Gorna, despite outweighing the princess by at least a thousand pounds if not more, found herself slammed onto her back in brutal fashion as the princess crashed down on top of her. Then she watched as the princess was slammed into the wall by her still flying daggers, which crashed into her back even as the announcer yelled out her victory.

"YANTAS! PETRAVIUS!" The announcer exclaimed to the roar of the crowd as Gorna attempted to redirect the last few daggers. She barely succeeded as the princess staggered and rolled out of their way before the last two redirected to the wall a few yards away.

Gorna was still mad. But she had lost fair and square. The extra attacks, while satisfying, wouldn't change that.

To her surprise, and despite what had to have been a punishing blow to the back, the princess held her hand out to Gorna.

Gorna stared at it awkwardly. Then accepted it and used the Princesses strength to help roll herself over and onto her legs.

"Now that's the fight I wanted to have from the beginning." Amina said with a smile. "Where was that in the three previous magic rounds?"

Gorna huffed in exasperation.

"I was hoping... to save it for the later rounds of the tournament." She admitted testily.

"Shouldn't have." Amina said easily. "I don't know if I would have won against you if I'd had to endure FOUR rounds of fighting like that." She stretched her back a bit as she rubbed it. "Might not have survived one. That hit hurt like hell."

"You rode me." Gorna hissed through clenched teeth.

"Yeah. Sorry about that." Amina said. "And the horsey comment. I know it's a bit of a touchy subject with your people. But I needed to get you riled up. I'd never do that anywhere but in a tournament like this."

"Hey babe!" James yelled from the nearby railing. "Great fight!"

Amina beamed up at him.

"You defeated me in battle." Gorna said, drawing Amina's attention back to her. "And you RODE me."

"Oh shit." Amina said as she realized what the defeated centaur was getting at. "Oh no."

"She seems mad." James said. "Your banter game is really improving hon." He said as he leaned against the railing with a huge grin on his face. "I'm finally teaching you for a change."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11u5hgy/wait_is_this_just_gate_331/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (330/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey, a drawn out, detailed POV of Amina kicking ass. That's a nice change of pace. And she's learned some stuff from James. (not all of them are good)

And don't worry there's only like, a few more chapters of this tournament arc before we move on. Plus we're gonna check back in with Earth soon.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

James nodded and tucked the two pistols into the bottomless bag that he'd slung over his shoulder in anticipation of that. "Yep." He said as his medallion translated the languages for him.

"Additionally if any blood is intentionally drawn in any of your remaining matches they will be grounds for immediate disqualification and forfeiture of any rewards earned up to that point, including self-bets." The dwarf finished as they rolled the scroll up and tucked it into their robes. "Do you accept?"

"Even the self-bets?" James asked incredulously. Admittedly it was only a hundred gold. But he still didn't like that. "Even though those are put down OUTSIDE the arena?"

"If we allowed self-bets to stand when someone was KNOWINGLY injuring their opponents it would bring the bettors themselves into doubt." The dwarf replied. "Therefore those bets would be stricken to maintain the odds of the tournament."

James sighed. "Fine." He said as he looked around. "I accept."

"Witnessed?" The dwarf asked.

Commander Tyrius, having pushed the normal guard aside so that he could bear witness grumbled. "Witnessed." He said gruffly.

"Cool." James said as he cinched his armor back down over his bottomless bag to keep it safe. "I'm gonna go watch my wife's fight."

"Don't let it happen again." Tyrius rumbled.

James spun lazily as he walked, a huge FAKE smile on his face, and saluted sarcastically.

"ROGER THAT SIR!" He barked out in a rapidly modulated voice meant to make him sound goofy.

Then he spun back around and walked over toward the tunnel leading to the pit Amina was currently fighting in. After making his way up the steps and into the stands he took a seat. He made a point of ignoring how the handful of other fighters shifted uncomfortably. One even stood up and relocated.

Below the sound of spell blasts and clanging metal drew his focus.

He smiled, genuinely this time, as he watched her go to work.

\----------

Amina rushed forward, her shield deflecting the blasts of stone-laden wind easily as her opponent attempted, unsuccessfully, to maintain their distance.

A dagger spun through the air in an arc that shouldn't have been possible and whirred in to strike her from the side her shield wasn't defending. The blade of her sword flashed out and deflected it easily, only for the dagger to continue flying off in a wide arc that she knew would bring it back in mere moments.

She felt a tug from her shield as it attempted to ward off another projectile, but it was still being buffeted by the debris and wind magic. She'd gotten used to its pull though, and dove over one of the stone columns that had been brought down well before the current fight, and rolled underneath a second magically flying dagger.

Two down. She thought as she rapidly rolled back to her feet, using the pull of her shield as an impromptu axis of rotation as she did, then she flipped up in a sideways somersault as the third dagger arced in from above and buried itself in the sand where she'd just been standing.

Three! One more.

Her shield pulled up and to the side and she let it guide itself as her sword arm moved to take its place. Her sword's blade bisected a rock that was flying towards her just as two of the fingers gripping it loosened and pointed at the centaur that was her opponent. A blast of fire, hot and pinpointed into a beam, shot through the blast of wind and rock and struck out at the dagger dancing mage. At the same moment there was a loud clang as her shield deflected the last of the enchanted daggers.

She landed from the airborne spin, and was on the verge of rushing in to go for a hit, when the announcer spoke.

"YANTAS!" The elderly elf woman said from her spot above the pit. "PETRAVIUS!" And another white flag moved to Amina's side. She only needed two more for the match to be over. She'd already won, but the extra points would put her higher up in the tournament brackets.

Amina stood, knowing that this round was over, and looked over to see a large black scorch mark on the centaur's leg as they hobbled over to their starting position again, the four enchanted daggers slotting themselves back in their respective sheathes.

"You alright to continue?" She asked, partly mocking, but also legitimately concerned. She hadn't actually been aiming for their leg, simply trying to force them to trip up or slow down. So it had been a hot spell compared to most she'd sent at them.

Her opponent, Gorna, reached down and rubbed some of the singed hair off her leg and then spit on it.

"Fine." She said in a thick accent that reminded Amina of some of the zealots to the south of Petravus. Then she looked up at the announcer and nodded. Amina did the same.

When the flag dropped Gorna did something that Amina had been expecting earlier. As soon as the flag fell, her hands blurred down to the sheathed daggers and rapidly unleashed all four simultaneously, instead of staggering them like she had in previous rounds. Apparently the burned leg had finally pushed her to desperation.

The upside, as far as Amina was concerned as she began running forward, was that she would only have to defend from one concentrated attack from the blades, as opposed to four seemingly random ones.

The down side was that they were all coming in from four differently angled arcs, and at vastly different speeds.

Four different speeds and angles that Amina would have to defend from all at once, while also avoiding her opponent's magical attacks.

A normal warrior, having an animated defensive item like her shield, would likely have opted to stand their ground and go blow for blow with the offensive.

But Amina decided to take a page from James's playbook. She still didn't know what a playbook was. Football made no sense to her, even after he'd explained it in depth. It barely even involved feet. But that wasn't important right now.

Amina dashed forward, her shield ahead of her to defend from the incoming wind, debris, and lightning that Gorna was throwing at her, and her sword hand pointing backwards and blasting out wind magic in a jet. It was a trick James had taught her that he used to stabilize his flying.

She used it to run faster.

Gorna leaped back as fast as she could, her eyes wide in surprise at the unexpected offensive rush. But her quadrupedal body wasn't good at going backwards, and she ended up stumbling a bit. She tried to regain her footing and dodge to the side, when Amina did something even more unexpected.

"MEET ME BLADE TO BLADE!"

The princess yelled, throat glowing, in a voice that, at this range, made the centaur lose focus on her spells and clamp her hands over her ears. Behind Amina the four daggers wavered in their pursuing flight, two of them even clattering into each other and being forced into different arcs as a result.

Gorna cringed from the audio onslaught, her eyes closing reflexively from the hit she knew was coming.

But it didn't. Instead, something heavy landed on her back.

She looked back to see Princess Amina sitting on her like she was a horse.

"YOU DISRESPECTFUL BI-"

"Heads up." Amina said as she pointed in front of Gorna. "Incoming."

Then the realization hit Gorna.

She turned back just in time for two of her own daggers to slam into her chest plate, causing the magical device there to glow blue.

"YANTAS!" The announcer exclaimed. "PETRAVIUS!" And the second to last flag went to Amina's side.

"Thank you horsey." Amina said with a devious smile as she hopped off of Gorna's back and skipped over to her side of the pit.

"I OUGHT TO KILL YOU!" Gorna said venomously.

"Do try." Amina said. "Maybe it'll actually get you a point."

The two of them signaled their readiness again.

The flag dropped, and Gorna the Dagger Dancer unleashed her fiercest onslaught of the tournament.

Her four daggers once again blurred out of their sheathes and into the air. But instead of arcing out to the side, they came straight for Amina.

The largest difference however, was that instead of using her magic to attack Amina directly, Gorna used her wind magic with both hands to speed up her daggers, in much the same way that Amina had just used wind magic to speed up her charge only moments before.

The first of the enchanted blades slammed into Amina's shield like a hammer strike from an orc, and she found herself pushed back ever so slightly as the blade rebounded away. She didn't have time to track it however, as the second one met her shield only a split second after. What was worse was that the excess wind magic that was bolstering the projectiles was splashing against her shield like a non stop tidal wave.

She quickly found herself being pushed back against her will as her feet slid in the somewhat loose sand.

Well now. She thought as she focused on trying to track the arcing blades, which were still moving faster than before. It would appear that I legitimately struck a nerve there.

A third hammer blow from one of the daggers and her sword arm lashed out as she deflected the first blade, which had already returned for its second strike.

Her blade rung nearly as loudly as her shield had, just in time for the fourth dagger to hit it too. Then, despite her hand stinging from the impact, she had to spin underneath her shield and deflect the second dagger on its second strike.

I might have messed up by angering her. She thought as her shield struggled between wanting to defend against multiple rapid speed attacks.

Wind enhanced, enchanted, controlled, daggers began hammering at her from all sides. It was all she could do to keep her sword and shield between them, and unlike James her sword wasn't enchanted. She could see the edges getting nicked and battered with each successful block. She started to augment the blade's defense by alternating it with blasts of wind jets from her fingers. On both hands when possible.

And to her surprise, Gorna began to move in.

"YOU DARE TO RIDE ME!?!?" She asked as her hands moved in front of her in slashing arcs as they manipulated the dancing blades like puppet strings. "AGAINST MY WILL!?!?!"

Amina was spinning like a child's top across the pit, shield moving mostly of its own volition as her sword blurred around her, and jets of high pressure wind lashed out in pin point strikes against the eager weapons.

"I WILL CRUSH YOU BENEATH MY HOOVES!" Gorna yelled.

As Amina neared one of the wooden columns in the arena, she improvised. Her left leg lashed out and struck the wood with the metal of her greaves leading. She wasn't as insanely strong as James, and especially not Vickers. But she was still superhuman compared to (pre-magic) Earth standards. That coupled with unknowingly slipping into a lesser form of the battle rage she'd entered in the desert, and the wood shattered like it was made of porcelain.

Amina made one last dodge of a dagger as the column fell, and threw her sword at Gorna to try and buy herself a moment. She also launched her shield up above her in a spin, sending it in the direction that it had been trying to go, and letting it guide itself somewhat on an intercept with the next strike.

As the numerous projectiles clashed against eachother, and as Gorna leapt aside to dodge the flying sword, Amina caught the falling wooden column with both hands and quickly heaved it overhead. She engaged her voice of authority again, even louder this time.

"CATCH!"

She yelled as she threw the entire nine feet or so of solid wood at Gorna lengthwise. The centaur's eyes once again went wide at the sight of the massive projectile. It was flying fast, but it's arc wasn't good, and it was flying low, towards her legs. She made to leap over the mass of wood.

But Amina hadn't stayed still to watch the column fly toward its target. She couldn't there were still, despite her distractions, daggers flying through the air much faster than they should have been.

Once again she charged.

Gorna realized her mistake just in time to pay for it. She cleared the flying column easily enough.

Then Amina's armored forearm slammed into her neck in a flying clothesline attack as she too flew through the air right behind the massive projectile.

Gorna, despite outweighing the princess by at least a thousand pounds if not more, found herself slammed onto her back in brutal fashion as the princess crashed down on top of her. Then she watched as the princess was slammed into the wall by her still flying daggers, which crashed into her back even as the announcer yelled out her victory.

"YANTAS! PETRAVIUS!" The announcer exclaimed to the roar of the crowd as Gorna attempted to redirect the last few daggers. She barely succeeded as the princess staggered and rolled out of their way before the last two redirected to the wall a few yards away.

Gorna was still mad. But she had lost fair and square. The extra attacks, while satisfying, wouldn't change that.

To her surprise, and despite what had to have been a punishing blow to the back, the princess held her hand out to Gorna.

Gorna stared at it awkwardly. Then accepted it and used the Princesses strength to help roll herself over and onto her legs.

"Now that's the fight I wanted to have from the beginning." Amina said with a smile. "Where was that in the three previous magic rounds?"

Gorna huffed in exasperation.

"I was hoping... to save it for the later rounds of the tournament." She admitted testily.

"Shouldn't have." Amina said easily. "I don't know if I would have won against you if I'd had to endure FOUR rounds of fighting like that." She stretched her back a bit as she rubbed it. "Might not have survived one. That hit hurt like hell."

"You rode me." Gorna hissed through clenched teeth.

"Yeah. Sorry about that." Amina said. "And the horsey comment. I know it's a bit of a touchy subject with your people. But I needed to get you riled up. I'd never do that anywhere but in a tournament like this."

"Hey babe!" James yelled from the nearby railing. "Great fight!"

Amina beamed up at him.

"You defeated me in battle." Gorna said, drawing Amina's attention back to her. "And you RODE me."

"Oh shit." Amina said as she realized what the defeated centaur was getting at. "Oh no."

"She seems mad." James said. "Your banter game is really improving hon." He said as he leaned against the railing with a huge grin on his face. "I'm finally teaching you for a change."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11u5ez9/wait_is_this_just_gate_331/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (329/?)

Previous

Writer's note: INTONIGHT'SEPISODE!.... James does a violence. The Muck Marchers make a choice. And Vickers wears two pairs of pants at once.

Enjoy.

\~

"I YIELD!" Vorea pleaded as he desperately backpedaled with one leg and the opposite arm. The other leg dragged limply, leaving a trail of blood in the sand that looked eerily like the material his zombies HAD been made of. His other hand furiously beat at the device adhered to his chest armor, making it flash with a bright red light. Smoke trailed from the desperate necromancer's hair and the charred edges of his robes.

James stalked forward, snapping the cylinder of his .357 back into place before cocking the hammer back. His eyes blazed with rage as he stomped over the bloodied sand toward the downed man.

Somewhere, distantly and mixed in with the cries of the crowd, both the announcer and Amina were yelling at him.

But all James could hear was his own heartbeat pounding in his ears as he pressed the still hot barrel of the revolver against Vorea's throat. The man cried out in pain as his skin their burned and James leaned in close.

Suddenly the entire arena seemed to silence, and James felt magic flood the area as some kind of shimmer snapped into place around the pit that he and the summoner had been fighting in. His other hand snapped up as his hand and eyes darted around with his .45, looking for whoever had put the new spell in place unexpectedly. It definitely hadn't been Vorea.

"Captain Choi." Said the familiar, and surprisingly relaxed, voice of the Emperor's voice Soleen. "Please stop."

She was standing up on the announcer's position, the announcer having been ushered aside, and the Emperor stood next to her gesticulating with his hands in the way he did. James wasn't currently wearing his medallion, and so couldn't understand him.

James looked back at the whimpering necromancer beneath his revolver's barrel.

"I warned you." He said. "I said no loved ones."

"I'm sorry!" Vorea exclaimed. "I'msorryIshouldhavelistened!"

"Captain Choi." Soleen said again. "Unhand the mage."

James stared at Vorea a second longer, then pulled the revolver back and tapped him on the forehead, eliciting a cry of shock.

"Lucky." He whispered. Then he stood up, holstering the two weapons as he did. He turned and looked at the Emperor and his translator and bowed sarcastically, arms out wide to the side.

Then he walked out of the arena, crunching over the shattered slag that had once been a horde of blood sand zombies, and the similarly destroyed form of his dead friend's champion body.

The shield and whatever silence spell had accompanied it weren't necessary to keep the crowd quiet, as they watched the mysterious man from another world stalk out of the arena in shocked silence.

Amina looked at the defeated necromancer as the shield dropped and the noise of his pained whimpers reached everyone's ears.

She was conflicted. On the one hand James had... well, not overreacted. She couldn't call it that. But that had definitely not been a healthy response. Especially for Vorea.

But on the other hand the defeated man had chosen the literal worst way to try to mess with James. And she'd been as enraged as James had when she'd seen Kela's form once more.

After a moment she ran back to the tunnel back down to the fighter's area.

\------------------------

The Emperor turned to leave, back to the main arena seats that he preferred over pit one. But as he did he signed at Commander Tyrius. Soleen translated for the half orc.

"Still think you could have stopped him?" She said for him.

Tyrius simply stared, mouth slightly agape, at the destruction below, and the bleeding whimpering form of Vorea as the Arena staff put him on a stretcher.

He jumped just a tiny bit as one of the remaining stone columns in the pit collapsed unexpectedly from the damage it had suffered.

He and Vorea had worked together before. Had even fought together a few times. To say that the necromancer's skill-set was powerful was an understatement. Vorea had literally turned the tide of battles that the Imperial Army had been losing before.

And the Summoned Hero had just reduced him to a whimpering, potentially crippled, mess. All while single-handedly clearing out Vorea's mob of summons, which at the start of the fight had swelled until they'd practically filled the pit.

And in his mind, Tyrius had to admit that he'd never be able to compare to the power of the small, strange looking, man who had threatened his Emperor only a day before.

Then he turned and jogged to catch up.

\---

"That's your.... solution?" Driscoll asked between machine induced breaths. "Trade in... a mechanical... body.... for one made.... of fur and claws?"

Vickers, fitting in the rubber suit a bit better now that his body had begun transitioning back to a more human form, nodded and pointed at Five, who was back in an induced coma again. They'd given her the cocktail of drugs to wake her back up. But the toolies assured him that she needed to go back down as soon as she could.

"She doesn't have a lot of time left." Vickers said grimly. Then he pulled up one of the chairs and sat in it. "Look. I aint gonna lie to you tin can. Even if you DO go through with this. It'll probably kill you. And even if it doesn't kill you. It'll probably drive you insane and I... will have to kill you. Or a member of the were-folk's guard will because you'll lose your mind and become a rabid monster."

"Is this... supposed to... sell me on this?" Driscoll asked with a laugh that quickly turned into wet coughing as the machine breathing for him struggled to handle the situation.

"No." Vickers said. "Cause even if you survive with your mind intact. The pain of it happening was enough that even I damn near shit myself and quit halfway through." He left out the part where, technically, he did shit himself. "And I wasn't even regrowing any limbs or organs or anything. you would be."

"This.... is a great... pitch." Driscoll wheezed.

"Well your other option is sitting here dying in a bucket full of what I'm assuming is YOUR shit." Vickers countered. "Oh yeah, and not coming with me to fuck up any Agency shit we find."

THAT got the Muck Marcher's attention.

Driscoll seemed to deflate a bit at that, then nodded his head a bit as he considered it. He had to admit that he wasn't exactly IMPROVING while he sat here waiting for his damaged equipment to fail a bit more each day. Five was basically already gone.

As if on cue, Five gasped awake. The toolie on duty went over and began checking her vitals as she slowly swam back to consciousness.

While the two of them waited, Driscoll turned back to Vickers. "I'll only say yes... if she does." He said. "Not gonna let... the last member... of my crew.... go through anything.... else... alone.... On either.... side."

Vickers thought about it for a minute, then nodded. He could respect that.

After about twenty minutes or so, Five was conscious enough for Vickers to give her the same offer as Driscoll. She thought about it for a few minutes, her eyes slowly de-glazing more and more as the drugs wore off.

"I don't have to be a fucking cat do I?" She asked in a slur. "I fuckin hate cats."

Vickers chuckled a bit. "No." He said as he pulled up the Ziploc bag with the letter from the Lunar Council in it. "No I've been given the names and contact info for some people here in the capital who are approved to perform conversions."

He told them the species that they could choose from, his own included. Five made her choice quickly, causing Driscoll to look at her in surprise.

"What?" She asked as she noticed his confusion. "They're cute. Besides I didn't really expect to wake up from that nap. Fuckin' fursuit me up Garfield." She said to Vickers. "Never had a backup plan anyways. Alternatives are fuckin sweeeeeeet." She said in a long, drawn out, slur that resulted in her head lolling back as she passed out. The toolie rushed over and shook his head as he read her vitals again.

"I've gotta put her back under." He said as he prepped the injections. "And I gotta do a flush."

"That's my cue to leave." Vickers said as he stood up. "Sterile suit or not. I can still smell stuff in here. i don't need that in my nose."

"Chief."

Vickers turned and looked at Driscoll curiously.

"Option three please." The Muck Marcher said simply.

Vickers looked back down at the list.

"Really?" He wondered.

"Used to have... a tattoo.." Driscoll admitted. Then he looked down. "On my calf.... Cause of an old nickname..... my grandma used... to call me."

Vickers tried to think of what that nickname could be. Driscoll beat him to it.

"Not English." He said. "Sionnach.... Cause of my hair."

Vickers looked up at the head of the Muck Marcher. Like Five, he was bald. Though whether it was bald because the toolies kept it that way for the suit, or from the sickness or whatever had put him in the suit in the first place, Vickers didn't know.

"Fair enough." He said as he opened the door and walked back into the decontamination air lock.

Once he was on the other side he went out into the capital to get in touch with the two people listed in the letter, and to get the supplies that would be necessary for the conversion.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11t86rb/wait_is_this_just_gate_330/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (329/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: INTONIGHT'SEPISODE!.... James does a violence. The Muck Marchers make a choice. And Vickers wears two pairs of pants at once.

Enjoy.

\~

"I YIELD!" Vorea pleaded as he desperately backpedaled with one leg and the opposite arm. The other leg dragged limply, leaving a trail of blood in the sand that looked eerily like the material his zombies HAD been made of. His other hand furiously beat at the device adhered to his chest armor, making it flash with a bright red light. Smoke trailed from the desperate necromancer's hair and the charred edges of his robes.

James stalked forward, snapping the cylinder of his .357 back into place before cocking the hammer back. His eyes blazed with rage as he stomped over the bloodied sand toward the downed man.

Somewhere, distantly and mixed in with the cries of the crowd, both the announcer and Amina were yelling at him.

But all James could hear was his own heartbeat pounding in his ears as he pressed the still hot barrel of the revolver against Vorea's throat. The man cried out in pain as his skin their burned and James leaned in close.

Suddenly the entire arena seemed to silence, and James felt magic flood the area as some kind of shimmer snapped into place around the pit that he and the summoner had been fighting in. His other hand snapped up as his hand and eyes darted around with his .45, looking for whoever had put the new spell in place unexpectedly. It definitely hadn't been Vorea.

"Captain Choi." Said the familiar, and surprisingly relaxed, voice of the Emperor's voice Soleen. "Please stop."

She was standing up on the announcer's position, the announcer having been ushered aside, and the Emperor stood next to her gesticulating with his hands in the way he did. James wasn't currently wearing his medallion, and so couldn't understand him.

James looked back at the whimpering necromancer beneath his revolver's barrel.

"I warned you." He said. "I said no loved ones."

"I'm sorry!" Vorea exclaimed. "I'msorryIshouldhavelistened!"

"Captain Choi." Soleen said again. "Unhand the mage."

James stared at Vorea a second longer, then pulled the revolver back and tapped him on the forehead, eliciting a cry of shock.

"Lucky." He whispered. Then he stood up, holstering the two weapons as he did. He turned and looked at the Emperor and his translator and bowed sarcastically, arms out wide to the side.

Then he walked out of the arena, crunching over the shattered slag that had once been a horde of blood sand zombies, and the similarly destroyed form of his dead friend's champion body.

The shield and whatever silence spell had accompanied it weren't necessary to keep the crowd quiet, as they watched the mysterious man from another world stalk out of the arena in shocked silence.

Amina looked at the defeated necromancer as the shield dropped and the noise of his pained whimpers reached everyone's ears.

She was conflicted. On the one hand James had... well, not overreacted. She couldn't call it that. But that had definitely not been a healthy response. Especially for Vorea.

But on the other hand the defeated man had chosen the literal worst way to try to mess with James. And she'd been as enraged as James had when she'd seen Kela's form once more.

After a moment she ran back to the tunnel back down to the fighter's area.

\------------------------

The Emperor turned to leave, back to the main arena seats that he preferred over pit one. But as he did he signed at Commander Tyrius. Soleen translated for the half orc.

"Still think you could have stopped him?" She said for him.

Tyrius simply stared, mouth slightly agape, at the destruction below, and the bleeding whimpering form of Vorea as the Arena staff put him on a stretcher.

He jumped just a tiny bit as one of the remaining stone columns in the pit collapsed unexpectedly from the damage it had suffered.

He and Vorea had worked together before. Had even fought together a few times. To say that the necromancer's skill-set was powerful was an understatement. Vorea had literally turned the tide of battles that the Imperial Army had been losing before.

And the Summoned Hero had just reduced him to a whimpering, potentially crippled, mess. All while single-handedly clearing out Vorea's mob of summons, which at the start of the fight had swelled until they'd practically filled the pit.

And in his mind, Tyrius had to admit that he'd never be able to compare to the power of the small, strange looking, man who had threatened his Emperor only a day before.

Then he turned and jogged to catch up.

\--------------------------------

"That's your.... solution?" Driscoll asked between machine induced breaths. "Trade in... a mechanical... body.... for one made.... of fur and claws?"

Vickers, fitting in the rubber suit a bit better now that his body had begun transitioning back to a more human form, nodded and pointed at Five, who was back in an induced coma again. They'd given her the cocktail of drugs to wake her back up. But the toolies assured him that she needed to go back down as soon as she could.

"She doesn't have a lot of time left." Vickers said grimly. Then he pulled up one of the chairs and sat in it. "Look. I aint gonna lie to you tin can. Even if you DO go through with this. It'll probably kill you. And even if it doesn't kill you. It'll probably drive you insane and I... will have to kill you. Or a member of the were-folk's guard will because you'll lose your mind and become a rabid monster."

"Is this... supposed to... sell me on this?" Driscoll asked with a laugh that quickly turned into wet coughing as the machine breathing for him struggled to handle the situation.

"No." Vickers said. "Cause even if you survive with your mind intact. The pain of it happening was enough that even I damn near shit myself and quit halfway through." He left out the part where, technically, he did shit himself. "And I wasn't even regrowing any limbs or organs or anything. you would be."

"This.... is a great... pitch." Driscoll wheezed.

"Well your other option is sitting here dying in a bucket full of what I'm assuming is YOUR shit." Vickers countered. "Oh yeah, and not coming with me to fuck up any Agency shit we find."

THAT got the Muck Marcher's attention.

Driscoll seemed to deflate a bit at that, then nodded his head a bit as he considered it. He had to admit that he wasn't exactly IMPROVING while he sat here waiting for his damaged equipment to fail a bit more each day. Five was basically already gone.

As if on cue, Five gasped awake. The toolie on duty went over and began checking her vitals as she slowly swam back to consciousness.

While the two of them waited, Driscoll turned back to Vickers. "I'll only say yes... if she does." He said. "Not gonna let... the last member... of my crew.... go through anything.... else... alone.... On either.... side."

Vickers thought about it for a minute, then nodded. He could respect that.

After about twenty minutes or so, Five was conscious enough for Vickers to give her the same offer as Driscoll. She thought about it for a few minutes, her eyes slowly de-glazing more and more as the drugs wore off.

"I don't have to be a fucking cat do I?" She asked in a slur. "I fuckin hate cats."

Vickers chuckled a bit. "No." He said as he pulled up the Ziploc bag with the letter from the Lunar Council in it. "No I've been given the names and contact info for some people here in the capital who are approved to perform conversions."

He told them the species that they could choose from, his own included. Five made her choice quickly, causing Driscoll to look at her in surprise.

"What?" She asked as she noticed his confusion. "They're cute. Besides I didn't really expect to wake up from that nap. Fuckin' fursuit me up Garfield." She said to Vickers. "Never had a backup plan anyways. Alternatives are fuckin sweeeeeeet." She said in a long, drawn out, slur that resulted in her head lolling back as she passed out. The toolie rushed over and shook his head as he read her vitals again.

"I've gotta put her back under." He said as he prepped the injections. "And I gotta do a flush."

"That's my cue to leave." Vickers said as he stood up. "Sterile suit or not. I can still smell stuff in here. i don't need that in my nose."

"Chief."

Vickers turned and looked at Driscoll curiously.

"Option three please." The Muck Marcher said simply.

Vickers looked back down at the list.

"Really?" He wondered.

"Used to have... a tattoo.." Driscoll admitted. Then he looked down. "On my calf.... Cause of an old nickname..... my grandma used... to call me."

Vickers tried to think of what that nickname could be. Driscoll beat him to it.

"Not English." He said. "Sionnach.... Cause of my hair."

Vickers looked up at the head of the Muck Marcher. Like Five, he was bald. Though whether it was bald because the toolies kept it that way for the suit, or from the sickness or whatever had put him in the suit in the first place, Vickers didn't know.

"Fair enough." He said as he opened the door and walked back into the decontamination air lock.

Once he was on the other side he went out into the capital to get in touch with the two people listed in the letter, and to get the supplies that would be necessary for the conversion.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11t84xc/wait_is_this_just_gate_330/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (328/?)

Previous

Writer's note: In which James loses his chill.

Also, the mechanics of what's happening will be explained in better detail next chapter.

Vorea = FA&FO

Enjoy.

\~

James stood undisturbed in the ring.

This was in stark contrast to the crowd and the people in the arena's control box, a few casters maintaining shields for the fans, the announcer, and a few other VIP's mainly.

It was also clearly unnerving his opponent, Vorea the Summoner, who was a champion of this very tournament several times over.

The two of them drew in power and began focusing it on their preferred flavors of magic.

James was gathering in his for his explosive flight style, and also to keep his sword and chain moving. Whether Vorea could tell that that was what it was for or not, James was unsure. But it was very obvious what Vorea's magic was.

James had experienced the aura of dread that necromancy would fill an area with before. When the summoner had first began drawing in power he'd had the moment of fear that he'd felt on both of those occasions. His sword had begun to jump and buck like an animal at the dark energy, and James had attached it to his chain. He'd also felt something itching in his mind. It had felt familiar, though he couldn't place where he'd felt that before.

He hadn't used the sword like that in his previous match. Nor had he used his explosions. Amina had warned him to keep his secrets for as long as he could in the tournament, not that she'd needed to. But against a reigning champion and sanctioned necromancer, James figured now would be a good time.

James looked over at the announcer, who was holding the red flag that marked the first of the magical rounds of the fight. The starting flag and one more white flag were on James's side of the box, and one white one was on Vorea's. It hadn't surprised James that he'd outshone the man in melee combat, at least in games he'd played summoners were back field characters, and he had a feeling that Vorea was like that too.

James's eyes glowed a bright gold as the flag slowly began to drop.

He saw a series of blood red, semi-skeletal, forms begin to rise out of the sand of the arena. They seemed to be made of the very arena sand itself.

He didn't give them, or their creator, time to make their move.

BOOM!

In the blink of an eye James obliterated the ground beneath his feet, sending sand and newly formed glass, flying back and behind him as he rocketed forward. His sword and chain swirled around him like the blades of an auger as he flew, battering and slicing the undead forms of what he assumed were former arena contestants as he flew.

Then he was within a foot of the necromancy summoner and his wolf hand slammed into the man's chest armor in an open palm slam. Before it did he had a moment to see the look of startled fear on Vorea's face as he realized what had happened. Then he was flying back to slam into the wall behind him in a heap.

Despite the impact Vorea fell from the wall to the ground and didn't fall. Instead he landed on his feet and charged at James.

This time it was James's fault to be surprised.

Instead of seeing the blue glow of Vorea's strike sensor, he saw the blood red glow of his brand of necromancy.

And for just a moment James saw the form of someone he'd never expected to see again.

Instead of Vorea moving toward him in a rage, James saw Gixelle.

She was made of the same glowing red sand as the "people" he'd destroyed mid-flight, and she was standing where Vorea was. But there was no mistaking the massive, incredibly muscular, sword wielding old woman.

Vorea's face and feet were exposed where they emerged from her sand based form as she sprinted at James. But it was her.

She even had the enraged expression he'd seen on her face any time she'd been fighting.

He only had a moment to feel rage himself before she was in his space, having taken advantage of his confusion to close the twenty yards or so in bounds.

So that's what my blood was for. He realized. Amina thought it was so his summons would target me. But I don't think she knew that it would do that like this.

He didn't have time to think any harder about it than that as Gixelle's massive sword, made of sand but he imagined still sharp enough to kill, swung at him in what would have been a blur if he hadn't been using his magic.

James leapt and ducked at the same time, dodging the swipe as he made distance.

He should have known better.

Instead of flying back into open space, he instead stumbled into a gaggle of grasping hands and swinging weapons.

Vorea had used the distraction of Gixelle to summon more sand zombies and move them in to mob him.

James's chest lit up blue only a split second later as he felt himself get battered for a moment.

And then, as soon as they'd done that, they let up. James looked around in confusion and saw the summons melting back as one. They moved like some kind of hive-mind from a movie.

"YANTAS!" The announcer yelled as they moved the flag over to Vorea's side. "VOREA!"

And the zombies stayed in the arena.

He looked at them in concern for a moment as he remembered the rules he'd been told.

"Summons can stay in the arena for as long as their summoner can maintain their forms." He muttered to himself. "So long as they undergo no changes in number or ability between rounds."

He nodded as he chewed on his lip.

"Alright." He said as he stepped back the prescribed distance. "Fair enough. The nuclear option it is then."

When he got there, before he signaled his readiness, he pointed a finger at Vorea, who was still piloting the Gixelle form.

"Is that her soul?" He asked. "Or just an image you pulled from my mind?"

The necromancer smiled creepily and looked satisfied.

"Whichever one makes you angrier." He replied as the red sand, which was part of the Gixelle form's sternum, enclosed his face.

"Wrong answer." James said quietly.

Then he signaled the announcer.

The next white flag dropped and James began focusing on the air around him. The zombies, and Vorea, seemed to expect him to charge, and so waited a moment to react before beginning to move.

That was a mistake.

In the space of a few heartbeats James flooded the arena with oxygen. Namely the area immediately around him.

He looked over at the summoner, who had just begun moving in behind his mob of zombies, even as others began rising from the ground.

James let them get within spitting distance.

He'd made an explosion like this once before, in the desert when he'd seen a muck marcher on the verge of shooting at Amina.

But this time it wasn't a spur of the moment reflex. It was focused, and angry.

BOOOM!

This time he couldn't see the surprised look on Vorea's face. Or Gixelle's for that matter.

Instead he saw a flash of fire as everything around him was engulfed in flame. He felt himself move so fast, and yet so evenly, that he didn't even change his body's position.

And when the smoke cleared Vorea was back against the far wall again, but this time with no necro-sand protecting him as James's sword pressed against his chest. Just below the blue light of his sensor.

And the arena was clear of zombies.

"Ya.... Yantas?" The announcer said uncertainly as he absently handed the white flag to one of the people next to him and placed it on James's side. "JamsChoi!?!" He said, mispronouncing it like he had when introducing James at the beginning of the match.

Vorea was dazed as he looked up at James with uncertainty and fear.

James was panting a bit as he held back the urge to move the sword up to his throat.

"Zombies are one thing." He said softly enough that only the two of them could hear it. He leaned in so that he was glaring at the smaller man with his right eye. "But leave.... my loved ones.... out of this." He said with as much menace as he could. "Or this stops being a game of hits and becomes a to-the-death kinda thing."

"JAMSCHOI!" The announcer yelled. "BADEH NAH!"

James glared at the necromancer for a moment longer, even as Vorea clearly got angry himself. Then he let the man go and stalked away.

"That's the only warning you're getting." James said as he walked to the necessary distance. He was happy to see the blackened, and partly glassed, crater where he'd taken off. There were bits of red glass sticking to one of the columns nearby.

He got to the spot just a few yards to the side of the crater and turned around, ready for the next round. The flag began to drop before he'd even finished turning all the way. He realized that Vorea must have already signaled readiness.

He heard a familiar voice, one he loved, call his name from the stands in warning.

Then, as he finished facing him, he saw Kela.

James's anger boiled up in him like lava as he looked at her.

Like Gixelle she was made of the glowing red sand. unlike Gixelle she didn't resemble the form he'd known for most of their time together.

Instead she was massive, at least twenty feet tall, and her eyes glowed with a dull red imitation of the light that had shone from them the last time he'd seen her alive. The crowd made noises of fear and confusion at the blood and necromancy based imitation of a champion of the moon goddess. Numerous were-folk were loudly protesting.

James was too angry to even register it

"Ha." He laughed once as his eye twitched.

He dropped the handle of his chain and sword into the sand, causing them both to fall down and for his sword to clatter noisily on the bits of glass and rock there as it tried to move on its own. Then he reached to his belt and chest, drawing the pistol and revolver as the reformed zombies swarmed into him and the Not-Kela began bounding toward him.

"I warned you." He yelled as his hands began to blur.

\----------

Amina had been jogging down the ramp into the fighter area once more, having already concluded her fight against, as she unbuckled her chest plate, when she heard (and felt) the first of James's blasts.

She jogged over to the board with the fighter brackets on it and checked to see which pit he was in. Then she ran over to the tunnel leading to it.

When she got there it was just in time to see James jump back, unwittingly landing in the grasp of Vorea's horde.

Then she saw the massive, muscular, sword wielding form that Vorea had taken.

"That son of a bitch." She said to no one in particular.

Then, as the round ended and James recovered, she knew that he wasn't going to hold back any more.

As a result, she was the only person who didn't cower in fear at the size of James's next explosion. Nor was she surprised when the dust settled and James was practically choking the man with his sword pressed into his chest. She saw him talking to Vorea and knew that he was warning the necromancer against using any more people he cared about.

So she was surprised, and even more enraged than James, when she saw the blood red sand quickly shift and congeal into a form that still haunted her nightmares to this day.

She rushed forward and gripped the railing of the stands.

"JAMES!" She yelled as the flag dropped and her husband finally saw the massive wolf.

And then, as a newly formed horde rose from the ground and moved in toward him, she saw him drop his weapons.

His hands blurred and she knew what was coming next.

Then the gunfire began.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11sa472/wait_is_this_just_gate_329/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (328/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: In which James loses his chill.

Also, the mechanics of what's happening will be explained in better detail next chapter.

Vorea = FA&FO

Enjoy.

\~

James stood undisturbed in the ring.

This was in stark contrast to the crowd and the people in the arena's control box, a few casters maintaining shields for the fans, the announcer, and a few other VIP's mainly.

It was also clearly unnerving his opponent, Vorea the Summoner, who was a champion of this very tournament several times over.

The two of them drew in power and began focusing it on their preferred flavors of magic.

James was gathering in his for his explosive flight style, and also to keep his sword and chain moving. Whether Vorea could tell that that was what it was for or not, James was unsure. But it was very obvious what Vorea's magic was.

James had experienced the aura of dread that necromancy would fill an area with before. When the summoner had first began drawing in power he'd had the moment of fear that he'd felt on both of those occasions. His sword had begun to jump and buck like an animal at the dark energy, and James had attached it to his chain. He'd also felt something itching in his mind. It had felt familiar, though he couldn't place where he'd felt that before.

He hadn't used the sword like that in his previous match. Nor had he used his explosions. Amina had warned him to keep his secrets for as long as he could in the tournament, not that she'd needed to. But against a reigning champion and sanctioned necromancer, James figured now would be a good time.

James looked over at the announcer, who was holding the red flag that marked the first of the magical rounds of the fight. The starting flag and one more white flag were on James's side of the box, and one white one was on Vorea's. It hadn't surprised James that he'd outshone the man in melee combat, at least in games he'd played summoners were back field characters, and he had a feeling that Vorea was like that too.

James's eyes glowed a bright gold as the flag slowly began to drop.

He saw a series of blood red, semi-skeletal, forms begin to rise out of the sand of the arena. They seemed to be made of the very arena sand itself.

He didn't give them, or their creator, time to make their move.

BOOM!

In the blink of an eye James obliterated the ground beneath his feet, sending sand and newly formed glass, flying back and behind him as he rocketed forward. His sword and chain swirled around him like the blades of an auger as he flew, battering and slicing the undead forms of what he assumed were former arena contestants as he flew.

Then he was within a foot of the necromancy summoner and his wolf hand slammed into the man's chest armor in an open palm slam. Before it did he had a moment to see the look of startled fear on Vorea's face as he realized what had happened. Then he was flying back to slam into the wall behind him in a heap.

Despite the impact Vorea fell from the wall to the ground and didn't fall. Instead he landed on his feet and charged at James.

This time it was James's fault to be surprised.

Instead of seeing the blue glow of Vorea's strike sensor, he saw the blood red glow of his brand of necromancy.

And for just a moment James saw the form of someone he'd never expected to see again.

Instead of Vorea moving toward him in a rage, James saw Gixelle.

She was made of the same glowing red sand as the "people" he'd destroyed mid-flight, and she was standing where Vorea was. But there was no mistaking the massive, incredibly muscular, sword wielding old woman.

Vorea's face and feet were exposed where they emerged from her sand based form as she sprinted at James. But it was her.

She even had the enraged expression he'd seen on her face any time she'd been fighting.

He only had a moment to feel rage himself before she was in his space, having taken advantage of his confusion to close the twenty yards or so in bounds.

So that's what my blood was for. He realized. Amina thought it was so his summons would target me. But I don't think she knew that it would do that like this.

He didn't have time to think any harder about it than that as Gixelle's massive sword, made of sand but he imagined still sharp enough to kill, swung at him in what would have been a blur if he hadn't been using his magic.

James leapt and ducked at the same time, dodging the swipe as he made distance.

He should have known better.

Instead of flying back into open space, he instead stumbled into a gaggle of grasping hands and swinging weapons.

Vorea had used the distraction of Gixelle to summon more sand zombies and move them in to mob him.

James's chest lit up blue only a split second later as he felt himself get battered for a moment.

And then, as soon as they'd done that, they let up. James looked around in confusion and saw the summons melting back as one. They moved like some kind of hive-mind from a movie.

"YANTAS!" The announcer yelled as they moved the flag over to Vorea's side. "VOREA!"

And the zombies stayed in the arena.

He looked at them in concern for a moment as he remembered the rules he'd been told.

"Summons can stay in the arena for as long as their summoner can maintain their forms." He muttered to himself. "So long as they undergo no changes in number or ability between rounds."

He nodded as he chewed on his lip.

"Alright." He said as he stepped back the prescribed distance. "Fair enough. The nuclear option it is then."

When he got there, before he signaled his readiness, he pointed a finger at Vorea, who was still piloting the Gixelle form.

"Is that her soul?" He asked. "Or just an image you pulled from my mind?"

The necromancer smiled creepily and looked satisfied.

"Whichever one makes you angrier." He replied as the red sand, which was part of the Gixelle form's sternum, enclosed his face.

"Wrong answer." James said quietly.

Then he signaled the announcer.

The next white flag dropped and James began focusing on the air around him. The zombies, and Vorea, seemed to expect him to charge, and so waited a moment to react before beginning to move.

That was a mistake.

In the space of a few heartbeats James flooded the arena with oxygen. Namely the area immediately around him.

He looked over at the summoner, who had just begun moving in behind his mob of zombies, even as others began rising from the ground.

James let them get within spitting distance.

He'd made an explosion like this once before, in the desert when he'd seen a muck marcher on the verge of shooting at Amina.

But this time it wasn't a spur of the moment reflex. It was focused, and angry.

BOOOM!

This time he couldn't see the surprised look on Vorea's face. Or Gixelle's for that matter.

Instead he saw a flash of fire as everything around him was engulfed in flame. He felt himself move so fast, and yet so evenly, that he didn't even change his body's position.

And when the smoke cleared Vorea was back against the far wall again, but this time with no necro-sand protecting him as James's sword pressed against his chest. Just below the blue light of his sensor.

And the arena was clear of zombies.

"Ya.... Yantas?" The announcer said uncertainly as he absently handed the white flag to one of the people next to him and placed it on James's side. "JamsChoi!?!" He said, mispronouncing it like he had when introducing James at the beginning of the match.

Vorea was dazed as he looked up at James with uncertainty and fear.

James was panting a bit as he held back the urge to move the sword up to his throat.

"Zombies are one thing." He said softly enough that only the two of them could hear it. He leaned in so that he was glaring at the smaller man with his right eye. "But leave.... my loved ones.... out of this." He said with as much menace as he could. "Or this stops being a game of hits and becomes a to-the-death kinda thing."

"JAMSCHOI!" The announcer yelled. "BADEH NAH!"

James glared at the necromancer for a moment longer, even as Vorea clearly got angry himself. Then he let the man go and stalked away.

"That's the only warning you're getting." James said as he walked to the necessary distance. He was happy to see the blackened, and partly glassed, crater where he'd taken off. There were bits of red glass sticking to one of the columns nearby.

He got to the spot just a few yards to the side of the crater and turned around, ready for the next round. The flag began to drop before he'd even finished turning all the way. He realized that Vorea must have already signaled readiness.

He heard a familiar voice, one he loved, call his name from the stands in warning.

Then, as he finished facing him, he saw Kela.

James's anger boiled up in him like lava as he looked at her.

Like Gixelle she was made of the glowing red sand. unlike Gixelle she didn't resemble the form he'd known for most of their time together.

Instead she was massive, at least twenty feet tall, and her eyes glowed with a dull red imitation of the light that had shone from them the last time he'd seen her alive. The crowd made noises of fear and confusion at the blood and necromancy based imitation of a champion of the moon goddess. Numerous were-folk were loudly protesting.

James was too angry to even register it

"Ha." He laughed once as his eye twitched.

He dropped the handle of his chain and sword into the sand, causing them both to fall down and for his sword to clatter noisily on the bits of glass and rock there as it tried to move on its own. Then he reached to his belt and chest, drawing the pistol and revolver as the reformed zombies swarmed into him and the Not-Kela began bounding toward him.

"I warned you." He yelled as his hands began to blur.

\----------

Amina had been jogging down the ramp into the fighter area once more, having already concluded her fight against a remarkably talented spear wielder, as she unbuckled her chest plate, when she heard (and felt) the first of James's blasts.

She jogged over to the board with the fighter brackets on it and checked to see which pit he was in. Then she ran over to the tunnel leading to it.

When she got there it was just in time to see James jump back, unwittingly landing in the grasp of Vorea's horde.

Then she saw the massive, muscular, sword wielding form that Vorea had taken.

"That son of a bitch." She said to no one in particular.

Then, as the round ended and James recovered, she knew that he wasn't going to hold back any more.

As a result, she was the only person who didn't cower in fear at the size of James's next explosion. Nor was she surprised when the dust settled and James was practically choking the man with his sword pressed into his chest. She saw him talking to Vorea and knew that he was warning the necromancer against using any more people he cared about.

So she was surprised, and even more enraged than James, when she saw the blood red sand quickly shift and congeal into a form that still haunted her nightmares to this day.

She rushed forward and gripped the railing of the stands.

"JAMES!" She yelled as the flag dropped and her husband finally saw the massive wolf.

And then, as a newly formed horde rose from the ground and moved in toward him, she saw him drop his weapons.

His hands blurred and she knew what was coming next.

Then the gunfire began.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11sa1p2/wait_is_this_just_gate_329/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (327/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah. It's a tournament arc. This has always been anime cliches. And J&A said that they wanted to take part in one that was going on.

Enjoy.

\~

James stood in the sand with his feet in a fighting stance. In his right hand was the magical sword that he'd had to reforge and re-enchant several months earlier. In his right was the handle of the enchanted chain that had been paired with it. The chain spun in slow lazy circles behind him, not moving with the air magic that he normally used with it. For now he just wanted it to look like a normal chain.

I'm at a bit of a disadvantage here. He thought as he looked across the arena's fighting pit at his opponent. I'm gonna have to ask Amina what the fuck this lady is later.

Across from him stood, or rather slithered, a woman with four arms and the body of a serpent. He'd seen a handful of them in the capital, but had never interacted with one until today. And he'd never seen one armed before.

This one was simultaneously wielding a crossbow AND two weapons that were shaped like question marks and reminded him of ancient Egyptian weapons. She also had a series of metal plates running down her back almost the entire way down her reptilian tail, and a matching breastplate. Her looked like a roman centurion helm, but with an extra set of eye slits..... for her extra set of eyes.

I wonder if she's the kind of thing Medusa was? He wondered as he listened to the tournament announcer speak to the crowd. He couldn't understand the opulently dressed man, he'd left his medallion with his personal belongings to keep it safe. Shit. Do I need to avoid eye contact?

"TAEL'ON MADORESSI!" The announcer yelled. The snake woman raised her crossbow over her head and screamed. James was vaguely reminded of Tuskan Raiders. He stifled a chuckle and the snake woman glared at him as the crowd cheered.

Then the announcer switched over to Petravian to introduced James.

"AND FROM ACROSS THE SEA IN PETRAVIUS!" He yelled in a thickly accented voice. "THE CAPTAIN JAMES CHOI!"

James held his sword up for a moment and waved to a significantly quieter crowd.

Then the announcer held up a large pole with the Vatrian Empire's symbol on it. He held it straight up and James listened for the Vatrian word that the tournament staff had told him marked the beginning of the fight.

"MADASH!" The announcer yelled as he dropped the Vatrian flag.

James moved bolted forward, his legs moving in a blur as he sprinted toward his opponent in a rush.

Remember. He told himself as he saw the snake woman's surprised expression as she raised the crossbow. No magic until after the third flag.

Even without his eye magic, James's reflexes were vastly improved over his first days in this world. And his quick draw competitions back on Earth had already made his reaction time a lot faster than most people.

He saw the crossbow aim for him, he estimated roughly for his chest. He saw the flare of enchantment on the end of its body as it fired its bolt, activating the magic in it as it did.

Just like I thought, an arbalestier. Or at least one of their weapons.

James initiated a baseball slide underneath the bolt. He felt a sizzling of magical energy fly past as the skin that wasn't protected by his own helmet felt intense heat fly past it.

But the small, enchanted, broach on his chest plate stayed dark. No hit.

The momentary distraction, quick as it was, as he checked was enough for the snake woman's upper arms to reload the magical crossbow.

James kicked and spun as he leapt up out of the slide and into the air.

He smiled as he saw his opponent's shocked expression and anger at the sudden redirection.

His sword flashed out and lightly smacked her helmet as he flew over her. There was a dull ringing noise from it as she instinctively jumped to the side. James landed some ten yards or so past her and stood up with a smile as she spun to face him. He tapped his sword hand at the device on his chest and then pointed at her.

She glared as she looked down and saw the bright blue light glowing from it.

"DARA!" The announcer yelled. "HIT!" He moved the flag from the beginning of the match onto the side and into a small stand. Then he retrieved another one, this one unadorned and held it up.

James and his opponent both stood and watched each other. The reptilian spat some kind of curse in some language that was neither Petravian or Vatrian. Then she did something to her crossbow and it separated into two smaller crossbows. Each one was still roughly the size of a sub machine gun, and he had no idea how she planned on reloading them. But he had a feeling he was going to find out.

"Fast thing." She said in a hiss. "Not happen twice. Tael'On will pin and crush."

"Hey." James replied. "No flirting allowed. You'll make my new wife angry."

The snake woman, Tael'On apparently, was about to retort when the announcer signaled for them to begin again.

The first shot of the crossbow came almost as soon as the man finished the word. James was faster though, and dashed to the side. He whipped the sand up with his chain as he did, creating a cloud of the fine grit as he flew around the crossbow wielding enemy began to loose bolts at a clip that James thought impressive.

It was when one of them flew just in front of his helmet's visor, close enough that one of its feathers bristled against his nose-guard, that James realized she was catching up to his rapid movements.

He made a mistake, his reflexes causing him to instinctively skid to a halt, and an arrow slammed into his shoulder plate. Despite being only a foot or so long, the arrow slammed into him like a sledgehammer. He rolled as it knocked him off his feet and rapidly leapt back up into a fighting stance. But the blue glow of the magical device on his chest made him stop.

She'd been letting him think he'd been faster than her aim.

He rose up fully as the announcer moved the flag over to the stand on his other side, evening their scores.

James pulled the blunted bolt from the ice it had flash frozen onto his shoulder and tossed it aside. Then a crack of his sword's pommel broke the coating of ice off.

"Nice." He said as he dusted the last few chips off with his hand. "But kitty hits harder when we train."

Tael'On stopped her chittering laugh and tilted her head a bit at the statement.

Then the third flag dropped.

This time James didn't run.

In fact he didn't so much as move from the position he'd been in.

Instead he let his sword do what it had been begging him to let it do the entire match. But he hadn't wanted to reveal its ability until he needed it, so he'd been resisting its pull.

Now he let it dance around him, tethered only by his arm, as the snake-like, dual wielding, arbalestier began unleashing a torrent of enchanted bolts.

And as his arm moved around in a blur, deflecting, blocking, and at times outright destroying, the rapidly flying projectiles, and drinking in the magical energy stored within them, James smiled.

His mouth broke into an almost manic grin as Tael'On recoiled at the display of enchantment enhanced defense.

She tried to increase her rate of fire, and as she did James began to advance.

When he got within twenty yards the thing he'd been waiting for finally happened. He'd been wondering just how many bolts she had for each of the small crossbows. Her two sets of arms had been a blur as she'd fired with the upper arms and rapidly reloaded with the lower ones. But as James crossed past one of the numerous wooden columns in the arena, a misfire occurred.

One of the lower arms, in her pressured haste, grabbed a bolt and somehow bungled the reload. Instead of firing the bolt at James, the crossbow's string flew beneath the projectile and launched it up into the air while also snapping its blunted tip off. In doing so it simultaneously primed the enchanted tip and severed itself.

The tip popped up for a second, then fell to the ground as Tael'On's eyes widened in surprised fear.

As the tip hit the ground, releasing a plume of smoke that must have been one of her last, and most desparate, rounds. James flew in with a charge.

The hand that had been wielding the offending crossbow threw it at the ground in anger and reached with its lower counterpart for the curved blade on that side. It didn't get free of its small leather scabbard before James's sword slammed into the large snake woman's chest plate, causing the device there to glow blue again.

Her hand clamped onto his throat by instinct and her tail began moving forward to attack him.

"TAEL'ON!" The announcer yelled. "BADEH NAH!"

"Point to me." James said with a grin as he struggled to breath. "You can put me down now."

She actually hissed at him, and James was mildly disturbed by the rows of long teeth within her mouth. They reminded him of Steve just a bit.

Then she lowered him down the few feet that she'd been holding him off the ground.

James walked back until he was once again at roughly the fifty foot mark. Then he nodded at the announcer.

The announcer nodded back, then looked at Tael'On with reproach.

She tossed her remaining crossbow aside and dropped the belt that held the two, mostly empty, quivers for them. Then she drew the two curved swords fully and nodded back.

The announcer moved the third flag to James's side. Then grabbed one that was red. The one that meant magic was allowed now.

His eyes began to glow gold as he imbued them with reflex enhancing vision.

Tael'On's right eye glowed with the same color, but her left one glowed green.

Nice. James thought. I'm gonna have to try that later.

He felt energy flooding the snake's side of the arena as she built it up in her empty hands, and once again he had to admit that, physically at least, she had a lot of advantages against him in a straight up fight.

But James wasn't about fair fights.

He kept swinging his chain around lazily, but built up the energy to start using wind magic to move it faster and more precisely.

The flag dropped, and as soon as it did a deluge of poisonous gas blasted right for James from the snake woman's hands as she charged in with her blades.

Poison gas from one hand, wind magic from the other to move it along. Nice. James thought. But not a good match up.

James's sword began moving in front of him like a blur, devouring the poisonous blast like it was nothing more than a refreshing drink of water.

Then James's chain swung forward like a whip, wing magic making it so fast even his enhanced vision saw it as a blur.

There was another loud ringing noise as it (ironically) snaked past his opponent's two swords and slammed into her chest like a fist, sending her crashing back on top of her own tail.

The light on her chest glowed blue again as she picked herself back up, and the red flag went to James's side.

When she looked at James this time there was honest confusion and panic on her face.

James had a feeling, that was proven correct shortly after, that she wasn't prepared for the kind of powers he was going to bring to bear.

Ten minutes later James walked into the fighter's waiting room, unbuckling his chest plate as he did.

Amina was already there, waiting for him, her sword resting comfortable against her leg as she reclined on one of the benches against the wall.

"You're already done?" He asked as he sat next to her with a fist bump that made their gauntlets rattle noisily. "How was your fight?"

"An orc who was far too slow to be a real contender." She said as she let him slide in next to her and placed her arm around him. "I was done nearly half an hour ago. You?"

"A four armed snake woman who was an arbalestier." He said proudly.

"Tael'On the poisoner?" She asked.

"You know her?" He asked as he slid his arm behind her and wrapped his wolf arm around her waist. He waved at a massive man with writhing tattoos who looked at them curiously.

"Not personally." She replied. "But she's won this tournament a few times." She seemed to think for a moment. "Did she try to send a jet of poison at you?" James nodded. "Oof. Not a good idea against your sword."

"No." He agreed. "No it was not."

"A bad match-up overall." She said. "Score?"

"Six to one." He said with a smile. "You?"

"Seven zero." She replied.

"Nice." He said as one of the tournament staff entered the waiting area.

"New match-ups!" The young elf announced. He pulled up a piece of parchment and pressed it to the board that had the tournaments bracket on it.

James, Amina, and all the other fighters got up from where they were resting and went over to it to see their new spots.

James and Amina were, by request, on opposite sides of the bracket.

"Arena two for me." She said after finding her name again. "Kragar Brightblade? A dwarf?"

"That's me princess." A short, but heavily armed, dwarven woman piped up. "Been a minute since I fought a Petravian. Much less a princess."

"Bring it on then." Amina said with a smile. James had been surprised at how amiable most of the fighters were when they weren't in the ring. Only a handful seemed to be playing any kind of villain role.

"I'm up against..... Vorea Snapcin?" James said as he read the name that was paired with his. "The..... summoner?"

"Oh?" Amina said. "That's a slightly better match for your skills." She added with a bit of concern.

"That's me... Hero." Said a sickly looking man in a bright green set of mages robes. Despite his somewhat menacing appearance he held out a hand.

James took it.

"Well." He said. "I look forward to our match. What kind of summoning do you do?"

Vorea shook his head as he smiled. The teeth in his mouth were a mish-mash of clean white human teeth, rotted brown teeth, and some of them seemed to be pointed and inhuman, and in various states of decay. He cringed a bit at the display.

Suddenly Amina was gripping his other arm.

Vorea broke the handshake, and as he did one of his fingernails, all of which were jagged and some broken, accidentally sliced James's hand.

"Ow!" He exclaimed at the injury. "What the hell man?" He asked as he wiped his hand on his pants. The cut wasn't big, but it did bleed a bit.

"Apologies." Vorea said as he slunk away. "See you in the pit."

"Dammit." Amina said.

"What?" James asked as he turned and saw her with a worried expression on her face.

"That was a setup." She said. "His summons will have a taste for you now."

"What?" He asked. He turned back to look for the mage, but he'd gotten out of sight fast. "What the hell does he summon? That's gotta be illegal."

Amina pulled his arm to inspect the injured hand.

"It falls into the category of 'pre-fight spell preparation'. The bastard." She said angrily. "It's one of the few loop holes, and one of the most disliked ones at that." Then she looked up at James. "And he summons the dead."

James's eyes widened at that. He'd experienced, albeit not in close proximity, the effect that necromancy had on people. Both times it had been used in the castle it had caused both of them to have sleepless nights.

"He's a necromancer?" He asked.

"One of the few in the world who hasn't been hunted down and killed. Mainly because he only ever uses his craft at the Emperor's request." Then she looked past James at the board. "Or for tournaments he's decided to enter. All of which he's won."

James pulled out his sword, which was subtly vibrating in it's scabbard.

"Well." He said with mild concern. "Let's hope for an upset."

"If anyone can do it, it's you." She said before kissing him on the cheek.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11o5f8g/wait_is_this_just_gate_327/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (327/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah. It's a tournament arc. This has always been anime cliches. And J&A said that they wanted to take part in one that was going on.

Enjoy.

\~

James stood in the sand with his feet in a fighting stance. In his right hand was the magical sword that he'd had to reforge and re-enchant several months earlier. In his right was the handle of the enchanted chain that had been paired with it. The chain spun in slow lazy circles behind him, not moving with the air magic that he normally used with it. For now he just wanted it to look like a normal chain.

I'm at a bit of a disadvantage here. He thought as he looked across the arena's fighting pit at his opponent. I'm gonna have to ask Amina what the fuck this lady is later.

Across from him stood, or rather slithered, a woman with four arms and the body of a serpent. He'd seen a handful of them in the capital, but had never interacted with one until today. And he'd never seen one armed before.

This one was simultaneously wielding a crossbow AND two weapons that were shaped like question marks and reminded him of ancient Egyptian weapons. She also had a series of metal plates running down her back almost the entire way down her reptilian tail, and a matching breastplate. Her looked like a roman centurion helm, but with an extra set of eye slits..... for her extra set of eyes.

I wonder if she's the kind of thing Medusa was? He wondered as he listened to the tournament announcer speak to the crowd. He couldn't understand the opulently dressed man, he'd left his medallion with his personal belongings to keep it safe. Shit. Do I need to avoid eye contact?

"TAEL'ON MADORESSI!" The announcer yelled. The snake woman raised her crossbow over her head and screamed. James was vaguely reminded of Tuskan Raiders. He stifled a chuckle and the snake woman glared at him as the crowd cheered.

Then the announcer switched over to Petravian to introduced James.

"AND FROM ACROSS THE SEA IN PETRAVIUS!" He yelled in a thickly accented voice. "THE CAPTAIN JAMES CHOI!"

James held his sword up for a moment and waved to a significantly quieter crowd.

Then the announcer held up a large pole with the Vatrian Empire's symbol on it. He held it straight up and James listened for the Vatrian word that the tournament staff had told him marked the beginning of the fight.

"MADASH!" The announcer yelled as he dropped the Vatrian flag.

James moved bolted forward, his legs moving in a blur as he sprinted toward his opponent in a rush.

Remember. He told himself as he saw the snake woman's surprised expression as she raised the crossbow. No magic until after the third flag.

Even without his eye magic, James's reflexes were vastly improved over his first days in this world. And his quick draw competitions back on Earth had already made his reaction time a lot faster than most people.

He saw the crossbow aim for him, he estimated roughly for his chest. He saw the flare of enchantment on the end of its body as it fired its bolt, activating the magic in it as it did.

Just like I thought, an arbalestier. Or at least one of their weapons.

James initiated a baseball slide underneath the bolt. He felt a sizzling of magical energy fly past as the skin that wasn't protected by his own helmet felt intense heat fly past it.

But the small, enchanted, broach on his chest plate stayed dark. No hit.

The momentary distraction, quick as it was, as he checked was enough for the snake woman's upper arms to reload the magical crossbow.

James kicked and spun as he leapt up out of the slide and into the air.

He smiled as he saw his opponent's shocked expression and anger at the sudden redirection.

His sword flashed out and lightly smacked her helmet as he flew over her. There was a dull ringing noise from it as she instinctively jumped to the side. James landed some ten yards or so past her and stood up with a smile as she spun to face him. He tapped his sword hand at the device on his chest and then pointed at her.

She glared as she looked down and saw the bright blue light glowing from it.

"DARA!" The announcer yelled. "HIT!" He moved the flag from the beginning of the match onto the side and into a small stand. Then he retrieved another one, this one unadorned and held it up.

James and his opponent both stood and watched each other. The reptilian spat some kind of curse in some language that was neither Petravian or Vatrian. Then she did something to her crossbow and it separated into two smaller crossbows. Each one was still roughly the size of a sub machine gun, and he had no idea how she planned on reloading them. But he had a feeling he was going to find out.

"Fast thing." She said in a hiss. "Not happen twice. Tael'On will pin and crush."

"Hey." James replied. "No flirting allowed. You'll make my new wife angry."

The snake woman, Tael'On apparently, was about to retort when the announcer signaled for them to begin again.

The first shot of the crossbow came almost as soon as the man finished the word. James was faster though, and dashed to the side. He whipped the sand up with his chain as he did, creating a cloud of the fine grit as he flew around the crossbow wielding enemy began to loose bolts at a clip that James thought impressive.

It was when one of them flew just in front of his helmet's visor, close enough that one of its feathers bristled against his nose-guard, that James realized she was catching up to his rapid movements.

He made a mistake, his reflexes causing him to instinctively skid to a halt, and an arrow slammed into his shoulder plate. Despite being only a foot or so long, the arrow slammed into him like a sledgehammer. He rolled as it knocked him off his feet and rapidly leapt back up into a fighting stance. But the blue glow of the magical device on his chest made him stop.

She'd been letting him think he'd been faster than her aim.

He rose up fully as the announcer moved the flag over to the stand on his other side, evening their scores.

James pulled the blunted bolt from the ice it had flash frozen onto his shoulder and tossed it aside. Then a crack of his sword's pommel broke the coating of ice off.

"Nice." He said as he dusted the last few chips off with his hand. "But kitty hits harder when we train."

Tael'On stopped her chittering laugh and tilted her head a bit at the statement.

Then the third flag dropped.

This time James didn't run.

In fact he didn't so much as move from the position he'd been in.

Instead he let his sword do what it had been begging him to let it do the entire match. But he hadn't wanted to reveal its ability until he needed it, so he'd been resisting its pull.

Now he let it dance around him, tethered only by his arm, as the snake-like, dual wielding, arbalestier began unleashing a torrent of enchanted bolts.

And as his arm moved around in a blur, deflecting, blocking, and at times outright destroying, the rapidly flying projectiles, and drinking in the magical energy stored within them, James smiled.

His mouth broke into an almost manic grin as Tael'On recoiled at the display of enchantment enhanced defense.

She tried to increase her rate of fire, and as she did James began to advance.

When he got within twenty yards the thing he'd been waiting for finally happened. He'd been wondering just how many bolts she had for each of the small crossbows. Her two sets of arms had been a blur as she'd fired with the upper arms and rapidly reloaded with the lower ones. But as James crossed past one of the numerous wooden columns in the arena, a misfire occurred.

One of the lower arms, in her pressured haste, grabbed a bolt and somehow bungled the reload. Instead of firing the bolt at James, the crossbow's string flew beneath the projectile and launched it up into the air while also snapping its blunted tip off. In doing so it simultaneously primed the enchanted tip and severed itself.

The tip popped up for a second, then fell to the ground as Tael'On's eyes widened in surprised fear.

As the tip hit the ground, releasing a plume of smoke that must have been one of her last, and most desparate, rounds. James flew in with a charge.

The hand that had been wielding the offending crossbow threw it at the ground in anger and reached with its lower counterpart for the curved blade on that side. It didn't get free of its small leather scabbard before James's sword slammed into the large snake woman's chest plate, causing the device there to glow blue again.

Her hand clamped onto his throat by instinct and her tail began moving forward to attack him.

"TAEL'ON!" The announcer yelled. "BADEH NAH!"

"Point to me." James said with a grin as he struggled to breath. "You can put me down now."

She actually hissed at him, and James was mildly disturbed by the rows of long teeth within her mouth. They reminded him of Steve just a bit.

Then she lowered him down the few feet that she'd been holding him off the ground.

James walked back until he was once again at roughly the fifty foot mark. Then he nodded at the announcer.

The announcer nodded back, then looked at Tael'On with reproach.

She tossed her remaining crossbow aside and dropped the belt that held the two, mostly empty, quivers for them. Then she drew the two curved swords fully and nodded back.

The announcer moved the third flag to James's side. Then grabbed one that was red. The one that meant magic was allowed now.

His eyes began to glow gold as he imbued them with reflex enhancing vision.

Tael'On's right eye glowed with the same color, but her left one glowed green.

Nice. James thought. I'm gonna have to try that later.

He felt energy flooding the snake's side of the arena as she built it up in her empty hands, and once again he had to admit that, physically at least, she had a lot of advantages against him in a straight up fight.

But James wasn't about fair fights.

He kept swinging his chain around lazily, but built up the energy to start using wind magic to move it faster and more precisely.

The flag dropped, and as soon as it did a deluge of poisonous gas blasted right for James from the snake woman's hands as she charged in with her blades.

Poison gas from one hand, wind magic from the other to move it along. Nice. James thought. But not a good match up.

James's sword began moving in front of him like a blur, devouring the poisonous blast like it was nothing more than a refreshing drink of water.

Then James's chain swung forward like a whip, wing magic making it so fast even his enhanced vision saw it as a blur.

There was another loud ringing noise as it (ironically) snaked past his opponent's two swords and slammed into her chest like a fist, sending her crashing back on top of her own tail.

The light on her chest glowed blue again as she picked herself back up, and the red flag went to James's side.

When she looked at James this time there was honest confusion and panic on her face.

James had a feeling, that was proven correct shortly after, that she wasn't prepared for the kind of powers he was going to bring to bear.

Ten minutes later James walked into the fighter's waiting room, unbuckling his chest plate as he did.

Amina was already there, waiting for him, her sword resting comfortable against her leg as she reclined on one of the benches against the wall.

"You're already done?" He asked as he sat next to her with a fist bump that made their gauntlets rattle noisily. "How was your fight?"

"An orc who was far too slow to be a real contender." She said as she let him slide in next to her and placed her arm around him. "I was done nearly half an hour ago. You?"

"A four armed snake woman who was an arbalestier." He said proudly.

"Tael'On the poisoner?" She asked.

"You know her?" He asked as he slid his arm behind her and wrapped his wolf arm around her waist. He waved at a massive man with writhing tattoos who looked at them curiously.

"Not personally." She replied. "But she's won this tournament a few times." She seemed to think for a moment. "Did she try to send a jet of poison at you?" James nodded. "Oof. Not a good idea against your sword."

"No." He agreed. "No it was not."

"A bad match-up overall." She said. "Score?"

"Six to one." He said with a smile. "You?"

"Seven zero." She replied.

"Nice." He said as one of the tournament staff entered the waiting area.

"New match-ups!" The young elf announced. He pulled up a piece of parchment and pressed it to the board that had the tournaments bracket on it.

James, Amina, and all the other fighters got up from where they were resting and went over to it to see their new spots.

James and Amina were, by request, on opposite sides of the bracket.

"Arena two for me." She said after finding her name again. "Kragar Brightblade? A dwarf?"

"That's me princess." A short, but heavily armed, dwarven woman piped up. "Been a minute since I fought a Petravian. Much less a princess."

"Bring it on then." Amina said with a smile. James had been surprised at how amiable most of the fighters were when they weren't in the ring. Only a handful seemed to be playing any kind of villain role.

"I'm up against..... Vorea Snapcin?" James said as he read the name that was paired with his. "The..... summoner?"

"Oh?" Amina said. "That's a slightly better match for your skills." She added with a bit of concern.

"That's me... Hero." Said a sickly looking man in a bright green set of mages robes. Despite his somewhat menacing appearance he held out a hand.

James took it.

"Well." He said. "I look forward to our match. What kind of summoning do you do?"

Vorea shook his head as he smiled. The teeth in his mouth were a mish-mash of clean white human teeth, rotted brown teeth, and some of them seemed to be pointed and inhuman, and in various states of decay. He cringed a bit at the display.

Suddenly Amina was gripping his other arm.

Vorea broke the handshake, and as he did one of his fingernails, all of which were jagged and some broken, accidentally sliced James's hand.

"Ow!" He exclaimed at the injury. "What the hell man?" He asked as he wiped his hand on his pants. The cut wasn't big, but it did bleed a bit.

"Apologies." Vorea said as he slunk away. "See you in the pit."

"Dammit." Amina said.

"What?" James asked as he turned and saw her with a worried expression on her face.

"That was a setup." She said. "His summons will have a taste for you now."

"What?" He asked. He turned back to look for the mage, but he'd gotten out of sight fast. "What the hell does he summon? That's gotta be illegal."

Amina pulled his arm to inspect the injured hand.

"It falls into the category of 'pre-fight spell preparation'. The bastard." She said angrily. "It's one of the few loop holes, and one of the most disliked ones at that." Then she looked up at James. "And he summons the dead."

James's eyes widened at that. He'd experienced, albeit not in close proximity, the effect that necromancy had on people. Both times it had been used in the castle it had caused both of them to have sleepless nights.

"He's a necromancer?" He asked.

"One of the few in the world who hasn't been hunted down and killed. Mainly because he only ever uses his craft at the Emperor's request." Then she looked past James at the board. "Or for tournaments he's decided to enter. All of which he's won."

James pulled out his sword, which was subtly vibrating in it's scabbard.

"Well." He said with mild concern. "Let's hope for an upset."

"If anyone can do it, it's you." She said before kissing him on the cheek.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11qncjv/wait_is_this_just_gate_328/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (326/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James be like.

Also, enjoy a little look into Vickers' day to day operation.

Enjoy.

\~

James stood up with a look of exasperation that was only mostly fake. As he did he whispered for Amina to follow his lead.

"Captain Choi. Princess Amina." Soleen said from behind the emperor. To her credit, her voice was convincingly stern as she relayed the emperor's signs. "We congratulate you on your marriage and wish you great fortune together. However we may not tolerate blasphemy against the gods of this world. As is custom you are granted a stay of five days as our guests. Though you may end that stay early at your own discretion." She paused as the emperor stood up and made a show of glaring at James. "During that time the emperor demands that no further blaspheming occur or he would have no choice but to bring the wrath of the guard down upon you." She gestured toward the door. "Please enjoy your time here in Vatria, and please do not return to our country until you have gained an appropriate level of piety."

Then, as Commander Tyrius turned to open the door, the Vateris signed quickly to James. \[Ferrick and I have agents we can send messages through.\] He looked as though he was about to sign more when Tyrius finished opening the massive door and turned back around.

"Please retrieve your weapon and return to your room." Soleen finished for the Emperor.

James bowed a little, and Amina joined him.

"Thank you for your mercy and understanding your majesty." James said with a subtle wink. "I apologize for any offense," He looked back at Tyrius, who had never stopped staring at him with a hateful expression since his little test. "and for any accidental fear I may have induced in your guards."

\[Good luck on your "endeavor".\] The Emperor signed.

"I appreciate the apology." Soleen lied on his behalf.

James simply nodded. Then he turned on his heel and approached the large half orc commander. He stuck his hand out expectantly.

Tyrius glared at him with a rage so intense that James was surprised there wasn't steam coming out of his ears.

"Give the hero his weapon Commander." Soleen said.

"Yes.... sire." Tyrius said through clenched teeth as he pulled the pistol, magazine, and lone bullet out of a pouch on his belt and handed it roughly to James. James grabbed the pistol. And as if he was trying to be a cliche, Tyrius held onto it, forcing James to pull harder. But, larger or not, James was the stronger one here. Once the pistol was in his hands he popped the round back in the magazine, and loaded it before switching the safety on and tucking it back under his armor.

He turned and nodded to Emperor Vateris, "Good evening your holiness." He said as he stepped out the door, and past the small army of guards that were still in formation outside the doors from earlier.

"James." Amina said after having also bowed and said her farewell, then hustling for a few steps to catch up. "That was hands down the worst diplomatic meeting I've ever borne witness to. And I didn't even get to take part in the majority of it. What the hell just happened?"

James smiled as he slid his hand around her waist and bumped his hip into hers.

"First off." He said. "Despite everyone treating me to the contrary, I'm NOT... a diplomat." He peeked over his shoulder at the throng of guards who had turned to watch the two of them depart. Tyrius towered over most of them and continued to glare. He waved sarcastically. "Secondly. I think I just made a friend." Then he put on a cheesy grin. "Maybe two if you count the Commander. I think he was trying to flirt with me." He joked.

Amina just stared at him like the madman that he occasionally, and currently, was.

\--------------------

"Alright everyone up!" Vickers yelled. "Time for squats!"

The last dozen or so military personnel who were classified as prisoners groaned as they got up off of their backs and took up position for the exercise.

"Hey Chief!" Batista yelled as he jogged over. He was wearing a set of workout clothes that he had had made by the castle tailors, as well as a compression vest around his abdomen.

Vickers nodded at the former soldier. "Batista." He said as he lowered down and held his arms out in front of him. The prisoners followed suit. "What's up?"

"Passed the King on my way outside." Batty said as he jogged in place for a minute. "Said to let you know that he got a response to whatever you two had talked about. Said to have you talk to him whenever you got a chance."

"Thanks. I'll talk to him in a bit." Vickers said as he began another squat. Batty mocked a salute, then resumed his morning run.

Vickers had come to respect the younger man over the past few weeks. He hadn't had much opportunity to deal with him before Choi had left for his honeymoon. But since then the two of them had gotten to know each other a bit better. Batista acted as a sort of casual go-between for the prisoners and the Ambassador's staff. His position as neither active duty or attached personnel, having effectively been disavowed and granted asylum, allowed him a bit more freedom. And Vickers thought he was startlingly disciplined for someone who no longer needed to be.

Additionally, the two of them had started hustling the royal soldiers at darts, which Batista had apparently introduced them to. Batista had really good grouping, and while Vicker's wasn't so good at getting any of the outer rings, he was reliably able to hit the bullseye racking up points quickly whenever they played.

Half an hour later Vickers watched as the P.O.W.s slowly ambled from the dungeon bathing rooms to their cells.

In his opinion they had it easy for Prisoners. They were, with the exception of Nguyen, kept four to a room. The rooms had a sink and a latrine, just like prisons on earth. They got three meals a day, and if they felt sick or accidentally got hurt the guards would take them to the healers ward. The beds weren't much, but Vickers had spent three years hot-cotting on ships before he'd become a SEAL, and knew they could have been worse. Combined with the fact that Earth had sent over books for them, all inspected of course, and they actually had a pretty easy, if boring, time.

Some of the guards might have been a bit harsher than others. But Vickers couldn't blame them for that. The battle in the desert had been rather large. Most of the Petravian soldiers knew at least one or two people who'd been killed or injured there, either by the soldiers themselves, or by the thermobaric rounds from the Miffy's. And angry or not, the guards never broke any of the rules of conduct that the King had agreed to when it came to the treatment of the P.O.W.s.

"Alright." He said as the last of them stepped into their cell, and the guard shut it behind em. "Zero Five tomorrow. Same bat time. Same bat channel. Endurance day." He finished as several of them groaned at the announcement.

The air force prisoners, and the one Navy Petty Officer, weren't fans of his endurance days. The army soldiers only complained if it went further than three miles, though they still kept up. And the two marines that were still locked up only ever complained if they had to wear shirts while running.

Vickers chuckled. Even as prisoners, Jarheads were gonna be Jarheads. He knew that even when they hated the exercise the prisoners were probably glad just to be up and moving.

After leaving the dungeon behind he went back outside and began exercising himself. He'd led the prisoners through PT at normal human levels. Well, actually he'd gone a little harder than normal. They'd all been here long enough that their bodies were at least close to being fully infused with magic like he and Choi. But he still hadn't satisfied his own need for exercise.

He'd learned early on that while his new form wanted to be nocturnal, it still got the equivalent of zoomies if he didn't burn off energy fast enough. His first few days as a were-jaguar had been exhausting enough to keep it at bay. Then there had been his week or so with Atrafar, and the events at the druid forest. But once things had settled down, and he had lost his sexual partner, he'd woken up almost every night feeling restless and full of manic energy. So, mornings had become time for extreme weight lifting (he was up to nearly two tons now), long distance running (ten miles minimum), and combat training.

He was happy to have re-learned the way to get magic to flow through his new form, and could successfully manifest frost on his clawed hands once again. But he'd had to adjust his fighting style. Most of his power was now in his legs, and of all places, in his jaw. Plus his hands, while significantly stronger and equipped with built in daggers, weren't well suited to punching. His new style had become something akin to a strange combination of capoeira and jiu jitsu. But when coupled with the claws and ice it became something that none of the castle guards he sparred with could counter without using a pole-arm to stay out of his range.

Once he'd thoroughly exhausted himself, Vickers bathed and changed into his day clothes, a mish mash of his old uniform and some Petravian robes that had been altered for his new physique, especially his tail and his legs. Then he went to the dining hall and ate a plate of food that was vastly larger than any meal he'd ever eaten as a human, and mostly lightly cooked meat too. He still tried to ensure that there were starches and vegetables. But he'd quickly learned that things too heavy in garlic or onions would give him an upset stomach. Even after the mountainous meal he usually felt at least a little hungry. He was still adjusting to that part.

Then, as much as his new body begged for a long nap, Vickers walked through the halls toward the King's meeting room, which reminded Vickers of his old college lecture halls, where he started most days. Sure enough, he was in there speaking to several of the castle blacksmiths, something about needing more steel and brass, though they hushed up when the King nodded to Vickers. He was used to that, even now.

Vickers took a seat and waited patiently, and the King sent one of his aides over with a small envelope for him. He recognized the seal with the small dual lunar cycle on it, bisected by a simple representation of the planet's rings.

He looked up at the King, who saw him and nodded before resuming the conversation with the two blacksmiths.

Vickers slid a claw under the seal and reopened it. The King had already read it, no surprise there.

Then he began reading the Lunar Council's reply to his and the King's request.

And while he was happy with most of the contents, he was somewhat concerned about the method entailed. More precisely, he was worried about how HE was involved in what was being described.

Well. I signed up for it. He thought to himself as he placed a clawed hand on his temple and rubbed at it in frustration. Comes with the new car smell.

When he was done he took a deep breath, folded the letter back up, and waited for his chance to speak to the King.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11o5f8g/wait_is_this_just_gate_327/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (326/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James be like.

Also, enjoy a little look into Vickers' day to day operation.

Enjoy.

\~

James stood up with a look of exasperation that was only mostly fake. As he did he whispered for Amina to follow his lead.

"Captain Choi. Princess Amina." Soleen said from behind the emperor. To her credit, her voice was convincingly stern as she relayed the emperor's signs. "We congratulate you on your marriage and wish you great fortune together. However we may not tolerate blasphemy against the gods of this world. As is custom you are granted a stay of five days as our guests. Though you may end that stay early at your own discretion." She paused as the emperor stood up and made a show of glaring at James. "During that time the emperor demands that no further blaspheming occur or he would have no choice but to bring the wrath of the guard down upon you." She gestured toward the door. "Please enjoy your time here in Vatria, and please do not return to our country until you have gained an appropriate level of piety."

Then, as Commander Tyrius turned to open the door, the Vateris signed quickly to James. \[Ferrick and I have agents we can send messages through.\] He looked as though he was about to sign more when Tyrius finished opening the massive door and turned back around.

"Please retrieve your weapon and return to your room." Soleen finished for the Emperor.

James bowed a little, and Amina joined him.

"Thank you for your mercy and understanding your majesty." James said with a subtle wink. "I apologize for any offense," He looked back at Tyrius, who had never stopped staring at him with a hateful expression since his little test. "and for any accidental fear I may have induced in your guards."

\[Good luck on your "endeavor".\] The Emperor signed.

"I appreciate the apology." Soleen lied on his behalf.

James simply nodded. Then he turned on his heel and approached the large half orc commander. He stuck his hand out expectantly.

Tyrius glared at him with a rage so intense that James was surprised there wasn't steam coming out of his ears.

"Give the hero his weapon Commander." Soleen said.

"Yes.... sire." Tyrius said through clenched teeth as he pulled the pistol, magazine, and lone bullet out of a pouch on his belt and handed it roughly to James. James grabbed the pistol. And as if he was trying to be a cliche, Tyrius held onto it, forcing James to pull harder. But, larger or not, James was the stronger one here. Once the pistol was in his hands he popped the round back in the magazine, and loaded it before switching the safety on and tucking it back under his armor.

He turned and nodded to Emperor Vateris, "Good evening your holiness." He said as he stepped out the door, and past the small army of guards that were still in formation outside the doors from earlier.

"James." Amina said after having also bowed and said her farewell, then hustling for a few steps to catch up. "That was hands down the worst diplomatic meeting I've ever borne witness to. And I didn't even get to take part in the majority of it. What the hell just happened?"

James smiled as he slid his hand around her waist and bumped his hip into hers.

"First off." He said. "Despite everyone treating me to the contrary, I'm NOT... a diplomat." He peeked over his shoulder at the throng of guards who had turned to watch the two of them depart. Tyrius towered over most of them and continued to glare. He waved sarcastically. "Secondly. I think I just made a friend." Then he put on a cheesy grin. "Maybe two if you count the Commander. I think he was trying to flirt with me." He joked.

Amina just stared at him like the madman that he occasionally, and currently, was.

\--------------------

"Alright everyone up!" Vickers yelled. "Time for squats!"

The last dozen or so military personnel who were classified as prisoners groaned as they got up off of their backs and took up position for the exercise.

"Hey Chief!" Batista yelled as he jogged over. He was wearing a set of workout clothes that he had had made by the castle tailors, as well as a compression vest around his abdomen.

Vickers nodded at the former soldier. "Batista." He said as he lowered down and held his arms out in front of him. The prisoners followed suit. "What's up?"

"Passed the King on my way outside." Batty said as he jogged in place for a minute. "Said to let you know that he got a response to whatever you two had talked about. Said to have you talk to him whenever you got a chance."

"Thanks. I'll talk to him in a bit." Vickers said as he began another squat. Batty mocked a salute, then resumed his morning run.

Vickers had come to respect the younger man over the past few weeks. He hadn't had much opportunity to deal with him before Choi had left for his honeymoon. But since then the two of them had gotten to know each other a bit better. Batista acted as a sort of casual go-between for the prisoners and the Ambassador's staff. His position as neither active duty or attached personnel, having effectively been disavowed and granted asylum, allowed him a bit more freedom. And Vickers thought he was startlingly disciplined for someone who no longer needed to be.

Additionally, the two of them had started hustling the royal soldiers at darts, which Batista had apparently introduced them to. Batista had really good grouping, and while Vicker's wasn't so good at getting any of the outer rings, he was reliably able to hit the bullseye racking up points quickly whenever they played.

Half an hour later Vickers watched as the P.O.W.s slowly ambled from the dungeon bathing rooms to their cells.

In his opinion they had it easy for Prisoners. They were, with the exception of Nguyen, kept four to a room. The rooms had a sink and a latrine, just like prisons on earth. They got three meals a day, and if they felt sick or accidentally got hurt the guards would take them to the healers ward. The beds weren't much, but Vickers had spent three years hot-cotting on ships before he'd become a SEAL, and knew they could have been worse. Combined with the fact that Earth had sent over books for them, all inspected of course, and they actually had a pretty easy, if boring, time.

Some of the guards might have been a bit harsher than others. But Vickers couldn't blame them for that. The battle in the desert had been rather large. Most of the Petravian soldiers knew at least one or two people who'd been killed or injured there, either by the soldiers themselves, or by the thermobaric rounds from the Miffy's. And angry or not, the guards never broke any of the rules of conduct that the King had agreed to when it came to the treatment of the P.O.W.s.

"Alright." He said as the last of them stepped into their cell, and the guard shut it behind em. "Zero Five tomorrow. Same bat time. Same bat channel. Endurance day." He finished as several of them groaned at the announcement.

The air force prisoners, and the one Navy Petty Officer, weren't fans of his endurance days. The army soldiers only complained if it went further than three miles, though they still kept up. And the two marines that were still locked up only ever complained if they had to wear shirts while running.

Vickers chuckled. Even as prisoners, Jarheads were gonna be Jarheads. He knew that even when they hated the exercise the prisoners were probably glad just to be up and moving.

After leaving the dungeon behind he went back outside and began exercising himself. He'd led the prisoners through PT at normal human levels. Well, actually he'd gone a little harder than normal. They'd all been here long enough that their bodies were at least close to being fully infused with magic like he and Choi. But he still hadn't satisfied his own need for exercise.

He'd learned early on that while his new form wanted to be nocturnal, it still got the equivalent of zoomies if he didn't burn off energy fast enough. His first few days as a were-jaguar had been exhausting enough to keep it at bay. Then there had been his week or so with Atrafar, and the events at the druid forest. But once things had settled down, and he had lost his sexual partner, he'd woken up almost every night feeling restless and full of manic energy. So, mornings had become time for extreme weight lifting (he was up to nearly two tons now), long distance running (ten miles minimum), and combat training.

He was happy to have re-learned the way to get magic to flow through his new form, and could successfully manifest frost on his clawed hands once again. But he'd had to adjust his fighting style. Most of his power was now in his legs, and of all places, in his jaw. Plus his hands, while significantly stronger and equipped with built in daggers, weren't well suited to punching. His new style had become something akin to a strange combination of capoeira and jiu jitsu. But when coupled with the claws and ice it became something that none of the castle guards he sparred with could counter without using a pole-arm to stay out of his range.

Once he'd thoroughly exhausted himself, Vickers bathed and changed into his day clothes, a mish mash of his old uniform and some Petravian robes that had been altered for his new physique, especially his tail and his legs. Then he went to the dining hall and ate a plate of food that was vastly larger than any meal he'd ever eaten as a human, and mostly lightly cooked meat too. He still tried to ensure that there were starches and vegetables. But he'd quickly learned that things too heavy in garlic or onions would give him an upset stomach. Even after the mountainous meal he usually felt at least a little hungry. He was still adjusting to that part.

Then, as much as his new body begged for a long nap, Vickers walked through the halls toward the King's meeting room, which reminded Vickers of his old college lecture halls, where he started most days. Sure enough, he was in there speaking to several of the castle blacksmiths, something about needing more steel and brass, though they hushed up when the King nodded to Vickers. He was used to that, even now.

Vickers took a seat and waited patiently, and the King sent one of his aides over with a small envelope for him. He recognized the seal with the small dual lunar cycle on it, bisected by a simple representation of the planet's rings.

He looked up at the King, who saw him and nodded before resuming the conversation with the two blacksmiths.

Vickers slid a claw under the seal and reopened it. The King had already read it, no surprise there.

Then he began reading the Lunar Council's reply to his and the King's request.

And while he was happy with most of the contents, he was somewhat concerned about the method entailed. More precisely, he was worried about how HE was involved in what was being described.

Well. I signed up for it. He thought to himself as he placed a clawed hand on his temple and rubbed at it in frustration. Comes with the new car smell.

When he was done he took a deep breath, folded the letter back up, and waited for his chance to speak to the King.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11o54p9/wait_is_this_just_gate_327/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (325/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James and tact don't go hand in hand. And he doesn't do things by halves.

Enjoy.

\~

\[So.\] The emperor signed, interrupting James's thoughts.is signed with mild upset at the tale he'd told them. \[My perceived holiness is an act required of my station. You are the only person besides my translator who knows my true thoughts in regards to them.\]

James looked back over his shoulder at the massive half-orc that was quietly standing sentinel at the door. They'd allowed the Emperor's translator back in several minutes earlier. The young woman had brought in a tray of finger foods and a tea set which they had used to serve James and Amina. Now she stood silently behind the emperor, allowing him to speak with James privately while Amina watched silently next to him.

\[No.\] The emperor signed as James turned back. \[Tyrius doesn't know either. He knows that I am not as.... zealous.... as I pretend to be. But he believes it to be tempered caution for my station rather than what it truly is. Hence his reaction earlier.\]

\[Will my outburst earlier have any repercussions?\] James asked in the same sign language.

The emperor nodded grimly. \[I shall have to chastise you through Soleen's voice.\] He replied. \[So that Tyrius may bare witness to my displeasure at your so called heresy.\] Then he looked at James reproachfully. \[Had you taken my cue and spoken with your arms instead I would have been able to deal with you more amicably. But... having learned your story, I can understand your hatred of the gods.\]

James nodded. \[Sorry.\] He said simply. \[I thought you were trying to threaten us.\]

\[No need.\] The youthful leader answered. \[By necessity it had to seem that way to observers. It's unfortunate. But it is what it is.\]

James thought on what he'd been told. The emperor's story only made him dislike the gods even more.

Vateris had been a gifted child, beloved by both his parents and the people of the Vatrian court, and had been called the song bird as a child for his skill in music. His parents HAD been as zealous as their followers, and in keeping with their countries culture had attributed the young prince's talent to his divinity. They'd said that his voice and his ability to register notes were a gift from the gods.

And just like the ancient gods of myth from Earth, they had earned the wrath of the god of the arts.

Vateris had had a private encounter with the deity, much as James had with Moon, and Defiance, and sort of with Life and her daughter.

He had been challenged to sing his most beautiful song for the god. And, believing in the tales of his own divinity, tales that he had been told of since birth, the young prince had been eager to do so.

And he had been found wanting.

Now he was deaf and mute, never to partake in the art he had so loved as a child. He'd had to come up with his own sign language, since a standardized form hadn't been made in this world.

And also destined to never BELIEVE in the myth his family had crafted for itself over the course of centuries.

And James was one of only two people in the world who knew the full truth of it. The other was standing behind the emperor with a smile on their face as they silently watched the conversation. Amina would learn of it later, once they were on the road and theoretically alone and unwatched. But for now she simply had to trust James to listen and make decisions about the current situation.

\[So.\] The emperor signed, interrupting James's thoughts. \[Do you have any plans to move against the gods? Or do you simply hate them?\]

James considered the question as he looked down at the furred and clawed hand that rested on Amina's leg. Could he trust the emperor? He barely knew the man, who wasn't as young as he looked, and who led a nation of borderline religious fanatics.

\[I guess that depends.\] He signed hesitantly. The emperor cocked an eyebrow as he leaned forward. \[Part of me wonders if this is a trap and you're simply giving me enough rope to hang myself. Lord knows my outburst earlier would be enough for any leader to have me imprisoned at the least. And if your nation's people are as fanatical about your divinity as you say then the contents of the outburst might be enough to have me burned at the stake. At least if my world's history with religion is any guide on how you might react.\] He thought for a moment. \[How do I know I can trust you?\]

Vateris nodded. They were all fair questions.

\[Ask your wife about my.... FORMER... talents.\] The emperor signed.

James looked at him for a moment, then leaned over and whispered in Amina's ear.

"Was the Emperor known for any skills as a child?" He asked as quietly as he could manage. "Anything impressive."

Amina thought for a moment, then whispered into James's ear.

"It was before my time. But my political teacher mentioned how he was known as.... I think it was the Song Bird. Or the God Bird or something like that. I can't remember exactly. But he was known for his singing voice. The tale of his voice and hearing was dark news in the Vatrian empire." She said before sitting back.

James nodded. Then turned back to the Emperor.

\[Mind a little test?\] He asked.

Vateris shrugged. \[I'm not terribly accustomed to being TESTED by guests. But I suppose it can't hurt.\]

\[Apologies ahead of time then.\] James said. The Emperor cocked his eyebrow again. Then James signed. \[I'm going to move fast for a moment. I promise no harm shall come to you. Please keep your eyes locked on mine.\] He slid his hand under the plate of his chest armor.

Emperor Vateris tilted his head in confusion for a moment as he considered the warning. Then nodded.

In a blur James's pistol came out from under his armor and he whipped it around so it was aimed at the ceiling behind him, using his head to shield the emperor from the muzzle flash, small as it was. The emperor flinched at the sudden movement. But his eyes remained locked on James's.

BANG!

And the emperors eyes didn't so much as twitch from the noise of the report.

He quickly pulled the pistol back in front of him and unloaded it in a blur, setting its magazine next to it and leaving its slide locked back, before placing it on the emperor's desk and raising his hands up over his head.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled. But the warning was unnecessary. He was lifted bodily out of his chair by a pair of massive hands and slammed him onto the ground even as the door opened and guards poured into the room. Before he knew it he was in a classic police style hold on the ground with his arms pinned behind his back.

"It's fine." He said in a grunt. "Amina relax. I expected this part. I'm fine."

"FINE!?!" Tyrius asked in his incredibly deep voice. "YOU BROUGHT A WEAPON INTO THE PRESENCE OF THE EMPEROR DESPITE MY INSTRUCTIONS YOUR LIFE IS-"

"Silence Tyrius." The translator, Soleen, said. The massive man froze as if he were made of stone. "Your emperor has orders for you."

"Lady Voice." Tyrius hissed through clenched teeth. "I only perform my duty to defend his holiness."

"And his holiness demands your attention." She replied calmly. James felt the Guard Commander's weight shift a few moments later.

"He is to be released." Soleen said calmly as she translated. "The other guards are to leave the room. You may secure this.... weapon... until the hero and the princess leave. But the Captain warned me of what he was doing. More or less."

And as easily as that, James felt the hands release his arms, and the weight of the commander's knee was removed from his lower back.

"As you command my Emperor." He said as James slowly stood back up.

"MOVE.... SLOWLY." The massive half-orc said as he watched James. "I have been forced to spare you twice. There will not be a third time." Then he made his way over to the desk and cautiously picked up the pistol, magazine, and the single bullet that had been ejected. Then he signaled the other guards out of the room, and took up his post again. Though his eyes remained locked on James the entire time.

The king looked at him with a simmering anger as James dusted himself off and made his way back to his seat and righted it.

\[Did I pass?\] He signed sarcastically.

\[Well. You're either legitimately deaf. Or you have the most hardcore nerves I've ever seen. And a lot of control over your unconscious reactions.\] James replied. \[Sorry about the hassle.\] He looked back over his shoulder at the spot he'd shot with the only rubber bullet in the magazine. Even with the non lethal round, it had knocked a chunk of stone off of the wall, just below the ceiling. \[And about the hole in your wall.\]

\[What is that thing?\] The Emperor asked. \[I take it it was quite loud? I felt it when it did.... whatever that was.\]

\[It's called a....\] His arms wobbled for a moment as they apparently came across a concept that the sign language didn't have a signal for. He paused and thought for a moment. \[Um.... your way of the arms doesn't have the exact word for it. But it's a handheld cannon. I can't tell you much more than that.\]

The emperor's eyes widened. \[You fired a canon INSIDE my study?\] He asked incredulously. \[Is this from your world?\]

James nodded.

The emperor looked away for a moment as he considered the ramifications of that.

\[Captain Choi.\] He said after a moment. \[I am not trying to set you up. Nor am I an enemy for you.\] He pointed at his chest for emphasis. \[I.... HATE... the gods. I won't pretend my hatred for them is equal to yours. I cannot imagine the anger I would feel if I had lost loved ones to them. My injury is my own and no one else's. In that we ARE different.\]

James listened, or he supposed WATCHED would be more accurate, as the Emperor continued.

\[But I assure you, that if the day ever comes where I have an opportunity to get my vengeance upon the gods, then I shall have it. Even if it costs me my life.\]

James smiled a devilish smile at the Emperor's statement.

\[Well then.\] He signed as he sat forward, peeking back as he heard Tyrius shift against the door. \[I think we might ACTUALLY be good friends moving forward.\]

James held his hand out in the classic greeting. The emperor looked at it curiously, clearly not accustomed to being greeted in such a fashion. But when he took the hand a moment later and shook it, James was pleasantly surprised to feel a strong grip returning the greeting.

\[I'll still have to chastise you in front of Tyrius and the others.\] The emperor signed as they released each others hands.

James just shrugged. \[I'm used to it.\] He responded smugly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11me665/wait_is_this_just_gate_326/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (325/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James and tact don't go hand in hand. And he doesn't do things by halves.

Enjoy.

\~

\[So.\] The emperor signed, interrupting James's thoughts.is signed with mild upset at the tale he'd told them. \[My perceived holiness is an act required of my station. You are the only person besides my translator who knows my true thoughts in regards to them.\]

James looked back over his shoulder at the massive half-orc that was quietly standing sentinel at the door. They'd allowed the Emperor's translator back in several minutes earlier. The young woman had brought in a tray of finger foods and a tea set which they had used to serve James and Amina. Now she stood silently behind the emperor, allowing him to speak with James privately while Amina watched silently next to him.

\[No.\] The emperor signed as James turned back. \[Tyrius doesn't know either. He knows that I am not as.... zealous.... as I pretend to be. But he believes it to be tempered caution for my station rather than what it truly is. Hence his reaction earlier.\]

\[Will my outburst earlier have any repercussions?\] James asked in the same sign language.

The emperor nodded grimly. \[I shall have to chastise you through Soleen's voice.\] He replied. \[So that Tyrius may bare witness to my displeasure at your so called heresy.\] Then he looked at James reproachfully. \[Had you taken my cue and spoken with your arms instead I would have been able to deal with you more amicably. But... having learned your story, I can understand your hatred of the gods.\]

James nodded. \[Sorry.\] He said simply. \[I thought you were trying to threaten us.\]

\[No need.\] The youthful leader answered. \[By necessity it had to seem that way to observers. It's unfortunate. But it is what it is.\]

James thought on what he'd been told. The emperor's story only made him dislike the gods even more.

Vateris had been a gifted child, beloved by both his parents and the people of the Vatrian court, and had been called the song bird as a child for his skill in music. His parents HAD been as zealous as their followers, and in keeping with their countries culture had attributed the young prince's talent to his divinity. They'd said that his voice and his ability to register notes were a gift from the gods.

And just like the ancient gods of myth from Earth, they had earned the wrath of the god of the arts.

Vateris had had a private encounter with the deity, much as James had with Moon, and Defiance, and sort of with Life and her daughter.

He had been challenged to sing his most beautiful song for the god. And, believing in the tales of his own divinity, tales that he had been told of since birth, the young prince had been eager to do so.

And he had been found wanting.

Now he was deaf and mute, never to partake in the art he had so loved as a child. He'd had to come up with his own sign language, since a standardized form hadn't been made in this world.

And also destined to never BELIEVE in the myth his family had crafted for itself over the course of centuries.

And James was one of only two people in the world who knew the full truth of it. The other was standing behind the emperor with a smile on their face as they silently watched the conversation. Amina would learn of it later, once they were on the road and theoretically alone and unwatched. But for now she simply had to trust James to listen and make decisions about the current situation.

\[So.\] The emperor signed, interrupting James's thoughts. \[Do you have any plans to move against the gods? Or do you simply hate them?\]

James considered the question as he looked down at the furred and clawed hand that rested on Amina's leg. Could he trust the emperor? He barely knew the man, who wasn't as young as he looked, and who led a nation of borderline religious fanatics.

\[I guess that depends.\] He signed hesitantly. The emperor cocked an eyebrow as he leaned forward. \[Part of me wonders if this is a trap and you're simply giving me enough rope to hang myself. Lord knows my outburst earlier would be enough for any leader to have me imprisoned at the least. And if your nation's people are as fanatical about your divinity as you say then the contents of the outburst might be enough to have me burned at the stake. At least if my world's history with religion is any guide on how you might react.\] He thought for a moment. \[How do I know I can trust you?\]

Vateris nodded. They were all fair questions.

\[Ask your wife about my.... FORMER... talents.\] The emperor signed.

James looked at him for a moment, then leaned over and whispered in Amina's ear.

"Was the Emperor known for any skills as a child?" He asked as quietly as he could manage. "Anything impressive."

Amina thought for a moment, then whispered into James's ear.

"It was before my time. But my political teacher mentioned how he was known as.... I think it was the Song Bird. Or the God Bird or something like that. I can't remember exactly. But he was known for his singing voice. The tale of his voice and hearing was dark news in the Vatrian empire." She said before sitting back.

James nodded. Then turned back to the Emperor.

\[Mind a little test?\] He asked.

Vateris shrugged. \[I'm not terribly accustomed to being TESTED by guests. But I suppose it can't hurt.\]

\[Apologies ahead of time then.\] James said. The Emperor cocked his eyebrow again. Then James signed. \[I'm going to move fast for a moment. I promise no harm shall come to you. Please keep your eyes locked on mine.\] He slid his hand under the plate of his chest armor.

Emperor Vateris tilted his head in confusion for a moment as he considered the warning. Then nodded.

In a blur James's pistol came out from under his armor and he whipped it around so it was aimed at the ceiling behind him, using his head to shield the emperor from the muzzle flash, small as it was. The emperor flinched at the sudden movement. But his eyes remained locked on James's.

BANG!

And the emperors eyes didn't so much as twitch from the noise of the report.

He quickly pulled the pistol back in front of him and unloaded it in a blur, setting its magazine next to it and leaving its slide locked back, before placing it on the emperor's desk and raising his hands up over his head.

"JAMES!" Amina yelled. But the warning was unnecessary. He was lifted bodily out of his chair by a pair of massive hands and slammed him onto the ground even as the door opened and guards poured into the room. Before he knew it he was in a classic police style hold on the ground with his arms pinned behind his back.

"It's fine." He said in a grunt. "Amina relax. I expected this part. I'm fine."

"FINE!?!" Tyrius asked in his incredibly deep voice. "YOU BROUGHT A WEAPON INTO THE PRESENCE OF THE EMPEROR DESPITE MY INSTRUCTIONS YOUR LIFE IS-"

"Silence Tyrius." The translator, Soleen, said. The massive man froze as if he were made of stone. "Your emperor has orders for you."

"Lady Voice." Tyrius hissed through clenched teeth. "I only perform my duty to defend his holiness."

"And his holiness demands your attention." She replied calmly. James felt the Guard Commander's weight shift a few moments later.

"He is to be released." Soleen said calmly as she translated. "The other guards are to leave the room. You may secure this.... weapon... until the hero and the princess leave. But the Captain warned me of what he was doing. More or less."

And as easily as that, James felt the hands release his arms, and the weight of the commander's knee was removed from his lower back.

"As you command my Emperor." He said as James slowly stood back up.

"MOVE.... SLOWLY." The massive half-orc said as he watched James. "I have been forced to spare you twice. There will not be a third time." Then he made his way over to the desk and cautiously picked up the pistol, magazine, and the single bullet that had been ejected. Then he signaled the other guards out of the room, and took up his post again. Though his eyes remained locked on James the entire time.

The king looked at him with a simmering anger as James dusted himself off and made his way back to his seat and righted it.

\[Did I pass?\] He signed sarcastically.

\[Well. You're either legitimately deaf. Or you have the most hardcore nerves I've ever seen. And a lot of control over your unconscious reactions.\] James replied. \[Sorry about the hassle.\] He looked back over his shoulder at the spot he'd shot with the only rubber bullet in the magazine. Even with the non lethal round, it had knocked a chunk of stone off of the wall, just below the ceiling. \[And about the hole in your wall.\]

\[What is that thing?\] The Emperor asked. \[I take it it was quite loud? I felt it when it did.... whatever that was.\]

\[It's called a....\] His arms wobbled for a moment as they apparently came across a concept that the sign language didn't have a signal for. He paused and thought for a moment. \[Um.... your way of the arms doesn't have the exact word for it. But it's a handheld cannon. I can't tell you much more than that.\]

The emperor's eyes widened. \[You fired a canon INSIDE my study?\] He asked incredulously. \[Is this from your world?\]

James nodded.

The emperor looked away for a moment as he considered the ramifications of that.

\[Captain Choi.\] He said after a moment. \[I am not trying to set you up. Nor am I an enemy for you.\] He pointed at his chest for emphasis. \[I.... HATE... the gods. I won't pretend my hatred for them is equal to yours. I cannot imagine the anger I would feel if I had lost loved ones to them. My injury is my own and no one else's. In that we ARE different.\]

James listened, or he supposed WATCHED would be more accurate, as the Emperor continued.

\[But I assure you, that if the day ever comes where I have an opportunity to get my vengeance upon the gods, then I shall have it. Even if it costs me my life.\]

James smiled a devilish smile at the Emperor's statement.

\[Well then.\] He signed as he sat forward, peeking back as he heard Tyrius shift against the door. \[I think we might ACTUALLY be good friends moving forward.\]

James held his hand out in the classic greeting. The emperor looked at it curiously, clearly not accustomed to being greeted in such a fashion. But when he took the hand a moment later and shook it, James was pleasantly surprised to feel a strong grip returning the greeting.

\[I'll still have to chastise you in front of Tyrius and the others.\] The emperor signed as they released each others hands.

James just shrugged. \[I'm used to it.\] He responded smugly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11me48q/wait_is_this_just_gate_326/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (324/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Could both of them have handled this better? Probably. But James is used to acting/speaking before he acts. This is par for the course for him. And the Emperor's reasoning will be explained next chapter.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

arms were longer than a normal humans, marking him as a half-orc. On his waste was a short handled war hammer that reminded James of the Norse god Thor. Though it had more spikes than that fabled weapon. His voice was deep and rumbled in a way that made it seem like his vocal chords couldn't handle the amount of bass in it.

"His Majesty, Emperor Vateris, REQUESTS you attend his study for a conversation." The large man said. Then he looked at Amina. "A private conversation."

James felt Amina press against him ever so slightly, then she patted him on the side, right above where he was resting his hand on the grip of his Colt.

"I have no issue with speaking with the Emperor, if that is his wish." James said. "But under no circumstances am I going to leave my wife unattended in an unfamiliar land. Not after the excitement of earlier." He held his wolf hand up for emphasis. Then moved it, imitating the hand gestures from earlier. "I'm gonna guess that he and I can have a private conversation even in a crowded room. She comes with, or I don't go. No exceptions." He tried to ignore the cold sweat that formed as the Vatrian guards visibly bristled at the display of the so-called way of the arms.

"It is that very HERESY...." The lead guard said, his jaw clenching as he said the last word. "That is cause for him to summon you."

"I kinda figured." James said steadily. He heard, and partially felt, Amina pulling one of the three speed loaders from the back of his belt. "Like I said. She and I go together, or not at all." He nodded at the guards behind the large man. "And that's not enough people to stop us from leaving if it comes to it."

There was a creaking noise from one side of the room that made James tense as his eyes began to glow gold. A small woman in dark, ninja-like, robes emerged from the bathroom of their room with a drawn bow. There was a clacking as one of their windows opened, and a similarly dressed man kneeled on their window ledge with a crossbow.

"That's better." He said. "But still not enough."

"James." Amina said softly as she adjusted to cover them from the new threats. "That's an arbalestier." She said of the man in the window. "And they are Vatrian way-walkers. We may see two. But there's probably five or six more that we DON'T see."

James looked back just a bit, with a raised eyebrow. He didn't have time to ask what that was at the moment.

"The Emperor only makes requests once." The lead guard said. "Though he ordered us to ASSURE you... that should he find your conversation pleasing, no harm shall come to either of you. Additionally, even if he finds the conversation UN-pleasing. You would simply be held as guests until he and your King could speak face to face."

"And we will gladly speak with him." Amina said. "But with the rights of royal guests we request that it be in accompaniment of each other."

The large man seemed to consider this for a moment. Then he nodded.

"This is acceptable. But please leave your weapons here with your guards." He said sternly. "Nobody is allowed in his presence armed, least of all in his study or chambers." Then he untied the chain-mail under his neck and bared a tattoo on his upper chest. "I swear honesty and safety to you both until such time as my Emperor explicitly orders otherwise. On my duty." He said. As he did the tattoo flared with a dark red light and he grimaced for a moment.

And just like that the Petravian guards seemed to relax. Amina even pressed the speed loader back into its pouch on his belt and closed the magnetic flap over it.

He looked back at her curiously again.

"If a Vatrian royal guard swears on their duty then it costs their life to break that vow." She said simply. "At the very least we can trust HIM." She added with a nod toward the large man. "Isn't that right Commander Tyrius."

The large man nodded in response as he tied his chain mail back in place under his chin.

"If you would please Princess." He said, gesturing at their weapons and armor. "Hero. Please disarm yourselves."

There was a slight whistle behind him from the woman that had emerged from their bathroom, and when he looked she patted at her hip. Right where JAMES had his revolver.

"Including the device on your belt." Tyrius said sternly. "Whatever it is."

James stepped back hesitantly. Then he turned and faced Amina. "You're sure?" He asked simply. But he was surprised to see her already removing her sword belt and shield. She even pulled the dagger out that she always kept tucked into her left vambrace.

She nodded. Then she whispered. "Boasts or not dear. We're outnumbered, and they still have Steve and my sister." She said. "We might escape. But it would ONLY be us."

"Right." He whispered back. Then he turned back to the large commander. "We'll come with." He said sarcastically as he began unfastening his holster belt.

And while he removed the revolver, he made sure to keep the .45 that was tucked into his chest plate. Even if they frisked him, or had him remove the armor, they wouldn't find it hidden in there. And he knew from his duel with Artair that the Earth weapons didn't register as magical. It could be a life saver in a pinch, even if it did only have a single magazine without his belt.

A few minutes later they were walking through the palace surrounded by Vatrian guards.

\----------

When they arrived James was surprised to find the room startlingly empty, practically spartan compared to the rest of the royal palace. It also had no guards. And while the Emperor's translator was present, standing off to the side of the large desk he sat at in front of the lit fireplace, they did not actively translate as the Emperor "Spoke".

"Princess Amina Petravius." The translator said. "A most unexpected addition to this meeting. Though not an unwelcome one."

Amina made a slight bow, ignoring the slight graciously.

"Before I leave. Is there anything either of you would desire? Refreshments? Food?" The translator asked as they made their way to the door.

"Just answers." James said venomously.

"Then I shall take my leave." The translator said. "Congratulations on your marriage." Then they stepped out of the door, which was still being held open by the commander.

The large man stepped in and closed the door behind him before standing attention there. Clearly intending to stay for the duration of this conversation. Though James was happy to see that his hand was nowhere near his weapon.

James turned back to the Emperor.

\[I see there was some disagreement about the nature of this meeting.\] The young man said as he stood up from his chair and approached the two of them.

"I had reason to believe that I had caused some kind of offense earlier." James said as his arms automatically translated into the emperor's hand signs. "My wife and I were unwilling to separate from each other given the circumstances." He paused for a moment as he thought of what to say next. "I've learned to be wary since coming to this world, and we have lost much together." He added.

The emperor seemed to consider this for a moment. Then nodded slightly.

\[I understand.\] He signed. \[We have heard tales of great battles and remarkable amounts of devastation to the land of Petravus. Each victory earned at great cost of life and land.\]

"Especially to she and I." James said/signed with a nod at Amina.

\[I am sorry to hear that.\] The Emperor replied. \[Tell me; can you speak with your hands and not your voice? Or must you do both?\]

James thought about it for a moment, then decided to try. He held up a finger, requesting a moment. The Emperor nodded as he slowly circled the two of them. Studying them as he did. After once around them, he stopped back in front of James, looking at him warily.

Come on. How do you talk without talking? James thought.

Then his arms moved. \[Come on. How do you talk without talking?\] They signed, and James watched them with confusion. \[Oh crap. Don't think hard about stuff you-\] He waved his hands in a jumble, then clamped his hands onto his elbows.

The emperor peered at him with a look that was equal parts amusement and offense.

"Sorry." James said as he let his arms sign freely. "Apparently it's as easy as thinking of doing it."

"James?" Amina asked curiously. He looked at her and nodded.

"Medallion stuff." He said.. Oddly, his hands didn't sign that part. Though they began again as he faced the emperor again. "I think this is the part where the conversation becomes one on one."

\[Quite so.\] The emperor replied. \[Please apologize to her if it seems rude. I had no intention of her being here for this.\]

James nodded. "He apologizes if that makes it seem rude." He said to her. Then he turned back to the emperor and thought. Though he had to focus a lot harder than he thought about WHEN he signed and didn't. \[I suppose we can start.\] He signed.

\[That's my line.\] The emperor said with a smug look on his face.

\[Sorry.\] James signed back, then bowed a little. \[At your discretion your majesty.\] He added as he stood back up.

The emperor studied him for a moment, then nodded.

\[How many gods have you had audience with in your time in this world?\] He asked. His signs were in a rapid, incredibly precise, fashion that the medallion's magic (however it worked) made him think meant the younger man was being stern and somewhat angry.

James clenched his jaw, and felt his claws dig into his palm as his hands clenched into fists as well. Then he shook his head a bit.

\[Too many.\] He admitted. \[But for the record, three.Though it could be considered four if you consider the Mother of the Land, as the druids called her, to be a god as well.\]

The Emperor's eyes widened at that.

\[Do you have issue with the gods?\] He asked after a moment. \[Even though they brought you to this world, and have granted you their boons?\]

James looked at Amina for a moment. She looked back at him curiously.

Then he spoke out loud so she could hear. The Emperor shifted uncomfortably as he did. And he heard Tyrius move a bit as well.

"The gods abducted me." He began, signing as he did. "In so doing they maimed one of my friends, and inadvertently caused the death of another well before his time." He stepped toward the smaller man. "They took me from a life of relative peace, and thrust me into a world of danger and, admittedly, fantasy. And while I thank them for the fact that in doing so I have met the love of my life." He nodded at Amina, who smiled even as she stood up straighter. "But that does NOT forgive who I lost in those first few moments."

The Emperor attempted to stand up to James as he approached.

"Hero." Tyrius boomed from where he stood at the door. James looked over and saw that his hand was on his war hammer now.

\[It's fine commander.\] The Emperor signed as James stopped only a step away from him.

"They looked on as another of my friends, Amina's own sister of choice, was turned into a MONSTER... and called a CHAMPION." He practically spat the title out. Then he held his wolf arm up again. "And then REWARDED me.... for granting her a merciful death." He stared at the Emperor. "She had two kids."

\[I believe I unders-\] The Emperor began to sign. But James waved a hand.

\[I'm not done.\] He signed rapidly.

"Then they manipulated events to temporarily relieve us of the vanishing blight." He pointed at the emperor for emphasis. "You know of the vanishing blight yeah? I was told your land had a few patches of it around too. Just like everyone else."

The emperor nodded, but James was already continuing before he could sign anything else.

"Did you know that THEY," He pointed up at the sky. "are the ones that sent the blight to this world?" The emperor's eyes widened in surprise at that. "Cause they did. And when they HELPED us get rid of it. They used my baby brother to do so." He was breathing heavily now, even as he felt tears begin rolling down his cheeks. "My baby brother who was only in this world because if he had stayed on Earth my OWN people would have used him against me." He paused for effect. "And the GODS.... killed him. In body and probably also his soul. JUST so they could buy us some time to prepare for the return of the entity that was tied to the blight." He stepped until he was almost nose to nose with the Emperor. He heard the massive guard commander begin moving toward them. "And even though my brother might still be alive KINDA... That entity WILL return. One way or the other."

"James." Amina hissed in warning.

"That happened only a week or two before Amina and I left to come here." He said. "So yes.... I have issue with these so called gods."

A large, powerful, hand clamped onto his shoulder and James was turned bodily by Tyrius, who had his hammer in the other hand and was bringing it up for a swing.

James latched onto the hand with his own, his eyes blazing with golden light. His magically enhanced earth and werewolf muscles made him MUCH stronger than the people of this world, and he heard a cracking noise from the commander's hand. But the man was a warrior, and didn't slow down or falter at all.

Then a small, tan, hand slapped the commander in the face. Tyrius froze in shock. Then wrenched his hand out of James's grip before he fell back and kneeled.

"My Emperor." He said in his deep voice. "My greatest apologies for assuming your will."

\[I will not have my commander die to his own vow.\] The emperor signed furiously. Then he stamped his feet angrily as he realized that his commander wasn't looking at him, and James assumed also wouldn't have understood the signs even if he were.

James stared at the diminutive leader, who was staring back at him with equal parts anger, and confusion.

Then the emperor signed to him. \[Instruct him that the God's Falcon orders him back to his post.\] He took several deep breaths. Then added. \[Please.\]

James looked back and forth between the two of them.

"The God's Falcon orders you back to your post?" He said hesitantly.

Tyrius looked up at him in shock, then at the Emperor. He nodded, then quickly stood up and moved at double time back to the door, where he immediately stood at attention, hammer back on his belt. As if nothing had happened.

James looked back at the Emperor curiously.

\[Are you quite done?\] He asked James.

James considered the question. Then nodded. Though his blood was still up a bit.

\[I believe that my shock and disbelief earlier, at someone using my own signs despite their secrecy, may have led us to have a misunderstanding.\] The emperor signed. \[For that, I apologize. So you know, I am called the God to Be only because I am Emperor. I have no misgivings about my own divinity.\]

James's head tilted a bit at the new information.

\[If anything.\] The Emperor continued. \[The title was made into a cruel jest.\] He pointed at his own throat and ears. \[The gods have taken from me as well. So in this, we are kindred spirits.\]

James considered this for a moment. Then understanding and embarrassment made him sign an apology.

\[Thank you.\] The Emperor said in response. Then he gestured at the chair in front of his desk. \[Now. Let us discuss our mutual enemies with more... level heads, and better understanding of each other.\]

James nodded, and followed the emperor's guidance toward the chair in question, signalling for Amina to follow.

And the three of them, with James translating, spoke long into the night.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11ldk66/wait_is_this_just_gate_325/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (324/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Could both of them have handled this better? Probably. But James is used to acting/speaking before he acts. This is par for the course for him. And the Emperor's reasoning will be explained next chapter.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were on their way out of the Imperial Palace to grab some dinner, and to look into staying somewhere else for the duration of their stay, when the Emperor's guards made their move.

They had been housed IN the palace, in the ambassadorial wing that was remarkably similar to the one in King Farrick's castle, and as such had known after their encounter earlier that they needed to leave. The two of them had donned their armor and weapons and grabbed the two bottomless bags they'd brought with them, and were going to head to the stables for Steve, and had just opened the doors to alert their two Petravian guards.

Then they'd seen the cohort of Vatrian guards standing outside their room door. These were not the flashy, plumed and colorful, guards that had been in the grand hall during the Emperor's announcements. Rather, they were wearing duller, less ornate, armor and carried weapons more fitting to the close quarters of the palace they were in. In short, they were ready for a fight. The three Petravian guards outside their room were standing in their normal positions, but there was a tenseness there that both of them could feel. And James noticed that each of them had their hands on their weapons, and he could feel one of them pulling magical energy into themselves at a low and slow rate, keeping it subtle.

"How's it going guys?" James said as he slowly stepped in front of Amina, and quietly released the retention strap on his revolver, which he kept behind him as well. "There a problem?"

The lead guard of the Vatrian group took a half step forward and looked James in the eyes, making a point of ignoring the Petravian guards as their swords inched out of their scabbards. The man was large, and dark of skin, his mouth bulged with the tell tale signs of Orc teeth, and his arms were longer than a normal humans, marking him as a half-orc. On his waste was a short handled war hammer that reminded James of the Norse god Thor. Though it had more spikes than that fabled weapon. His voice was deep and rumbled in a way that made it seem like his vocal chords couldn't handle the amount of bass in it.

"His Majesty, Emperor Vateris, REQUESTS you attend his study for a conversation." The large man said. Then he looked at Amina. "A private conversation."

James felt Amina press against him ever so slightly, then she patted him on the side, right above where he was resting his hand on the grip of his Colt.

"I have no issue with speaking with the Emperor, if that is his wish." James said. "But under no circumstances am I going to leave my wife unattended in an unfamiliar land. Not after the excitement of earlier." He held his wolf hand up for emphasis. Then moved it, imitating the hand gestures from earlier. "I'm gonna guess that he and I can have a private conversation even in a crowded room. She comes with, or I don't go. No exceptions." He tried to ignore the cold sweat that formed as the Vatrian guards visibly bristled at the display of the so-called way of the arms.

"It is that very HERESY...." The lead guard said, his jaw clenching as he said the last word. "That is cause for him to summon you."

"I kinda figured." James said steadily. He heard, and partially felt, Amina pulling one of the three speed loaders from the back of his belt.

"Like I said. She and I go together, or not at all." He nodded at the guards behind the large man. "And that's not enough people to stop us from leaving if it comes to it."

There was a creaking noise from one side of the room that made James tense as his eyes began to glow gold. A small woman in dark, ninja-like, robes emerged from the bathroom of their room with a drawn bow. There was a clacking as one of their windows opened, and a similarly dressed man kneeled on their window ledge with a crossbow.

"That's better." He said. "But still not enough."

"James." Amina said softly as she adjusted to cover them from the new threats. "That's an arbalestier." She said of the man in the window. "And they are Vatrian way-walkers. We may see two. But there's probably five or six more that we DON'T see."

James looked back just a bit, with a raised eyebrow. He didn't have time to ask what that was at the moment.

"The Emperor only makes requests once." The lead guard said. "Though he ordered us to ASSURE you... that should he find your conversation pleasing, no harm shall come to either of you. Additionally, even if he finds the conversation UN-pleasing. You would simply be held as guests until he and your King could speak face to face."

"And we will gladly speak with him." Amina said. "But with the rights of royal guests we request that it be in accompaniment of each other."

The large man seemed to consider this for a moment. Then he nodded.

"This is acceptable. But please leave your weapons here with your guards." He said sternly. "Nobody is allowed in his presence armed, least of all in his study or chambers." Then he untied the chain-mail under his neck and bared a tattoo on his upper chest. "I swear honesty and safety to you both until such time as my Emperor explicitly orders otherwise. On my duty." He said. As he did the tattoo flared with a dark red light and he grimaced for a moment.

And just like that the Petravian guards seemed to relax. Amina even pressed the speed loader back into its pouch on his belt and closed the magnetic flap over it.

He looked back at her curiously again.

"If a Vatrian royal guard swears on their duty then it costs their life to break that vow." She said simply. "At the very least we can trust HIM." She added with a nod toward the large man. "Isn't that right Commander Tyrius."

The large man nodded in response as he tied his chain mail back in place under his chin.

"If you would please Princess." He said, gesturing at their weapons and armor. "Hero. Please disarm yourselves."

There was a slight whistle behind him from the woman that had emerged from their bathroom, and when he looked she patted at her hip. Right where JAMES had his revolver.

"Including the device on your belt." Tyrius said sternly. "Whatever it is."

James stepped back hesitantly. Then he turned and faced Amina. "You're sure?" He asked simply. But he was surprised to see her already removing her sword belt and shield. She even pulled the dagger out that she always kept tucked into her left vambrace.

She nodded. Then she whispered. "Boasts or not dear. We're outnumbered, and they still have Steve and my sister." She said. "We might escape. But it would ONLY be us."

"Right." He whispered back. Then he turned back to the large commander. "We'll come with." He said sarcastically as he began unfastening his holster belt.

And while he removed the revolver, he made sure to keep the .45 that was tucked into his chest plate. Even if they frisked him, or had him remove the armor, they wouldn't find it hidden in there. And he knew from his duel with Artair that the Earth weapons didn't register as magical. It could be a life saver in a pinch, even if it did only have a single magazine without his belt.

A few minutes later they were walking through the palace surrounded by Vatrian guards.

\----------

When they arrived James was surprised to find the room startlingly empty, practically spartan compared to the rest of the royal palace. It also had no guards. And while the Emperor's translator was present, standing off to the side of the large desk he sat at in front of the lit fireplace, they did not actively translate as the Emperor "Spoke".

"Princess Amina Petravius." The translator said. "A most unexpected addition to this meeting. Though not an unwelcome one."

Amina made a slight bow, ignoring the slight graciously.

"Before I leave. Is there anything either of you would desire? Refreshments? Food?" The translator asked as they made their way to the door.

"Just answers." James said venomously.

"Then I shall take my leave." The translator said. "Congratulations on your marriage." Then they stepped out of the door, which was still being held open by the commander.

The large man stepped in and closed the door behind him before standing attention there. Clearly intending to stay for the duration of this conversation. Though James was happy to see that his hand was nowhere near his weapon.

James turned back to the Emperor.

\[I see there was some disagreement about the nature of this meeting.\] The young man said as he stood up from his chair and approached the two of them.

"I had reason to believe that I had caused some kind of offense earlier." James said as his arms automatically translated into the emperor's hand signs. "My wife and I were unwilling to separate from each other given the circumstances." He paused for a moment as he thought of what to say next. "I've learned to be wary since coming to this world, and we have lost much together." He added.

The emperor seemed to consider this for a moment. Then nodded slightly.

\[I understand.\] He signed. \[We have heard tales of great battles and remarkable amounts of devastation to the land of Petravus. Each victory earned at great cost of life and land.\]

"Especially to she and I." James said/signed with a nod at Amina.

\[I am sorry to hear that.\] The Emperor replied. \[Tell me; can you speak with your hands and not your voice? Or must you do both?\]

James thought about it for a moment, then decided to try. He held up a finger, requesting a moment. The Emperor nodded as he slowly circled the two of them. Studying them as he did. After once around them, he stopped back in front of James, looking at him warily.

Come on. How do you talk without talking? James thought.

Then his arms moved. \[Come on. How do you talk without talking?\] They signed, and James watched them with confusion. \[Oh crap. Don't think hard about stuff you-\] He waved his hands in a jumble, then clamped his hands onto his elbows.

The emperor peered at him with a look that was equal parts amusement and offense.

"Sorry." James said as he let his arms sign freely. "Apparently it's as easy as thinking of doing it."

"James?" Amina asked curiously. He looked at her and nodded.

"Medallion stuff." He said.. Oddly, his hands didn't sign that part. Though they began again as he faced the emperor again. "I think this is the part where the conversation becomes one on one."

\[Quite so.\] The emperor replied. \[Please apologize to her if it seems rude. I had no intention of her being here for this.\]

James nodded. "He apologizes if that makes it seem rude." He said to her. Then he turned back to the emperor and thought. Though he had to focus a lot harder than he thought about WHEN he signed and didn't. \[I suppose we can start.\] He signed.

\[That's my line.\] The emperor said with a smug look on his face.

\[Sorry.\] James signed back, then bowed a little. \[At your discretion your majesty.\] He added as he stood back up.

The emperor studied him for a moment, then nodded.

\[How many gods have you had audience with in your time in this world?\] He asked. His signs were in a rapid, incredibly precise, fashion that the medallion's magic (however it worked) made him think meant the younger man was being stern and somewhat angry.

James clenched his jaw, and felt his claws dig into his palm as his hands clenched into fists as well. Then he shook his head a bit.

\[Too many.\] He admitted. \[But for the record, three.Though it could be considered four if you consider the Mother of the Land, as the druids called her, to be a god as well.\]

The Emperor's eyes widened at that.

\[Do you have issue with the gods?\] He asked after a moment. \[Even though they brought you to this world, and have granted you their boons?\]

James looked at Amina for a moment. She looked back at him curiously.

Then he spoke out loud so she could hear. The Emperor shifted uncomfortably as he did. And he heard Tyrius move a bit as well.

"The gods abducted me." He began, signing as he did. "In so doing they maimed one of my friends, and inadvertently caused the death of another well before his time." He stepped toward the smaller man. "They took me from a life of relative peace, and thrust me into a world of danger and, admittedly, fantasy. And while I thank them for the fact that in doing so I have met the love of my life." He nodded at Amina, who smiled even as she stood up straighter. "But that does NOT forgive who I lost in those first few moments."

The Emperor attempted to stand up to James as he approached.

"Hero." Tyrius boomed from where he stood at the door. James looked over and saw that his hand was on his war hammer now.

\[It's fine commander.\] The Emperor signed as James stopped only a step away from him.

"They looked on as another of my friends, Amina's own sister of choice, was turned into a MONSTER... and called a CHAMPION." He practically spat the title out. Then he held his wolf arm up again. "And then REWARDED me.... for granting her a merciful death." He stared at the Emperor. "She had two kids."

\[I believe I unders-\] The Emperor began to sign. But James waved a hand.

\[I'm not done.\] He signed rapidly.

"Then they manipulated events to temporarily relieve us of the vanishing blight." He pointed at the emperor for emphasis. "You know of the vanishing blight yeah? I was told your land had a few patches of it around too. Just like everyone else."

The emperor nodded, but James was already continuing before he could sign anything else.

"Did you know that THEY," He pointed up at the sky. "are the ones that sent the blight to this world?" The emperor's eyes widened in surprise at that. "Cause they did. And when they HELPED us get rid of it. They used my baby brother to do so." He was breathing heavily now, even as he felt tears begin rolling down his cheeks. "My baby brother who was only in this world because if he had stayed on Earth my OWN people would have used him against me." He paused for effect. "And the GODS.... killed him. In body and probably also his soul. JUST so they could buy us some time to prepare for the return of the entity that was tied to the blight." He stepped until he was almost nose to nose with the Emperor. He heard the massive guard commander begin moving toward them. "And even though my brother might still be alive KINDA... That entity WILL return. One way or the other."

"James." Amina hissed in warning.

"That happened only a week or two before Amina and I left to come here." He said. "So yes.... I have issue with these so called gods."

A large, powerful, hand clamped onto his shoulder and James was turned bodily by Tyrius, who had his hammer in the other hand and was bringing it up for a swing.

James latched onto the hand with his own, his eyes blazing with golden light. His magically enhanced earth and werewolf muscles made him MUCH stronger than the people of this world, and he heard a cracking noise from the commander's hand. But the man was a warrior, and didn't slow down or falter at all.

Then a small, tan, hand slapped the commander in the face. Tyrius froze in shock. Then wrenched his hand out of James's grip before he fell back and kneeled.

"My Emperor." He said in his deep voice. "My greatest apologies for assuming your will."

\[I will not have my commander die to his own vow.\] The emperor signed furiously. Then he stamped his feet angrily as he realized that his commander wasn't looking at him, and James assumed also wouldn't have understood the signs even if he were.

James stared at the diminutive leader, who was staring back at him with equal parts anger, and confusion.

Then the emperor signed to him. \[Instruct him that the God's Falcon orders him back to his post.\] He took several deep breaths. Then added. \[Please.\]

James looked back and forth between the two of them.

"The God's Falcon orders you back to your post?" He said hesitantly.

Tyrius looked up at him in shock, then at the Emperor. He nodded, then quickly stood up and moved at double time back to the door, where he immediately stood at attention, hammer back on his belt. As if nothing had happened.

James looked back at the Emperor curiously.

\[Are you quite done?\] He asked James.

James considered the question. Then nodded. Though his blood was still up a bit.

\[I believe that my shock and disbelief earlier, at someone using my own signs despite their secrecy, may have led us to have a misunderstanding.\] The emperor signed. \[For that, I apologize. So you know, I am called the God to Be only because I am Emperor. I have no misgivings about my own divinity.\]

James's head tilted a bit at the new information.

\[If anything.\] The Emperor continued. \[The title was made into a cruel jest.\] He pointed at his own throat and ears. \[The gods have taken from me as well. So in this, we are kindred spirits.\]

James considered this for a moment. Then understanding and embarrassment made him sign an apology.

\[Thank you.\] The Emperor said in response. Then he gestured at the chair in front of his desk. \[Now. Let us discuss our mutual enemies with more level heads, and better understanding of each other.\]

James nodded, and followed the emperor's guidance toward the chair in question, signalling for Amina to follow.

And the three of them, with James translating, spoke long into the night.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11ldc9w/wait_is_this_just_gate_325/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (323/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Of course things get more complicated. It's James we're talking about.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were in the middle of talking to a Vatrian merchant about shops they needed to visit in the city when the Royal Guards stationed around the royal hall yelled out, heralding the arrival of the Vatrian Emperor.

The palace's construction was reminiscent of those he had seen in footage about ancient Saudi Arabia and other Middle Eastern kingdoms from ancient Earth. With tall domed towers and wide open areas illuminated only by large windows and doorways that let in the scent of the city below. Despite that the designs on the walls weren't of the geometric, and borderline mathematically sequenced design one would expect of such architecture, but rather of the square, and angular design he might expect of ancient Aztec or Mayan temples. The combination made him feel like he was on the set of an old Indiana Jones movie.

It also kind of made his head hurt to wonder how they had combined the two clashing styles and somehow succeeded.

The wide open hall they were in echoed loudly as the guards yelled out.

Unlike Amina, James understood the announcement. He'd decided that, since he was in a different country with a different language, he should wear his green medallion. He hadn't worn the thing, even casually, in close to a year now.

James felt the hairs on his wolf arm bristle at the content of the announcement.

"HIS HOLY EMINENCE, THE GOD TO BE, EMPEROR VIYA VATERIS!" The guards announced in near perfect unison. The yellow feathered plumes of their helmets bobbing up and down as they made quick bows before raising their spears. To James the guards looked like a cross between Persian immortals and winged hussars. Though the wings in question were on their helmets and vambraces instead of their backs.

The entire crowd moved as one to face forward, and James noticed that the Vatrians all bowed their heads.

He squeezed Amina's hand. "Are we supposed to bow too?" He asked.

"Is it the emperor?" She asked. She had never learned Vatrian like her sister. He nodded in response. "Then only when he addresses us directly, and only once. We're royalty. The rules are a bit different for us. Just do as I do." She said. James nodded again.

Then a child entered the room. Or at least they looked like a child to James. But he noticed that they had both the slightly pointed ears that marked them as having elf blood, so he didn't actually KNOW how old they might be. They wore a flowing blue robe that glittered with gemstones around the neck and the ends of the sleeves, and a pair of servants carried the tail of their robes up off of the ground. A combination crown/wreath made of silver and a vine of flowers that seemed to change color based on the angle they sat at, sat atop their head.

James was just about to mention how... over the top... he looked.

Then they began to "speak" and something happened to James that had never happened in his time in this world.

Instead of speaking with their mouth and vocal chords, the Vatrian emperor began speaking in hand gestures that reminded James of A.S.L., though they were significantly more complex. A royal attendant in robes that echoed the emperors spoke the translated meaning to the crowd haltingly as she watched her emperor gesticulate.

That alone wouldn't have been strange to James. What was strange was that he UNDERSTOOD what the emperor was saying without the need of the translator.

Words formed in his mind with each movement of the man's arms, hands, and face. And when the signed words altered with nuanced movements, his mind understood those too, and adjusted the structure of the sentences being spoken.

\[Kind citizens of my land!\] The emperor began. \[And esteemed guests from lands far and wide!\] He added while looking around, his eyes settling on James and Amina for a moment as he did. \[Welcome to my beautiful palace. I trust that you have all enjoyed your time here, however brief or long it has been?\]

Nods and a handful of cheers rose from the crowd, as well as low clapping. But it was all kept at a low volume, to allow the translator to be heard over them.

"That's right. I forgot." Amina said. "Keep your volume low unless spoken to directly." Then she noticed the look of confusion on James's face. "James."

He nodded acknowledgment. "Yeah. Sorry. Just. The medallion is translating for me." He said.

Her eyebrows rose in surprise then she nodded. "Lucky." She said as she turned back.

\[Now that I have greeted you all, and you have partaken of refreshments.\] The emperor continued. \[Allow us to commence with this month's imperial announcements.\]

As one the crowd rustled as everyone sat down in the seats that they had all been standing in front of. Amina pulled James down alongside her.

Then began a long list of announcements about new developments throughout the land. James "heard" news of new mines that had successfully opened, new town buildings that had been erected for various reasons, great accomplishment of distant members of the emperor's family, and other well esteemed members of Vatrian society, an announcement of a new arena in some city James didn't know, and so much more that after thirty minutes James's attention began to wane.

But, he noticed, the emperor's didn't.

The, seemingly, young emperor watched each announcer with rapt attention, smiling and signing his congratulations to each of them whenever they were finished. And he always thanked them for their contributions to Vatria.

The whole thing kind of creeped James out. Something about it seemed almost... surreal... and he was vaguely reminded of the old war-time propaganda feeds from when he was a child. The ones touting America's accomplishments and advancements, but never mentioned any of the bad news that James could see right outside his own bedroom window.

He was snapped out of his thoughts by Amina gently tugging at his arm again.

"We're coming up soon." She said softly.

\[Now it is my turn to present good news to you my people!\] The emperor said as he stood up and began walking over to one of the windows nearby. The two attendants rushing to lift his robe tail for him as he did. \[As you may have noticed over the past two days there has been a ship of all things, holding position over my palace's eastern garden.\]

The crowd murmured and whispered as people discussed the subject quietly.

\[I am so incredibly proud to announce.\] The emperor continued, oblivious to the noise. \[That the long time efforts of my cousin and Ambassador, Tanier, have finally paid off for the empire. And that ship is flying under its own power. Additionally, it has just completed its maiden voyage across the ocean to Petravus and back. Even braving a most terrible thunderstorm on the way.\]

Despite presumably being deaf, the emperor seemed to understand the need for a pause here. He stopped speaking as the crowd once again broke into murmuring conversations, this time a bit louder than before. The emperor waited for nearly half a minute before continuing.

\[For those of you with the appropriate rights I welcome you to come and marvel at my cousin's accomplishment and toast in his honor as we promote him to Ambassador Sectoria and I also bestow a new title fitting of his great invention after this is over!\] He said with a smile on his face.

That brought muted cheers and clapping as the people around Tanier and Ferria shook his hand and clapped him on the shoulder, and congratulated Ferria as well.

Then the Emperor regained his spot at the throne, though he didn't sit down.

\[In related news. We have a royal marriage to announce from our Petravian allies! The ambassador and his lovely wife used the trip as a chance to see her sister's wedding, and borne them to us for their post marriage announcement!\] He gestured at the two of them with a wide smile.

Amina stood up, pulling James up with her. She bowed deeply, and James matched her.

"Great and holy Vatrian Emperor!" She said as she stood up fully. "I am most pleased to find myself within your realm for the first time in nearly a decade. My sister writes often of how lovely your empire has been to her. I am here today to announce my marriage to the summoned hero!" She nudged James's back with the hand that she had there. "Captain James Choi of the Realm known as Earth!"

He made a small bow at her nudge. "It's an honor to be here your majesty." He added.

And he was amazed to feel his two arms make gestures in the same style as the emperor had. And he also knew that they were translating him into the emperor's sign language as he spoke.

The emperor's eyes locked onto James's as he saw the hand signs.

Then he rushed forward, causing the two attendants to scramble to keep up. The crowd parted before him in a rush of bowed heads.

The emperor stared at James with wide eyes and a smile that didn't FEEL real to James. James could sense the guards around the room tensing at the sudden closeness. Then he seemed to study James up and down before grabbing at both of his hands and studying the long, clawed and furred, arm that he had been "gifted" by the moon goddess. He backed up a step, continuing to eye James up and down as he did.

The emperor signalled to his translator with a quick wave of his hand. Then turned back to James. \[You speak with the way of arms?\] The emperor asked with a studious look on his face.

"Um...." James said, and his hand made a s-so gesture while waving a bit. "I think I can whenever I have my Hero's Medallion on." He said uncertainly as his arms acted out the conversation. The emperor's eyes widened as James replied correctly despite the lack of his translator.

\[This artifact is of the gods?\] The Emperor asked, still without his translator. \[And your arm as well?\]

James clenched his jaw a bit at the mention of the so-called gods.

"Yes." He answered.

\[Most interesting.\] The emperor said. And James saw something in his face that he thought might have been jealousy. But before he could read any further the Emperor spun and returned to his throne, signalling his translator as he did. \[My great people!\] He gestured. \[This months announcements have been most pleasing for me! Wish the lovely princess and her god sent consort the best of wishes in their marriage! May their love last them till the end of time, and bear them many children and much happiness!\]

Then he began clapping, while beaming a forced smile at James and Amina and lowering down to his seat.

The crowd around them erupted into light cheering and congratulations despite none of them actually KNOWING either of them.

But James couldn't take his eyes off the curious man sitting at the throne.

"James?" Amina whispered in his ear as the people around them shook their hands and gave them light hugs. "What just happened?"

"I have no idea." He said. "But I have a bad feeling about it."

Then they were being swept along with the crowd as a large portion of it began making its way to the eastern garden to inspect the air ship.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11khp5f/wait_is_this_just_gate_324/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (323/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Of course things get more complicated. It's James we're talking about.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were in the middle of talking to a Vatrian merchant about shops they needed to visit in the city when the Royal Guards stationed around the royal hall yelled out, heralding the arrival of the Vatrian Emperor.

The palace's construction was reminiscent of those he had seen in footage about ancient Saudi Arabia and other Middle Eastern kingdoms from ancient Earth. With tall domed towers and wide open areas illuminated only by large windows and doorways that let in the scent of the city below. Despite that the designs on the walls weren't of the geometric, and borderline mathematically sequenced design one would expect of such architecture, but rather of the square, and angular design he might expect of ancient Aztec or Mayan temples. The combination made him feel like he was on the set of an old Indiana Jones movie.

It also kind of made his head hurt to wonder how they had combined the two clashing styles and somehow succeeded.

The wide open hall they were in echoed loudly as the guards yelled out.

Unlike Amina, James understood the announcement. He'd decided that, since he was in a different country with a different language, he should wear his green medallion. He hadn't worn the thing, even casually, in close to a year now.

James felt the hairs on his wolf arm bristle at the content of the announcement.

"HIS HOLY EMINENCE, THE GOD TO BE, EMPEROR VIYA VATERIS!" The guards announced in near perfect unison. The yellow feathered plumes of their helmets bobbing up and down as they made quick bows before raising their spears. To James the guards looked like a cross between Persian immortals and winged hussars. Though the wings in question were on their helmets and vambraces instead of their backs.

The entire crowd moved as one to face forward, and James noticed that the Vatrians all bowed their heads.

He squeezed Amina's hand. "Are we supposed to bow too?" He asked.

"Is it the emperor?" She asked. She had never learned Vatrian like her sister. He nodded in response. "Then only when he addresses us directly, and only once. We're royalty. The rules are a bit different for us. Just do as I do." She said. James nodded again.

Then a child entered the room. Or at least they looked like a child to James. But he noticed that they had the slightly pointed ears that marked them as having elf blood, so he didn't actually KNOW how old they might be. They wore a flowing blue robe that glittered with gemstones around the neck and the ends of the sleeves, and a pair of servants carried the tail of their robes up off of the ground. A combination crown/wreath made of silver and a vine of flowers that seemed to change color based on the angle they sat at, sat atop their head.

James was just about to mention how... over the top... he looked.

Then they began to "speak" and something happened to James that had never happened in his time in this world.

Instead of speaking with their mouth and vocal chords, the Vatrian emperor began speaking in hand gestures that reminded James of A.S.L., though they were significantly more complex. A royal attendant in robes that echoed the emperors spoke the translated meaning to the crowd haltingly as she watched her emperor gesticulate.

That alone wouldn't have been strange to James. What was strange was that he UNDERSTOOD what the emperor was saying without the need of the translator.

Words formed in his mind with each movement of the man's arms, hands, and face. And when the signed words altered with nuanced movements, his mind understood those too, and adjusted the structure of the sentences being spoken.

\[Kind citizens of my land!\] The emperor began. \[And esteemed guests from lands far and wide!\] He added while looking around, his eyes settling on James and Amina for a moment as he did. \[Welcome to my beautiful palace. I trust that you have all enjoyed your time here, however brief or long it has been?\]

Nods and a handful of cheers rose from the crowd, as well as low clapping. But it was all kept at a low volume, to allow the translator to be heard over them.

"That's right. I forgot." Amina said. "Keep your volume low unless spoken to directly." Then she noticed the look of confusion on James's face. "James."

He nodded acknowledgment. "Yeah. Sorry. Just. The medallion is translating for me." He said.

Her eyebrows rose in surprise then she nodded. "Lucky." She said as she turned back.

\[Now that I have greeted you all, and you have partaken of refreshments.\] The emperor continued. \[Allow us to commence with this month's imperial announcements.\]

As one the crowd rustled as everyone sat down in the seats that they had all been standing in front of. Amina pulled James down alongside her.

Then began a long list of announcements about new developments throughout the land. James "heard" news of new mines that had successfully opened, new town buildings that had been erected for various reasons, great accomplishment of distant members of the emperor's family, and other well esteemed members of Vatrian society, an announcement of a new arena in some city James didn't know, and so much more that after thirty minutes James's attention began to wane.

But, he noticed, the emperor's didn't.

The, seemingly, young emperor watched each announcer with rapt attention, smiling and signing his congratulations to each of them whenever they were finished. And he always thanked them for their contributions to Vatria.

The whole thing kind of creeped James out. Something about it seemed almost... surreal... and he was vaguely reminded of the old war-time propaganda feeds from when he was a child. The ones touting America's accomplishments and advancements, but never mentioned any of the bad news that James could see right outside his own bedroom window.

He was snapped out of his thoughts by Amina gently tugging at his arm again.

"We're coming up soon." She said softly.

\[Now it is my turn to present good news to you my people!\] The emperor said as he stood up and began walking over to one of the windows nearby. The two attendants rushing to lift his robe tail for him as he did. \[As you may have noticed over the past two days there has been a ship of all things, holding position over my palace's eastern garden.\]

The crowd murmured and whispered as people discussed the subject quietly.

\[I am so incredibly proud to announce.\] The emperor continued, oblivious to the noise. \[That the long time efforts of my cousin and Ambassador, Tanier, have finally paid off for the empire. And that ship is flying under its own power. Additionally, it has just completed its maiden voyage across the ocean to Petravus and back. Even braving a most terrible thunderstorm on the way.\]

Despite presumably being deaf, the emperor seemed to understand the need for a pause here. He stopped speaking as the crowd once again broke into murmuring conversations, this time a bit louder than before. The emperor waited for nearly half a minute before continuing.

\[For those of you with the appropriate rights I welcome you to come and marvel at my cousin's accomplishment and toast in his honor as we promote him to Ambassador Sectoria and I also bestow a new title fitting of his great invention after this is over!\] He said with a smile on his face.

That brought muted cheers and clapping as the people around Tanier and Ferria shook his hand and clapped him on the shoulder, and congratulated Ferria as well.

Then the Emperor regained his spot at the throne, though he didn't sit down.

\[In related news. We have a royal marriage to announce from our Petravian allies! The ambassador and his lovely wife used the trip as a chance to see her sister's wedding, and have borne them to us for their post marriage announcement!\] He gestured at the two of them with a wide smile.

Amina stood up, pulling James up with her. She bowed deeply, and James matched her.

"Great and holy Vatrian Emperor!" She said as she stood up fully. "I am most pleased to find myself within your realm for the first time in nearly a decade. My sister writes often of how lovely your empire has been to her. I am here today to announce my marriage to the summoned hero!" She nudged James's back with the hand that she had there. "Captain James Choi of the Realm known as Earth!"

He made a small bow at her nudge. "It's an honor to be here your majesty." He added.

And he was amazed to feel his two arms make gestures in the same style as the emperor had. And he also knew that they were translating him into the emperor's sign language as he spoke.

The emperor's eyes locked onto James's as he saw the hand signs.

Then he rushed forward, causing the two attendants to scramble to keep up. The crowd parted before him in a rush of bowed heads.

The emperor stared at James with wide eyes and a smile that didn't FEEL real to James. James could sense the guards around the room tensing at the sudden closeness. Then he seemed to study James up and down before grabbing at both of his hands and studying the long, clawed and furred, arm that he had been "gifted" by the moon goddess. He backed up a step, continuing to eye James up and down as he did.

The emperor signalled to his translator with a quick wave of his hand. Then turned back to James. \[You speak with the way of arms?\] The emperor asked with a studious look on his face.

"Um...." James said, and his hand made a s-so gesture while waving a bit. "I think I can whenever I have my Hero's Medallion on." He said uncertainly as his arms acted out the conversation. The emperor's eyes widened as James replied correctly despite the lack of his translator.

\[This artifact is of the gods?\] The Emperor asked, still without his translator. \[And your arm as well?\]

James clenched his jaw a bit at the mention of the so-called gods.

"Yes." He answered.

\[Most interesting.\] The emperor said. And James saw something in his face that he thought might have been jealousy. But before he could read any further the Emperor spun and returned to his throne, signalling his translator as he did. \[My great people!\] He gestured. \[This months announcements have been most pleasing for me! Wish the lovely princess and her god sent consort the best of wishes in their marriage! May their love last them till the end of time, and bear them many children and much happiness!\]

Then he began clapping, while beaming a forced smile at James and Amina and lowering down to his seat.

The crowd around them erupted into light cheering and congratulations despite none of them actually KNOWING either of them.

But James couldn't take his eyes off the curious man sitting at the throne.

"James?" Amina whispered in his ear as the people around them shook their hands and gave them light hugs. "What just happened?"

"I have no idea." He said. "But I have a bad feeling about it."

Then they were being swept along with the crowd as a large portion of it began making its way to the eastern garden to inspect the air ship.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11khlzi/wait_is_this_just_gate_324/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (322/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Bit of a short one. Get to flesh out ANOTHER country tomorrow... yay me.

And of course James is gonna be insecure. Guy has like 9 different flavors of PTSD now. A bit of good news aint gonna stop that.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

circumstances that had made such a thing possible despite their previous beliefs to the contrary.

But there was a nagging at the back of his mind. And as much as Amina enjoyed the pampering that James doted upon her, sometimes a bit too much, she could sense the unease in him.

He jumped whenever things moved too fast, or made unexpected, or loud noises. Though he always did so between her and whatever had done so.

His eyes seemed to scan every area they entered, especially during the day they spent at Tanier's mansion on the outskirts of the Vatrian city of Redhill, where he and Ferria lived. He glanced around as though expecting attacks from every shadow, as though every passing person was a threat with a hidden dagger.

Frequently she would ask him what was wrong only to see him turn, and she'd notice a golden glow fading from his eyes as he did.

"James?" She asked hesitantly as she approached him on the balcony of their suite in the Vatrian Emperor's castle.

"Yes." He replied quickly as he turned to her. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing." She said with her hands up in a placating gesture as she joined him at the balcony. "Not with me anyways."

He tilted his head a bit as he donned a confused expression and took her hand in his. "What do you mean?" He asked.

"James." She began. "What's been going on with you lately?"

He shook his head as his confused expression grew deeper. "I... don't understand. What are you talking about?"

"James. I am a General." She said sternly. "But before that I was a soldier. Same as anyone else. Including you."

"Yeah. I know." He said.

"Then tell me why you're treating my like I'm made of thin glass, broken at the slightest jostle?" She asked with a raised eyebrow.

"What?" He asked. "I'm... I'm not."

She leaned against the railing of the balcony and made a pained expression as she rubbed at the back of her calf.

"Are you okay?" He asked in earnest. "Let me get you a chair." He said as he began to walk over to one of the ones nearby. But he stopped when she didn't let go of his hand.

Amina stood up straighter and her expression changed from one of pain, to one of exasperation.

"James." She said softly.

James stopped and turned back.

"That was a test wasn't it?" He asked as he leaned back against the railings and hung his head a bit.

She nodded.

He released her hand, though he did so hesitantly, and looked down at the city below. Then he looked up at the pre-dusk sky, at the handful of stars that were beginning to glint here and there.

"I am a warrior James." She said softly. "Nothing changes that."

"I know." He admitted, and he held out his hand. She took it gladly, and let him pull her closer to him. "I know... it's just."

"It's just that you've seen danger appear from thin air." She said. "And lost people with no warning."

He nodded."I can't...." He began. "I can't lose you Amina. Not you too. Especially now."

She cupped his face in her hands as she pulled it up to her own.

"James. Joseph was your little brother. And that made him MY little brother too." She said as a single tear fell down her cheek. "And Kela was more like a sister to me than even Ferria or Xarina."

"I know." He said softly.

"This is a dangerous world. And we have lost much these past two years." She continued. "And I would be lying if I said that my life before your arrival was as much of a tempest as it has been since."

He looked at her curiously.

"But I will not be coddled James." She said finally. "Not when I haven't even had a chance to get an affirmation from a life priestess."

James cringed at that. He knew that the life adherents were this worlds version of fertility shamans. But he still didn't like the idea of relying on someone who worshiped the deity that had taken part in his brother's death. And he also couldn't exactly request an ultrasound machine from Earth without raising questions all over the place.

"The time will come my love." She said softly. "When I will be fat, and hobbling, and complaining of sore feet, strange hungers, and an angry bladder." She smiled as he looked up at her. "Dote on me then. Until then we are in a city I have never seen before, on our honeymoon. Can we try to enjoy it?"

James smiled. "Sorry." He said. "I just... I worry."

"You would not be a good husband if you didn't." Then she headbutted him ever so lightly. "But you have to see the irony of those words when you say them." Then she stole a page from his book and made her tone as haughty as possible. " Great and powerful storm slayer."

He chuckled at the turn around. "Fair enough." He said simply. Then the smile on his face faltered a little bit. "When do you go to get um.... affirmed?"

She thought for a moment. "Well. Our meeting with the emperor is tomorrow afternoon. We'll be expected to hold court with them until then. So... day after?"

"Do I go with you for that?" He asked uncertainly.

"Well you are the father right?" She asked rhetorically with a grin.

"Hard to tell." James said with a fake graveness. "I've seen the way some of the castle guards look at you when you walk past."

"James!" She exclaimed in mock hurt as she lightly punched his shoulder. Then she looked away. "I didn't think you'd noticed that."

And just like that the conversation stopped being serious.

They talked about plans for the week they intended to spend here before moving on to the next destination. The things Amina wanted to shop for, the foods James wanted to try, the popular sights to visit. Apparently there were weekly dueling tournaments, and both of them wanted to see if they could win the champions purse, though neither of them needed it.

And they discussed baby names. Though they did so with mild caution, in case it was too soon.

Over the next few days, Amina was happy to notice James relax, even if only a little bit.

\----------

Vickers walked slowly and confidently as he moved through the castle hallways. He chewed on a bun full of bacon as he did.

In his other hand was a folder full of new orders, as well as a letter of pardon from the King.

He presented the latter to the guard Sergeant currently on duty at the door to the castle dungeon.

"What's this then Chief?" Sergeant Kitra asked. She was a tall but remarkably muscular elf. Not quite as big as the one that everyone called guardian, but close. They'd become familiar with each other since Vickers had taken over Choi's duties with the P.O.W.s. Though not friends.

"Conditional release of some of the lower enlisted and newest arrivals." He said as she read over the pardon. "They're to become ambassadorial staff for Werner whenever she gets done with her treatment. I've gotta get them set up."

"Makes sense." She said as she closed the letter back up. "Says no weapons. Guessing busy work?"

"Pretty much." He agreed. Like Choi he'd found it reassuring that even in another world soldiers learned to look busy, and stand by to stand by.

She looked over at the other guard. "Slate got a list?" She asked them. They ran over to the small office that they used as a combination supply and communication room. A minute later he popped back out and nodded. Then she turned back to Vickers. "Follow me Chief." She said and began walking toward the door. Then she turned back to her comrade. "Let em out in order." She said.

"Mind if I have a word with one who aint on the list?" He asked.

Kitra considered it. Then shrugged. "Sure."

A few minutes later Vickers was handing the last of the orders to the last of the soldiers on the list. A young, slightly effeminate, airmen who had apparently been one of the Miffy controllers. He did what he could not to intimidate the young man too much, though apparently his appearance was enough to make that a hard job.

"That's the last of those ones." He said to Kitra after sending the airmen to wait outside in formation with the others. "I'mma talk to Nguyen for a minute."

The Sergeant nodded. "Just make it quick. I'll be right here."

He nodded, then made his way to the last cell in the row. The one with the least amenities and smallest window outside.

Nguyen sat on the ground looking at the wall with a blank stare. He had a scar under his left eye from where Choi had pummeled him.

"PT time chief?" He asked.

"No." Vickers replied. He knew that Nguyen had heard him reading off orders only moments before. "Just a heads up that we're working on a strike back against the Agency. It's not a get out of jail free card or anything. But... Might be a shot at gettin' your dick out of the dirt."

Nguyen looked at him flatly for a moment, then went back to staring at the wall.

"Who says I deserve that?" He asked.

Vickers just shrugged. "Nobody. Can't MAKE you see yourself any kind o' way." He said nonchalantly. "Just figured I'd offer if it became an option."

Nguyen just kept staring at the wall.

Vickers waited a moment, then seeing the lost cause for what it was, turned and walked away.

"Offer's there if you find your balls Nguyen." He said over his shoulder.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11hhmuu/wait_is_this_just_gate_323/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (322/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Bit of a short one. Get to flesh out ANOTHER country tomorrow... yay me.

And of course James is gonna be insecure. Guy has like 9 different flavors of PTSD now. A bit of good news aint gonna stop that.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Frequently she would ask him what was wrong only to see him turn, and she'd notice a golden glow fading from his eyes as he did.

"James?" She asked hesitantly as she approached him on the balcony of their suite in the Vatrian Emperor's castle.

"Yes." He replied quickly as he turned to her. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing." She said with her hands up in a placating gesture as she joined him at the balcony. "Not with me anyways."

He tilted his head a bit as he donned a confused expression and took her hand in his. "What do you mean?" He asked.

"James." She began. "What's been going on with you lately?"

He shook his head as his confused expression grew deeper. "I... don't understand. What are you talking about?"

"James. I am a General." She said sternly. "But before that I was a soldier. Same as anyone else. Including you."

"Yeah. I know." He said.

"Then tell me why you're treating my like I'm made of thin glass, broken at the slightest jostle?" She asked with a raised eyebrow.

"What?" He asked. "I'm... I'm not."

She leaned against the railing of the balcony and made a pained expression as she rubbed at the back of her calf.

"Are you okay?" He asked in earnest. "Let me get you a chair." He said as he began to walk over to one of the ones nearby. But he stopped when she didn't let go of his hand.

Amina stood up straighter and her expression changed from one of pain, to one of exasperation.

"James." She said softly.

James stopped and turned back.

"That was a test wasn't it?" He asked as he leaned back against the railings and hung his head a bit.

She nodded.

He released her hand, though he did so hesitantly, and looked down at the city below. Then he looked up at the pre-dusk sky, at the handful of stars that were beginning to glint here and there.

"I am a warrior James." She said softly. "Nothing changes that."

"I know." He admitted, and he held out his hand. She took it gladly, and let him pull her closer to him. "I know... it's just."

"It's just that you've seen danger appear from thin air." She said. "And lost people with no warning."

He nodded."I can't...." He began. "I can't lose you Amina. Not you too. Especially now."

She cupped his face in her hands as she pulled it up to her own.

"James. Joseph was your little brother. And that made him MY little brother too." She said as a single tear fell down her cheek. "And Kela was more like a sister to me than even Ferria or Xarina."

"I know." He said softly.

"This is a dangerous world. And we have lost much these past two years." She continued. "And I would be lying if I said that my life before your arrival was as much of a tempest as it has been since."

He looked at her curiously.

"But I will not be coddled James." She said finally. "Not when I haven't even had a chance to get an affirmation from a life priestess."

James cringed at that. He knew that the life adherents were this worlds version of fertility shamans. But he still didn't like the idea of relying on someone who worshiped the deity that had taken part in his brother's death. And he also couldn't exactly request an ultrasound machine from Earth without raising questions all over the place.

"The time will come my love." She said softly. "When I will be fat, and hobbling, and complaining of sore feet, strange hungers, and an angry bladder." She smiled as he looked up at her. "Dote on me then. Until then we are in a city I have never seen before, on our honeymoon. Can we try to enjoy it?"

James smiled. "Sorry." He said. "I just... I worry."

"You would not be a good husband if you didn't." Then she headbutted him ever so lightly. "But you have to see the irony of those words when you say them." Then she stole a page from his book and made her tone as haughty as possible. " Great and powerful storm slayer."

He chuckled at the turn around. "Fair enough." He said simply. Then the smile on his face faltered a little bit. "When do you go to get um.... affirmed?"

She thought for a moment. "Well. Our meeting with the emperor is tomorrow afternoon. We'll be expected to hold court with them until then. So... day after?"

"Do I go with you for that?" He asked uncertainly.

"Well you are the father right?" She asked rhetorically with a grin.

"Hard to tell." James said with a fake graveness. "I've seen the way some of the castle guards look at you when you walk past."

"James!" She exclaimed in mock hurt as she lightly punched his shoulder. Then she looked away. "I didn't think you'd noticed that."

And just like that the conversation stopped being serious.

They talked about plans for the week they intended to spend here before moving on to the next destination. The things Amina wanted to shop for, the foods James wanted to try, the popular sights to visit. Apparently there were weekly dueling tournaments, and both of them wanted to see if they could win the champions purse, though neither of them needed it.

And they discussed baby names. Though they did so with mild caution, in case it was too soon.

Over the next few days, Amina was happy to notice James relax, even if only a little bit.

\----------

Vickers walked slowly and confidently as he moved through the castle hallways. He chewed on a bun full of bacon as he did.

In his other hand was a folder full of new orders, as well as a letter of pardon from the King.

He presented the latter to the guard Sergeant currently on duty at the door to the castle dungeon.

"What's this then Chief?" Sergeant Kitra asked. She was a tall but remarkably muscular elf. Not quite as big as the one that everyone called guardian, but close. They'd become familiar with each other since Vickers had taken over Choi's duties with the P.O.W.s. Though not friends.

"Conditional release of some of the lower enlisted and newest arrivals." He said as she read over the pardon. "They're to become ambassadorial staff for Werner whenever she gets done with her treatment. I've gotta get them set up."

"Makes sense." She said as she closed the letter back up. "Says no weapons. Guessing busy work?"

"Pretty much." He agreed. Like Choi he'd found it reassuring that even in another world soldiers learned to look busy, and stand by to stand by.

She looked over at the other guard. "Slate got a list?" She asked them. They ran over to the small office that they used as a combination supply and communication room. A minute later he popped back out and nodded.

Then she turned back to Vickers. "Follow me Chief." She said and began walking toward the door. Then she turned back to her comrade. "Let em out in order." She said.

"Mind if I have a word with one who aint on the list?" He asked.

Kitra considered it. Then shrugged. "Sure."

A few minutes later Vickers was handing the last of the orders to the last of the soldiers on the list. A young, slightly effeminate, airmen who had apparently been one of the Miffy controllers. He did what he could not to intimidate the young man too much, though apparently his appearance was enough to make that a hard job.

"That's the last of those ones." He said to Kitra after sending the airmen to wait outside in formation with the others. "I'mma talk to Nguyen for a minute."

The Sergeant nodded. "Just make it quick. I'll be right here."

He nodded, then made his way to the last cell in the row. The one with the least amenities and smallest window outside.

Nguyen sat on the ground looking at the wall with a blank stare. He had a scar under his left eye from where Choi had pummeled him.

"PT time chief?" He asked.

"No." Vickers replied. He knew that Nguyen had heard him reading off orders only moments before. "Just a heads up that we're working on a strike back against the Agency. It's not a get out of jail free card or anything. But... Might be a shot at gettin' your dick out of the dirt."

Nguyen looked at him flatly for a moment, then went back to staring at the wall.

"Who says I deserve that?" He asked.

Vickers just shrugged. "Nobody. Can't MAKE you see yourself any kind o' way." He said nonchalantly. "Just figured I'd offer if it became an option."

Nguyen just kept staring at the wall.

Vickers waited a moment, then seeing the lost cause for what it was, turned and walked away.

"Offer's there if you find your balls Nguyen." He said over his shoulder.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11hhcoa/wait_is_this_just_gate_323/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (321/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look... developments. Cool.

^(Small note: They're both butt ass naked for the first section. That doesn't really add or subtract anything from it. Just something to know.)

Also, what kind of ramifications could Post-Its have on a medieval society?

Enjoy.

\~

James awoke suddenly as the images of a few weeks earlier flashed through his mind for what he knew would be the rest of his life.

He resisted the urge to call out for his brother as he sat bolt upright in the hammock, rocking it precariously for just a moment. He breathed heavily as he realized that he was once again coated in cold sweat. He'd woken up like that a lot lately.

He quietly left the slowly rocking hammock and padded over through the back door and out onto the deck that he'd NOT wanted to walk on earlier. A moment later he was pissing off the edge of the mountain. An effort that was worth the risk as far as he and any other man would be concerned.

He heard a noise that, at first, he thought must have been one of the Bug Jumpers from earlier. But after a moment he also heard a muttered curse in a familiar voice.

"Hello?" He asked as he shook and then walked around the side of the hut. "Amina?"

"Huuuuuurk!" He heard come from nearby, and as he rounded the corner he saw her doubled over near a small bit of brush some ten yards away from Steve's slumbering form.

James rushed over to her side and she jumped a bit at his touch. He hadn't even realized that she hadn't been in the hammock when he'd woken up.

"Amina!" He exclaimed as he rubbed her back. "Are you okay?" But he already had an idea of what was happening.

"I'm.... I'm fine." She reassured him as she struggled not to throw up again. "Jus.... just still... hurrr... still nauseous from.... from the fl-AAAAGH!" She answered before retching into the bush again.

James grimaced as he pulled her hair back out of the way for her and kept rubbing her back.

"You sure those rations in your.... in your saddlebags are still good?" She asked after a moment.

James smiled softly, though she couldn't see it as he felt her begin to lurch a bit more.

"Hon." He said softly. "Those rations are from this morning. And were kept in bottomless bags."

"Then they... rrrrrr.... must've been cooked wrong." She countered.

They both knew better though. The cooks on the ship may have had an odd spice palate compared to the ones at the castle. But they were still top-notch.

"Amina?" He asked gently. "When was the last time you um... had your... monthly cycle?"

She looked at him as she took long slow breaths and spit a bit of excess saliva out. Then she seemed to deflate.

"I'm... about three weeks overdue." She admitted. Then she turned, fell forward onto her hands and threw up again.

James did some math in his head. Then as he felt her hand grasp onto his forearm, he realized he didn't care about the math, and simply smiled as he gripped on her arm in return.

When she sat back up on her haunches he pulled her back and into his arms.

"Why didn't you tell me?" He asked.

She took a few more long deep breaths as she wiped her mouth.

"Because of everything that was going on." She replied as she leaned back into him, still breathing irregularly as her other hand rubbed at her still sore stomach. "With the wedding. The.... the thing with the cleanser and the gods.... and Joey. I thought maybe it was just late because of all the stress. I was going to get checked when we got to Vatria. Besides, it wasn't even supposed to be possible. And I didn't want to put more on your shoulders if I ended up being wrong."

James pulled her head to the side. "Amina... After all that I've put you through... It wouldn't be a burden... Not when it's you." He said before kissing her lightly on the lips. He ignored the smell as they rested their foreheads against each other for a moment. Then she pulled away and leaned forward to throw up a bit more.

"I'll go get you some water." He said as she slapped at his arm with her hand and gave him a weak thumbs up.

Thirty minutes later they were sitting in the, slightly too small but not quite, hot tub in the hut leaning against each other as the sun came up.

James still wondered, though it was unimportant, where the tub got its water from.

He smiled as he heard her snore just a little bit as she rested against him.

\------------------------

"Do you understand the proposal Chief Vickers has made regarding your fates?" The King asked from his side of the sealed room. Vickers himself stood next to the King, tablet in hand showing a video feed of the Colonel.

Five, who still had a tube in her mouth and was still incredibly drugged, nodded. Driscoll watched her out of the corner of his eye, then looked back at the three faces in front of him.

"Long...." He began, pausing to let the respirator work. "as I get aimed at the Agency.... to hell with the details." Then he nodded too.

Driscoll turned so the tablet was facing the King. Colonel Muhammed sat back in her chair on her side of the connection.

"The powers that be aren't exactly happy to lose two of its most valuable operators." She said grimly. "But, as rude as it is to admit, they were pretty much already written off as losses." She admitted. "If you're willing to let them undertake the same conversion that the Chief is, and if he thinks its a good idea too, then I can't exactly say NOT to do it."

The King nodded. "I'll sign and send the letter this very evening." He said. "In the mean time, I'll leave you and the Chief to sort out any of their personal affairs should it not go well."

"Thank you your highness." She made a show of looking up, and it gave the illusion of her looking at Vickers. "Chief. Give them a download on the pertinent info regarding the change. I'll have the legal boys send over any paperwork necessary."

"Yes ma'am." He said as he turned the tablet off and nodded to the King, then he stepped into the decontamination chamber and began the annoying process of donning one of the suits.

\------------------------

Veliry looked at the door at the end of the hallway with more than a little worry as she stood at the corner.

She snapped her fingers, willing them to spark with something, anything really. But instead all she heard was snapping fingers. No dark green/blue lightning. No fire, or wind, or anything else stirred at her command.

She sighed and lifted her head back up to look at the door again, ignoring the way the balance of her head was different from the two antlers rising from just above her ears.

Then she stepped forward and as she passed the off-colored stone that she knew as the door's sensory limit, it spoke.

"Good evening Arch Mage Veliry. It is good to see you again." It said as it made to slide up into the wall around it. But it paused as she spoke.

"It's just...." She began. "It's just Veliry now.... Anatha." She looked down at the robes that she was wearing and suddenly felt like an imposter for wearing them. "I'm not the Arch Mage anymore."

The door stopped in mid transformation.

"Has the King found reason to release you from service?" The door asked curiously.

She thought for a moment. He hadn't. Though she wondered why.

"No." She replied. "Not yet at least."

The door seemed to think for a moment, like she just had. Then spoke again.

"The title of Arch Mage is bestowed by the King in recognition of talent and power." It said firmly. "So, until he determines otherwise. Welcome back... Arch Mage."

Veliry had to admit as she walked through the opening, that she hadn't thought of it that way. King Farrick knew she'd lost her magic. Yet he hadn't fired her, or expelled her from the castle or anything.

She sat on the mismatched couch that sat in the center of her main room as she thought. Her hand brushed up against something and she looked down to see the book containing the thesis she'd written that had gotten her accepted as a High Mage from the academy. It was about how magic users could only grow stronger if they continued pushing the boundaries of their bodies and souls by repeatedly pushing themselves to their magical limits. And how those limits would eventually relent and grow more expansive.

It seemed thicker than she remembered.

She opened it, and was surprised to find sheets of paper in it, written in a familiar handwriting, but in Earth English. They were small, and yellow, and seemed to stick to the pages of the thesis with some incredibly light adhesive. It was just sticky enough to keep them attached to the pages, but light enough that she could remove them without damaging the paper or writing within.

She looked at one.

>Sounds similar to muscular hypertrophy in athletes but for magic.???Can magical muscles fully tear?If so can they be "surgically repaired" like muscles?No= time???~~No = Dead~~~~???~~Ask Miss V if rest of thesis doesn't elaborate.

A tear fell onto the little yellow square as she looked at a little crudely drawn character that was clearly meant to be a mage of some kind flexing absurdly large muscular arms, and as she wiped her cheek she realized it was hers.

She'd forgotten that Joey had read her thesis. And remembered him mentioning it while he'd been explaining how he'd learned to deal with his own issues.

Then she looked back up at the questions he'd asked himself while reading her paper.

Her head tilted as she considered them.

She cursed her self pity as she realized that she WASN'T without magic. She WOULD be dead if that was the case. Petravian physiology RAN on the invisible energy, and even Marcos had confirmed that her magic levels were at the bare minimum for her body to survive. It was why she felt so lethargic all the time now.

"We're not exactly LOVING the gods right now." She said to herself as she rushed over to where she kept her copy of the medical books Earth had sent over. "But gods bless you Joseph. You brilliant BRILLIANT idiot."

And she began flipping to the section about muscles, specifically about torn muscles, and began rereading it.

And as she did she began at the first step she'd learned decades ago when she'd still been a child. The first lesson she'd taught BOTH of the Choi brothers when they'd wanted to learn magic from her.

Learn to draw in energy and focus it. Even if its only a tiny bit. Create a puff of wind.

And she began slowly but surely trying to flex those magical muscles.

An eye appeared on the inside of her door and watched her. And if it had been willing to risk its owner's notice, it would have also manifested a smiling mouth.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11gmqkp/wait_is_this_just_gate_322/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (321/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look... developments. Cool.

^(Small note: They're both butt ass naked for the first section. That doesn't really add or subtract anything from it. Just something to know.)

Also, what kind of ramifications could Post-Its have on a medieval society?

Enjoy.

\~

James awoke suddenly as the images of a few weeks earlier flashed through his mind for what he knew would be the rest of his life.

He resisted the urge to call out for his brother as he sat bolt upright in the hammock, rocking it precariously for just a moment. He breathed heavily as he realized that he was once again coated in cold sweat. He'd woken up like that a lot lately.

He quietly left the slowly rocking hammock and padded over through the back door and out onto the deck that he'd NOT wanted to walk on earlier. A moment later he was pissing off the edge of the mountain. An effort that was worth the risk as far as he and any other man would be concerned.

He heard a noise that, at first, he thought must have been one of the Bug Jumpers from earlier. But after a moment he also heard a muttered curse in a familiar voice.

"Hello?" He asked as he shook and then walked around the side of the hut. "Amina?"

"Huuuuuurk!" He heard come from nearby, and as he rounded the corner he saw her doubled over near a small bit of brush some ten yards away from Steve's slumbering form.

James rushed over to her side and she jumped a bit at his touch. He hadn't even realized that she hadn't been in the hammock when he'd woken up.

"Amina!" He exclaimed as he rubbed her back. "Are you okay?" But he already had an idea of what was happening.

"I'm.... I'm fine." She reassured him as she struggled not to throw up again. "Jus.... just still... hurrr... still nauseous from.... from the fl-AAAAGH!" She answered before retching into the bush again.

James grimaced as he pulled her hair back out of the way for her and kept rubbing her back.

"You sure those rations in your.... in your saddlebags are still good?" She asked after a moment.

James smiled softly, though she couldn't see it as he felt her begin to lurch a bit more.

"Hon." He said softly. "Those rations are from this morning. And were kept in bottomless bags."

"Then they... rrrrrr.... must've been cooked wrong." She countered.

They both knew better though. The cooks on the ship may have had an odd spice palate compared to the ones at the castle. But they were still top-notch.

"Amina?" He asked gently. "When was the last time you um... had your... monthly cycle?"

She looked at him as she took long slow breaths and spit a bit of excess saliva out. Then she seemed to deflate.

"I'm... about three weeks overdue." She admitted. Then she turned, fell forward onto her hands and threw up again.

James did some math in his head. Then as he felt her hand grasp onto his forearm, he realized he didn't care about the math, and simply smiled as he gripped on her arm in return.

When she sat back up on her haunches he pulled her back and into his arms.

"Why didn't you tell me?" He asked.

She took a few more long deep breaths as she wiped her mouth.

"Because of everything that was going on." She replied as she leaned back into him, still breathing irregularly as her other hand rubbed at her still sore stomach. "With the wedding. The.... the thing with the cleanser and the gods.... and Joey. I thought maybe it was just late because of all the stress. I was going to get checked when we got to Vatria. Besides, it wasn't even supposed to be possible. And I didn't want to put more on your shoulders if I ended up being wrong."

James pulled her head to the side. "Amina... After all that I've put you through... It wouldn't be a burden... Not when it's you." He said before kissing her lightly on the lips. He ignored the smell as they rested their foreheads against each other for a moment. Then she pulled away and leaned forward to throw up a bit more.

"I'll go get you some water." He said as she slapped at his arm with her hand and gave him a weak thumbs up.

Thirty minutes later they were sitting in the, slightly too small but not quite, hot tub in the hut leaning against each other as the sun came up.

James still wondered, though it was unimportant, where the tub got its water from.

He smiled as he heard her snore just a little bit as she rested against him.

\------------------------

"Do you understand the proposal Chief Vickers has made regarding your fates?" The King asked from his side of the sealed room. Vickers himself stood next to the King, tablet in hand showing a video feed of the Colonel.

Five, who still had a tube in her mouth and was still incredibly drugged, nodded. Driscoll watched her out of the corner of his eye, then looked back at the three faces in front of him.

"Long...." He began, pausing to let the respirator work. "as I get aimed at the Agency.... to hell with the details." Then he nodded too.

Driscoll turned so the tablet was facing the King. Colonel Muhammed sat back in her chair on her side of the connection.

"The powers that be aren't exactly happy to lose two of its most valuable operators." She said grimly. "But, as rude as it is to admit, they were pretty much already written off as losses." She admitted. "If you're willing to let them undertake the same conversion that the Chief is, and if he thinks its a good idea too, then I can't exactly say NOT to do it."

The King nodded. "I'll sign and send the letter this very evening." He said. "In the mean time, I'll leave you and the Chief to sort out any of their personal affairs should it not go well."

"Thank you your highness." She made a show of looking up, and it gave the illusion of her looking at Vickers. "Chief. Give them a download on the pertinent info regarding the change. I'll have the legal boys send over any paperwork necessary."

"Yes ma'am." He said as he turned the tablet off and nodded to the King, then he stepped into the decontamination chamber and began the annoying process of donning one of the suits.

\------------------------

Veliry looked at the door at the end of the hallway with more than a little worry as she stood at the corner.

She snapped her fingers, willing them to spark with something, anything really. But instead all she heard was snapping fingers. No dark green/blue lightning. No fire, or wind, or anything else stirred at her command.

She sighed and lifted her head back up to look at the door again, ignoring the way the balance of her head was different from the two antlers rising from just above her ears.

Then she stepped forward and as she passed the off-colored stone that she knew as the door's sensory limit, it spoke.

"Good evening Arch Mage Veliry. It is good to see you again." It said as it made to slide up into the wall around it. But it paused as she spoke.

"It's just...." She began. "It's just Veliry now.... Anatha." She looked down at the robes that she was wearing and suddenly felt like an imposter for wearing them. "I'm not the Arch Mage anymore."

The door stopped in mid transformation.

"Has the King found reason to release you from service?" The door asked curiously.

She thought for a moment. He hadn't. Though she wondered why.

"No." She replied. "Not yet at least."

The door seemed to think for a moment, like she just had. Then spoke again.

"The title of Arch Mage is bestowed by the King in recognition of talent and power." It said firmly. "So, until he determines otherwise. Welcome back... Arch Mage."

Veliry had to admit as she walked through the opening, that she hadn't thought of it that way. King Farrick knew she'd lost her magic. Yet he hadn't fired her, or expelled her from the castle or anything.

She sat on the mismatched couch that sat in the center of her main room as she thought. Her hand brushed up against something and she looked down to see the book containing the thesis she'd written that had gotten her accepted as a High Mage from the academy. It was about how magic users could only grow stronger if they continued pushing the boundaries of their bodies and souls by repeatedly pushing themselves to their magical limits. And how those limits would eventually relent and grow more expansive.

It seemed thicker than she remembered.

She opened it, and was surprised to find sheets of paper in it, written in a familiar handwriting, but in Earth English. They were small, and yellow, and seemed to stick to the pages of the thesis with some incredibly light adhesive. It was just sticky enough to keep them attached to the pages, but light enough that she could remove them without damaging the paper or writing within.

She looked at one.

>Sounds similar to muscular hypertrophy in athletes but for magic.
>
>???
>
>Can magical muscles fully tear?
>
>If so can they be "surgically repaired" like muscles?
>
>No= time???
>
>~~No = Dead~~~~???~~
>
>Ask Miss V if rest of thesis doesn't elaborate.

A tear fell onto the little yellow square as she looked at a little crudely drawn character that was clearly meant to be a mage of some kind flexing absurdly large muscular arms, and as she wiped her cheek she realized it was hers.

She'd forgotten that Joey had read her thesis. And remembered him mentioning it while he'd been explaining how he'd learned to deal with his own issues.

Then she looked back up at the questions he'd asked himself while reading her paper.

Her head tilted as she considered them.

She cursed her self pity as she realized that she WASN'T without magic. She WOULD be dead if that was the case. Petravian physiology RAN on the invisible energy, and even Marcos had confirmed that her magic levels were at the bare minimum for her body to survive. It was why she felt so lethargic all the time now.

"We're not exactly LOVING the gods right now." She said to herself as she rushed over to where she kept her copy of the medical books Earth had sent over. "But gods bless you Joseph. You brilliant BRILLIANT idiot."

And she began flipping to the section about muscles, specifically about torn muscles, and began rereading it.

And as she did she began at the first step she'd learned decades ago when she'd still been a child. The first lesson she'd taught BOTH of the Choi brothers when they'd wanted to learn magic from her.

Learn to draw in energy and focus it. Even if its only a tiny bit. Create a puff of wind.

And she began slowly but surely trying to flex those magical muscles.

An eye appeared on the inside of her door and watched her. And if it had been willing to risk its owner's notice, it would have also manifested a smiling mouth.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11gmop0/wait_is_this_just_gate_322/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (320/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Bit of a short one. Steve's the motherfuckin' best. That is all.

Enjoy.

\~

"So there's nothing WE need to do while here?" James asked as he and Amina rode out of the ships hold and onto the small island they'd landed at. "No one to meet and greet. No fancy ceremonies?"

"No." She said as she wrapped her arms around his waist and rested her head on his shoulder. "The islands of the Vengien Sea don't have leaders exactly. Mostly just community living."

James rubbed the side of his head against hers. "And they'll have what your sisters need to fix the ship?"

"Eh. Enough of it anyways." Amina replied. "Ferria's men brought enough repair supplies of their own really."

"Sooo... we've got two days on a remote island in the middle of the ocean, with a small mountain known for its view of the lagoon below?" He asked rhetorically. Then he leaned back and looked at her grinning face. "Definitely a coincidence."

She shrugged. "I don't know what you're talking about." She said. "And it's not my fault you scared the crew half to death with your theatrics and that they want you off the ship for a bit."

"Right." He said. Then he kicked Steve into motion. "Steve lets go check out this mountain."

Steve grunted and moved toward the small village that rested nearby and butted up against the small mountain.

It felt good to ride the massive drake again. As James's legs began complaining about the saddle and stirrups he realized that it had been too long since he'd taken Steve out of his pen and gone on a long ride. He missed the black bristle back.

"How are you?" She asked as they made their way into the small village.

One of the villagers, a small child, rushed forward excitedly toward Steve, who rumbled a bit at the burst of motion. But the child's mother grabbed them by the shoulders and lifted them up. James bopped Steve's neck with the palm of his hand in warning. Then he pulled the drake to a stop and waved the mother and child over.

"You can pet him." He said. Steve turned back with a look that James recognized as uncertainty as the mother, equally uncertain, held her child forward. James watched with a small smile as the little boy, who couldn't have been more than five, grabbed large tufts of Steve's fur. "Gently." He cautioned, and watched as the child began to pet the drake more softly. He joined the child and scratched Steve deeply, just like he liked.

Steve leaned into the child a bit.

James turned back to Amina a little bit. "I'm um... I'm okay. I guess."

The mother smiled as her son broke out in hysterical laughter from Steve's massive tongue running up and down his face and leaving a trail of smelly lizard saliva in its wake. She nodded at them as she pulled back, and James kicked Steve back into motion.

The village looked like the pre-war tropical resorts that people would go to in the Caribbean, or Polynesia. The kind where super models would be photographed on inflatable beds, or walking among nurse sharks. The houses were elevated huts made out of some kind of bamboo and palm fronds.

"What was that with the lightning then?" She asked as she held her hands up and brushed them against some of the roofing of one of the houses. "Rina said it looked like you had had a death wish."

James thought back to the fight with the storm. Admittedly, he hadn't known whether or not his plan with the lightning would work.

"We needed to get the ship out of the storm." He replied. "And I needed to hit something that could take it."

Amina didn't reply. She could understand that.

"How's your stomach?" He asked instead.

She pulled back a bit and rubbed at the still sore abdominal muscles there. "Better." She said. "Still sore. But better."

"I thought you didn't have a problem with ships?" He wondered as Steve began to incline up the mountain.

"I normally don't." She agreed. "But then again that isn't exactly a normal ship. And I can't recall the last time I was on a ship during a storm. I don't think I ever have been."

James nodded. "Yeah... A couple more minutes and we probably would have been fighting for space in the bathroom."

They rode that way in silence for a few minutes, enjoying the shade of the trees as they passed over them. James marveled at the sight of some kind of winged marsupial that occasionally glided from one tree to the other, eating flying insects that it caught as it did. Steve watched them with hungry curiosity. One of them landed on a tree just above where they were riding and James stared into its large blue eyes as it watched them pass below it.

"What are those called?" He asked.

"I don't know." She admitted. "Last time I was here was when Ferria got married. I was too busy being Father's guard to pay much attention. Especially since Kela didn't come along on that trip."

James looked back at her curiously.

"She had just had the pups." She said in answer to his unspoken question.

James did some mental math. "How old was your sister when she got married? He asked.

"Nineteen." Amina replied easily. "Tanier is only a few years older. They met when his father, the former ambassador, brought him along on one of his trips to meet with my father. I was just a major back then. Still in the field under uncle Sig."

James thought of all that for a minute.

"Well." James said with a small grin. "I'm calling them bug jumpers."

Amina's eyebrows furrowed at the shift of subject BACK to the marsupials. "I don't think that's what they're called." She said.

"They are now." James said confidently.

Amina simply shook her head before resting it back on his shoulder.

Twenty minutes later they'd made the top of the small mountain. James was surprised to find a small, but remarkably well kept, hut at the top. It had a deck that extended out past the edge of the mountain's far side. Though James had zero intention of testing the decks construction. He might be able to fly, but that didn't mean he liked heights.

"What's this?" James asked as he slid down Steve's side and then helped Amina down.

"I don't know." Amina admitted. "Like I said. I was too busy last time I was here."

James knocked on the frame of the huts door. "Hello?" He asked. After a moment he shook it gently and was surprised at how rigid the whole structure was. He turned back. "So... No tent needed I guess." He saw something on the railing of the small deck and moved closer to it to inspect the carving.

Amina edged closer to the top of the cliff overlooking the lagoon down below, and the small village around one side of it.

"HEY!" James yelled suddenly, making her jump out of her skin and scramble back from the edge.

"WHAT?" She asked as she regained her wits.

"Come check this out." He said with a smile.

Amina took a moment to breath and look away from the infuriating little man that she loved so much. Then she made her way over to him. He pointed her toward a hand carved message on the railing. One of dozens.

>Tanier VaunLoren + Ferria PetraviusMay our love last until the ocean swallows this mountain.

"Huh." She said. "They must have left that here during their trip back to Vatria after their marriage."

"Kinda figured." James said. Then he jerked his thumb back over his shoulder at the doorway. "And that is definitely a fuck shack."

"A what?" She asked as she blinked at the words.

"It's got a massive hammock bed, an oversized chair with no arms, and I think I saw some kind of old school hot tub. Though I don't know how they get water up here." He said. Then he gestured at the view. "Bit of sunset lighting and some candles from my pack...." He nodded and pursed his lips. "And yep.... Fuck shack."

And, despite his crude words, Amina couldn't deny that the images in her mind sounded like a good time.

"You have candles?" She asked with a grin.

James looked at her and smiled mischievously. "I like... lavender." He admitted.

And then the two of them burst into motion setting up the shack as he'd envisioned.

Steve watched the two of them with mild curiosity as he sat down, chewing on a bug jumper that had been a bit too curious about him for its own good.

\------------------------------

Werner laid back on the healing bed as Mrs. Choi was wheeled in by one of the younger healers. Shrend and his fellow Lead Healer, an elderly elf named Arita Glowborne, joined them around the bed.

"Are you sure you're ready for this?" Mrs. Choi asked as she laid a hand on Werner's shoulder.

"It's the first step to... to resetting me. Right?" She asked nervously.

A blue skinned woman entered wearing a set of ornate robes. Her eyes had black sclera and gold irises that looked completely inhuman.

"First." She said in a sing song voice. "We'll have you sleep deeply. While you sleep we'll take an imprint of your mind. All your memories, waking and sleeping, will be kept stored. It will take several days."

That raised red flags in her mind. She was an ambassador for her country. Her mind had a lot of secrets that couldn't be allowed out.

"All my memories?" She asked. She'd known they would have to record some of her mind to preserve it. But she hadn't known it would be ALL her memories.

Mrs. Choi's grip tightened ever so slightly in reassurance.

"As a servant of the goddess of dreams." The blue skinned woman said. "I am sworn to secrecy when it comes to the people in my care. Besides. It's not a book or a transcript or anything like that. Think of it like.... letting me hold your identifying documents for a moment while you change clothes." The woman thought. "That's not the best way I could put that. But it's about as close as I can get to describing it." Then she smiled. "I won't read them. And because I'll only be tending to you for the duration, I won't even need to compare them to anyone else's. I'll simply be handing them back to you once the process is complete."

"And I'll make sure nobody tinkers with them while we aren't looking." Mrs. Choi said with a small smile.

"And all I have to do is sleep?" Werner asked.

"That's all." The woman said. "Three days and three nights of slumber."

"We'll handle the rest." Shrend said.

"Okay." Werner said hesitantly. "When do we start?"

The blue woman lit a candle. "Now." She said, and Werner was surprised to find that the candle smelled like a coffee hut. "Everyone else either leave or brace your noses." She said to the others as she lit a second candle. And as Werner felt her eyelids drooping, and saw a faint purple light emanate from her pillow, she thought the second candle smelled like the salted peanuts her father used to get her at ball games. Though how a candle could smell that precisely, she didn't know.

Then she was asleep.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11fh0np/wait_is_this_just_gate_321/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (320/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Bit of a short one. Steve's the motherfuckin' best. That is all.

Enjoy.

\~

"So there's nothing WE need to do while here?" James asked as he and Amina rode out of the ships hold and onto the small island they'd landed at. "No one to meet and greet. No fancy ceremonies?"

"No." She said as she wrapped her arms around his waist and rested her head on his shoulder. "The islands of the Vengien Sea don't have leaders exactly. Mostly just community living."

James rubbed the side of his head against hers. "And they'll have what your sisters need to fix the ship?"

"Eh. Enough of it anyways." Amina replied. "Ferria's men brought enough repair supplies of their own really."

"Sooo... we've got two days on a remote island in the middle of the ocean, with a small mountain known for its view of the lagoon below?" He asked rhetorically. Then he leaned back and looked at her grinning face. "Definitely a coincidence."

She shrugged. "I don't know what you're talking about." She said. "And it's not my fault you scared the crew half to death with your theatrics and that they want you off the ship for a bit."

"Right." He said. Then he kicked Steve into motion. "Steve lets go check out this mountain."

Steve grunted and moved toward the small village that rested nearby and butted up against the small mountain.

It felt good to ride the massive drake again. As James's legs began complaining about the saddle and stirrups he realized that it had been too long since he'd taken Steve out of his pen and gone on a long ride. He missed the black bristle back.

"How are you?" She asked as they made their way into the small village.

One of the villagers, a small child, rushed forward excitedly toward Steve, who rumbled a bit at the burst of motion. But the child's mother grabbed them by the shoulders and lifted them up. James bopped Steve's neck with the palm of his hand in warning. Then he pulled the drake to a stop and waved the mother and child over.

"You can pet him." He said. Steve turned back with a look that James recognized as uncertainty as the mother, equally uncertain, held her child forward. James watched with a small smile as the little boy, who couldn't have been more than five, grabbed large tufts of Steve's fur. "Gently." He cautioned, and watched as the child began to pet the drake more softly. He joined the child and scratched Steve deeply, just like he liked.

Steve leaned into the child a bit.

James turned back to Amina a little bit. "I'm um... I'm okay. I guess."

The mother smiled as her son broke out in hysterical laughter from Steve's massive tongue running up and down his face and leaving a trail of smelly lizard saliva in its wake. She nodded at them as she pulled back, and James kicked Steve back into motion.

The village looked like the pre-war tropical resorts that people would go to in the Caribbean, or Polynesia. The kind where super models would be photographed on inflatable beds, or walking among nurse sharks. The houses were elevated huts made out of some kind of bamboo and palm fronds.

"What was that with the lightning then?" She asked as she held her hands up and brushed them against some of the roofing of one of the houses. "Rina said it looked like you had had a death wish."

James thought back to the fight with the storm. Admittedly, he hadn't known whether or not his plan with the lightning would work.

"We needed to get the ship out of the storm." He replied. "And I needed to hit something that could take it."

Amina didn't reply. She could understand that.

"How's your stomach?" He asked instead.

She pulled back a bit and rubbed at the still sore abdominal muscles there. "Better." She said. "Still sore. But better."

"I thought you didn't have a problem with ships?" He wondered as Steve began to incline up the mountain.

"I normally don't." She agreed. "But then again that isn't exactly a normal ship. And I can't recall the last time I was on a ship during a storm. I don't think I ever have been."

James nodded. "Yeah... A couple more minutes and we probably would have been fighting for space in the bathroom."

They rode that way in silence for a few minutes, enjoying the shade of the trees as they passed over them. James marveled at the sight of some kind of winged marsupial that occasionally glided from one tree to the other, eating flying insects that it caught as it did. Steve watched them with hungry curiosity. One of them landed on a tree just above where they were riding and James stared into its large blue eyes as it watched them pass below it.

"What are those called?" He asked.

"I don't know." She admitted. "Last time I was here was when Ferria got married. I was too busy being Father's guard to pay much attention. Especially since Kela didn't come along on that trip."

James looked back at her curiously.

"She had just had the pups." She said in answer to his unspoken question.

James did some mental math. "How old was your sister when she got married? He asked.

"Nineteen." Amina replied easily. "Tanier is only a few years older. They met when his father, the former ambassador, brought him along on one of his trips to meet with my father. I was just a major back then. Still in the field under uncle Sig."

James thought of all that for a minute.

"Well." James said with a small grin. "I'm calling them bug jumpers."

Amina's eyebrows furrowed at the shift of subject BACK to the marsupials. "I don't think that's what they're called." She said.

"They are now." James said confidently.

Amina simply shook her head before resting it back on his shoulder.

Twenty minutes later they'd made the top of the small mountain. James was surprised to find a small, but remarkably well kept, hut at the top. It had a deck that extended out past the edge of the mountain's far side. Though James had zero intention of testing the decks construction. He might be able to fly, but that didn't mean he liked heights.

"What's this?" James asked as he slid down Steve's side and then helped Amina down.

"I don't know." Amina admitted. "Like I said. I was too busy last time I was here."

James knocked on the frame of the huts door. "Hello?" He asked. After a moment he shook it gently and was surprised at how rigid the whole structure was. He turned back. "So... No tent needed I guess." He saw something on the railing of the small deck and moved closer to it to inspect the carving.

Amina edged closer to the top of the cliff overlooking the lagoon down below, and the small village around one side of it.

"HEY!" James yelled suddenly, making her jump out of her skin and scramble back from the edge.

"WHAT?" She asked as she regained her wits.

"Come check this out." He said with a smile.

Amina took a moment to breath and look away from the infuriating little man that she loved so much. Then she made her way over to him. He pointed her toward a hand carved message on the railing. One of dozens.

>Tanier VaunLoren + Ferria Petravius
>
>May our love last until the ocean swallows this mountain.

"Huh." She said. "They must have left that here during their trip back to Vatria after their marriage."

"Kinda figured." James said. Then he jerked his thumb back over his shoulder at the doorway. "And that is definitely a fuck shack."

"A what?" She asked as she blinked at the words.

"It's got a massive hammock bed, an oversized chair with no arms, and I think I saw some kind of old school hot tub. Though I don't know how they get water up here." He said. Then he gestured at the view. "Bit of sunset lighting and some candles from my pack...." He nodded and pursed his lips. "And yep.... Fuck shack."

And, despite his crude words, Amina couldn't deny that the images in her mind sounded like a good time.

"You have candles?" She asked with a grin.

James looked at her and smiled mischievously. "I like... lavender." He admitted.

And then the two of them burst into motion setting up the shack as he'd envisioned.

Steve watched the two of them with mild curiosity as he sat down, chewing on a bug jumper that had been a bit too curious about him for its own good.

\------------------------------

Werner laid back on the healing bed as Mrs. Choi was wheeled in by one of the younger healers. Shrend and his fellow Lead Healer, an elderly elf named Arita Glowborne, joined them around the bed.

"Are you sure you're ready for this?" Mrs. Choi asked as she laid a hand on Werner's shoulder.

"It's the first step to... to resetting me. Right?" She asked nervously.

A blue skinned woman entered wearing a set of ornate robes. Her eyes had black sclera and gold irises that looked completely inhuman.

"First." She said in a sing song voice. "We'll have you sleep deeply. While you sleep we'll take an imprint of your mind. All your memories, waking and sleeping, will be kept stored. It will take several days."

That raised red flags in her mind. She was an ambassador for her country. Her mind had a lot of secrets that couldn't be allowed out.

"All my memories?" She asked. She'd known they would have to record some of her mind to preserve it. But she hadn't known it would be ALL her memories.

Mrs. Choi's grip tightened ever so slightly in reassurance.

"As a servant of the goddess of dreams." The blue skinned woman said. "I am sworn to secrecy when it comes to the people in my care. Besides. It's not a book or a transcript or anything like that. Think of it like.... letting me hold your identifying documents for a moment while you change clothes." The woman thought. "That's not the best way I could put that. But it's about as close as I can get to describing it." Then she smiled. "I won't read them. And because I'll only be tending to you for the duration, I won't even need to compare them to anyone else's. I'll simply be handing them back to you once the process is complete."

"And I'll make sure nobody tinkers with them while we aren't looking." Mrs. Choi said with a small smile.

"And all I have to do is sleep?" Werner asked.

"That's all." The woman said. "Three days and three nights of slumber."

"We'll handle the rest." Shrend said.

"Okay." Werner said hesitantly. "When do we start?"

The blue woman lit a candle. "Now." She said, and Werner was surprised to find that the candle smelled like a coffee hut. "Everyone else either leave or brace your noses." She said to the others as she lit a second candle. And as Werner felt her eyelids drooping, and saw a faint purple light emanate from her pillow, she thought the second candle smelled like the salted peanuts her father used to get her at ball games. Though how a candle could smell that precisely, she didn't know.

Then she was asleep.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11fgys7/wait_is_this_just_gate_321/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (319/?)

Previous

Writer's note: This serves as a reminder that James = Stronk Idiot

Enjoy

\~\~\~

"Aye!" A voice shouted back.

There was a crack, and a flash of slightly blueish light as James felt magical energy discharge somewhere behind and above him.

KRAKOOM!

James instinctively ducked down inside the doorway as the sky went blindingly bright with light. His ears rang with the report of the lightning that had just blasted past them. Then Xarina staggered past him, almost forty five degrees askew, as she confidently crossed the deck of the ship. She wore a large leather patch over her right eye that held a large blue crystal in front of it. The crystal glowed a bit as she turned her head.

"FORWARD PORT!" She yelled out. "PROJECT IT!"

"Aye miss!" A different voice called. James felt the familiar magical buildup before there was another small lightning blast that he actually saw through the mist. It cast an eerie shadow around its caster as it flew out a few yards and then detonated.

KABOOM!

He practically threw himself back down the stairs and into the ship's hold as a massive bolt of NATURAL lightning immediately replaced the one the caster had sent out. It flew past the side of the ship, missing it by mere inches, or so it seemed to James.

"SKYWARD!" Xarina yelled frantically. "SKYWARD SKYWARD SKYWARD!"

Again the buildup of magical energy. But this time from all over the ship, and James saw the faint shimmer of a shield form over the-

KABOOM!

The shield flared as a hammer of lightning slammed into it from above and spidered out across its shimmering blue form. Someone cried out.

"HOLD YA BUNCH O' VATRIAN DIRT EATERS!" Xarina yelled. Then the lightning was gone again.

James staggered back up and out and toward the princess's voice. After a few moments of staggering drunkenly about he found her and latched onto her shoulder. She rounded on him with a manic expression on her face.

"What are you doin' here HERO!?" She asked. "Ye should be below with the rest."

"What the fuck is going on?" He asked.

Her eyepiece glared with blue light and she stepped over and past him.

"AFT SIDE AGAIN!" She yelled. "PORTWARD!"

"Aye!" One of the ship-hands yelled again. And this time James was braced for the lightning that flew past.

"Can't you see we're a touch busy?" She asked as he recovered. "Bloody Vatrians didn't even put in any dampening for their enchantments!" She said, more to herself than for his benefit. "We're attracting every stray lightning bolt the storm has to give. And it's got a lot."

"What?" James asked.

She glared at him as if he was an idiot. Then shouldered past him.

"STARBOARD SIDE!" She yelled.

Another "Aye!" Another spell, and another blast of lightning.

Then she looked back at him. "The Vatrians." She said, each word dripping with disgust. "Built a bloody flying ship. That's full o' magic. They didn't think of what would happen if a bloody magic ship got caught in a bleedin' storm!" She gestured at the grey mist of the cloud they were in. "Like oh... I don't know. THIS BLOODY STORM!"

Before James could react she waved her hand and a bolt of red lightning flew out past the front of the ship at an angle, then detonated into a spider web of similarly colored lightning that went every way except toward the ship.

KABOOM!

"Didn't even put any damned redirection tubing in place." She grumbled as she scanned around with the crystal eye piece.

"What do we do?" He asked as the ship rolled. He fell to a knee as his wolf hand dug into the ship's deck. Xarina simply listed in the other direction, her feet barely moving.

"Fuck can we do?" She asked rhetorically. Then she cupped her hands around her mouth. "STARBOARD!" Another lightning blast. "All we can do is keep redirecting them manually and hope the men hold out until we can get clear." She said grimly.

"Get clear?" He said curiously as he thought hard.

She cocked an eyebrow. "Yeah." She said in confusion. "Of the storm. Obviously."

"No." He said. "I mean..... What if we cleared the storm?"

"Yeah." She said with her arms wide. "THAT'S THE IDEA!" Then she turned as the gem lit up again. "PORT SIDE!"

Another report. More lightning.

"NO!" He yelled back. "I mean what if WE... Clear the storm ourselves?!?!"

"What?" She asked. "Like... make it go away? That's druidcraft." She scoffed. "Know any druids that strong?"

His face hardened for a moment as he thought of sarcastically replying. "Yeah. Yeah I do." And she seemed to read the thoughts there.

"You know what I mean." She said a bit more softly.

"Right." He said. "Still. How do you normally clear fog?"

"Light and heat." She said. "Helps to have a lot of both."

James gestured at the grey mist around them.

"A cloud is just fog that's up in the sky with a bunch of lightning in it." He said.

"Aye but this is a storm. It's massive." She shot back.

"Then we'd better dress to match." He said simply. And before she could react he began making his way over to the railing at the side of the ship.

"What?" She asked. "You'd have to blast out enough fire to-"

Then James jumped over the railing.

Xarina rushed over to the side, on the verge of yelling out "Man overboard!" as if it would matter a thousand feet above the ocean. Then there was a rapid popping noise, like firecrackers going off. Then James was hovering a few dozen yards out past the rapidly buzzing wings of the ship, which he'd fallen between when he'd jumped off. She could barely see him out in the thick mist, only able to track his location by the twin jets of magical energy emitting from his feet, and the gold glow around his eyes.

She felt magical energy build up in his location and was temporarily stunned at the scale of what he was pulling into himself.

And suddenly there was a loud roaring sound. And the world came alight with fire right before her eyes.

Three gouts of flame sprayed forth from the small man as he hovered, one from each hand, and one from his mouth, and fanned out in an inferno before him.

Her eyepiece flared and she studied the info it gave her.

"MR. CHOI!" She tried to yell over the noise of his burning attack. "BEHIND Y-"

BOOM!

Lightning arced over the ship, making every hair on her head stand up with static as it did, and she watched in mute horror as it arced toward the largest source of magical energy it could find.

Right now that was him.

James felt the incoming surge behind him.

His right hand stopped spewing flame and let out a small pop that spun him around ever so slightly and he looked back to see the large white spot of the approaching lightning bolt. It was moving... well... like lightning, and even with his vision enhanced he knew he wasn't going to avoid it.

Luckily that had never been the plan. After all, his new sister in law had keyed him in to the fact that apparently lightning liked sources of magical energy.

He'd needed something to fight for a while now. And a storm seemed like a damn good outlet to unleash upon.

Images of the first fire elemental he'd ever fought popped into his mind. As did the image of Prince Alixan shielding him outside of Jadesport. And Veliry shielding a thermobaric artillery attack.

And, he'd never admit it, so did an angsty prince from one of his dad's favorite cartoons.

His right hand caught the bolt with his pointer and middle finger. It burned in a way that was oddly ice cold.

USE IT! He demanded of himself.

In his mind he devoured the energy and mixed it in with all the other energy he'd gathered in to fly and shoot fire. He used the impact to spin himself back the way he'd come. Then his numb right hand spread back out and fire bloomed from it once again, joining his other hand and his mouth.

And the blazing maelstrom that he'd been emitting before was amplified tenfold as the very power of the storm joined it.

The entire crew, or at least those present on the deck, watched this with slack jaws and wide eyes as the young man they'd all assumed was dead, became a human fire elemental in the sky.

Then, he began to move.

"By the serpents of the deeps." Xarina muttered to herself as she felt the dew on her face first warm, then evaporate entirely, then was replaced by sweat as the temperature near the ship began to climb.

She looked around, and sure enough the mist of the cloud seemed... lighter.

James flew forward, toward the front of the ship. He felt another swell of energy and turned to face it. This time he caught the bolt on his left leg, which made his flight falter for a moment before he recovered. Once again the fire intensified.

More! He thought. Give me more!

He turned his head ever so slightly as he felt magic building up on the ship, and saw the crew there beginning to spray flames of their own out from the ship deck.

He jetted down underneath the ship and was shocked to see that there were several large scorch marks on the bottom where Xarina and the crew HADN'T been able to defend it from the lightning. He felt another bolt building up now.

This one he caught in both hands, allowing the fire to stop temporarily as he focused on catching it. Once he had, he redirected it out of his mouth and did his best impersonation of a dragon.

Fire flowed out in a torrent that would have made Steve jealous if he hadn't been clamped onto his pen's walls for his life.

Oh god. He thought as he was reminded of his best friend and mount. Sorry bout the lightning Steve.

Then he went back to flying around the ship as a human flamethrower.

Thirty minutes later, and with the sky around the ship much clearer, James landed on the deck and flopped out on his belly with his arms and legs splayed. He had black veins forming around the corners of his mouth, though he couldn't see them. Once the crew had caught on and joined him in burning away the cloud he'd taken off in front of the ship and cleared out a few miles of the sky in front of it, making a corridor for it to fly through safely until they reached the end of the weather formation.

He stayed that way for a few minutes as he caught his breath.

I fought a storm and won. He thought to himself as he caught his breath. And I did it in style.

But when he rolled over and sat up there were no cheers. The crew didn't gather around and clap him on the shoulder or anything like that.

Instead they looked at him with what he thought might have been a bit of fear. Only Xarina approached him, and even she did so with apprehension on her face.

"Got it." He said as he got to his feet.

"Aye. That you did." She agreed as she reached out to steady him. "Well done."

"Everyone okay?" He asked.

"Aye. We're fine." She said. "But what the hell was that?"

"What?" He asked, confused. "I told you we could burn the cloud away."

"Yeah." She agreed. Then she gestured to the deck hands who were still emitting jets of fire from the ship to keep the cloud from rolling back in. "And WE did. You damn near got yourself killed." She pointed at the burns on his right hand, where long lightning pattern lines had formed starting at his finger tips. He hadn't even noticed them. "What was that with the lightning?" She asked.

He held it up and looked at it curiously. "What? I used the storm to fuel the spells against itself." He said.

He saw the look of concern in her face. "I've never heard of anyone doin' that." She admitted. "And what if it hadn't worked? What if instead you'd simply been knocked dead in the sky? What then?"

James shrugged. He hadn't really thought of it. "I don't know." He admitted. "Didn't really think that far ahead."

She jabbed him in the chest painfully. "That's part of the problem." She said angrily. "This is a ship. May be a weird sky ship built by a bunch of idiots. But it's still a ship. And you're a damn member of the royal family now. Even if its only by marriage you still have to THINK... before you act. You represent my father and the kingdom now. AND Amina."

As if on cue, Amina emerged from the door leading below. She still looked green around the gills.

"Is it..." She began. "Is it over?" Then she rushed over to the railing and vomited again.

"Go take care of your wife." Xarina said firmly as she began walking away, tucking the crystal and leather eye piece into a pouch on her belt as she did. "And next time you're thinkin' of leaping ass first into trouble; do us a favor and simply stay in your cabin."

James watched her go for a moment, then heard Amina retch again and rushed to her side.

"Yeah, you're welcome." James hissed over his shoulder at the departing princess.

He wasn't aware of the fact that she'd left out the part where his display of firepower had intimidated everyone who'd seen it. Herself included.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11emsi1/wait_is_this_just_gate_320/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (319/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: This serves as a reminder that James = Stronk Idiot

Enjoy

\~\~\~

"Aye!" A voice shouted back.

There was a crack, and a flash of slightly blueish light as James felt magical energy discharge somewhere behind and above him.

KRAKOOM!

James instinctively ducked down inside the doorway as the sky went blindingly bright with light. His ears rang with the report of the lightning that had just blasted past them. Then Xarina staggered past him, almost forty five degrees askew, as she confidently crossed the deck of the ship. She wore a large leather patch over her right eye that held a large blue crystal in front of it. The crystal glowed a bit as she turned her head.

"FORWARD PORT!" She yelled out. "PROJECT IT!"

"Aye miss!" A different voice called. James felt the familiar magical buildup before there was another small lightning blast that he actually saw through the mist. It cast an eerie shadow around its caster as it flew out a few yards and then detonated.

KABOOM!

He practically threw himself back down the stairs and into the ship's hold as a massive bolt of NATURAL lightning immediately replaced the one the caster had sent out. It flew past the side of the ship, missing it by mere inches, or so it seemed to James.

"SKYWARD!" Xarina yelled frantically. "SKYWARD SKYWARD SKYWARD!"

Again the buildup of magical energy. But this time from all over the ship, and James saw the faint shimmer of a shield form over the-

KABOOM!

The shield flared as a hammer of lightning slammed into it from above and spidered out across its shimmering blue form. Someone cried out.

"HOLD YA BUNCH O' VATRIAN DIRT EATERS!" Xarina yelled. Then the lightning was gone again.

James staggered back up and out and toward the princess's voice. After a few moments of staggering drunkenly about he found her and latched onto her shoulder. She rounded on him with a manic expression on her face.

"What are you doin' here HERO!?" She asked. "Ye should be below with the rest."

"What the fuck is going on?" He asked.

Her eyepiece glared with blue light and she stepped over and past him.

"AFT SIDE AGAIN!" She yelled. "PORTWARD!"

"Aye!" One of the ship-hands yelled again. And this time James was braced for the lightning that flew past.

"Can't you see we're a touch busy?" She asked as he recovered. "Bloody Vatrians didn't even put in any dampening for their enchantments!" She said, more to herself than for his benefit. "We're attracting every stray lightning bolt the storm has to give. And it's got a lot."

"What?" James asked.

She glared at him as if he was an idiot. Then shouldered past him.

"STARBOARD SIDE!" She yelled.

Another "Aye!" Another spell, and another blast of lightning.

Then she looked back at him. "The Vatrians." She said, each word dripping with disgust. "Built a bloody flying ship. That's full o' magic. They didn't think of what would happen if a bloody magic ship got caught in a bleedin' storm!" She gestured at the grey mist of the cloud they were in. "Like oh... I don't know. THIS BLOODY STORM!"

Before James could react she waved her hand and a bolt of red lightning flew out past the front of the ship at an angle, then detonated into a spider web of similarly colored lightning that went every way except toward the ship.

KABOOM!

"Didn't even put any damned redirection tubing in place." She grumbled as she scanned around with the crystal eye piece.

"What do we do?" He asked as the ship rolled. He fell to a knee as his wolf hand dug into the ship's deck. Xarina simply listed in the other direction, her feet barely moving.

"Fuck can we do?" She asked rhetorically. Then she cupped her hands around her mouth. "STARBOARD!" Another lightning blast. "All we can do is keep redirecting them manually and hope the men hold out until we can get clear." She said grimly.

"Get clear?" He said curiously as he thought hard.

She cocked an eyebrow. "Yeah." She said in confusion. "Of the storm. Obviously."

"No." He said. "I mean..... What if we cleared the storm?"

"Yeah." She said with her arms wide. "THAT'S THE IDEA!" Then she turned as the gem lit up again. "PORT SIDE!"

Another report. More lightning.

"NO!" He yelled back. "I mean what if WE... Clear the storm ourselves?!?!"

"What?" She asked. "Like... make it go away? That's druidcraft." She scoffed. "Know any druids that strong?"

His face hardened for a moment as he thought of sarcastically replying. "Yeah. Yeah I do." And she seemed to read the thoughts there.

"You know what I mean." She said a bit more softly.

"Right." He said. "Still. How do you normally clear fog?"

"Light and heat." She said. "Helps to have a lot of both."

James gestured at the grey mist around them.

"A cloud is just fog that's up in the sky with a bunch of lightning in it." He said.

"Aye but this is a storm. It's massive." She shot back.

"Then we'd better dress to match." He said simply. And before she could react he began making his way over to the railing at the side of the ship.

"What?" She asked. "You'd have to blast out enough fire to-"

Then James jumped over the railing.

Xarina rushed over to the side, on the verge of yelling out "Man overboard!" as if it would matter a thousand feet above the ocean. Then there was a rapid popping noise, like firecrackers going off. Then James was hovering a few dozen yards out past the rapidly buzzing wings of the ship, which he'd fallen between when he'd jumped off. She could barely see him out in the thick mist, only able to track his location by the twin jets of magical energy emitting from his feet, and the gold glow around his eyes.

She felt magical energy build up in his location and was temporarily stunned at the scale of what he was pulling into himself.

And suddenly there was a loud roaring sound. And the world came alight with fire right before her eyes.

Three gouts of flame sprayed forth from the small man as he hovered, one from each hand, and one from his mouth, and fanned out in an inferno before him.

Her eyepiece flared and she studied the info it gave her.

"MR. CHOI!" She tried to yell over the noise of his burning attack. "BEHIND Y-"

BOOM!

Lightning arced over the ship, making every hair on her head stand up with static as it did, and she watched in mute horror as it arced toward the largest source of magical energy it could find.

Right now that was him.

James felt the incoming surge behind him.

His right hand stopped spewing flame and let out a small pop that spun him around ever so slightly and he looked back to see the large white spot of the approaching lightning bolt. It was moving... well... like lightning, and even with his vision enhanced he knew he wasn't going to avoid it.

Luckily that had never been the plan. After all, his new sister in law had keyed him in to the fact that apparently lightning liked sources of magical energy.

He'd needed something to fight for a while now. And a storm seemed like a damn good outlet to unleash upon.

Images of the first fire elemental he'd ever fought popped into his mind. As did the image of Prince Alixan shielding him outside of Jadesport. And Veliry shielding a thermobaric artillery attack.

And, he'd never admit it, so did an angsty prince from one of his dad's favorite cartoons.

His right hand caught the bolt with his pointer and middle finger. It burned in a way that was oddly ice cold.

USE IT! He demanded of himself.

In his mind he devoured the energy and mixed it in with all the other energy he'd gathered in to fly and shoot fire. He used the impact to spin himself back the way he'd come. Then his numb right hand spread back out and fire bloomed from it once again, joining his other hand and his mouth.

And the blazing maelstrom that he'd been emitting before was amplified tenfold as the very power of the storm joined it.

The entire crew, or at least those present on the deck, watched this with slack jaws and wide eyes as the young man they'd all assumed was dead, became a human fire elemental in the sky.

Then, he began to move.

"By the serpents of the deeps." Xarina muttered to herself as she felt the dew on her face first warm, then evaporate entirely, then was replaced by sweat as the temperature near the ship began to climb.

She looked around, and sure enough the mist of the cloud seemed... lighter.

James flew forward, toward the front of the ship. He felt another swell of energy and turned to face it. This time he caught the bolt on his left leg, which made his flight falter for a moment before he recovered. Once again the fire intensified.

More! He thought. Give me more!

He turned his head ever so slightly as he felt magic building up on the ship, and saw the crew there beginning to spray flames of their own out from the ship deck.

He jetted down underneath the ship and was shocked to see that there were several large scorch marks on the bottom where Xarina and the crew HADN'T been able to defend it from the lightning. He felt another bolt building up now.

This one he caught in both hands, allowing the fire to stop temporarily as he focused on catching it. Once he had, he redirected it out of his mouth and did his best impersonation of a dragon.

Fire flowed out in a torrent that would have made Steve jealous if he hadn't been clamped onto his pen's walls for his life.

Oh god. He thought as he was reminded of his best friend and mount. Sorry bout the lightning Steve.

Then he went back to flying around the ship as a human flamethrower.

Thirty minutes later, and with the sky around the ship much clearer, James landed on the deck and flopped out on his belly with his arms and legs splayed. He had black veins forming around the corners of his mouth, though he couldn't see them. Once the crew had caught on and joined him in burning away the cloud he'd taken off in front of the ship and cleared out a few miles of the sky in front of it, making a corridor for it to fly through safely until they reached the end of the weather formation.

He stayed that way for a few minutes as he caught his breath.

I fought a storm and won. He thought to himself as he caught his breath. And I did it in style.

But when he rolled over and sat up there were no cheers. The crew didn't gather around and clap him on the shoulder or anything like that.

Instead they looked at him with what he thought might have been a bit of fear. Only Xarina approached him, and even she did so with apprehension on her face.

"Got it." He said as he got to his feet.

"Aye. That you did." She agreed as she reached out to steady him. "Well done."

"Everyone okay?" He asked.

"Aye. We're fine." She said. "But what the hell was that?"

"What?" He asked, confused. "I told you we could burn the cloud away."

"Yeah." She agreed. Then she gestured to the deck hands who were still emitting jets of fire from the ship to keep the cloud from rolling back in. "And WE did. You damn near got yourself killed." She pointed at the burns on his right hand, where long lightning pattern lines had formed starting at his finger tips. He hadn't even noticed them. "What was that with the lightning?" She asked.

He held it up and looked at it curiously. "What? I used the storm to fuel the spells against itself." He said.

He saw the look of concern in her face. "I've never heard of anyone doin' that." She admitted. "And what if it hadn't worked? What if instead you'd simply been knocked dead in the sky? What then?"

James shrugged. He hadn't really thought of it. "I don't know." He admitted. "Didn't really think that far ahead."

She jabbed him in the chest painfully. "That's part of the problem." She said angrily. "This is a ship. May be a weird sky ship built by a bunch of idiots. But it's still a ship. And you're a damn member of the royal family now. Even if its only by marriage you still have to THINK... before you act. You represent my father and the kingdom now. AND Amina."

As if on cue, Amina emerged from the door leading below. She still looked green around the gills.

"Is it..." She began. "Is it over?" Then she rushed over to the railing and vomited again.

"Go take care of your wife." Xarina said firmly as she began walking away, tucking the crystal and leather eye piece into a pouch on her belt as she did. "And next time you're thinkin' of leaping ass first into trouble; do us a favor and simply stay in your cabin."

James watched her go for a moment, then heard Amina retch again and rushed to her side.

"Yeah, you're welcome." James hissed over his shoulder at the departing princess.

He wasn't aware of the fact that she'd left out the part where his display of firepower had intimidated everyone who'd seen it. Herself included.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11emqt0/wait_is_this_just_gate_320/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (318/?)

Previous

Writer's Note: Been battling the plague all week. Hence the lack of chapters. Still alive. Feeling better, if still a bit shitty. We're officially moving into the Honeymoon Arc now. We're gonna get to see more of the world Petravus is in. And James begins recovering.

Be back next week with the standard schedule.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina only spent three days in Jadesport before boarding Ferria's airship and beginning the next leg of their trip.

They spent the first day catching up with Amina's uncle, General Sigbert. His army was being pulled back from the area outside of the city due to the blight there being removed by whatever Joey had done with it. He thanked James, even as he wrapped the younger man in a bear-hug and gave his condolences for his loss.

The second day they'd spent talking with the city mayor. The mayor threw them a massive feast and party, in thanks for their aid with the blight spawn, and also for whatever they'd done to remove the blight as well. But it was also a celebration of the princess's wedding.

James joined in the cheers, and gave short toasts when it was appropriate. And to anyone else he would have seemed like a cheerful, if quietly bashful, new spouse.

But Amina knew differently.

She saw the way he shifted uncomfortably whenever the blight was mentioned. The way he was quick to drink whenever a toast was made, though he managed to avoid getting drunk. She saw the way his laughter, though loud and quick to rise, was equally quick to fade. How he would frequently stare into his cup whenever he thought nobody was looking.

She resolved to use the third day in the city to fix this, even if only a little bit.

So, on the third day she took him shopping. They avoided all the places that they'd been to before, sticking to the parts of the city on the other side of the trade channel. At first they purchased simple things, some extra furnishings for their room on the air ship, a few sets of winter clothes for when their route took them a little further north and into cold weather. But then she took him to a part of town that she hadn't actually been to in years. Not since Kela had found out that she was pregnant with her twins.

James stopped in front of one of the shops and looked at the display. In it were a set of baby clothes in a variety of colors and, thanks to the nature of this world, different body types as well.

He looked at the shops next to it and saw toys in one, and maternity clothes in the other.

"Amina?" He asked curiously.

"Yes?" She replied.

"Why are we looking at a bunch of baby stuff?" He turned and saw that the shop behind them was full of cribs and various types of furniture made for babies and nursing mothers. "Are you..... trying to tell me something?"

"Yes and no." She said wistfully. She took his hand and used her other hand to point at a small onesy that had a simple embroidered pattern of smeplies, apples, and something that looked like a banana, though it was straight rather than curved. "We should get that one for Veliry." She said after he'd had a chance to look at it a bit. "And I bet if we asked they would probably have one that looks like little mage robes."

James took a deep breath as he realized what she meant.

He wiped his eyes with his sleeve as he turned to her with one of the first genuine smiles he'd had since their wedding.

"I think that'd be cute." He said once he'd gotten himself together. "Long as it comes with a pointy hat that flops over."

Then he let her lead him into the store.

And they ended up buying four little outfits. Then they hit all the stores nearby and bought much much more for James's future nephew/niece.

As they walked back to the ship, with two shop assistants pushing wagons along behind them, Amina smiled as she saw James actually looking happy once again. Even if it was likely only temporary.

\------------------------

King Farrick was just finishing up with a royal decree that he hoped would help alleviate some of the strain the Druids were dealing with now, when someone knocked at his study door.

"Who is it?" He asked. He was accustomed to unexpected visits. But he still didn't like them.

"Chief Vickers, sir." The large were-jaguar rumbled through the door.

"Come in Chief." He replied as he turned the decree over and slid it aside.

The door opened and Vickers stepped in gingerly. The King had been surprised to learn of the man's request, and subsequent approval, of conversion. Though, having seen him in motion, and learned of his relationship with the Outer Light knight, he was no longer confused by it.

"Hope I'm not interrupting anything." Vickers said as he stepped forward. "Mind if I sit?"

King Farrick gestured at the chair across from him. "Everyone almost always is when you're a king." He said with a slight grin. "How can I help you chief?" He asked.

Vickers sat, let out a quick gasp of surprise before standing up a bit and adjusting his tail, then sat down all the way.

"Still getting used to the new body I take it?" The King asked with a hint of amusement.

"Bits and pieces." Vickers admitted. "Have you had a chance to interrogate the Agency members that Chief Driscoll apprehended?"

That caught the King's attention. He sat up a bit straighter and rested his hands on the table.

"A few." He replied. "Several died of their injuries before we had a chance to. And one of them managed to kill themselves before we could stop them. But we've SUCCESSFULLY interrogated two. Though I use the word SUCCESSFULLY as loosely as possible there."

Vickers nodded. "Sounds about right." He said. Then he pulled up his phone and retrieved the footage of his interview with Driscoll. "Well I talked to the tin can. And I figured we could compare notes. The Toolies are going over his suits logs. Trying to see what they can figure out in terms of location tracking and what not." He slid the phone across the desk and hit the play button.

While the King watched the video, only a little more than ten minutes when all was said and done, Vickers fished out an envelope with a letter inside. One that was eerily similar to the one he'd sent out a few months earlier.

"That all seems to line up." The King. "Albeit with what little we were capable of getting." He looked at the letter in Vickers' hands. "What's that?"

Vickers held it out and let the King take it.

"A chance to earn the Muck Marcher's loyalty... assuming it doesn't kill them." He said as the King read it over, his eyes widening as he did. "Plus it might earn a bit of favor with my government. And it would give us a hell of a weapon against the Agency. Driscoll wants to go scorched earth on em. Aaaaand I kinda wanna let him."

"This...." The King said as he waved the letter at Vickers. "This is a mighty large gamble. Chief Vickers. And you want me to allow this to happen with two of the people who almost killed my daughter? Who nearly killed the Arch Mage. Your own captain?"

Vickers held his hands up in mock surrender. "Never said it wasn't a risk. Plus, like I said, it'll probably kill em. And that's assuming it even works at all. That's why I didn't sign MY name to it."

King Farrick looked, and sure enough the signature block at the bottom was blank.

"I just figured it was an option. And if the Toolies can get us a location, a couple of wolfed up muck marchers with a bone to pick might be a mighty nice ace in the hole." Vickers said. "But I'll leave that decision to you."

The king looked back at the image on Vickers' phone one more time before sliding it back across from him. He couldn't deny the anger in Driscoll's eyes. And He'd already seen what the man could do with no idea what was going on and missing an arm.

"I'll consider it." He said firmly. "But I don't like the idea of THEM having the same kind of power you do." He left out the part where he barely liked Vickers having that power.

"That's all I'm asking sir." Vickers replied as he stood up and began making his way toward the door. "I'll keep you updated on the suit data."

\------------------------

Samantha walked through the hall nervously.

She was about halfway back to her "human" form now. But even still, she could hear and smell the people waiting in the room at the end of the hall waiting for them. The room marked "Conference Hall B". She kept glancing around nervously from within her hood, as if ensuring that Dr. Munro was still there. She was, and she smiled at Samantha each time she looked her way.

She stopped in her tracks as she got within a few feet of the door. Dr. Munro stopped as well.

"Is everything okay Samantha?" She asked.

"Is this..." She began. "Is this really a good idea?" She could tell that all the chatter inside the room had quieted, and knew that all eyes would be on her as soon as she entered. "Do you really think this is okay?"

Dr. Munro looked back and forth between her and the door a few times as she thought of what to say.

"They're like you." She said finally. "Some of them have embraced their change a little more easily. But they're all just as lost. Just as alone, even when they aren't. And all in need of someone they can ACTUALLY relate to."

Samantha couldn't deny that she felt alone. Even with the doctor helping her. With her father only a phone call away. With the hospital staff slowly but surely becoming more comfortable around her. She felt like she was on her own.

She stepped forward, grasped the door handle and pulled.

And as she stepped in eight sets of golden canine eyes just like hers looked toward her, and locked on her own. She felt the fur on her neck and back stand on end.

They all stayed that way for a moment. Then a large, slightly gray furred, wolf near the far end of the room spoke.

"You're the one that had the shield?" They asked in a slightly German accented voice. "The uh... Wonder Woman?"

She looked at Dr. Munro, though she kept the other werewolves in her peripheral vision almost on instinct. Dr. Munro nodded.

"I.... was." She said hesitantly.

The large gray wolf nodded at her answer. "Thank you for stopping the big one." He said after a moment. "Sorry you turned back."

Some of the other wolves, though not all of them, were nodding agreement.

"Thanks." She said, unsure of what else there was to say.

"Did...." A small wolf, that must have only been a young teen at most, asked from a few seats away from her. "Did that... God lady... talk to you too?" Behind the young girl were two people that Samantha assumed where her parents.

"Um.... yeah." Samantha admitted.

"She seemed mean." The young wolf said. "I didn't like her."

"Me neither." Samantha agreed. Then she pulled up the empty seat near her and sat down. "I guess you said no to what she told you to do?"

The young girl looked back at her parents. "My mom and dad said not to listen to people I don't know. Especially if they seem mean."

Samantha looked at the two parents and smiled.

"That's good." She said. Then she looked around at everyone else. "Did you all speak with her too?"

They all nodded and looked around at each other too.

"Well." She said after a moment. "SHE... whoever she was... wasn't the one that gave me the Wonder Woman powers."

Even the few werewolves who hadn't been taking part in the conversation up until that point, perked up at that.

"That was a different.... GOD." She finished.

The handful of other doctors in the room looked at Dr. Munro with raised eyebrows. She simply gestured for them to pay attention as the wolves began to talk in earnest. And she was happy to see how quickly Samantha was opening up compared to when she'd first woken back up in the hospital.

First

Wait, is this just GATE? (318/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's Note: Been battling the plague all week. Hence the lack of chapters. Still alive. Feeling better, if still a bit shitty. We're officially moving into the Honeymoon Arc now. We're gonna get to see more of the world Petravus is in. And James begins recovering.

Be back next week with the standard schedule.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina only spent three days in Jadesport before boarding Ferria's airship and beginning the next leg of their trip.

They spent the first day catching up with Amina's uncle, General Sigbert. His army was being pulled back from the area outside of the city due to the blight there being removed by whatever Joey had done with it. He thanked James, even as he wrapped the younger man in a bear-hug and gave his condolences for his loss.

The second day they'd spent talking with the city mayor. The mayor threw them a massive feast and party, in thanks for their aid with the blight spawn, and also for whatever they'd done to remove the blight as well. But it was also a celebration of the princess's wedding.

James joined in the cheers, and gave short toasts when it was appropriate. And to anyone else he would have seemed like a cheerful, if quietly bashful, new spouse.

But Amina knew differently.

She saw the way he shifted uncomfortably whenever the blight was mentioned. The way he was quick to drink whenever a toast was made, though he managed to avoid getting drunk. She saw the way his laughter, though loud and quick to rise, was equally quick to fade. How he would frequently stare into his cup whenever he thought nobody was looking.

She resolved to use the third day in the city to fix this, even if only a little bit.

So, on the third day she took him shopping. They avoided all the places that they'd been to before, sticking to the parts of the city on the other side of the trade channel. At first they purchased simple things, some extra furnishings for their room on the air ship, a few sets of winter clothes for when their route took them a little further north and into cold weather. But then she took him to a part of town that she hadn't actually been to in years. Not since Kela had found out that she was pregnant with her twins.

James stopped in front of one of the shops and looked at the display. In it were a set of baby clothes in a variety of colors and, thanks to the nature of this world, different body types as well.

He looked at the shops next to it and saw toys in one, and maternity clothes in the other.

"Amina?" He asked curiously.

"Yes?" She replied.

"Why are we looking at a bunch of baby stuff?" He turned and saw that the shop behind them was full of cribs and various types of furniture made for babies and nursing mothers. "Are you..... trying to tell me something?"

"Yes and no." She said wistfully. She took his hand and used her other hand to point at a small onesy that had a simple embroidered pattern of smeplies, apples, and something that looked like a banana, though it was straight rather than curved. "We should get that one for Veliry." She said after he'd had a chance to look at it a bit. "And I bet if we asked they would probably have one that looks like little mage robes."

James took a deep breath as he realized what she meant.

He wiped his eyes with his sleeve as he turned to her with one of the first genuine smiles he'd had since their wedding.

"I think that'd be cute." He said once he'd gotten himself together. "Long as it comes with a pointy hat that flops over."

Then he let her lead him into the store.

And they ended up buying four little outfits. Then they hit all the stores nearby and bought much much more for James's future nephew/niece.

As they walked back to the ship, with two shop assistants pushing wagons along behind them, Amina smiled as she saw James actually looking happy once again. Even if it was likely only temporary.

\------------------------

King Farrick was just finishing up with a royal decree that he hoped would help alleviate some of the strain the Druids were dealing with now, when someone knocked at his study door.

"Who is it?" He asked. He was accustomed to unexpected visits. But he still didn't like them.

"Chief Vickers, sir." The large were-jaguar rumbled through the door.

"Come in Chief." He replied as he turned the decree over and slid it aside.

The door opened and Vickers stepped in gingerly. The King had been surprised to learn of the man's request, and subsequent approval, of conversion. Though, having seen him in motion, and learned of his relationship with the Outer Light knight, he was no longer confused by it.

"Hope I'm not interrupting anything." Vickers said as he stepped forward. "Mind if I sit?"

King Farrick gestured at the chair across from him. "Everyone almost always is when you're a king." He said with a slight grin. "How can I help you chief?" He asked.

Vickers sat, let out a quick gasp of surprise before standing up a bit and adjusting his tail, then sat down all the way.

"Still getting used to the new body I take it?" The King asked with a hint of amusement.

"Bits and pieces." Vickers admitted. "Have you had a chance to interrogate the Agency members that Chief Driscoll apprehended?"

That caught the King's attention. He sat up a bit straighter and rested his hands on the table.

"A few." He replied. "Several died of their injuries before we had a chance to. And one of them managed to kill themselves before we could stop them. But we've SUCCESSFULLY interrogated two. Though I use the word SUCCESSFULLY as loosely as possible there."

Vickers nodded. "Sounds about right." He said. Then he pulled up his phone and retrieved the footage of his interview with Driscoll. "Well I talked to the tin can. And I figured we could compare notes. The Toolies are going over his suits logs. Trying to see what they can figure out in terms of location tracking and what not." He slid the phone across the desk and hit the play button.

While the King watched the video, only a little more than ten minutes when all was said and done, Vickers fished out an envelope with a letter inside. One that was eerily similar to the one he'd sent out a few months earlier.

"That all seems to line up." The King. "Albeit with what little we were capable of getting." He looked at the letter in Vickers' hands. "What's that?"

Vickers held it out and let the King take it.

"A chance to earn the Muck Marcher's loyalty... assuming it doesn't kill them." He said as the King read it over, his eyes widening as he did. "Plus it might earn a bit of favor with my government. And it would give us a hell of a weapon against the Agency. Driscoll wants to go scorched earth on em. Aaaaand I kinda wanna let him."

"This...." The King said as he waved the letter at Vickers. "This is a mighty large gamble. Chief Vickers. And you want me to allow this to happen with two of the people who almost killed my daughter? Who nearly killed the Arch Mage. Your own captain?"

Vickers held his hands up in mock surrender. "Never said it wasn't a risk. Plus, like I said, it'll probably kill em. And that's assuming it even works at all. That's why I didn't sign MY name to it."

King Farrick looked, and sure enough the signature block at the bottom was blank.

"I just figured it was an option. And if the Toolies can get us a location, a couple of wolfed up muck marchers with a bone to pick might be a mighty nice ace in the hole." Vickers said. "But I'll leave that decision to you."

The king looked back at the image on Vickers' phone one more time before sliding it back across from him. He couldn't deny the anger in Driscoll's eyes. And He'd already seen what the man could do with no idea what was going on and missing an arm.

"I'll consider it." He said firmly. "But I don't like the idea of THEM having the same kind of power you do." He left out the part where he barely liked Vickers having that power.

"That's all I'm asking sir." Vickers replied as he stood up and began making his way toward the door. "I'll keep you updated on the suit data."

\------------------------

Samantha walked through the hall nervously.

She was about halfway back to her "human" form now. But even still, she could hear and smell the people waiting in the room at the end of the hall waiting for them. The room marked "Conference Hall B". She kept glancing around nervously from within her hood, as if ensuring that Dr. Munro was still there. She was, and she smiled at Samantha each time she looked her way.

She stopped in her tracks as she got within a few feet of the door. Dr. Munro stopped as well.

"Is everything okay Samantha?" She asked.

"Is this..." She began. "Is this really a good idea?" She could tell that all the chatter inside the room had quieted, and knew that all eyes would be on her as soon as she entered. "Do you really think this is okay?"

Dr. Munro looked back and forth between her and the door a few times as she thought of what to say.

"They're like you." She said finally. "Some of them have embraced their change a little more easily. But they're all just as lost. Just as alone, even when they aren't. And all in need of someone they can ACTUALLY relate to."

Samantha couldn't deny that she felt alone. Even with the doctor helping her. With her father only a phone call away. With the hospital staff slowly but surely becoming more comfortable around her. She felt like she was on her own.

She stepped forward, grasped the door handle and pulled.

And as she stepped in eight sets of golden canine eyes just like hers looked toward her, and locked on her own. She felt the fur on her neck and back stand on end.

They all stayed that way for a moment. Then a large, slightly gray furred, wolf near the far end of the room spoke.

"You're the one that had the shield?" They asked in a slightly German accented voice. "The uh... Wonder Woman?"

She looked at Dr. Munro, though she kept the other werewolves in her peripheral vision almost on instinct. Dr. Munro nodded.

"I.... was." She said hesitantly.

The large gray wolf nodded at her answer. "Thank you for stopping the big one." He said after a moment. "Sorry you turned back."

Some of the other wolves, though not all of them, were nodding agreement.

"Thanks." She said, unsure of what else there was to say.

"Did...." A small wolf, that must have only been a young teen at most, asked from a few seats away from her. "Did that... God lady... talk to you too?" Behind the young girl were two people that Samantha assumed where her parents.

"Um.... yeah." Samantha admitted.

"She seemed mean." The young wolf said. "I didn't like her."

"Me neither." Samantha agreed. Then she pulled up the empty seat near her and sat down. "I guess you said no to what she told you to do?"

The young girl looked back at her parents. "My mom and dad said not to listen to people I don't know. Especially if they seem mean."

Samantha looked at the two parents and smiled.

"That's good." She said. Then she looked around at everyone else. "Did you all speak with her too?"

They all nodded and looked around at each other too.

"Well." She said after a moment. "SHE... whoever she was... wasn't the one that gave me the Wonder Woman powers."

Even the few werewolves who hadn't been taking part in the conversation up until that point, perked up at that.

"That was a different.... GOD." She finished.

The handful of other doctors in the room looked at Dr. Munro with raised eyebrows. She simply gestured for them to pay attention as the wolves began to talk in earnest. And she was happy to see how quickly Samantha was opening up compared to when she'd first woken back up in the hospital.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11dmsdw/wait_is_this_just_gate_319/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (317/?)

Previous

Writer's note: In the words of Al Green; How can you mend a broken heart? Lemme know if that link doesn't work.

Enjoy.

PS: This is the beginning of the honeymoon arc. Tragic as it may have started.

\~

Amina sat on one of the chairs on her sister's airship sipping tea, and watching James as he leaned against the railing on the far side of the deck staring off into the distance.

It had been three days since they had buried Joey in the graveyard near the castle. He'd been given a place of honor, and her father had promised that a fitting monument would be dedicated to him upon their return. But the ceremony itself had been simple. James and Vickers had worked to carry the casket from the castle to the graveyard.

There had been no large crowd. Her father had made no grand speech. James and Vickers had simply lowered the casket onto the straps made to lower it into its plot. Mrs. Choi had recounted a few stories about Joey, and how much he had loved being in the new world with everyone. Veliry talked about some of the brilliant advances in her research just by having ideas she wouldn't have. And told a funny story about how he'd almost lost a hand to a particularly rude carnivorous vine she'd been experimenting on, and how she'd used it as a lesson to be careful.

James opted not to say anything, assuring everyone that what he needed to say had already been said in private. And when the time had come, he and Vickers had simply cranked the wheels to lower Joey down.

Then James had taken it upon himself to cover it using his earth magic.

He'd left without a word, simply wheeling his mother back to the castle in silence. Her father and siblings, and the few other castle staff who had become friendly with him looked around at each other with mild confusion. But Amina had assured them that it was okay. That he simply needed time.

But she knew better.

She'd seen James at low points before. She'd seen him hurt physically until he was on the brink of death. But she knew this was different. And she knew that there wasn't much that could be done about it. This was no simple wound. Joey had been part of the foundation of her husband's life, and to have him gone was to have his entire world destabilized in a way that couldn't just be repaired. It was a wound that only time would close. Though it would never truly heal.

And it hurt her not to know what to do until then.

"He's not gettin' any better alone." Xarina said, startling her out of her thoughts.

Her younger sister staggered up, in her sailor's way, to the seat across from hers and sat down. Without prompting she uncorked the ceramic bottle she had in her hand and poured a splash of rich golden wine into the empty glasses on the table and slid one over.

"Thank you." Amina said, unsure of what else to say.

"Don't." Xarina replied. "Vatrian ship swill."

Amina sipped at the wine, and despite her sister's protests actually found it quite pleasant.

"He's hurt." Xarina said after a few silent moments. "Can't blame 'im."

Amina just nodded.

"Kinda thing that never stops hurtin'. Just stops doin it all day." Xarina added.

"I don't know what to do for him." Amina admitted. "The last time I lost anyone THAT important to me. I was only a child. And you were still a toddler."

"Aye. Mom." Xarina said. "I was too young to know much about it."

"The only one who wasn't was father. And maybe Alixan." She agreed. "For the rest of us it was just confusing and scary."

"What about your wolf friend?" Xarina asked. "You AND Al loved her."

"True." Amina agreed. "And there aren't many days where I don't miss her a bit. Also, how did you know about her and Alixan? Weren't you off at the mercantile academy when they had their fling?"

"Bah." Xarina scoffed. "Who do you think helped him get that wee bracelet he gave her for the lunar festival?"

Amina was taken aback a bit by that. She hadn't even known that that had been a gift. Though Kela had worn it happily and proudly for years. At least until she'd begun seeing Jurl.

"That was you...." She said with a small smile. "She loved that bracelet."

"Dwarven silver and tundra pearl." Xarina said with a grin. "It was a tall ask and it earned me good marks from the instructors to get it for as little as I did." She nodded a bit as she thought about the old memory. "How is your wolf friend dying different for you than his brother is for him?" She asked with a nod towards James.

Amina thought about that for a moment. How WAS it different? She hadn't even thought about it really.

"I don't know." Amina admitted. "Maybe because we were both soldiers. We were both kind of... I don't know... comfortable with the idea of dying in a fight."

"That aint it." Xarina said with a light tssk.

"It's not?" Amina asked.

"Well." Xarina said. "It's part of it. Sure. But not really. It's because you saw it coming."

"What?" Amina said with a tone of anger.

"You saw it coming." Xarina repeated. "I asked around about the whole thing. You and your wolf, you had a big fight right before... well... the fight. You knew what was coming. You knew it was the end." Amina was about to reply, to tell her she was wrong. "Plus. You knew that SOME day she would go down a different path from you. She was a mother and wife. Sooner or later her muzzle would get a bit grayer and she'd decide to settle down. And you'd still be a princess. You'd still be friends, sure. But she wouldn't be your shadow any more."

Amina stammered to silence. She had had that thought before. But it had always been far away. Years or decades away even.

"Sooner or later." Xarina continued. "You'd have fallen away. Still friends. Still seeing each other a few times a year. But.... Different. And you'd've seen it coming. It would've happened slow. As it is. You saw her death coming. Even if it was only by a few hours or so. And it still ate ya up."

Amina nodded as the memories of those days just after Kela's death came back to the forefront.

"But him." Xarina said, pointing at James. "He had no warning at all. And time or distance or whatever. NOT having a brother was never a possibility in his mind." She sipped from her wine a bit. "He was prepared to lose his mother to old age some day. And as a soldier he probably acknowledged that HE might die before his time. But not the little one. Nobody ever expects it of the younger ones."

She was reminded of the words James had said the few times she'd woken him up to try to feed him. His demands that it couldn't be real.

She tried to imagine what might have happened to her if any of her siblings had died unexpectedly. Especially Alixan, who she was closest to among them.

"So what do I do?" She asked. That was the golden question after all.

"What you can." Xarina replied. "I'm guessing that just being there will help."

"That's all?" Amina asked.

Xarina shrugged as she tossed back the last of her glass and reached for the bottle.

"Like you said. You don't know what to do. And I don't know him well enough to know what works for him." She tilted her head and grinned. "Maybe use a bit more tongue than usual. I don't know."

"Rina!" Amina said with a blush as she slapped her sister on the arm.

"Hey watch the wine now." Xarina said with a playful scowl. "It may be Vatrian deck polish but it's all we've got until we land."

The two of them sat like that for a moment. Then Xarina spoke up again.

"That wasn't just advice sister." She said nodding at James. "Go over there."

Amina stood up and walked over next to him. She hesitated as she got close and he looked over his shoulder at her. There was still so much sorrow on his face, just under the surface. But she finished the last few steps and leaned against the railing next to him. After a moment of not knowing what to do she placed her hand over his and he turned his over to grasp hers.

They stayed that way for a few moments before James spoke.

"Pep talk from your sister?" He asked.

"So obvious?" She asked back.

"She's loud." He said simply.

"Yes." Amina agreed with a quick glance back. "Yes she is."

There was another long silence.

"He woulda loved this." James said with a gesture at the ship wings beating beneath them, and the wide open view of the land below. "Real steampunk, Studio Ghibli type stuff."

She nodded, though she didn't know what either of those things were.

"Well then." She said. "You'll just have to see as much of it as you can for him."

He nodded as if in agreement. "Sorry about... the thing.... before I woke up. If I... If I hurt anyone. Or said anything that was... mean."

She shook her head. "You didn't." She said. "And you don't need to apologize. Not for any of that."

James smiled for just a moment. Then he leaned his head into her shoulder, and she placed her head on top of his.

"Thank you." He said softly. "For helping."

She didn't say anything, she just nodded against him.

And they stayed that way for a while.

\---------------

Vickers walked into the healing ward in as close to his full military uniform as he could manage with his new body. He had no weapons, or his shield. But he did have one of the numerous drones clamped to the Molle webbing on the front of his vest.

He nodded to the staff at the desk as he entered. Then he knocked on the door to the room Mrs. Choi was in. He checked in to see how she was doing and when she assured him that she was fine he nodded, told her to let him know if she needed anything, then went back to the task at hand.

He stepped into the small room that had been set up and put on the largest clean suit they had, removing the drone from his chest as he did, then holding it in hand once the sterilization process was complete. Even inflated all the way, the suit strained against his shoulders, and he had to hunch to keep from breaking the hood with his head. Plus the boots attached to it clearly weren't made with his feet in mind. Not that that surprised him.

Once the little light next to the door turned green he unzipped the inner door and stepped through, closing it behind him.

Then he pulled up one of the small rolling tray tables that normally held tools and medical equipment , and placed it in front of the target of today's task. He set the drone on top of it.

Driscoll stared at him through drug hazed eyes, a breathing tube was attached to a port in his neck and the machine it was attached to whirred with a soft hum.

Five was only a few yards away, in an induced coma.

"So." He said as he pulled up one of the stools that would have been small for him even when he was human, and leaned a knee against it. "Now that you're stable and things have..... quieted down... a bit. Tell me about the Agency."

Driscoll's eyes flashed with a rage that burned through the glassiness that the drugs had given them.

He took a deep breath, causing the machine to whir a bit louder for a few seconds. The vitals monitor grew erratic and began beeping, summoning the toolie currently on shift over to study it.

"What." Breath-whir. "Do you." Breath-whir. "Wanna know?" Breath-whir. "And will you." Breath-whir. "Let me join." Breath-Whir. "When you move on em?"

Vickers tapped on the drone with his finger, which he'd padded with a leather glove even before he'd put the suit on.

"Depends on what you say." He said.

Driscoll looked at the small drone and nodded.

"Whatever." Breath-whir. "Gets THE AGENCY... in." Breath-whir. "My sights."

Vickers leaned forward a bit.

"Right answer." He said.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/11ayvow/wait_is_this_just_gate_318/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (317/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: In the words of Al Green; How can you mend a broken heart? ^(Lemme know if that link doesn't work.)

Enjoy.

PS: This is the beginning of the honeymoon arc. Tragic as it may have started.

\~

Amina sat on one of the chairs on her sister's airship sipping tea, and watching James as he leaned against the railing on the far side of the deck staring off into the distance.

It had been three days since they had buried Joey in the graveyard near the castle. He'd been given a place of honor, and her father had promised that a fitting monument would be dedicated to him upon their return. But the ceremony itself had been simple. James and Vickers had worked to carry the casket from the castle to the graveyard.

There had been no large crowd. Her father had made no grand speech. James and Vickers had simply lowered the casket onto the straps made to lower it into its plot. Mrs. Choi had recounted a few stories about Joey, and how much he had loved being in the new world with everyone. Veliry talked about some of the brilliant advances in her research just by having ideas she wouldn't have. And told a funny story about how he'd almost lost a hand to a particularly rude carnivorous vine she'd been experimenting on, and how she'd used it as a lesson to be careful.

James opted not to say anything, assuring everyone that what he needed to say had already been said in private. And when the time had come, he and Vickers had simply cranked the wheels to lower Joey down.

Then James had taken it upon himself to cover it using his earth magic.

He'd left without a word, simply wheeling his mother back to the castle in silence. Her father and siblings, and the few other castle staff who had become friendly with him looked around at each other with mild confusion. But Amina had assured them that it was okay. That he simply needed time.

But she knew better.

She'd seen James at low points before. She'd seen him hurt physically until he was on the brink of death. But she knew this was different. And she knew that there wasn't much that could be done about it. This was no simple wound. Joey had been part of the foundation of her husband's life, and to have him gone was to have his entire world destabilized in a way that couldn't just be repaired. It was a wound that only time would close. Though it would never truly heal.

And it hurt her not to know what to do until then.

"He's not gettin' any better alone." Xarina said, startling her out of her thoughts.

Her younger sister staggered up, in her sailor's way, to the seat across from hers and sat down. Without prompting she uncorked the ceramic bottle she had in her hand and poured a splash of rich golden wine into the empty glasses on the table and slid one over.

"Thank you." Amina said, unsure of what else to say.

"Don't." Xarina replied. "Vatrian ship swill."

Amina sipped at the wine, and despite her sister's protests actually found it quite pleasant.

"He's hurt." Xarina said after a few silent moments. "Can't blame 'im."

Amina just nodded.

"Kinda thing that never stops hurtin'. Just stops doin it all day." Xarina added.

"I don't know what to do for him." Amina admitted. "The last time I lost anyone THAT important to me. I was only a child. And you were still a toddler."

"Aye. Mom." Xarina said. "I was too young to know much about it."

"The only one who wasn't was father. And maybe Alixan." She agreed. "For the rest of us it was just confusing and scary."

"What about your wolf friend?" Xarina asked. "You AND Al loved her."

"True." Amina agreed. "And there aren't many days where I don't miss her a bit. Also, how did you know about her and Alixan? Weren't you off at the mercantile academy when they had their fling?"

"Bah." Xarina scoffed. "Who do you think helped him get that wee bracelet he gave her for the lunar festival?"

Amina was taken aback a bit by that. She hadn't even known that that had been a gift. Though Kela had worn it happily and proudly for years. At least until she'd begun seeing Jurl.

"That was you...." She said with a small smile. "She loved that bracelet."

"Dwarven silver and tundra pearl." Xarina said with a grin. "It was a tall ask and it earned me good marks from the instructors to get it for as little as I did." She nodded a bit as she thought about the old memory. "How is your wolf friend dying different for you than his brother is for him?" She asked with a nod towards James.

Amina thought about that for a moment. How WAS it different? She hadn't even thought about it really.

"I don't know." Amina admitted. "Maybe because we were both soldiers. We were both kind of... I don't know... comfortable with the idea of dying in a fight."

"That aint it." Xarina said with a light tssk.

"It's not?" Amina asked.

"Well." Xarina said. "It's part of it. Sure. But not really. It's because you saw it coming."

"What?" Amina said with a tone of anger.

"You saw it coming." Xarina repeated. "I asked around about the whole thing. You and your wolf, you had a big fight right before... well... the fight. You knew what was coming. You knew it was the end." Amina was about to reply, to tell her she was wrong. "Plus. You knew that SOME day she would go down a different path from you. She was a mother and wife. Sooner or later her muzzle would get a bit grayer and she'd decide to settle down. And you'd still be a princess. You'd still be friends, sure. But she wouldn't be your shadow any more."

Amina stammered to silence. She had had that thought before. But it had always been far away. Years or decades away even.

"Sooner or later." Xarina continued. "You'd have fallen away. Still friends. Still seeing each other a few times a year. But.... Different. And you'd've seen it coming. It would've happened slow. As it is. You saw her death coming. Even if it was only by a few hours or so. And it still ate ya up."

Amina nodded as the memories of those days just after Kela's death came back to the forefront.

"But him." Xarina said, pointing at James. "He had no warning at all. And time or distance or whatever. NOT having a brother was never a possibility in his mind." She sipped from her wine a bit. "He was prepared to lose his mother to old age some day. And as a soldier he probably acknowledged that HE might die before his time. But not the little one. Nobody ever expects it of the younger ones."

She was reminded of the words James had said the few times she'd woken him up to try to feed him. His demands that it couldn't be real.

She tried to imagine what might have happened to her if any of her siblings had died unexpectedly. Especially Alixan, who she was closest to among them.

"So what do I do?" She asked. That was the golden question after all.

"What you can." Xarina replied. "I'm guessing that just being there will help."

"That's all?" Amina asked.

Xarina shrugged as she tossed back the last of her glass and reached for the bottle.

"Like you said. You don't know what to do. And I don't know him well enough to know what works for him." She tilted her head and grinned. "Maybe use a bit more tongue than usual. I don't know."

"Rina!" Amina said with a blush as she slapped her sister on the arm.

"Hey watch the wine now." Xarina said with a playful scowl. "It may be Vatrian deck polish but it's all we've got until we land."

The two of them sat like that for a moment. Then Xarina spoke up again.

"That wasn't just advice sister." She said nodding at James. "Go over there."

Amina stood up and walked over next to him. She hesitated as she got close and he looked over his shoulder at her. There was still so much sorrow on his face, just under the surface. But she finished the last few steps and leaned against the railing next to him. After a moment of not knowing what to do she placed her hand over his and he turned his over to grasp hers.

They stayed that way for a few moments before James spoke.

"Pep talk from your sister?" He asked.

"So obvious?" She asked back.

"She's loud." He said simply.

"Yes." Amina agreed with a quick glance back. "Yes she is."

There was another long silence.

"He woulda loved this." James said with a gesture at the ship wings beating beneath them, and the wide open view of the land below. "Real steampunk, Studio Ghibli type stuff."

She nodded, though she didn't know what either of those things were.

"Well then." She said. "You'll just have to see as much of it as you can for him."

He nodded as if in agreement. "Sorry about... the thing.... before I woke up. If I... If I hurt anyone. Or said anything that was... mean."

She shook her head. "You didn't." She said. "And you don't need to apologize. Not for any of that."

James smiled for just a moment. Then he leaned his head into her shoulder, and she placed her head on top of his.

"Thank you." He said softly. "For helping."

She didn't say anything, she just nodded against him.

And they stayed that way for a while.

\---------------

Vickers walked into the healing ward in as close to his full military uniform as he could manage with his new body. He had no weapons, or his shield. But he did have one of the numerous drones clamped to the Molle webbing on the front of his vest.

He nodded to the staff at the desk as he entered. Then he knocked on the door to the room Mrs. Choi was in. He checked in to see how she was doing and when she assured him that she was fine he nodded, told her to let him know if she needed anything, then went back to the task at hand.

He stepped into the small room that had been set up and put on the largest clean suit they had, removing the drone from his chest as he did, then holding it in hand once the sterilization process was complete. Even inflated all the way, the suit strained against his shoulders, and he had to hunch to keep from breaking the hood with his head. Plus the boots attached to it clearly weren't made with his feet in mind. Not that that surprised him.

Once the little light next to the door turned green he unzipped the inner door and stepped through, closing it behind him.

Then he pulled up one of the small rolling tray tables that normally held tools and medical equipment , and placed it in front of the target of today's task. He set the drone on top of it.

Driscoll stared at him through drug hazed eyes, a breathing tube was attached to a port in his neck and the machine it was attached to whirred with a soft hum.

Five was only a few yards away, in an induced coma.

"So." He said as he pulled up one of the stools that would have been small for him even when he was human, and leaned a knee against it. "Now that you're stable and things have..... quieted down... a bit. Tell me about the Agency."

Driscoll's eyes flashed with a rage that burned through the glassiness that the drugs had given them.

He took a deep breath, causing the machine to whir a bit louder for a few seconds. The vitals monitor grew erratic and began beeping, summoning the toolie currently on shift over to study it.

"What." Breath-whir. "Do you." Breath-whir. "Wanna know?" Breath-whir. "And will you." Breath-whir. "Let me join." Breath-Whir. "When you move on em?"

Vickers tapped on the drone with his finger, which he'd padded with a leather glove even before he'd put the suit on.

"Depends on what you say." He said.

Driscoll looked at the small drone and nodded.

"Whatever." Breath-whir. "Gets THE AGENCY... in." Breath-whir. "My sights."

Vickers leaned forward a bit.

"Right answer." He said.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/11ayszi/wait_is_this_just_gate_318/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (316/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look. Vickers has a backstory of his own.

Enjoy.

\~

James didn't sleep that night.

He tried. He lay in bed for hours, first on his back simply staring up at the canopy above their bed. Then he wrapped his arms around Amina and held her close, glad to have her warmth. When that didn't work he tried sleeping on his stomach, even going so far as to put a spare pillow over the back of his head to try to drown out any sound or light that might have been messing with him, not that there was much of that to do so.

When none of that worked he moved into the bathroom and closed the door. He did push-ups, and sit-ups, and squats, and anything else he could think of to burn off energy. But when all was said and done, and when he was sitting with his bare back against the cool stone of the wall and coated in sweat, he had to admit to himself that he just wasn't going to be able to sleep any time soon.

So he opted to do something productive instead.

He lit a small candle on the table in the corner of their room, laid out a large roll of suede that he kept in his bottomless bag, and then laid his rifle and pistol on top of it, along with a few bottles of cleaning solution and gun oil. Hoppe's no 9. Just like he liked.

Then he spent the last hour or so before dawn silently clearing, disassembling, and cleaning the two weapons. The rifle especially needed it. He'd taken Vickers' lead during the fight and opened up on the entity with it as he'd flown. He only had a mag and a half of ammo left in it before it had ended. He'd need to reload those later.

For now he stripped it down to its base components, using the small multitool that the army had issued him when he'd first gotten to his unit. There was copper build up in the chamber that he chipped away at with the screwdriver attachment until he could see the steel beneath. These damn rifles always had an issue with that.

When the rifle was finished, oiled and shining and smooth as glass when he slowly cycled it through its action, he moved onto the pistol. He hadn't used it during the fight. But he also couldn't remember the last time he'd cleaned it either. Probably a few weeks at least. So he depressed the slide release and popped it apart. A few minutes of wiping and applying oil, which he knew for a fact he could do blind folded thanks to Batty, and it was cleaned too.

Finally he pulled his Colt out.

He hadn't had a chance to fire it yet. And he knew from his initial inspection that it had the oil from the manufacturer on it still. But he wanted to familiarize himself with the massive hand cannon. He found that cleaning it was remarkably easy, at least until he was able to watch a video and figure out how to fully disassemble it properly. It gleamed in the light of the small candle he'd lit, and the crack of pre-dawn light coming through the window near the desk.

When he snapped the cylinder in place, slowly and deliberately and not while it was spinning like they do in the movies, he held it up and out at arms length. He'd never fire it like that if he had to use it in a fight. Doing so was terrible for recoil management, and simply not good for aim in the first place. But he couldn't help but do it. He felt like a cowboy or something.

And he couldn't help but think that Joey would have compared him to some detective from an anime show or something if he'd seen him do it. Maybe Spike from Cowboy Bebop. They'd both thought that one was stylish and cool. Or maybe he'd just ask James if he was his huckleberry.

The thought brought James's mood back down as he pulled the weapon back in and rested it in his hands on his lap and inspected it. He set the revolver back on the table and rested his face in his hands for a moment.

He sat that way for several minutes, then stood up, threw on a shirt and shorts, and went to see if there was any breakfast ready in the dining hall. If not he'd simply grab himself and Amina some coffee.

He was thankful for the quiet as he walked. The castle staff, it seemed, had not quite gotten into full swing for the day. The downside was that he became doubtful about a breakfast being available.

And of all the people, he ran into Vickers on his way.

The large, dark furred, were-jaguar Navy SEAL was passing through an intersection when they saw each other. James nodded, curious about why he was here at this hour. But then again, he shouldn't have been awake either. Vickers raised an eyebrow, and then fell into step beside him on the way to the dining hall.

"Can't sleep?" He asked.

James looked at him for a moment. "No." He said simply. "You?"

"Just seeing Atrafar off." Vickers replied casually. "She's got to go gather the Council Elder and the others that came with them for the conversion process. Then get their wagon ready and get on the road. So, an early morning."

James just nodded. That made sense.

"No jokes about cats and dogs lying together?" Vickers asked curiously.

"Too easy." James replied. "Besides, I figure the cat litter and the fish covered the jokes for a few more weeks."

"Jokes on you." Vickers said as he opened the door to the dining hall and let James through. "That fish was delicious."

James's face scrunched up a bit. "It was uncooked." He said. "Like... uncooked uncooked. Fresh from the river."

Vickers shrugged. "Yeah well. The taste-buds are under new management."

Sure enough as they entered they saw no food steaming at the serving counter just yet. The large pot of hot water was already warming on its enchanted plate though, and the glass carafe that James had had commissioned was sitting next to it with a large glass jar of ground coffee next to that.

"Coffee?" He asked as he walked up to the setup.

"Gladly." Vickers answered as he sat down at one of the tables.

They stayed silent for a few minutes as James filled the carafe with grounds, then steaming hot water. He placed the small metal cover over the spout, prepping it to filter the grounds out when he poured.

"I had a nephew." Vickers said, breaking the silence. James looked back for a moment.

"Yeah?"

Vickers nodded, not that James could see it.

"Yeah..... Antonio. Named in honor of his Great Grandfather, just like me." James turned and leaned against the counter next to the coffee setup as the SEAL stared off into the distance. "He uh.... He and his dad- my brother. They uh. They lived down in Florida."

And suddenly James saw where the conversation was going.

"My brother was a piece of shit." Vickers said flatly, without emotion. "A druggy and a damn liar. Stole mom's jewelry when she died." He paused, taking a deep breath as he remembered a past that, until now James had never heard a peep of. "But he did one decent thing in his life. And that was help make a damned good kid with his ex wife."

"I'm guessing they got um..." James began, not sure how to ask the question.

"One of them Russian gas tanker kamikazes." Vickers said before it had a chance to get awkward. "Not the initial hit. But the gas cloud after. The cloud from the Clearwater hit."

James nodded as he tasted a spoon of the coffee, not quite strong enough yet.

"I loved that little ginger fuzzball." Vickers said. He held his hands up around his head. "Had this big ole red afro. Wouldn't let his mom cut it off.... I used to visit them whenever I had a chance on holidays. Make up for my brother's absence you know. Send him stuff on Christmas and his birthday."

"Sounds nice." James said. "Sorry bout what happened."

"Thanks." Vickers said with a slight nod. "I used to hate my brother for leaving those two out to dry like that." He said. "Then one day I got done with a mission in the China Sea, and when I got back to base after there was a Red Cross message waiting for me."

James nodded. Every service member knew what that meant.

"Wasn't even for Tony." Vickers said with a hint of anger. "It was for his shit-bag father."

James tilted his head at that.

"See. Tony wasn't my next of kin. And he had his mom's last name so he wouldn't be on any Red Cross message for me. But my brother was. They told me what had happened, and that I should check the news if I wanted more info on it. But I knew that if it had caught Mickey, and was as big as they said. Then it meant that Tony and his ma were gone too. And sure enough, when I confirmed later, I was right."

James had heard a lot of stories like it. They'd become all too common after the Water War.

"And you know." Vickers continued, and James thought he heard a quiver in the usually stoic operator's voice, though it was slight. "As much as I was torn up over the little puffball. I knew that whatever had happened he'd been with his mom. But I couldn't get over the fact that my little bro had probably died alone and scared.... He'd burned every bridge he'd ever crossed, and a few besides. And as far as I was concerned he shoulda been in prison. But I just couldn't NOT wish that I'd been there to help him. Even if it had killed me too."

James turned and focused on pouring the three cups of coffee. His jaw clenched as he fought not to let his own tears out.

"I cried like a little bitch." Vickers said. "I cried until the boys on my team could pick me up and get me hauled back to our racks and into a bed. They pulled me off mission for three months while I settled affairs, not that there were many for him, and I saw a doc about it."

James turned and quickly handed the cup of coffee to the large man, turning back just as quickly so he could look away again.

"I can't even imagine how much worse it woulda been for me if he and I had actually been close." Vickers said. "So I can't even imagine what you and your ma are goin' through."

The two of them stood there for a few moments in awkward silence as James mixed some cream into his coffee, and put some cream and sugar in Amina's.

"Look. I'm sorry if you don't exactly wanna hear that." Vickers said with a hint of shame. "I just... I don't know man. Just... don't feel like you gotta rush back into this hero business or nothin', you know? Take your time."

James just sighed.

"Thanks man." He said as he turned around and moved toward the door. "Just do me a favor and give that memo to the agency and all the gods and... I don't know... whoever the fuck else wants to shit all over me next."

Then he walked out, leaving the somewhat befuddled jaguar man sitting at the table he'd set up at.

He knew he'd have to apologize for that later. It had been rude. Vickers had just been trying to help him out.

But he just didn't have the energy for any of that right now. He just felt drained. And somehow he knew that the coffee wasn't going to do anything for it. But, he'd at least give it its chance.

And when he got back to the room he was surprised, pleasantly so, to find Amina up and waiting for him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1151el4/wait_is_this_just_gate_317/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (316/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look. Vickers has a backstory of his own.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

When none of that worked he moved into the bathroom and closed the door. He did push-ups, and sit-ups, and squats, and anything else he could think of to burn off energy. But when all was said and done, and when he was sitting with his bare back against the cool stone of the wall and coated in sweat, he had to admit to himself that he just wasn't going to be able to sleep any time soon.

So he opted to do something productive instead.

He lit a small candle on the table in the corner of their room, laid out a large roll of suede that he kept in his bottomless bag, and then laid his rifle and pistol on top of it, along with a few bottles of cleaning solution and gun oil. Hoppe's no 9. Just like he liked.

Then he spent the last hour or so before dawn silently clearing, disassembling, and cleaning the two weapons. The rifle especially needed it. He'd taken Vickers' lead during the fight and opened up on the entity with it as he'd flown. He only had a mag and a half of ammo left in it before it had ended. He'd need to reload those later.

For now he stripped it down to its base components, using the small multitool that the army had issued him when he'd first gotten to his unit. There was copper build up in the chamber that he chipped away at with the screwdriver attachment until he could see the steel beneath. These damn rifles always had an issue with that.

When the rifle was finished, oiled and shining and smooth as glass when he slowly cycled it through its action, he moved onto the pistol. He hadn't used it during the fight. But he also couldn't remember the last time he'd cleaned it either. Probably a few weeks at least. So he depressed the slide release and popped it apart. A few minutes of wiping and applying oil, which he knew for a fact he could do blind folded thanks to Batty, and it was cleaned too.

Finally he pulled his Colt out.

He hadn't had a chance to fire it yet. And he knew from his initial inspection that it had the oil from the manufacturer on it still. But he wanted to familiarize himself with the massive hand cannon. He found that cleaning it was remarkably easy, at least until he was able to watch a video and figure out how to fully disassemble it properly. It gleamed in the light of the small candle he'd lit, and the crack of pre-dawn light coming through the window near the desk.

When he snapped the cylinder in place, slowly and deliberately and not while it was spinning like they do in the movies, he held it up and out at arms length. He'd never fire it like that if he had to use it in a fight. Doing so was terrible for recoil management, and simply not good for aim in the first place. But he couldn't help but do it. He felt like a cowboy or something.

And he couldn't help but think that Joey would have compared him to some detective from an anime show or something if he'd seen him do it. Maybe

Spike from Cowboy Bebop. They'd both thought that one was stylish and cool. Or maybe he'd just ask James if he was his huckleberry.

The thought brought James's mood back down as he pulled the weapon back in and rested it in his hands on his lap and inspected it. He set the revolver back on the table and rested his face in his hands for a moment.

He sat that way for several minutes, then stood up, threw on a shirt and shorts, and went to see if there was any breakfast ready in the dining hall. If not he'd simply grab himself and Amina some coffee.

He was thankful for the quiet as he walked. The castle staff, it seemed, had not quite gotten into full swing for the day. The downside was that he became doubtful about a breakfast being available.

And of all the people, he ran into Vickers on his way.

The large, dark furred, were-jaguar Navy SEAL was passing through an intersection when they saw each other. James nodded, curious about why he was here at this hour. But then again, he shouldn't have been awake either. Vickers raised an eyebrow, and then fell into step beside him on the way to the dining hall.

"Can't sleep?" He asked.

James looked at him for a moment. "No." He said simply. "You?"

"Just seeing Atrafar off." Vickers replied casually. "She's got to go gather the Council Elder and the others that came with them for the conversion process. Then get their wagon ready and get on the road. So, an early morning."

James just nodded. That made sense.

"No jokes about cats and dogs lying together?" Vickers asked curiously.

"Too easy." James replied. "Besides, I figure the cat litter and the fish covered the jokes for a few more weeks."

"Jokes on you." Vickers said as he opened the door to the dining hall and let James through. "That fish was delicious."

James's face scrunched up a bit. "It was uncooked." He said. "Like... uncooked uncooked. Fresh from the river."

Vickers shrugged. "Yeah well. The taste-buds are under new management."

Sure enough as they entered they saw no food steaming at the serving counter just yet. The large pot of hot water was already warming on its enchanted plate though, and the glass carafe that James had had commissioned was sitting next to it with a large glass jar of ground coffee next to that.

"Coffee?" He asked as he walked up to the setup.

"Gladly." Vickers answered as he sat down at one of the tables.

They stayed silent for a few minutes as James filled the carafe with grounds, then steaming hot water. He placed the small metal cover over the spout, prepping it to filter the grounds out when he poured.

"I had a nephew." Vickers said, breaking the silence. James looked back for a moment.

"Yeah?"

Vickers nodded, not that James could see it.

"Yeah..... Antonio. Named in honor of his Great Grandfather, just like me." James turned and leaned against the counter next to the coffee setup as the SEAL stared off into the distance. "He uh.... He and his dad- my brother. They uh. They lived down in Florida."

And suddenly James saw where the conversation was going.

"My brother was a piece of shit." Vickers said flatly, without emotion. "A druggy and a damn liar. Stole mom's jewelry when she died." He paused, taking a deep breath as he remembered a past that, until now James had never heard a peep of. "But he did one decent thing in his life. And that was help make a damned good kid with his ex wife."

"I'm guessing they got um..." James began, not sure how to ask the question.

"One of them Russian gas tanker kamikazes." Vickers said before it had a chance to get awkward. "Not the initial hit. But the gas cloud after. The cloud from the Clearwater hit."

James nodded as he tasted a spoon of the coffee, not quite strong enough yet.

"I loved that little ginger fuzzball." Vickers said. He held his hands up around his head. "Had this big ole red afro. Wouldn't let his mom cut it off.... I used to visit them whenever I had a chance on holidays. Make up for my brother's absence you know. Send him stuff on Christmas and his birthday."

"Sounds nice." James said. "Sorry bout what happened."

"Thanks." Vickers said with a slight nod. "I used to hate my brother for leaving those two out to dry like that." He said. "Then one day I got done with a mission in the China Sea, and when I got back to base after there was a Red Cross message waiting for me."

James nodded. Every service member knew what that meant.

"Wasn't even for Tony." Vickers said with a hint of anger. "It was for his shit-bag father."

James tilted his head at that.

"See. Tony wasn't my next of kin. And he had his mom's last name so he wouldn't be on any Red Cross message for me. But my brother was. They told me what had happened, and that I should check the news if I wanted more info on it. But I knew that if it had caught Mickey, and was as big as they said. Then it meant that Tony and his ma were gone too. And sure enough, when I confirmed later, I was right."

James had heard a lot of stories like it. They'd become all too common after the Water War.

"And you know." Vickers continued, and James thought he heard a quiver in the usually stoic operator's voice, though it was slight. "As much as I was torn up over the little puffball. I knew that whatever had happened he'd been with his mom. But I couldn't get over the fact that my little bro had probably died alone and scared.... He'd burned every bridge he'd ever crossed, and a few besides. And as far as I was concerned he shoulda been in prison. But I just couldn't NOT wish that I'd been there to help him. Even if it had killed me too."

James turned and focused on pouring the three cups of coffee. His jaw clenched as he fought not to let his own tears out.

"I cried like a little bitch." Vickers said. "I cried until the boys on my team could pick me up and get me hauled back to our racks and into a bed. They pulled me off mission for three months while I settled affairs, not that there were many for him, and I saw a doc about it."

James turned and quickly handed the cup of coffee to the large man, turning back just as quickly so he could look away again.

"I can't even imagine how much worse it woulda been for me if he and I had actually been close." Vickers said. "So I can't even imagine what you and your ma are goin' through."

The two of them stood there for a few moments in awkward silence as James mixed some cream into his coffee, and put some cream and sugar in Amina's.

"Look. I'm sorry if you don't exactly wanna hear that." Vickers said with a hint of shame. "I just... I don't know man. Just... don't feel like you gotta rush back into this hero business or nothin', you know? Take your time."

James just sighed.

"Thanks man." He said as he turned around and moved toward the door. "Just do me a favor and give that memo to the agency and all the gods and... I don't know... whoever the fuck else wants to shit all over me next."

Then he walked out, leaving the somewhat befuddled jaguar man sitting at the table he'd set up at.

He knew he'd have to apologize for that later. It had been rude. Vickers had just been trying to help him out.

But he just didn't have the energy for any of that right now. He just felt drained. And somehow he knew that the coffee wasn't going to do anything for it. But, he'd at least give it its chance.

And when he got back to the room he was surprised, pleasantly so, to find Amina up and waiting for him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1151ctm/wait_is_this_just_gate_317/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (315/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yes. I know the transition between last chapters two sections was a bit whiplash inducing. Like I said; I needed some levity. The feels have been too strong lately. And now I have to make it all sad again.

Oh yeah, you also learn a bit about the rest of the world.

FUCKING ENJOY!!!!

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Mister Batista." The King said as he shuffled through the papers. "How are your compatriots doing with adjusting to their new lives?"

Batty pulled up the notes he'd taken on the spare tablet that he'd been given to help with the task of keeping an eye on the "civilian" personnel that had been conditionally released after the desert battle.

"Um. They are doing well sir." He replied as he checked the notes. "Some minor complaints. Basic stuff that I've already forwarded to your staff. A few of the scientists are asking for permission to have some of their equipment to study the plant life they've seen around the castle. I've checked, nothing that would be a threat." He assured the King, who had cocked an eyebrow at the request. "Mostly just analysis gear. Other than that life goes on." He cringed a bit as he said the last sentence.

King Farrick simply nodded. "I'll approve what I can." He said. "How are YOU doing?" He asked.

"I'm good sir." Batty replied with a bit more cheer in his voice. "The quarters you've provided are more than enough for me." He stood and made a show of twisting and bending forward a bit. "Stomach is all good now."

"Glad to hear." The King said with a smile. "But what I meant was; how are you doing with the news about the Chois?"

Batty's smile fled quickly as he bit his lip a bit and nodded.

"It's rough." He admitted. "I checked on Mrs. Choi. She's doing okay. You know... relatively. Haven't been able to get to Jim just yet. I guess he was pretty tore up.... understandably."

"Well." The King began. "I was told that he's up and moving again. Maybe check up on him in the morning. I know I will."

Batty nodded. "Yes sir. Thanks for letting me know." Then he sat back down and listened in as the King turned to the other people present.

He turned to one of the soldiers who had a small bird's crest engraved into their pauldron.

"News?" He asked simply.

The soldier stood up with a nod. "Aye your majesty." He replied eagerly. "You already know that General Sigbert has reported the blighted area being clear." He said. The King nodded with a small wave of his hand telling the man to keep going. "News from the scouts following the Blight Entity's path through the southern lands found what they think was a blight zone in the mountains. Or, barring that, the area where the beast emerged. Several mountains have disappeared with minimal signs of debris left behind."

He moved forward, unrolling a map that he'd brought with him and placing it on the King's desk. It showed the land in question, with several large markings that mocked up the damage it had done to the Druid forest and several more for where it had destroyed the small villages and drained the lake. The area that the soldier indicated for the mountains showed large X-marks through several of the mountains.

"They sent griffin parties over the fallen mountains, careful not to fly into any patches if there were any of course, and could see no sign of further destruction beyond the range." He shrugged aand shook his head a bit. "But there were also no blight patches either."

"And what of our neighbors?" The King prodded. "We knew there was one patch beyond the Krag. And also in your husband's homeland Ferria."

Princess Ferria stood up and bowed, much to Her brother and sister's dismay as they each rolled their eyes.

"Tanier received word late yesterday that the most heavily monitored affected area in Vatria has likewise been emptied of its blight." She said. "The scholars studying it at the time. Some of whom were killed by what happened unfortunately, witnessed the blight accelerating southwest, and downward, at a rapid rate before disappearing into the ground." She tilted her head a bit. "They are currently dealing with several incursions from the Deep Dark as a result of the tunnels that the event created. And three scholars were in the paths of the anomalies when they began moving."

Everyone bristled at that. They all knew what happened to people who disappeared into the blight. Or at least the ones before the battle of Jadesport.

"And to the south?" The King asked.

Alixan stood and nodded. "Our spies in the south have reported increased agitation among the zealots around the area where their patch was. Unfortunately they've also increased their military presence there as a result so we haven't gotten eyes on just yet." He shrugged and grinned. "But I have faith in our people. And if Tanier's message is true then it makes sense. They'd likely be dealing with their own paths to the Dark. And they hate that place."

"And the Orkkrag?" The King prompted.

"The Chieftan hasn't reported anything. Though it's entirely possible that that is a simple result of the miasma being thick this time of year. Visibility is low." The prince replied.

"Well than, until we get reports in from our other ambassadors and agents, we shall have to ASSUME that the younger Choi has saved us all." The King said solemnly. He left out the part where their countries natural order might begin to fray. Nor did he mention the fact that Veliry had hinted at the salvation only being temporary. But that was a problem for later.

"We shall have to build him a monument." Marcos said from where he sat nearby.

Several of the people in the room murmured their agreement.

"In time." The King said with a small nod. "The Chois are heartbroken, and in mourning. We can come up with something once they've had time to mend their hearts a bit."

Everyone went silent at that.

After a moment he spoke up again. "In the mean time, young mister Choi and Arch Mage Veliry discovered a method of transiting between two locations near instantaneously. There's still some refining and experimenting to do. But I'd like to set up a location where we can use it to transport important people and materials between the different cities of the country." He turned to Ferria. "Let your husband know that we've outdone his flying canoes." He said with a mischievous grin.

Ferria rolled her eyes and sighed. "He's going to be livid." She said in response.

\----------

When James finally emerged from the room where they'd stored Joey's body, it was already nearing dawn. He also saw Amina sitting in one of the chairs typically reserved for the people that came down here to tend to the dead. She was snoring a little as her head leaned back against the wall.

He hadn't intended to take so long. But when he'd first entered the room and seen his brother's body on the wooden table that was enchanted to preserve it and keep it cold, he'd frozen.

His brother had been taken by the blight. Had also been infused with a good chunk of the druidic power of the Five after using the tendrils of blight to fuse Veliry's antlers with his own skull. Had undergone some kind of magical detonation that expelled both powers, and his soul, or something like it anyways. And then had fallen several thousand feet before Prince Alixan had managed to catch him at the last second.

And yet when James had first walked in, he almost could have believed that Joey had just fallen asleep on an oddly glowing table.

He'd approached slowly, as if he thought he might wake him from the sleep, and when he'd touched his brother's shoulder he'd been reminded of the reality.

Joey's body had been so cold. Almost cold enough to freeze, though not quite.

He'd pulled up one of the stools tucked under the table and sat down, taking Joey's hand as he did and holding it in both of his.

He'd looked up and away from his little brother as he'd gathered himself. He'd struggled, and failed, to hold his tears back as he finally spoke.

"Mom always used to tell me how much you looked up to me." He'd began. "How... I was your hero. She told me one time- and I hadn't even realized it until she said it, but she told me.... that any time you were in trouble.... or scared.... I.... was the first person you went to for help. Not her. And not dad, though I guess you were too young when he went away for that one to count." He paused as he wiped his eyes with one hand, not letting go with the other. He shook his head a bit as he continued. "I never got a chance to tell her.....To tell you.... That you were mine."

He'd wanted to tell Joey that for years. But brotherly rivalry, and simple emotional ignorance, had kept it from happening. And now it was too late.

"The hardest part of joining the Army wasn't basic training." He continued. "It wasn't shaving every day. Or staying in shape or anything." He squeezed the cold hand that was in his. "It was knowing that it would probably upset you. That... That I wouldn't be there to be that safety net for you anymore." He took a deep breath. "But I also knew that you NEEDED that to grow. I'd watched.... Every time I helped you learn something you were struggling with. Or helped you figure out how to recognize a social cue... I saw you Jojo. I saw you trying SO hard... to move forward."

He paused to catch his breath, and suck in some of the snot that was slowly dripping from his nose.

"And you were my hero." He said, knowing that it was years later than it should have been. He nodded as he looked over at his brothers face and reached to tousle his hair one last time.

"And now you're everyone else's too." He nodded and looked up, as if looking at the sky where his brother's soul, his essence, wrestled with a power that was so far beyond him it was laughable.

"I know you can do it." He said to nobody present. "I.... KNOW.... you can do it."

Then he looked down and rested his head against his brother's chest.

"Please do it." He said softly, almost in a whisper.

And he'd stayed that way for a long time before he could summon the strength to release the hand and leave the room.

He'd turned at the last moment and looked back for just a second.

But he didn't say it.

Wherever he was out there. James was certain that his brother knew, just how much he and their mother loved him. And how much they would keep loving him. No matter what happened.

Then he'd stepped out the door.

There was no feeling of gathering strength. No sense of relief. Nothing that would require a swell of emotional music in a movie.

It was simply a grieving brother stepping through a door and closing it behind him.

James was the only one who might have perceived any change.

Because to him, everything seemed just a bit less bright.

Then he scooped up his new wife in his arms, and walked her through the castle to their room so they could get some actual proper, restful, sleep.

And he tried not to think of how closely the sensation of carrying her reminded him of how he'd carried his brother.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/1145sfi/wait_is_this_just_gate_316/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (315/?)

Previous (mildly NSFW) / First

Writer's note: Yes. I know the transition between last chapters two sections was a bit whiplash inducing. Like I said; I needed some levity. The feels have been too strong lately. And now I have to make it all sad again.

Oh yeah, you also learn a bit about the rest of the world.

FUCKING ENJOY!!!!

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"Mister Batista." The King said as he shuffled through the papers. "How are your compatriots doing with adjusting to their new lives?"

Batty pulled up the notes he'd taken on the spare tablet that he'd been given to help with the task of keeping an eye on the "civilian" personnel that had been conditionally released after the desert battle.

"Um. They are doing well sir." He replied as he checked the notes. "Some minor complaints. Basic stuff that I've already forwarded to your staff. A few of the scientists are asking for permission to have some of their equipment to study the plant life they've seen around the castle. I've checked, nothing that would be a threat." He assured the King, who had cocked an eyebrow at the request. "Mostly just analysis gear. Other than that life goes on." He cringed a bit as he said the last sentence.

King Farrick simply nodded. "I'll approve what I can." He said. "How are YOU doing?" He asked.

"I'm good sir." Batty replied with a bit more cheer in his voice. "The quarters you've provided are more than enough for me." He stood and made a show of twisting and bending forward a bit. "Stomach is all good now."

"Glad to hear." The King said with a smile. "But what I meant was; how are you doing with the news about the Chois?"

Batty's smile fled quickly as he bit his lip a bit and nodded.

"It's rough." He admitted. "I checked on Mrs. Choi. She's doing okay. You know... relatively. Haven't been able to get to Jim just yet. I guess he was pretty tore up.... understandably."

"Well." The King began. "I was told that he's up and moving again. Maybe check up on him in the morning. I know I will."

Batty nodded. "Yes sir. Thanks for letting me know." Then he sat back down and listened in as the King turned to the other people present.

He turned to one of the soldiers who had a small bird's crest engraved into their pauldron.

"News?" He asked simply.

The soldier stood up with a nod. "Aye your majesty." He replied eagerly. "You already know that General Sigbert has reported the blighted area being clear." He said. The King nodded with a small wave of his hand telling the man to keep going. "News from the scouts following the Blight Entity's path through the southern lands found what they think was a blight zone in the mountains. Or, barring that, the area where the beast emerged. Several mountains have disappeared with minimal signs of debris left behind."

He moved forward, unrolling a map that he'd brought with him and placing it on the King's desk. It showed the land in question, with several large markings that mocked up the damage it had done to the Druid forest and several more for where it had destroyed the small villages and drained the lake. The area that the soldier indicated for the mountains showed large X-marks through several of the mountains.

"They sent griffin parties over the fallen mountains, careful not to fly into any patches if there were any of course, and could see no sign of further destruction beyond the range." He shrugged aand shook his head a bit. "But there were also no blight patches either."

"And what of our neighbors?" The King prodded. "We knew there was one patch beyond the Krag. And also in your husband's homeland Ferria."

Princess Ferria stood up and bowed, much to Her brother and sister's dismay as they each rolled their eyes.

"Tanier received word late yesterday that the most heavily monitored affected area in Vatria has likewise been emptied of its blight." She said. "The scholars studying it at the time. Some of whom were killed by what happened unfortunately, witnessed the blight accelerating southwest, and downward, at a rapid rate before disappearing into the ground." She tilted her head a bit. "They are currently dealing with several incursions from the Deep Dark as a result of the tunnels that the event created. And three scholars were in the paths of the anomalies when they began moving."

Everyone bristled at that. They all knew what happened to people who disappeared into the blight. Or at least the ones before the battle of Jadesport.

"And to the south?" The King asked.

Alixan stood and nodded. "Our spies in the south have reported increased agitation among the zealots around the area where their patch was. Unfortunately they've also increased their military presence there as a result so we haven't gotten eyes on just yet." He shrugged and grinned. "But I have faith in our people. And if Tanier's message is true then it makes sense. They'd likely be dealing with their own paths to the Dark. And they hate that place."

"And the Orkkrag?" The King prompted.

"The Chieftan hasn't reported anything. Though it's entirely possible that that is a simple result of the miasma being thick this time of year. Visibility is low." The prince replied.

"Well than, until we get reports in from our other ambassadors and agents, we shall have to ASSUME that the younger Choi has saved us all." The King said solemnly. He left out the part where their countries natural order might begin to fray. Nor did he mention the fact that Veliry had hinted at the salvation only being temporary. But that was a problem for later.

"We shall have to build him a monument." Marcos said from where he sat nearby.

Several of the people in the room murmured their agreement.

"In time." The King said with a small nod. "The Chois are heartbroken, and in mourning. We can come up with something once they've had time to mend their hearts a bit."

Everyone went silent at that.

After a moment he spoke up again. "In the mean time, young mister Choi and Arch Mage Veliry discovered a method of transiting between two locations near instantaneously. There's still some refining and experimenting to do. But I'd like to set up a location where we can use it to transport important people and materials between the different cities of the country." He turned to Ferria. "Let your husband know that we've outdone his flying canoes." He said with a mischievous grin.

Ferria rolled her eyes and sighed. "He's going to be livid." She said in response.

\--------------------

When James finally emerged from the room where they'd stored Joey's body, it was already nearing dawn. He also saw Amina sitting in one of the chairs typically reserved for the people that came down here to tend to the dead. She was snoring a little as her head leaned back against the wall.

He hadn't intended to take so long. But when he'd first entered the room and seen his brother's body on the wooden table that was enchanted to preserve it and keep it cold, he'd frozen.

His brother had been taken by the blight. Had also been infused with a good chunk of the druidic power of the Five after using the tendrils of blight to fuse Veliry's antlers with his own skull. Had undergone some kind of magical detonation that expelled both powers, and his soul, or something like it anyways. And then had fallen several thousand feet before Prince Alixan had managed to catch him at the last second.

And yet when James had first walked in, he almost could have believed that Joey had just fallen asleep on an oddly glowing table.

He'd approached slowly, as if he thought he might wake him from the sleep, and when he'd touched his brother's shoulder he'd been reminded of the reality.

Joey's body had been so cold. Almost cold enough to freeze, though not quite.

He'd pulled up one of the stools tucked under the table and sat down, taking Joey's hand as he did and holding it in both of his.

He'd looked up and away from his little brother as he'd gathered himself. He'd struggled, and failed, to hold his tears back as he finally spoke.

"Mom always used to tell me how much you looked up to me." He'd began. "How... I was your hero. She told me one time- and I hadn't even realized it until she said it, but she told me.... that any time you were in trouble.... or scared.... I.... was the first person you went to for help. Not her. And not dad, though I guess you were too young when he went away for that one to count." He paused as he wiped his eyes with one hand, not letting go with the other. He shook his head a bit as he continued. "I never got a chance to tell her.....To tell you.... That you were mine."

He'd wanted to tell Joey that for years. But brotherly rivalry, and simple emotional ignorance, had kept it from happening. And now it was too late.

"The hardest part of joining the Army wasn't basic training." He continued. "It wasn't shaving every day. Or staying in shape or anything." He squeezed the cold hand that was in his. "It was knowing that it would probably upset you. That... That I wouldn't be there to be that safety net for you anymore." He took a deep breath. "But I also knew that you NEEDED that to grow. I'd watched.... Every time I helped you learn something you were struggling with. Or helped you figure out how to recognize a social cue... I saw you Jojo. I saw you trying SO hard... to move forward."

He paused to catch his breath, and suck in some of the snot that was slowly dripping from his nose.

"And you were my hero." He said, knowing that it was years later than it should have been. He nodded as he looked over at his brothers face and reached to tousle his hair one last time.

"And now you're everyone else's too." He nodded and looked up, as if looking at the sky where his brother's soul, his essence, wrestled with a power that was so far beyond him it was laughable.

"I know you can do it." He said to nobody present. "I.... KNOW.... you can do it."

Then he looked down and rested his head against his brother's chest.

"Please do it." He said softly, almost in a whisper.

And he'd stayed that way for a long time before he could summon the strength to release the hand and leave the room.

He'd turned at the last moment and looked back for just a second.

But he didn't say it.

Wherever he was out there. James was certain that his brother knew, just how much he and their mother loved him. And how much they would keep loving him. No matter what happened.

Then he'd stepped out the door.

There was no feeling of gathering strength. No sense of relief. Nothing that would require a swell of emotional music in a movie.

It was simply a grieving brother stepping through a door and closing it behind him.

James was the only one who might have perceived any change.

Because to him, everything seemed just a bit less bright.

Then he scooped up his new wife in his arms, and walked her through the castle to their room so they could get some actual proper, restful, sleep.

And he tried not to think of how closely the sensation of carrying her reminded him of how he'd carried his brother.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/1145irw/wait_is_this_just_gate_316/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (314/?)

Previous

Writer's Note: First and foremost. SEMI-NSFW FURRY STUFF WARNING!!!!

*I'm gonna mark this chapter NSFW just in case. If that kinda stuff isn't your bag, just stop reading at the break point half way through.

Also, I'm not writing a full pancakes section for these two. That's just.... no. Not doing that. This is just a Wendy's you bunch of miscreants.*

I kinda wanted to put the last half in a later section. But then I realized how short the first section was. I also wanted to bring at least a little levity back into the story since this is happening effectively at the same time as James's last few sections. And don't worry. The super crazy onion stuff is almost over for this arc guys.

Also you finally get to see Vickers joke a bit. It's about time.

\~

By the time James managed to get fed, bathed, dressed, and over to the healing ward it was almost sun down.

His mother was lying in one of the private rooms, a comfort afforded by her comradery with the other healers, and the fact that everyone knew what had happened and knew she needed space.

James entered slowly and quietly. He wasn't sneaking, he simply didn't want to wake his mother if she was sleeping. But as he released Amina's helping hand and closed the door behind him he was surprised to see that she was awake and sitting up.

He was also surprised to see how exhausted she looked despite being awake. She'd had a handful of greys in her hair for the past five years or so. But as he looked now he saw streaks of the grey that looked to be fighting for dominance of his mother's hairdo. The bags under her eyes, a result of years of long and late shifts at her job, seemed deeper and darker. Had they always been that way and he just hadn't noticed? If he looked in a mirror would he see similar signs of weariness on his own face, just to a lesser degree?

But those questions weren't important.

His mother held her arms out without saying a word, in a gesture that any child would recognize from their parents, and James walked as quickly as he could and wrapped his arms around her. Were her arms always so thin? And when had he started crying?

"Oh mijo." She said softly as she patted the back of his head.

He tried to say something, but it came out in a choking sob.

"I know mijo." She said. He felt her shudder as she took a breath. "I know."

"I lost Jojo mom." He said between breaths. She just kept patting at his head and stroking his back like she had when he'd been a child. "I lost Joey."

They stayed that way for a while, a mother and son doing what they could to find solace in each others embrace even though there was someone missing. It took time, but eventually James was able to get the sobbing, and his breathing, under control. His mother reached over to the table near her bed and grabbed a small towel that was there and helped him clean himself up.

When he was finally able to sit up she simply placed a hand over his and looked at him with eyes that spoke to the depths of sorrow she was feeling.

"Tell me what happened mijo." She said. "Tell me how everyone started calling my youngest son a hero."

And as James finished wiping the tears from his cheeks, that was exactly what he did. And before he was finished he called through the door and Amina opened it before rolling Veliry in. He watched his mother intently as she let the information sink in for a moment. He watched as she struggled to keep the tears from flowing again, and his own emerged as he saw her lose the fight and begin sobbing as she held her arms out to Veliry much like she had for him only minutes before.

James made as silent of an exit as he could as the two women gushed over the news that Veliry had just revealed and stepped outside with Amina.

"Are you okay?" She asked as she took his hand. "How's your mother?'

He shook his head. "I don't think either of us will ever be okay." He admitted. "But my mom's stronger than I'll ever be."

Amina nodded and pulled him into a gentle hug. She hadn't said anything, but it was nice having him up and on his feet again.

"Come on." She said. "Let's go get you some more food and go to bed." She tugged at his hand to lead him. But James stayed rooted to his spot.

"No." He said softly, but firmly. "Can you..... Can you take me to see him?" He took a deep breath as he looked up and away. "Can you take me to see Joey?"

"James we can do that tomorrow." She said. "You need to rest, and regain your strength."

"Amina." He said, his tone shifting to one of mild anger, or at least annoyance. "Please. I just.... I need to see him."

She looked at him for a moment, then reluctantly nodded. "Okay." She said and began leading him through the castle down to the room that functioned as their morgue.

And James followed her with eyes that focused on nothing.

\------------------------

"You sure you have to leave tomorrow?" Vickers asked as he flipped through the small, and remarkably boring, book on Petravian water bodies.

It still messed with him that he could do that without anything except the small bit of moonlight coming through the small window on the opposite side of the room.

"I've already been gone a whole week longer than was expected." Atrafar said as she ran her clawed fingers across the fur over his abdominal muscles. Vickers flinched a little at the slight tickle it caused. His claws even emerged a bit more from it.

Shit. He thought. Can't attack just because someone touched my stomach. I'll never hear the end of it.

"That's fair." He said instead. "Guess the whole 'our world almost got devoured by a monster' thing can only buy you so much extra time."

"I also have to give my report on that too." She said as she rested her head on his chest. She huffed a bit and he looked at her past the book.

"What?" He asked.

Her head turned and looked up at him, and he noticed that her hackles were just a little bit puffed up. His rose just a touch in an unconscious reaction to the aggressive body language.

"We were just talking about how its my last night here for Goddess knows how long." She said as she sat up, letting him see her naked form as the blankets fell off of it. "And you're reading a book about rivers and lakes."

"And swamps." He said with a slight grin as he set the book aside.

"Oh." She said. "Well if its got swamps then never mind. Clearly that's more important."

Vickers rolled his eyes a bit.

"I'll have you know that swamps are some of the most important ecosystems out there." He said as he lifted her up, his newly massive hands almost fully encompassing her waist as he did, and set her directly on his lap. "They prevent floods."

"Nonsense. Levees do that." She said with a look of superiority. "And what in the hells is an ecosystem?"

Vickers pulled her toward him, but felt a rising pressure around his ribs as her legs and back locked her in place.

He scoffed a bit as she looked down at him, still with that look of superiority. "You were just mad at me about NOT rolling around with you for the thirtieth time today."

She tilted her head a bit. "Rescind your statement about the importance of swamps. They're disgusting." She said.

Vickers' face went flat. "Are we really using geographic structures, both man-made and naturally formed, as foreplay?" He asked in a flat tone. "Because if so.... I may just ravish you as my lust for.... swamps.... overflows."

The she wolf grinned as she attempted to stifle a laugh.

Vickers pulled harder at her, even going so far as to extend his claws and let them lightly poke into her skin just a bit. She put on a shocked expression.

"Mister Vickers." She said in a mock scandalized tone. "You'd bare your claws at a member of the Outer Light?"

He kept his face flat as he panned down and looked at where their bodies met then panned back up.

"Uuuuh... I honestly don't remember who bared what first." He said. "But I'm pretty sure it was you back at tha-."

Her mouth enveloped his and she kissed him deeply for a few seconds.

"Enough jokes my little cat boy." She said as she gripped one of his ears and yanked his head back, causing him to snarl in surprise. "Also, this time you at least write me from time to time."

Vickers flicked her nose. The werewolf's hand immediately let go of him and clamped over her snout.

"Bad doggy." He said. "I.... am a cat....MAN."

Atrafar's hackles raised fully and a deep rumble began emitting from her chest.

"I'm gonna fuck you until you regret that." She said in a growl.

And just like that Vickers finally understood the meaning of the old slang word "Scaroused".

"Good doggy?" He asked hesitantly.

And then the two of them were rolling around the room like the wild animals they resembled.

Again.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/113cg0l/wait_is_this_just_gate_315/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (314/?)

Previous / First

Writer's Note: First and foremost. SEMI-NSFW FURRY STUFF WARNING!!!!

I'm gonna mark this chapter NSFW just in case. If that kinda stuff isn't your bag, just stop reading at the break point half way through. Also, I'm not writing a full pancakes section for these two. That's just.... no. Not doing that. This is just a Wendy's you bunch of miscreants.

I kinda wanted to put the last half in a later section. But then I realized how short the first section was. I also wanted to bring at least a little levity back into the story since this is happening effectively at the same time as James's last few sections. And don't worry. The super crazy onion stuff is almost over for this arc guys.

Also you finally get to see Vickers joke a bit. It's about time.

\~

By the time James managed to get fed, bathed, dressed, and over to the healing ward it was almost sun down.

His mother was lying in one of the private rooms, a comfort afforded by her comradery with the other healers, and the fact that everyone knew what had happened and knew she needed space.

James entered slowly and quietly. He wasn't sneaking, he simply didn't want to wake his mother if she was sleeping. But as he released Amina's helping hand and closed the door behind him he was surprised to see that she was awake and sitting up.

He was also surprised to see how exhausted she looked despite being awake. She'd had a handful of greys in her hair for the past five years or so. But as he looked now he saw streaks of the grey that looked to be fighting for dominance of his mother's hairdo. The bags under her eyes, a result of years of long and late shifts at her job, seemed deeper and darker. Had they always been that way and he just hadn't noticed? If he looked in a mirror would he see similar signs of weariness on his own face, just to a lesser degree?

But those questions weren't important.

His mother held her arms out without saying a word, in a gesture that any child would recognize from their parents, and James walked as quickly as he could and wrapped his arms around her. Were her arms always so thin? And when had he started crying?

"Oh mijo." She said softly as she patted the back of his head.

He tried to say something, but it came out in a choking sob.

"I know mijo." She said. He felt her shudder as she took a breath. "I know."

"I lost Jojo mom." He said between breaths. She just kept patting at his head and stroking his back like she had when he'd been a child. "I lost Joey."

They stayed that way for a while, a mother and son doing what they could to find solace in each others embrace even though there was someone missing. It took time, but eventually James was able to get the sobbing, and his breathing, under control. His mother reached over to the table near her bed and grabbed a small towel that was there and helped him clean himself up.

When he was finally able to sit up she simply placed a hand over his and looked at him with eyes that spoke to the depths of sorrow she was feeling.

"Tell me what happened mijo." She said. "Tell me how everyone started calling my youngest son a hero."

And as James finished wiping the tears from his cheeks, that was exactly what he did. And before he was finished he called through the door and Amina opened it before rolling Veliry in. He watched his mother intently as she let the information sink in for a moment. He watched as she struggled to keep the tears from flowing again, and his own emerged as he saw her lose the fight and begin sobbing as she held her arms out to Veliry much like she had for him only minutes before.

James made as silent of an exit as he could as the two women gushed over the news that Veliry had just revealed and stepped outside with Amina.

"Are you okay?" She asked as she took his hand. "How's your mother?'

He shook his head. "I don't think either of us will ever be okay." He admitted. "But my mom's stronger than I'll ever be."

Amina nodded and pulled him into a gentle hug. She hadn't said anything, but it was nice having him up and on his feet again.

"Come on." She said. "Let's go get you some more food and go to bed." She tugged at his hand to lead him. But James stayed rooted to his spot.

"No." He said softly, but firmly. "Can you..... Can you take me to see him?" He took a deep breath as he looked up and away. "Can you take me to see Joey?"

"James we can do that tomorrow." She said. "You need to rest, and regain your strength."

"Amina." He said, his tone shifting to one of mild anger, or at least annoyance. "Please. I just.... I need to see him."

She looked at him for a moment, then reluctantly nodded. "Okay." She said and began leading him through the castle down to the room that functioned as their morgue.

And James followed her with eyes that focused on nothing.

\-------------------------

"You sure you have to leave tomorrow?" Vickers asked as he flipped through the small, and remarkably boring, book on Petravian water bodies.

It still messed with him that he could do that without anything except the small bit of moonlight coming through the small window on the opposite side of the room.

"I've already been gone a whole week longer than was expected." Atrafar said as she ran her clawed fingers across the fur over his abdominal muscles. Vickers flinched a little at the slight tickle it caused. His claws even emerged a bit more from it.

Shit. He thought. Can't attack just because someone touched my stomach. I'll never hear the end of it.

"That's fair." He said instead. "Guess the whole 'our world almost got devoured by a monster' thing can only buy you so much extra time."

"I also have to give my report on that too." She said as she rested her head on his chest. She huffed a bit and he looked at her past the book.

"What?" He asked.

Her head turned and looked up at him, and he noticed that her hackles were just a little bit puffed up. His rose just a touch in an unconscious reaction to the aggressive body language.

"We were just talking about how its my last night here for Goddess knows how long." She said as she sat up, letting him see her naked form as the blankets fell off of it. "And you're reading a book about rivers and lakes."

"And swamps." He said with a slight grin as he set the book aside.

"Oh." She said. "Well if its got swamps then never mind. Clearly that's more important."

Vickers rolled his eyes a bit.

"I'll have you know that swamps are some of the most important ecosystems out there." He said as he lifted her up, his newly massive hands almost fully encompassing her waist as he did, and set her directly on his lap. "They prevent floods."

"Nonsense. Levees do that." She said with a look of superiority. "And what in the hells is an ecosystem?"

Vickers pulled her toward him, but felt a rising pressure around his ribs as her legs and back locked her in place.

He scoffed a bit as she looked down at him, still with that look of superiority. "You were just mad at me about NOT rolling around with you for the thirtieth time today."

She tilted her head a bit. "Rescind your statement about the importance of swamps. They're disgusting." She said.

Vickers' face went flat. "Are we really using geographic structures, both man-made and naturally formed, as foreplay?" He asked in a flat tone. "Because if so.... I may just ravish you as my lust for.... swamps.... overflows."

The she wolf grinned as she attempted to stifle a laugh.

Vickers pulled harder at her, even going so far as to extend his claws and let them lightly poke into her skin just a bit. She put on a shocked expression.

"Mister Vickers." She said in a mock scandalized tone. "You'd bare your claws at a member of the Outer Light?"

He kept his face flat as he panned down and looked at where their bodies met then panned back up.

"Uuuuh... I honestly don't remember who bared what first." He said. "But I'm pretty sure it was you back at tha-."

Her mouth enveloped his and she kissed him deeply for a few seconds.

"Enough jokes my little cat boy." She said as she gripped one of his ears and yanked his head back, causing him to snarl in surprise. "Also, this time you at least write me from time to time."

Vickers flicked her nose. The werewolf's hand immediately let go of him and clamped over her snout.

"Bad doggy." He said. "I.... am a cat....MAN."

Atrafar's hackles raised fully and a deep rumble began emitting from her chest.

"I'm gonna fuck you until you regret that." She said in a growl.

And just like that Vickers finally understood the meaning of the old slang word "Scaroused".

"Good doggy?" He asked hesitantly.

And then the two of them were rolling around the room like the wild animals they resembled.

Again.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/113ce0v/wait_is_this_just_gate_315/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (313/?)

Previous

Writer's note:

James before: I'm on a mission from God(s). And I have no idea what I'm doing about it.

James now: NEW PLAN!

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Apparently the deity wasn't ALLOWED to speak of it directly. But they had gone on to warn James that there was a small chance, small enough that it was barely worth thinking of, that Joseph Choi could return some day.

He'd be fighting against the will and soul of the Cleanser as they traveled through the cosmos. And there was no knowing how long that would last. But regardless of who won the fight, some day the entity would be back.

Only then would James know the fate of his little brother's soul. And regardless of the outcome, his brother would never be the same person as before.

"I can't effect the outcome of that fight." Defiance had said as she'd stood up and dusted off the spot on James's bed that she'd been sitting on. "The Cleanser isn't my beast and I'm already being censured. Even I know which fights step back from." She'd admitted. "And if I tell you any more than I have, then someone-" She pointed up into the sky. "will take notice and come to haul me back off to the padded room with the tasty windows."

James simply stared up as he had been forced to the entire conversation, his body still locked in place.

Let me talk for a minute. He thought at the deity, uncertain as to whether or not he was still "On Mute" as the god had made him earlier. She certainly hadn't acknowledged anything he'd thought at her since then.

Defiance sighed. "Right. I should probably let you talk." She said as she made a show of unzipping her lips. "After all, we're not going to see each other for a while."

"Defiance?" James thought at them.

"Yes James." The god replied, a hint of actual sympathy in her assumed voice.

"None of this gives my my brother back." James said flatly. "None of this undoes what you did to him right in front of me."

Defiance pursed her lips and nodded solemnly.

"None of this undoes the fact that my mother watched me carry his body back into the castle." James continued, uncaring for the god's sympathy or empathy, or perceived chuminess with him. "And even if he does come back, which you yourself have admitted is virtually impossible. None of this is RIGHT."

"No." Defiance admitted. "No it doesn't."

"So know this DEFIANCE." James said, still ignoring her. "I'm fucking coming for all of you. Some day. Some how. Even if it kills me. If I ever get even a single, so called GOD, in front of my sights." He strained, even knowing that it was impossible, to turn his head. Defiance flinched at the knowledge of the effort. "Know that the trigger is already pulled." James said with pure hatred in his voice. "The bullet is already fired. Whether it does anything or not. I will kill.... EVERY.... god I can get my hands on. Or I will die trying."

And because James was one of the god's favorite beings in the mortal world. And because she could sense the herculean effort that the young man was putting forward just to move his head to look at the god. Defiance took a half step back.

Because they knew that the immobilized, grieving, malnourished, man in the bed was speaking the truth.

Defiance simply nodded acknowledgement of the statement.

"Duly warned." She said, doing what she could to hide the uneasiness she felt at his words, as she turned to leave, shimmering with green energy as she did. "For the record: you do have my condolences James."

Then the god was gone, and a moment later time resumed.

James shot up into a sitting position as his body returned to his control.

Veliry slumped down in her wheelchair as her exhausted body regained motion.

"wanted to ask you.....something." She said. "Dammit." She said instead.

"Veliry?" James asked as he was reminded of his constraints.

"Yes?" She asked as she struggled back upright in the chair.

"Can you undo these?" He asked as he spread his hands to show her the restraints.

"You're not going to do anything rash are you? " She asked. "Not going to hurt yourself or something?"

"No." James said as he looked down at her and tried to see what his brother had seen, even if only for a second. "I just need to do something important real quick. Then we can get the others in here."

She nodded, wondering why he was looking at her. Then she reached over and, using almost all the strength she had at the moment, undid the buckle on his right hand. Once it was free he undid the other one himself, moving carefully to prevent the I.V. in the arm from causing problems.

When it was done he turned and planted his feet on the ground, kneeled down to Veliry's level, and wrapped his arms around her in a hug.

"I'm sorry Vel." He said as she first went rigid in shock, then slowly returned the hug. "I'm so sorry."

He didn't need to say any more than that for her to understand what he meant. Tears welled in her eyes as she gripped him hard with her arms, though as weak as she was it wasn't that tight of a hug, and began to cry.

James joined her as tears fell down his own cheeks.

After ten minutes or so, and once Veliry had had a chance to discretely wipe her nose with her sleeve, they broke the hug and James sat back on the bed.

"What do we do now?" She asked. "They didn't tell me what we were supposed to do AFTER it happened."

James thought for a moment as he got his breathing back into control.

Then his stomach rumbled so loud even Veliry heard it.

"First I eat a sandwich." He said. Then he looked down and his eyes sank. "Then I need to go see my mom."

"Okay." She said simply. "I'll go with you. I'll leave... telling her... up to your judgment."

James nodded, still looking down. "Thanks."

"I don't...." She began, looking over toward the window outside. "I.... I don't know... HOW... I felt about him." She said.

James looked up and, sensing that she just needed him to listen, stayed silent.

"I... haven't had a lot of... lovers." She admitted. "And you already know one of them and she was a woman." She took a deep breath. As if she was bracing herself. "So I don't know if I... LOVED... Joey like that.... Mostly because I don't know if I ever loved ANYONE like that."

James nodded. He thought maybe everyone had that same thought at some point in their life. He had, years ago in another world about someone who'd ended up cheating on him. But that wasn't important right now.

"But at some point... I began to think of my future with him in it." She continued. "Mainly as my apprentice. Someday as a fellow Arch-Mage if I could ever convince him to pick up magic again. But regardless, he was there in it. And now that he's gone I feel as if some great piece of that life has been ripped away."

And that, more than anything, James could understand.

Because in his mind, in his heart, it was more than just a piece.

They both sat in silence for several moments.

"And now I just have to hope that he can succeed at something even a GOD admits is impossible." She finished.

"He will." James said as he wiped his eyes again.

She turned to look at him curiously.

James forced himself to smile.

"He has too." James added. "He's gonna be a dad." Veliry smiled at that, and unlike James's it was genuine, if small. "Plus. I know my little brother. If he sets his mind to something. If he says he's gonna do it. It gets done. Might take some time. Might overload him a few times. But.... It gets done." He took a deep breath."And he did what he did knowing the odds." He nodded. "He'll be back. And you, me, and Amina will show him his kid. And then we'll have to weather through poorly delivered dad-jokes for the rest of our lives."

Veliry chuckled. And as she did James hated himself.

Because, for just a moment, he doubted his own words. And even worse than that, it meant that he also doubted Joey.

Then his stomach made another noise and he doubled over in pain.

"Amina!" Veliry called. "Chief Vickers! We could use a bit of help."

The door opened as the two rushed in, thinking the worst.

And then, as painful as it was for him, James took the first step toward trying to live in a world where his brother didn't really exist anymore.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/112jgq7/wait_is_this_just_gate_314/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (313/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note:

James before: I'm on a mission from God(s). And I have no idea what I'm doing about it.

James now: NEW PLAN!

Enjoy.

\~

James listened to the "God" tell him the tale of what had happened between him, the other two gods, and both Joey and Veliry in the druid forest.

It didn't forgive anything that had happened, at least not in his mind. It didn't make the pain of losing his brother any easier. But it clarified things.

And there were two small nuggets of hope hidden within the retelling.

Firstly: Veliry was, barring anything unexpected, practically guaranteed to be pregnant with Joey's child. They'd only spent one, drunken and likely confused and clumsy, night together. But a confluence of various magical powers, and a few moments of near omniscience about the living beings around her had ensured her that it had happened.

Secondly, and more upsetting than that, Defiance had implied that Joey wasn't "gone" all the way.

James had grilled the god when he'd made the implication. Had refused to listen to anything else at all until Defiance had clarified what they'd meant by it.

Defiance hadn't acknowledged any of the things James had thought at it. But after a few minutes of James literally(?) thinking "Lalalalalalalalala!" in his mind, the god had put on an annoyed expression and told James that she KNEW James was ignoring anything not related to his brother.

Apparently the deity wasn't ALLOWED to speak of it directly. But they had gone on to warn James that there was a small chance, small enough that it was barely worth thinking of, that Joseph Choi could return some day.

He'd be fighting against the will and soul of the Cleanser as they traveled through the cosmos. And there was no knowing how long that would last. But regardless of who won the fight, some day the entity would be back.

Only then would James know the fate of his little brother's soul. And regardless of the outcome, his brother would never be the same person as before.

"I can't effect the outcome of that fight." Defiance had said as she'd stood up and dusted off the spot on James's bed that she'd been sitting on. "The Cleanser isn't my beast and I'm already being censured. Even I know which fights step back from." She'd admitted. "And if I tell you any more than I have, then someone-" She pointed up into the sky. "will take notice and come to haul me back off to the padded room with the tasty windows."

James simply stared up as he had been forced to the entire conversation, his body still locked in place.

Let me talk for a minute. He thought at the deity, uncertain as to whether or not he was still "On Mute" as the god had made him earlier. She certainly hadn't acknowledged anything he'd thought at her since then.

Defiance sighed. "Right. I should probably let you talk." She said as she made a show of unzipping her lips. "After all, we're not going to see each other for a while."

"Defiance?" James thought at them.

"Yes James." The god replied, a hint of actual sympathy in her assumed voice.

"None of this gives my my brother back." James said flatly. "None of this undoes what you did to him right in front of me."

Defiance pursed her lips and nodded solemnly.

"None of this undoes the fact that my mother watched me carry his body back into the castle." James continued, uncaring for the god's sympathy or empathy, or perceived chuminess with him. "And even if he does come back, which you yourself have admitted is virtually impossible. None of this is RIGHT."

"No." Defiance admitted. "No it doesn't."

"So know this DEFIANCE." James said, still ignoring her. "I'm fucking coming for all of you. Some day. Some how. Even if it kills me. If I ever get even a single, so called GOD, in front of my sights." He strained, even knowing that it was impossible, to turn his head. Defiance flinched at the knowledge of the effort. "Know that the trigger is already pulled." James said with pure hatred in his voice. "The bullet is already fired. Whether it does anything or not. I will kill.... EVERY.... god I can get my hands on. Or I will die trying."

And because James was one of the god's favorite beings in the mortal world. And because she could sense the herculean effort that the young man was putting forward just to move his head to look at the god. Defiance took a half step back.

Because they knew that the immobilized, grieving, malnourished, man in the bed was speaking the truth.

Defiance simply nodded acknowledgement of the statement.

"Duly warned." She said, doing what she could to hide the uneasiness she felt at his words, as she turned to leave, shimmering with green energy as she did. "For the record: you do have my condolences James."

Then the god was gone, and a moment later time resumed.

James shot up into a sitting position as his body returned to his control.

Veliry slumped down in her wheelchair as her exhausted body regained motion.

"wanted to ask you.....something." She said. "Dammit." She said instead.

"Veliry?" James asked as he was reminded of his constraints.

"Yes?" She asked as she struggled back upright in the chair.

"Can you undo these?" He asked as he spread his hands to show her the restraints.

"You're not going to do anything rash are you? " She asked. "Not going to hurt yourself or something?"

"No." James said as he looked down at her and tried to see what his brother had seen, even if only for a second. "I just need to do something important real quick. Then we can get the others in here."

She nodded, wondering why he was looking at her. Then she reached over and, using almost all the strength she had at the moment, undid the buckle on his right hand. Once it was free he undid the other one himself, moving carefully to prevent the I.V. in the arm from causing problems.

When it was done he turned and planted his feet on the ground, kneeled down to Veliry's level, and wrapped his arms around her in a hug.

"I'm sorry Vel." He said as she first went rigid in shock, then slowly returned the hug. "I'm so sorry."

He didn't need to say any more than that for her to understand what he meant. Tears welled in her eyes as she gripped him hard with her arms, though as weak as she was it wasn't that tight of a hug, and began to cry.

James joined her as tears fell down his own cheeks.

After ten minutes or so, and once Veliry had had a chance to discretely wipe her nose with her sleeve, they broke the hug and James sat back on the bed.

"What do we do now?" She asked. "They didn't tell me what we were supposed to do AFTER it happened."

James thought for a moment as he got his breathing back into control.

Then his stomach rumbled so loud even Veliry heard it.

"First I eat a sandwich." He said. Then he looked down and his eyes sank. "Then I need to go see my mom."

"Okay." She said simply. "I'll go with you. I'll leave... telling her... up to your judgment."

James nodded, still looking down. "Thanks."

"I don't...." She began, looking over toward the window outside. "I.... I don't know... HOW... I felt about him." She said.

James looked up and, sensing that she just needed him to listen, stayed silent.

"I... haven't had a lot of... lovers." She admitted. "And you already know one of them and she was a woman." She took a deep breath. As if she was bracing herself. "So I don't know if I... LOVED... Joey like that.... Mostly because I don't know if I ever loved ANYONE like that."

James nodded. He thought maybe everyone had that same thought at some point in their life. He had, years ago in another world about someone who'd ended up cheating on him. But that wasn't important right now.

"But at some point... I began to think of my future with him in it." She continued. "Mainly as my apprentice. Someday as a fellow Arch-Mage if I could ever convince him to pick up magic again. But regardless, he was there in it. And now that he's gone I feel as if some great piece of that life has been ripped away."

And that, more than anything, James could understand.

Because in his mind, in his heart, it was more than just a piece.

They both sat in silence for several moments.

"And now I just have to hope that he can succeed at something even a GOD admits is impossible." She finished.

"He will." James said as he wiped his eyes again.

She turned to look at him curiously.

James forced himself to smile.

"He has too." James added. "He's gonna be a dad." Veliry smiled at that, and unlike James's it was genuine, if small. "Plus. I know my little brother. If he sets his mind to something. If he says he's gonna do it. It gets done. Might take some time. Might overload him a few times. But.... It gets done." He took a deep breath."And he did what he did knowing the odds." He nodded. "He'll be back. And you, me, and Amina will show him his kid. And then we'll have to weather through poorly delivered dad-jokes for the rest of our lives."

Veliry chuckled. And as she did James hated himself.

Because, for just a moment, he doubted his own words. And even worse than that, it meant that he also doubted Joey.

Then his stomach made another noise and he doubled over in pain.

"Amina!" Veliry called. "Chief Vickers! We could use a bit of help."

The door opened as the two rushed in, thinking the worst.

And then, as painful as it was for him, James took the first step toward trying to live in a world where his brother didn't really exist anymore.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/112jfjb/wait_is_this_just_gate_314/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (312/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Some times the only fix is a kick in the ass.

Enjoy.

\~

James woke up to the feeling of a pinch in his arm.

He'd had a dream, a nightmare really, something awful had happened. It had kept happening, over and over, no matter what he did to try to stop it.

As he looked over he saw Vickers sitting on the edge of his bed and carefully pulling the needle from a catheter in his arm. The air smelled faintly of cinnamon rolls and kimchi. His stomach rumbled as he stirred, and he felt weak.

"Vickers?" He asked. "What's going on?"

Vickers startled a bit at the unexpected question. He rubbed his nose with his sleeve a bit and went back to attaching the catheter in James's arm to a bag of fluid.

"Hey cap." He replied. "We uh..... we got hit kid. You more than the rest of us."

Flashes of the nightmare came to the front of James's mind. He looked around the room, surprised to see a woman in white robes with blue skin standing in the corner. Something about her seemed familiar to him, though he didn't know why.

"Where.... where's Joey?" He asked. He felt a rush of cold in his arm as Vickers gave the I.V. bag a squeeze that flooded his veins with fresh fluid. "Vickers what happened?" He asked, his breathing becoming more rapid. He tried to bring his other hand up to grab but it was halted by a leather band holding it to his side. "Wha? What's going on?"

Suddenly the bed depressed as the blue skinned woman sat down on the side opposite of Vickers and dabbed at his forehead with a damp cloth.

"Captain Choi." She said in a voice the reminded him of nursery rhymes and a lullaby. "The nightmares you've been experiencing are more real than you know. Your mind simply refuses to accept the truth, and fights against it."

Images of Joey flying above him, glowing, and surrounded by tendrils of the impossible, came to him.

"No." He said as he strained at the restraint. He tried to move his other hand over to release it, but that one was restrained too. Vickers gripped it anyways as he placed a piece of medical tape over the I.V. tubing he'd set in place. "Lemme go." He demanded.

"Stop Choi." He said. "You'll hurt yourself."

"She's wrong." James said as tears formed in the corners of his eyes. "Vickers tell her she's wrong."

Vickers simply looked at James as he held his arm steady against his struggling. And for the first time since he'd met the surly operator, James saw legitimate sympathy in his eyes, feline features or not.

James stared at the man, his eyes pleading for the massive were-jaguar to change his expression. For it to break into a grin, or start laughing, and reveal that he'd finally gotten James back for all the pranks and jokes.

Instead Vickers simply shook his head and looked away.

"Nooooo." He moaned as his breathing hitched. "No.... You're lying." He strained against the restraints to no avail, and his stomach made a loud gurgling noise that came with a side of pain. "Noooo." He whined as his face pressed into the pillow he was resting on, streaking it with tears and snot.

He didn't notice the door opening and Amina pushing a wheelchair into the room.

"I'm sorry Choi." Vicker said as he struggled to keep the young man's thrashing to a minimum. He looked up at the new arrival with mild shock. "But you need to get a hold of yourself. You haven't eaten in almost four days now."

"Bring me-" He said before taking a long, ragged, breath. "bring me Joey. He's fine." Another breath. "He's fine. It was just..." Breath. "It was just a nightmare."

A small hand tapped at James's shoulder, as the chair they were in was wheeled up next to his bed on the same side Vickers was on.

James's head turned over to look at who it was, and his breathing froze for a moment as his eyes went wide in surprise.

Then they panned up and saw the antlers, and fear formed in them.

KRAK!

James looked back down at Veliry in shock as she slowly drew the hand back across the bed and into her lap. The movement visibly taxed her as she breathed slowly and heavily. Amina reached down to try and help her straighten, but the small mage shook her head slightly, then slowly placed the hand on the arm of her chair and sat up straight on her own. Even that small bit of activity seemed to drain her.

"Veliry?" He asked, more surprised than hurt. "Why'd you slap me?"

She took several long and deep breaths as she gathered her strength. Then she spoke slowly.

"Because.... you're being.... selfish." She said.

"What?" He asked in confusion. His eyes remained locked on the antlers sprouting from her head. They were no longer the massive jumble of branching madness that they had been in his nightmares, but they were still long and multi-pointed.

"Your brother." She said. Then her eyes sank. "Joseph.... didn't do what he did... so you could wallow in bed crying." She took a deep breath. "He didn't do it for me.... He didn't do it for Amina.... And believe it or not... He didn't even do it for YOU." She weakly pointed a finger at him and he cringed back. "He did it... because... and you know this..... he was a good person." She looked away for a moment and wiped tears from her cheek. "He did it because he was a helper.... He wanted to keep the people around him from being hurt.... or killed. But he would have done it for everyone else too. And this was the best way for him to do that."

"Nooo." James said. "No. There were other ways. There had to be another way." His eyes welled with more tears. "No. He should still be here."

Veliry looked back at Amina, who moved forward to see if she needed help. Instead Veliry simply placed a hand over Amina's.

"Could the rest of you give us a few minutes?" She asked. "I have to tell James a couple things. And.... I don't know who else would be allowed to hear it."

Vickers and Amina exchanged a glance even as the priestess was already moving toward the door.

"You sure?" Amina asked.

Veliry nodded and then seemed to relax a bit as she steadied her breathing.

"It's just.... It's stuff that he and I are.... uniquely allowed to know." She said. Then she seemed to reconsider. "At least I think he is."

Amina nodded to Vickers and the two of them left the James and Veliry alone.

James struggled against the restraints the whole time. His breathing never settled.

"James." Veliry said. But he didn't look at her, instead opting to continue his futile writhing. "James..... JAMES!" She yelled.

"Nooooo." He whined. "No you're wrong."

"James you were there." She said as she weakly tossed one of the I.V. bags at his face. It fell short and he looked at it with mild confusion. "You know that we were talking to Gods."

THAT got a change from James.

His eyebrows furrowed and his hands began flexing into fists. His breath began hissing out of his nose and his jaw clenched.

"Gods." He half growled through his teeth.

"Yes.... gods." She said sternly. "I remember you... intruding... I still don't know how you did that." She thought about it for a minute. "But I remember it. So you KNOW.... that we were told what had to happen."

"They did this." He hissed as he renewed his struggle for freedom. "I'll fucking kill them!"

"No any time soon you won't." Said a new voice.

James and Veliry froze in their positions, Veliry in the middle of reaching for James, and James with his neck arched up and his veins bulging as he strained against the leather straps.

"Some day though.... Maybe." Said a young, dark skinned woman, in a white 50's style dress, and a pair of rectangular glasses, as she sat down on the edge of the bed between the two of them. She took Veliry's hand and kissed it before moving it back to the mage's lap gently.

"Defiance." James said without any of his body actually moving. With his mind. And even using only his mind to speak, the word was filled with venom.

"The god from before?" Veliry asked in the same fashion.

"Yes. Though don't say that too loud." The woman said with a mischievous grin. "I'm.... SUPPOSED... to be on time out right now. Didn't take." Then she muttered. "Those fools really don't understand me."

"Let me move you bastard!" James yelled. "Let me move so I can fucking strangle you."

Defiance looked at James over the glasses. Then she pressed her hand to James's forehead and pressed him back down to the bed.

"You need to be quiet for a minute my dear." She said. "You aren't listening to the young woman when she's trying to tell you the truth. Part of which was that IIIII got in a bit of trouble with my coworkers to help you three."

"Us three?" James asked. "There's only two of us thanks to you you son of a bitch."

Defiance sighed and rolled her eyes, then ran a finger over James's mouth. James went silent immediately.

"Firstly. I was helping all three of you even then." She said.

Then she turned James's head to look over at Veliry. Stood up. Walked over behind Veliry and placed a hand over Veliry's stomach.

"Besides. There's still three people in this room. And no, I'm not counting myself." She said.

If James had had control of his body, his eyes would have been the size of dinner plates.

"Veliry?" He asked.

"I was trying to get there." She said awkwardly. "You weren't listening."

"Yes yes." Defiance interrupted. "I like stealing people's thunder. Now if you don't mind. I'm only able to be here because none of the others are in this realm at the moment. So we need to hurry." She sat back down between them again. "Lady mage, you are no longer needed for this conversation. Please and thank you." She said as she waved a hand at Veliry.

"Wait I-" She said before suddenly silencing.

Then Defiance turned back to James.

"She'd make a solid champion some day." She said with a smile. "Now. Let me tell you what actually happened." She leaned forward and booped James on his nose. "Because right now. Like this. You're no use to anyone. Least of all me. And definitely not any of your friends or family. Because Denial and Defiance ARE NOT the same thing young James."

And as James was held captive, the God told him the truth.

It didn't make James feel any better.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/111lz9l/wait_is_this_just_gate_313/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (312/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Some times the only fix is a kick in the ass.

Enjoy.

\~

James woke up to the feeling of a pinch in his arm.

He'd had a dream, a nightmare really, something awful had happened. It had kept happening, over and over, no matter what he did to try to stop it.

As he looked over he saw Vickers sitting on the edge of his bed and carefully pulling the needle from a catheter in his arm. The air smelled faintly of cinnamon rolls and kimchi. His stomach rumbled as he stirred, and he felt weak.

"Vickers?" He asked. "What's going on?"

Vickers startled a bit at the unexpected question. He rubbed his nose with his sleeve a bit and went back to attaching the catheter in James's arm to a bag of fluid.

"Hey cap." He replied. "We uh..... we got hit kid. You more than the rest of us."

Flashes of the nightmare came to the front of James's mind. He looked around the room, surprised to see a woman in white robes with blue skin standing in the corner. Something about her seemed familiar to him, though he didn't know why.

"Where.... where's Joey?" He asked. He felt a rush of cold in his arm as Vickers gave the I.V. bag a squeeze that flooded his veins with fresh fluid. "Vickers what happened?" He asked, his breathing becoming more rapid. He tried to bring his other hand up to grab but it was halted by a leather band holding it to his side. "Wha? What's going on?"

Suddenly the bed depressed as the blue skinned woman sat down on the side opposite of Vickers and dabbed at his forehead with a damp cloth.

"Captain Choi." She said in a voice the reminded him of nursery rhymes and a lullaby. "The nightmares you've been experiencing are more real than you know. Your mind simply refuses to accept the truth, and fights against it."

Images of Joey flying above him, glowing, and surrounded by tendrils of the impossible, came to him.

"No." He said as he strained at the restraint. He tried to move his other hand over to release it, but that one was restrained too. Vickers gripped it anyways as he placed a piece of medical tape over the I.V. tubing he'd set in place. "Lemme go." He demanded.

"Stop Choi." He said. "You'll hurt yourself."

"She's wrong." James said as tears formed in the corners of his eyes. "Vickers tell her she's wrong."

Vickers simply looked at James as he held his arm steady against his struggling. And for the first time since he'd met the surly operator, James saw legitimate sympathy in his eyes, feline features or not.

James stared at the man, his eyes pleading for the massive were-jaguar to change his expression. For it to break into a grin, or start laughing, and reveal that he'd finally gotten James back for all the pranks and jokes.

Instead Vickers simply shook his head and looked away.

"Nooooo." He moaned as his breathing hitched. "No.... You're lying." He strained against the restraints to no avail, and his stomach made a loud gurgling noise that came with a side of pain. "Noooo." He whined as his face pressed into the pillow he was resting on, streaking it with tears and snot.

He didn't notice the door opening and Amina pushing a wheelchair into the room.

"I'm sorry Choi." Vicker said as he struggled to keep the young man's thrashing to a minimum. He looked up at the new arrival with mild shock. "But you need to get a hold of yourself. You haven't eaten in almost four days now."

"Bring me-" He said before taking a long, ragged, breath. "bring me Joey. He's fine." Another breath. "He's fine. It was just..." Breath. "It was just a nightmare."

A small hand tapped at James's shoulder, as the chair they were in was wheeled up next to his bed on the same side Vickers was on.

James's head turned over to look at who it was, and his breathing froze for a moment as his eyes went wide in surprise.

Then they panned up and saw the antlers, and fear formed in them.

KRAK!

James looked back down at Veliry in shock as she slowly drew the hand back across the bed and into her lap. The movement visibly taxed her as she breathed slowly and heavily. Amina reached down to try and help her straighten, but the small mage shook her head slightly, then slowly placed the hand on the arm of her chair and sat up straight on her own. Even that small bit of activity seemed to drain her.

"Veliry?" He asked, more surprised than hurt. "Why'd you slap me?"

She took several long and deep breaths as she gathered her strength. Then she spoke slowly.

"Because.... you're being.... selfish." She said.

"What?" He asked in confusion. His eyes remained locked on the antlers sprouting from her head. They were no longer the massive jumble of branching madness that they had been in his nightmares, but they were still long and multi-pointed.

"Your brother." She said. Then her eyes sank. "Joseph.... didn't do what he did... so you could wallow in bed crying." She took a deep breath. "He didn't do it for me.... He didn't do it for Amina.... And believe it or not... He didn't even do it for YOU." She weakly pointed a finger at him and he cringed back. "He did it... because... and you know this..... he was a good person." She looked away for a moment and wiped tears from her cheek. "He did it because he was a helper.... He wanted to keep the people around him from being hurt.... or killed. But he would have done it for everyone else too. And this was the best way for him to do that."

"Nooo." James said. "No. There were other ways. There had to be another way." His eyes welled with more tears. "No. He should still be here."

Veliry looked back at Amina, who moved forward to see if she needed help. Instead Veliry simply placed a hand over Amina's.

"Could the rest of you give us a few minutes?" She asked. "I have to tell James a couple things. And.... I don't know who else would be allowed to hear it."

Vickers and Amina exchanged a glance even as the priestess was already moving toward the door.

"You sure?" Amina asked.

Veliry nodded and then seemed to relax a bit as she steadied her breathing.

"It's just.... It's stuff that he and I are.... uniquely allowed to know." She said. Then she seemed to reconsider. "At least I think he is."

Amina nodded to Vickers and the two of them left James and Veliry alone.

James struggled against the restraints the whole time. His breathing never settled.

"James." Veliry said. But he didn't look at her, instead opting to continue his futile writhing. "James..... JAMES!" She yelled.

"Nooooo." He whined. "No you're wrong."

"James you were there." She said as she weakly tossed one of the I.V. bags at his face. It fell short and he looked at it with mild confusion. "You know that we were talking to Gods."

THAT got a change from James.

His eyebrows furrowed and his hands began flexing into fists. His breath began hissing out of his nose and his jaw clenched.

"Gods." He half growled through his teeth.

"Yes.... gods." She said sternly. "I remember you... intruding... I still don't know how you did that." She thought about it for a minute. "But I remember it. So you KNOW.... that we were told what had to happen."

"They did this." He hissed as he renewed his struggle for freedom. "I'll fucking kill them!"

"Not any time soon you won't." Said a new voice.

James and Veliry froze in their positions, Veliry in the middle of reaching for James, and James with his neck arched up and his veins bulging as he strained against the leather straps.

"Some day though.... Maybe." Said a young, dark skinned woman, in a white 50's style dress, and a pair of rectangular glasses, as she sat down on the edge of the bed between the two of them. She took Veliry's hand and kissed it before moving it back to the mage's lap gently.

"Defiance." James said without any of his body actually moving. With his mind. And even using only his mind to speak, the word was filled with venom.

"The god from before?" Veliry asked in the same fashion.

"Yes. Though don't say that too loud." The woman said with a mischievous grin. "I'm.... SUPPOSED... to be on time out right now. Didn't take." Then she muttered. "Those fools really don't understand me."

"Let me move you bastard!" James yelled. "Let me move so I can fucking strangle you."

Defiance looked at James over the glasses. Then she pressed her hand to James's forehead and pressed him back down to the bed.

"You need to be quiet for a minute my dear." She said. "You aren't listening to the young woman when she's trying to tell you the truth. Part of which was that IIIII got in a bit of trouble with my coworkers to help you three."

"Us three?" James asked. "There's only two of us thanks to you you son of a bitch."

Defiance sighed and rolled her eyes, then ran a finger over James's mouth. James went silent immediately.

"Firstly. I was helping all three of you even then." She said.

Then she turned James's head to look over at Veliry. Stood up. Walked over behind Veliry and placed a hand over Veliry's stomach.

"Besides. There's still three people in this room. And no, I'm not counting myself." She said.

If James had had control of his body, his eyes would have been the size of dinner plates.

"Veliry?" He asked.

"I was trying to get there." She said awkwardly. "You weren't listening."

"Yes yes." Defiance interrupted. "I like stealing people's thunder. Now if you don't mind. I'm only able to be here because none of the others are in this realm at the moment. So we need to hurry." She sat back down between them again. "Lady mage, you are no longer needed for this conversation. Please and thank you." She said as she waved a hand at Veliry.

"Wait I-" She said before suddenly silencing.

Then Defiance turned back to James.

"She'd make a solid champion some day." She said with a smile. "Now. Let me tell you what actually happened." She leaned forward and booped James on his nose. "Because right now. Like this. You're no use to anyone. Least of all me. And definitely not any of your friends or family. Because Denial and Defiance ARE NOT the same thing young James."

And as James was held captive, the God told him the truth.

It didn't make James feel any better.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/111ltu8/wait_is_this_just_gate_313/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (311/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I'm gonna put the rest of my note blocked out. Last chapter took a lot out of me and I don't want to sound preachy. So read it at your own discretion.

>!I don't think it would surprise anyone to learn that a writer often imparts bits of themselves and the people in their lives into their characters. How could they not? You write a character without any references and they'll just be a formless blob with a name that comes and goes without notice. I won't tell you who Joey's based on in my life. Because that's my story. And it's not being written here.!<

>!But Joseph Choi was one of the first characters written into this story. He's been canon pretty much since the beginning. He's been an important part of James's story and I did everything I could to make that feel real. And I've been proud to see how well I did when I've read all your comments about him throughout the series. Even the last chapter.!<

>!And now my keyboard has taken him from all of us. I tried to think up ways to make it not happen. And everything I tried just didn't feel true.!<

>!I'm not going to guarantee anything regarding any of the characters' futures. Good or bad. Not even Joey's (take that as you will). When the keys strike, they do so without much care for my, or your, desires.!<

>!Like James and the others. I'm just going to have to hope I'm strong enough, and skilled enough, to keep making it work.!<

>!Until it's done.!<

Until then, enjoy.

\~

Amina braced herself as she entered the room that she and James shared. In her hands she carried a tray with a light broth, a few small pieces of bread, and a glass of water. She opened it and was immediately taken aback by the smell that emanated from within. She'd expected it, the candles were meant to protect the person they were made for, and so smelled foul to anyone else, while smelling disarmingly pleasant to their actual target.

The priestess stood up as she entered, smiling softly as she bowed slightly to the princess.

Amina fought the urge to gag at the smell of mildew and foul meat.

"Any change?" She asked after steeling her resolve a bit.

The priestess shook her head as the smile faltered.

"He relives it over and over. His mind struggles to acknowledge the nightmare for what it really is." The blue skinned, slightly scaled, woman replied as she stepped aside. "I am doing what I can to blur the lines between the two, but he fights like a trapped beast." She added as she gestured for Amina to approach.

Amina took a moment to compose herself, fighting back tears and her sense of smell as she pulled the nightstand from beside their bed closer and setting the tray on top of it. Then she brushed James's hair back and wiped away the cold sweat there. Behind her the priestess covered one of the two candles.

James's eyes fluttered after a few minutes, then slowly opened.

"Hi." She said softly as she looked into them and felt her heart break at the pain that welled up behind them.

"A...." He began as he stirred a bit. "mina?" He asked.

"That's right." She said as her hand rubbed at his ear a bit. "I'm right here."

"What happened?"

"Nothing good." She said honestly. She saw the comprehension dawn in his expression. "I need you to sit up a bit okay? We need to get some food in you."

Tears began to form in his eyes and Amina knew that it was happening again.

"It's-" He said as he took a deep, shuddering breath. "It's... it's real?" He made a sound like a wounded animal as his wolf hand reached up and clawed at his shirt, leaving long scratches in the fabric and even the skin underneath. "No.... Where's Jojo?" He cried. "Mom?!"

Amina signaled for the priestess, who quickly uncapped the candle and hit it with a small burst of fire magic, sparking it to life. While she was doing that Amina clamped her hand down on James's wrist and began wrestling it away from him. Even delirious and half asleep she struggled to match his strength.

"JO...." He gasped into his pillow as he began squirming. "No! No come back! Please!" He begged.

The priestess used a small fan to waft some of the foul smelling candle fumes their direction and Amina pressed James's arm to her side as her left hand snaked under his head and pulled his face up until she could rest her forehead against his.

"It's okay." She whispered, lying to him as she felt her own tears drop from her face.

"No." He whimpered. But she could feel the arm growing weaker as it thrashed against her. The candles were already doing their job. "No. No Joey..... No..... No...."

As Amina was about to lower him down and place the blanket back over him he surged forward and locked his other arm onto her shoulder with a grip that would have hurt a normal person.

"Amina it's not real." He begged her. "Say it's not real."

Amina looked down for a moment, and in a struggle of will, a struggle to not hurt the man she loved, but also not to lie to him. She shook her head.

"I'm sorry James." She said as she looked back up at him. "It is."

He stared at her for a moment, breathing heavily as he struggled to stay awake and then his arm went limp in her hand, and he fell back into the world of sleep.

She kissed him on the forehead before wiping the tears from first his cheeks, then her own.

She sat that way for several minutes, wallowing in the aroma of the awful candles and sorrow that sank into every corner of the room. Then, slowly, she stood up and picked up the tray again.

"He needs to eat." The priestess said sadly as Amina passed her. "It has been three days and he's only barely had water."

Amina stopped in her stride and closed her eyes.

"I'll see if one of the healers that his mother trained can give him one of those bags of nutrients they use." She said as she looked down at her husband's fitfully slumbering form. "Or maybe Chief Vickers. Barring that I'll see if a song of sustenance can be brought forth."

The priestess nodded, and Amina took her leave from the room that SHOULD have been filled with love and happiness, and instead was a place of unconscious despair.

When she rounded the corner she placed the tray on the pedestal of a statue and leaned against it as she fought to stem the flow of tears pouring from her eyes.

\----------

"I'm sorry ma'am." Vickers said into the Communications hub. "I'm afraid that for the foreseeable future we need to consider Captain Choi as inoperative. Unfit for duty. The King has already agreed that I can take his place when it comes to P.O.W. relations until such a time as he's recovered. I was going to during the honeymoon anyways."

Colonel Muhammed nodded slowly. "And Mrs. DeLaRosa?" She asked.

"Still recovering." Vickers replied. "The chief healer thinks she may have had a heart attack. Ironically, based on the very training SHE helped him receive in understanding such things. Though, they assure me she'll make a full recovery. Physically anyways."

"What exactly happened out there chief?" She asked. "We have the footage from the drones and from you and Choi's glasses, but even slowed down a lot of it happened to fast to understand."

Vickers nodded as he rubbed his head where he'd pulled the duct tape spectacles off.

"If I'm honest." He began. "That's pretty much how it felt from the ground too ma'am." He tinkered with the controls on the hub and pulled up the footage, starting at when the druids had all broken from each other, right before the two brothers had flown into the sky. "One second we were enacting the plan with the massive bag. Then everything went to shit. Then things just.... they just accelerated so quickly. The next thing I knew I was catching the captain on my griffin."

He planted his massive hands on the table next to the hub, which seemed so small now, and looked down for a bit as he thought.

"You okay chief?" The Colonel asked.

He took a deep breath.

"No. Not really." He admitted. He stood up and paced a bit as he replayed everything in his mind.

The Colonel simply waited.

"Not gonna pretend that me and the younger Choi were friends or anything." He said after a moment. "But you'd have to be blind to not see that he was a good kid." He stopped for a moment. "I just.... I don't completely understand what happened yet." He admitted. "It just aint right."

She listened silently, nodding a bit as he spoke.

"It's hard to see innocent people hurt." She said after a moment. "Even more so when they get hurt trying to help."

He nodded.

"Yeah." He said simply.

There was a knock at the door, and Vickers turned to see the princess poking her head through.

"Evening princess." He said. "Any change?"

Amina shook her head. "If anything I think I may need your help chief Vickers." She replied.

Vickers nodded.

"Keep us updated Chief. Do what you can." The Colonel said. "We'll let you know if we learn anything from the drones. And we can talk about your... transformation.... at a more opportune time."

"Yes ma'am." He said as her feed cut out. Then he turned back to the princess. "How can I help?" He asked.

Amina filled him in.

\------------------------------

King Farrick looked at all the scrolls and notes that had been laid out in front of him.

He looked at the people arrayed before him. Mages, soldiers, members of the druid confluence, some of the castle healers.

And he felt tired.

"So we have reason to believe." Arch Mage Marcos droned on in his slow, old man droll. "That the blight hasn't actually been.... er.... destroyed... as it were." Farrick sighed as he listened. "But rather that they have been um... it has been.... removed." He muttered something to himself about terminology before continuing. "That it has.... entered the cosmos... your majesty." He said with a gesture toward the ceiling.

He turned and addressed the other people present. "Do those of you who were there concur?" He asked.

The druids and several of the mages began to nod their heads.

"And it took the Conduit with it." One of the druids chimed in. "Or at least most of it. One of the Five has re-manifested."

The king took that in. The energies, the world altering POWERS, that had collided had been monumental in their importance and impact on the world. And both of them were effectively gone now.

"What kind of effects will that have on this world?" He asked.

An older member of the druids present, who seemed to be made of some kind of sand stone though none of it fell off as he moved, spoke up.

"In the short term not much." She said in a grating voice. "They have already begun to recover the plant life of the area and are reclaiming the matter from the er.... shield?... bag?... whatever you want to call it." The King wouldn't have called her tone cheerful, but it at least sounded positive. "However, Nek'Mar, as this one is named this time, is only the herald of feasting and growth. They have little sway over much else, though they are doing what they can."

"So we can expect some... turbulence.... in the region's natural order?" King Farrick asked.

The elder druid nodded slowly, and haltingly.

"We have already requested the aid of Conduit members from other confluences across the world." Another druid weighed in. "They are dispatching what they can. Though obviously this will put their regions into some turmoil as well."

The King nodded understanding. "Let them know that we appreciate any aide they can lend, and send word to their parent Kingdoms that we will reimburse them to the best of our ability."

The druids, and one of his scribes near them, nodded acknowledgement.

Then he turned to the healers.

"What of the Chois." He asked grimly. "And what of the Arch Mage."

Healer Shrend Farstorm spoke up, his tone weary and concerned.

"Mrs. Choi is.... recovering." He said. "At the very least her body will not fail her on our watch sir." He added with some pride. "She is however grieving. As I'm sure we can all understand. The young Captain, I am told, is in much the same state. One of the mistresses of slumber attends to him in his chambers." He sighed. "As for the arch mage. The.... changes... she underwent. Well, they were severe, and incredibly intense. Her body was only able to survive it because of a powerful relic she had in her possession. One which used the last of its power to save her this time."

"Her ring?" The King mused.

Shrend nodded. "Indeed sir. She is... whole. Though she has also regained the antlers that her merge with the Conduit caused." He turned to the druids, many of whom had turned in surprise at that. "Though, the powers did not return with it." He paused and looked uneasy for a moment. "In fact... none of her powers did."

Marcos spat out a bit of the tea he had been in the middle of slowly sipping next to the King.

"Her powers?" King Farrick asked curiously. "What do you mean?"

Shrend looked at the healers next to him, one of them, an older elf woman, nodded.

"She." He began. "It appears that she has no magical energy within her body now." He said. "There's a little in there. About the bare minimum that a native of this world would need to survive, I imagine. But little more than that."

"She lost her powers?" Marcos asked in surprise. He stood up as the healer nodded, and began slowly making his way toward the door, muttering about impossibilities and other things. King Farrick watched him leave.

"There's more." Shrend said as the door shut behind the old mage. He looked at the other healer again and nodded at her.

She stood up suddenly and began barking orders.

"Up!" She demanded. "Everybody up and out." She said, her tone commanding and surprising most of the other people seated into following the orders. The few who didn't were quickly shooed out of their seats by the woman and a few of the other healers present.

Once everyone had left save the King and the large Minotaur healer, Shrend spoke up again.

"She had.... a lot of energy forced through her body." He said uncertainly. "A lot of LIFE... energy. Energy of the Mother of the Forests." He continued. "Then she also had to use a relic that flooded her body with regenerative energies too."

The King listened to him intently, wondering where he was going with this.

"And." Shrend continued after a moment. "The night before. After the party."

And suddenly the king understood.

"She was with the young Joseph Choi." He said, finishing the thought for the healer.

Shrend nodded.

"It's far too early to tell." He admitted. "But in the few instances when she was conscious she mentioned learning of it while she was empowered. She at least is certain of it.

King Farrick had sat forward as the information had coalesced in his mind. Now he ran his hands over his face and through his hair in frustration and weariness.

"Let none know save those who must." He said after some moments of thought. "Least of all the Chois. Not yet. They need time to come back." He paused. "Once they're strong enough again. Strong enough to handle it. Until then you must keep it from spreading."

Shrend considered this. Then nodded.

"Aye sir." He said.

King Farrick gestured for him to leave.

"I." He began. "I need some time to think of everything I have learned." He said simply, and he watched the Minotaur nod understanding before turning to leave.

He sat there for who knew how long, simply sifting through everything.

When had being a king ever been this difficult? He wondered. Surely not since his wife had passed. And oh how he longed for her guidance here.

He stood, finally, and gathered the papers from in front of him.

"First step." He said to himself as he stood up fully. "Help your daughter."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10z3ksy/wait_is_this_just_gate_312/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (311/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I'm gonna put the rest of my note blocked out. Last chapter took a lot out of me and I don't want to sound preachy. So read it at your own discretion.

>!I don't think it would surprise anyone to learn that a writer often imparts bits of themselves and the people in their lives into their characters. How could they not? You write a character without any references and they'll just be a formless blob with a name that comes and goes without notice. I won't tell you who Joey's based on in my life. Because that's my story. And it's not being written here.!<

>!But Joseph Choi was one of the first characters written into this story. He's been canon pretty much since the beginning. He's been an important part of James's story and I did everything I could to make that feel real. And I've been proud to see how well I did when I've read all your comments about him throughout the series. Even the last chapter.!<

>!And now my keyboard has taken him from all of us. I tried to think up ways to make it not happen. And everything I tried just didn't feel true.!<

>!I'm not going to guarantee anything regarding any of the characters' futures. Good or bad. Not even Joey's (take that as you will). When the keys strike, they do so without much care for my, or your, desires.!<

>!Like James and the others. I'm just going to have to hope I'm strong enough, and skilled enough, to keep making it work.!<

>!Until it's done.!<

Until then, enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

Amina braced herself as she entered the room that she and James shared. In her hands she carried a tray with a light broth, a few small pieces of bread, and a glass of water. She opened it and was immediately taken aback by the smell that emanated from within. She'd expected it, the candles were meant to protect the person they were made for, and so smelled foul to anyone else, while smelling disarmingly pleasant to their actual target.

The priestess stood up as she entered, smiling softly as she bowed slightly to the princess.

Amina fought the urge to gag at the smell of mildew and foul meat.

"Any change?" She asked after steeling her resolve a bit.

The priestess shook her head as the smile faltered.

"He relives it over and over. His mind struggles to acknowledge the nightmare for what it really is." The blue skinned, slightly scaled, woman replied as she stepped aside. "I am doing what I can to blur the lines between the two, but he fights like a trapped beast." She added as she gestured for Amina to approach.

Amina took a moment to compose herself, fighting back tears and her sense of smell as she pulled the nightstand from beside their bed closer and setting the tray on top of it. Then she brushed James's hair back and wiped away the cold sweat there. Behind her the priestess covered one of the two candles.

James's eyes fluttered after a few minutes, then slowly opened.

"Hi." She said softly as she looked into them and felt her heart break at the pain that welled up behind them.

"A...." He began as he stirred a bit. "mina?" He asked.

"That's right." She said as her hand rubbed at his ear a bit. "I'm right here."

"What happened?"

"Nothing good." She said honestly. She saw the comprehension dawn in his expression. "I need you to sit up a bit okay? We need to get some food in you."

Tears began to form in his eyes and Amina knew that it was happening again.

"It's-" He said as he took a deep, shuddering breath. "It's... it's real?" He made a sound like a wounded animal as his wolf hand reached up and clawed at his shirt, leaving long scratches in the fabric and even the skin underneath. "No.... Where's Jojo?" He cried. "Mom?!"

Amina signaled for the priestess, who quickly uncapped the candle and hit it with a small burst of fire magic, sparking it to life. While she was doing that Amina clamped her hand down on James's wrist and began wrestling it away from him. Even delirious and half asleep she struggled to match his strength.

"JO...." He gasped into his pillow as he began squirming. "No! No come back! Please!" He begged.

The priestess used a small fan to waft some of the foul smelling candle fumes their direction and Amina pressed James's arm to her side as her left hand snaked under his head and pulled his face up until she could rest her forehead against his.

"It's okay." She whispered, lying to him as she felt her own tears drop from her face.

"No." He whimpered. But she could feel the arm growing weaker as it thrashed against her. The candles were already doing their job. "No. No Joey..... ^(No..... No....")

As Amina was about to lower him down and place the blanket back over him he surged forward and locked his other arm onto her shoulder with a grip that would have hurt a normal person.

"Amina it's not real." He begged her. "Say it's not real."

Amina looked down for a moment, and in a struggle of will, a struggle to not hurt the man she loved, but also not to lie to him. She shook her head.

"I'm sorry James." She said as she looked back up at him. "It is."

He stared at her for a moment, breathing heavily as he struggled to stay awake and then his arm went limp in her hand, and he fell back into the world of sleep.

She kissed him on the forehead before wiping the tears from first his cheeks, then her own.

She sat that way for several minutes, wallowing in the aroma of the awful candles and sorrow that sank into every corner of the room. Then, slowly, she stood up and picked up the tray again.

"He needs to eat." The priestess said sadly as Amina passed her. "It has been three days and he's only barely had water."

Amina stopped in her stride and closed her eyes.

"I'll see if one of the healers that his mother trained can give him one of those bags of nutrients they use." She said as she looked down at her husband's fitfully slumbering form. "Or maybe Chief Vickers. Barring that I'll see if a song of sustenance can be brought forth."

The priestess nodded, and Amina took her leave from the room that SHOULD have been filled with love and happiness, and instead was a place of unconscious despair.

When she rounded the corner she placed the tray on the pedestal of a statue and leaned against it as she fought to stem the flow of tears pouring from her eyes.

\--------------------------

"I'm sorry ma'am." Vickers said into the Communications hub. "I'm afraid that for the foreseeable future we need to consider Captain Choi as inoperative. Unfit for duty. The King has already agreed that I can take his place when it comes to P.O.W. relations until such a time as he's recovered. I was going to during the honeymoon anyways."

Colonel Muhammed nodded slowly. "And Mrs. DeLaRosa?" She asked.

"Still recovering." Vickers replied. "The chief healer thinks she may have had a heart attack. Ironically, based on the very training SHE helped him receive in understanding such things. Though, they assure me she'll make a full recovery. Physically anyways."

"What exactly happened out there chief?" She asked. "We have the footage from the drones and from you and Choi's glasses, but even slowed down a lot of it happened too fast to understand."

Vickers nodded as he rubbed his head where he'd pulled the duct tape spectacles off.

"If I'm honest." He began. "That's pretty much how it felt from the ground too ma'am." He tinkered with the controls on the hub and pulled up the footage, starting at when the druids had all broken from each other, right before the two brothers had flown into the sky. "One second we were enacting the plan with the massive bag. Then everything went to shit. Then things just.... they just accelerated so quickly. The next thing I knew I was catching the captain on my griffin."

He planted his massive hands on the table next to the hub, which seemed so small now, and looked down for a bit as he thought.

"You okay chief?" The Colonel asked.

He took a deep breath.

"No. Not really." He admitted. He stood up and paced a bit as he replayed everything in his mind.

The Colonel simply waited.

"Not gonna pretend that me and the younger Choi were friends or anything." He said after a moment. "But you'd have to be blind to not see that he was a good kid." He stopped for a moment. "I just.... I don't completely understand what happened yet." He admitted. "It just aint right."

She listened silently, nodding a bit as he spoke.

"It's hard to see innocent people hurt." She said after a moment. "Even more so when they get hurt trying to help."

He nodded.

"Yeah." He said simply.

There was a knock at the door, and Vickers turned to see the princess poking her head through.

"Evening princess." He said. "Any change?"

Amina shook her head. "If anything I think I may need your help chief Vickers." She replied.

Vickers nodded.

"Keep us updated Chief. Do what you can." The Colonel said. "We'll let you know if we learn anything from the drones. And we can talk about your... transformation.... at a more opportune time."

"Yes ma'am." He said as her feed cut out. Then he turned back to the princess. "How can I help?" He asked.

Amina filled him in.

\----------

King Farrick looked at all the scrolls and notes that had been laid out in front of him.

He looked at the people arrayed before him. Mages, soldiers, members of the druid confluence, some of the castle healers.

And he felt tired.

"So we have reason to believe." Arch Mage Marcos droned on in his slow, old man droll. "That the blight hasn't actually been.... er.... destroyed... as it were." Farrick sighed as he listened. "But rather that they have been um... it has been.... removed." He muttered something to himself about terminology before continuing. "That it has.... entered the cosmos... your majesty." He said with a gesture toward the ceiling.

He turned and addressed the other people present. "Do those of you who were there concur?" He asked.

The druids and several of the mages began to nod their heads.

"And it took the Conduit with it." One of the druids chimed in. "Or at least most of it. One of the Five has re-manifested."

The king took that in. The energies, the world altering POWERS, that had collided had been monumental in their importance and impact on the world. And both of them were effectively gone now.

"What kind of effects will that have on this world?" He asked.

An older member of the druids present, who seemed to be made of some kind of sand stone though none of it fell off as he moved, spoke up.

"In the short term not much." She said in a grating voice. "They have already begun to recover the plant life of the area and are reclaiming the matter from the er.... shield?... bag?... whatever you want to call it." The King wouldn't have called her tone cheerful, but it at least sounded positive. "However, Nek'Mar, as this one is named this time, is only the herald of feasting and growth. They have little sway over much else, though they are doing what they can."

"So we can expect some... turbulence.... in the region's natural order?" King Farrick asked.

The elder druid nodded slowly, and haltingly.

"We have already requested the aid of Conduit members from other confluences across the world." Another druid weighed in. "They are dispatching what they can. Though obviously this will put their regions into some turmoil as well."

The King nodded understanding. "Let them know that we appreciate any aide they can lend, and send word to their parent Kingdoms that we will reimburse them to the best of our ability."

The druids, and one of his scribes near them, nodded acknowledgement.

Then he turned to the healers.

"What of the Chois." He asked grimly. "And what of the Arch Mage."

Healer Shrend Farstorm spoke up, his tone weary and concerned.

"Mrs. Choi is.... recovering." He said. "At the very least her body will not fail her on our watch sir." He added with some pride. "She is however grieving. As I'm sure we can all understand. The young Captain, I am told, is in much the same state. One of the mistresses of slumber attends to him in his chambers." He sighed. "As for the arch mage. The.... changes... she underwent. Well, they were severe, and incredibly intense. Her body was only able to survive it because of a powerful relic she had in her possession. One which used the last of its power to save her this time."

"Her ring?" The King mused.

Shrend nodded. "Indeed sir. She is... whole. Though she has also regained the antlers that her merge with the Conduit caused." He turned to the druids, many of whom had turned in surprise at that. "Though, the powers did not return with it." He paused and looked uneasy for a moment. "In fact... none of her powers did."

Marcos spat out a bit of the tea he had been in the middle of slowly sipping next to the King.

"Her powers?" King Farrick asked curiously. "What do you mean?"

Shrend looked at the healers next to him, one of them, an older elf woman, nodded.

"She." He began. "It appears that she has no magical energy within her body now." He said. "There's a little in there. About the bare minimum that a native of this world would need to survive, I imagine. But little more than that."

"She lost her powers?" Marcos asked in surprise. He stood up as the healer nodded, and began slowly making his way toward the door, muttering about impossibilities and other things. King Farrick watched him leave.

"There's more." Shrend said as the door shut behind the old mage. He looked at the other healer again and nodded at her.

She stood up suddenly and began barking orders.

"Up!" She demanded. "Everybody up and out." She said, her tone commanding and surprising most of the other people seated into following the orders. The few who didn't were quickly shooed out of their seats by the woman and a few of the other healers present.

Once everyone had left save the King and the large Minotaur healer, Shrend spoke up again.

"She had.... a lot of energy forced through her body." He said uncertainly. "A lot of LIFE... energy. Energy of the Mother of the Forests." He continued. "Then she also had to use a relic that flooded her body with regenerative energies too."

The King listened to him intently, wondering where he was going with this.

"And." Shrend continued after a moment. "The night before. After the party."

And suddenly the king understood.

"She was with the young Joseph Choi." He said, finishing the thought for the healer.

Shrend nodded.

"It's far too early to tell." He admitted. "But in the few instances when she was conscious she mentioned learning of it while she was empowered. She at least is certain of it.

King Farrick had sat forward as the information had coalesced in his mind. Now he ran his hands over his face and through his hair in frustration and weariness.

"Let none know save those who must." He said after some moments of thought. "Least of all the Chois. Not yet. They need time to come back." He paused. "Once they're strong enough again. Strong enough to handle it. Until then you must keep it from spreading."

Shrend considered this. Then nodded.

"Aye sir." He said.

King Farrick gestured for him to leave.

"I." He began. "I need some time to think of everything I have learned." He said simply, and he watched the Minotaur nod understanding before turning to leave.

He sat there for who knew how long, simply sifting through everything.

When had being a king ever been this difficult? He wondered. Surely not since his wife had passed. And oh how he longed for her guidance here.

He stood, finally, and gathered the papers from in front of him.

"First step." He said to himself as he stood up fully. "Help your daughter."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10z3jeo/wait_is_this_just_gate_312/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (310/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I've uh.... I got nothing for you today readers.... I'm sorry.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James sat on the ground on his knees as the tears rolled down his cheeks in a torrent. His eyes panned around slowly without actually seeing any of the area around him. He screamed into the air loud, and long enough that his voice became ragged as it wound down. And as he did the memories of the few minutes that had just passed replayed in his mind like a nightmare.

>He remembered scrambling to his feet after the blast of power from Veliry's fall, and seeing his brother flying into the sky like a missile.

Bits of the now defunct plant dome/bag crashed around him as his hands dug into the thing he was holding onto.

>He remembered crying out "JOEY!" as he ran and jumped off of the massive mushroom platform and blasting into the sky after him. He hadn't spared a glance for Veliry as she lay on the ground, plant life and animal flesh sloughing off of her as she reached into one of the pockets on her robes. Nor did he so much as consider anything that had been in his "backblast" as he took off, all of which was now smoldering and destroyed.He remembered screaming for his brother to stop, and wondering at the small splatterings of blood that fell and landed on him as he flew, struggling to catch up to his rapidly accelerating sibling.

He stood up on legs covered in black veins and stumbled as he felt them turn to jelly beneath him. But he had to get back. Had to get home. Had to get help.

>He remembered feeling that NATURE energy from before flood back into the area ahead of him. Saw the green light that began emitting from his brother as he pushed himself to fly faster. And remembered something feeling his arm go numb as something he couldn't see flew past him, and faster than him, on an intercept course with his brother's new form. A form that now had a pair of antlers fused with its head.

He stumbled and fell as he tripped on something, a root or stone maybe, and he scrambled to keep a hold of the thing in his arms. He took a moment to sob into it, wailing and screaming as he did. A pair of strong, clawed, hands tried to lift him up and he shrugged away from them. They couldn't have him. Nobody could.

>He remembered the soft, yet resonating words of his brother as he finally began to close the distance on him."James." Joey had said. "Stop. Go back."Something had collided with him, something soft, and he felt his stomach go queasy as his flight faltered for a moment. Then it was past him, and merging with the tendrils that were flowing behind Joey."NO!" He'd cried out. "YOU GO BACK! DON'T DO THIS! COME BACK!"Joey had looked at him with sorrow in his eyes. "I can't." He'd said.And yet he'd slowed down. Not much, maybe just a few miles per hour, but it was enough that James had been able to catch all the way up with one last, massive, blast of energy.He'd clamped his hands onto his little brother's shoulders, a little too hard as his wolf claws dug in a bit, and he'd pulled Joey into a hug. His arms went numb as they went into the ethereal, not really there, tendrils.But he'd clamped onto his brother like a vice."James." Joey had said into his ear, almost whispering. "If you stay you'll die. We're already almost too high for you to breath. I have to do this.""No you don't!" James had yelled back. "NO! You have to go back!"

The hands hauled James to his feet. Somewhere, some long distance away, Vickers offered to help him. To help carry what his burden. James ignored him and shambled on. Towards the door, and the castle beyond it. Towards real help.

Towards their mother. She would know what to do. She'd always taken care of them. She could fix this.

>He remembered begging Joey to just come back. To give up whatever powers he'd taken into himself. To reject whatever those damned Gods had done to him. To just come back.Joey had wrapped James up in his own arms, and James had felt tears wet his cheek just under his ear where his brother cried. His vision blurred from a combination of tears, and oxygen deprivation. Though he was only marginally aware of either."I can't." He'd said. "I'm already gone."Then the tendrils had encompassed his arms even further, like snakes swallowing their prey. His arms had phased through his brother at the same moment that Joey released his hug.And as James's consciousness blurred into a tunnel, he'd began to fall.He'd reached for Joey. Had tried to summon more energy to get back up to him. Had cried out for him.And none of it had worked.He'd watched as more blobs of blight streamed through the sky at bullet speed toward his brother, merging with him even as his body began to glow in the cascade of light that Veliry had formerly possessed.And James had been unable to do anything about it.And as he'd struggled to maintain consciousness, and as he struggled feebly to gather any energy he could, there had been a flare of light. He thought he'd heard someone screaming in rage, someone other than him and his brother.Then there had been only darkness, as he plummeted.

James came around the bend in the small path, and past the thicket of forest he saw the door leading back to the castle. He also saw Atrafar, and the handful of soldiers, mages, and druids who had been awaiting news of what had happened. He saw his new wife, whose hands went to her mouth as she saw him and what he carried and broke out in tears.

James didn't acknowledge any of them.

Couldn't.

Not right now.

He simply walked through the open door like a tear streaked zombie, through the moment of vertigo, and into the castle.

\----------

Margaret Choi had been on her way to the healing ward to start her daily training.

The training had become a combination of the healers helping her further her magical abilities, and her helping them understand the technical side of medicine as Earth understood it.

The people on Earth had even sent over a few Veterinarian Medicine textbooks to see if they might help with some of the people with animal like features in their physiology. Today they were going to see if feline medical practices could help one of the castle's Felinians who had come in with some sort of recurring stomach issue.

She had rounded the corner, munching on a pastry as she went, when she'd ran into the King, almost literally as they stumbled into each other.

She'd greeted him as she always did, and asked what all the commotion was about. Soldiers and mages had been running around helter skelter since before she'd even woken up.

Then she'd seen the expression on his face and she'd paused.

"Lady Choi. I'm afraid there's been a development." He'd said, his tone chilling her. "Would you please follow me?"

A few minutes later they'd arrived at the large hall, where she was surprised to see countless people, many of whom were odd looking even by this world's standards, milling about uneasily.

The King had refused to answer any questions, insisting that even HE didn't know everything that was going on now. And her unease had grown with each step.

They only had to wait ten minutes for her to find out why.

She was piecing the events of the morning together from the soldiers in the room, some of whom she'd worked on in the healing ward. Her unease had continued to increase with each tidbit she cobbled together.

Then the room had gone silent, and she'd turned to see what everyone was looking at.

"Momma?" A quavering voice that she knew and loved, and had never heard sound like that before, asked and her blood ran cold at the sound of it.

The whole room turned around and beheld her son James as he stepped through the door with his little brother's lifeless form in his arms.

"James?" She asked as her mind struggled to understand. "Joseph?" She said as her hand reached up and clutched at her chest and her heart skipped.

"Momma... help." James pleaded as he fell to his knees.

The room seemed to spin, and her legs went out from under her as a series of hands reached out to catch her.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10y6s3i/wait_is_this_just_gate_311/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (310/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I've uh.... I got nothing for you today readers.... I'm sorry.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James sat on the ground on his knees as the tears rolled down his cheeks in a torrent. His eyes panned around slowly without actually seeing any of the area around him. He screamed into the air loud, and long enough that his voice became ragged as it wound down. And as he did the memories of the few minutes that had just passed replayed in his mind like a nightmare.

>He remembered scrambling to his feet after the blast of power from Veliry's fall, and seeing his brother flying into the sky like a missile.

Bits of the now defunct plant dome/bag crashed around him as his hands dug into the thing he was holding onto.

>He remembered crying out "JOEY!" as he ran and jumped off of the massive mushroom platform and blasting into the sky after him. He hadn't spared a glance for Veliry as she lay on the ground, plant life and animal flesh sloughing off of her as she reached into one of the pockets on her robes. Nor did he so much as consider anything that had been in his "backblast" as he took off, all of which was now smoldering and destroyed.
>
>He remembered screaming for his brother to stop, and wondering at the small splatterings of blood that fell and landed on him as he flew, struggling to catch up to his rapidly accelerating sibling.

He stood up on legs covered in black veins and stumbled as he felt them turn to jelly beneath him. But he had to get back. Had to get home. Had to get help.

>He remembered feeling that NATURE energy from before flood back into the area ahead of him. Saw the green light that began emitting from his brother as he pushed himself to fly faster. And remembered feeling his arm go numb as something he couldn't see flew past him, and faster than him, on an intercept course with his brother's new form. A form that now had a pair of antlers fused with its head.

He stumbled and fell as he tripped on something, a root or stone maybe, and he scrambled to keep a hold of the thing in his arms. He took a moment to sob into it, wailing and screaming as he did. A pair of strong, clawed, hands tried to lift him up and he shrugged away from them. They couldn't have him. Nobody could.

>He remembered the soft, yet resonating words of his brother as he finally began to close the distance on him.
>
>"James." Joey had said. "Stop. Go back."
>
>Something had collided with him, something soft, and he felt his stomach go queasy as his flight faltered for a moment. Then it was past him, and merging with the tendrils that were flowing behind Joey.
>
>"NO!" He'd cried out. "YOU GO BACK! DON'T DO THIS! COME BACK!"
>
>Joey had looked at him with sorrow in his eyes. "I can't." He'd said.
>
>And yet he'd slowed down. Not much, maybe just a few miles per hour, but it was enough that James had been able to catch all the way up with one last, massive, blast of energy.
>
>He'd clamped his hands onto his little brother's shoulders, a little too hard as his wolf claws dug in a bit, and he'd pulled Joey into a hug. His arms went numb as they went into the ethereal, not really there, tendrils.
>
>But he'd clamped onto his brother like a vice.
>
>"James." Joey had said into his ear, almost whispering. "If you stay you'll die. We're already almost too high for you to breath. I have to do this."
>
>"No you don't!" James had yelled back. "NO! You have to go back!"

The hands hauled James to his feet. Somewhere, some long distance away, Vickers offered to help him. To help carry his burden. James ignored him and shambled on. Towards the door, and the castle beyond it. Towards real help.

Towards their mother. She would know what to do. She'd always taken care of them. She could fix this.

>He remembered begging Joey to just come back. To give up whatever powers he'd taken into himself. To reject whatever those damned Gods had done to him. To just come back.
>
>Joey had wrapped James up in his own arms, and James had felt tears wet his cheek just under his ear where his brother cried. His vision blurred from a combination of tears, and oxygen deprivation. Though he was only marginally aware of either.
>
>"I can't." He'd said. "I'm already gone."
>

>Then the tendrils had encompassed his arms even further, like snakes swallowing their prey. His arms had phased through his brother at the same moment that Joey released his hug.
>
>And as James's consciousness blurred into a tunnel, he'd began to fall.
>
>He'd reached for Joey. Had tried to summon more energy to get back up to him. Had cried out for him.
>
>And none of it had worked.
>
>He'd watched as more blobs of blight streamed through the sky at bullet speed toward his brother, merging with him even as his body began to glow in the cascade of light that Veliry had formerly possessed.
>
>And James had been unable to do anything about it.
>
>And as he'd struggled to maintain consciousness, and as he struggled feebly to gather any energy he could, there had been a flare of light. He thought he'd heard someone screaming in rage, someone other than him and his brother.
>
>Then there had been only darkness, as he plummeted.

James came around the bend in the small path, and past the thicket of forest he saw the door leading back to the castle. He also saw Atrafar, and the handful of soldiers, mages, and druids who had been awaiting news of what had happened. He saw his new wife, whose hands went to her mouth as she saw him and what he carried and broke out in tears.

James didn't acknowledge any of them.

Couldn't.

Not right now.

He simply walked through the open door like a tear streaked zombie, through the moment of vertigo, and into the castle.

\----------

Margaret Choi had been on her way to the healing ward to start her daily training.

The training had become a combination of the healers helping her further her magical abilities, and her helping them understand the technical side of medicine as Earth understood it.

The people on Earth had even sent over a few Veterinarian Medicine textbooks to see if they might help with some of the people with animal like features in their physiology. Today they were going to see if feline medical practices could help one of the castle's Felinians who had come in with some sort of recurring stomach issue.

She had rounded the corner, munching on a pastry as she went, when she'd ran into the King, almost literally as they stumbled into each other.

She'd greeted him as she always did, and asked what all the commotion was about. Soldiers and mages had been running around helter skelter since before she'd even woken up.

Then she'd seen the expression on his face and she'd paused.

"Lady Choi. I'm afraid there's been a development." He'd said, his tone chilling her. "Would you please follow me?"

A few minutes later they'd arrived at the large hall, where she was surprised to see countless people, many of whom were odd looking even by this world's standards, milling about uneasily.

The King had refused to answer any questions, insisting that even HE didn't know everything that was going on now. And her unease had grown with each step.

They only had to wait ten minutes for her to find out why.

She was piecing the events of the morning together from the soldiers in the room, some of whom she'd worked on in the healing ward. Her unease had continued to increase with each tidbit she cobbled together.

Then the room had gone silent, and she'd turned to see what everyone was looking at.

"Momma?" A quavering voice that she knew and loved, and had never heard sound like that before, asked and her blood ran cold at the sound of it.

The whole room turned around and beheld her son James as he stepped through the door with his little brother's lifeless form in his arms.

"James?" She asked as her mind struggled to understand. "Joseph?" She said as her hand reached up and clutched at her chest and her heart skipped.

"Momma... help." James pleaded as he fell to his knees.

The room seemed to spin, and her legs went out from under her as a series of hands reached out to catch her.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10y6pya/wait_is_this_just_gate_311/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (309?)

Previous

Ignore the previous title screw up.

Writer's note: Well. Even I didn't know that was coming.

Shit.

\~

For the first time in this world's entire history, three separate Gods stepped foot onto it simultaneously and in the same general area. Two of them, the oldest and fairest of them all, though also the coldest and least forgiving, paid visit to two separate mortal beings who had taken into themselves entities of those god's purest forms.

The third simply trailed along after the other two. And as time imperceptibly halted for everyone except them and the two mortals they entreated with, the third god made counter offers that the first two gods already expected AND accepted.

Then, as they departed, time resumed.

And the two mortals, who were no longer TRULY mortal, began a metamorphosis.

\-----------------------

James landed on the ground in a slide and turned to look up at the clash above him.

The ground shook as the supporting plant structures swelled with mass and helped press the massive, pink-glowing, form of the druidic bottomless bag against the tentacles of the blight entity.

He watched as one of the tentacles swooped around the side of the bag and attempted to break it like it had with the previous one that he'd helped make. Then he watched as the bag deformed around the damaged area and began encompassing the attacking tentacle, enclosing it like a white blood cell attacking a virus.

Vickers landed next to him, Tom scrambling to a stop as he did.

"Is it working?" He asked, his rifle still aimed skyward as Tom wheeled around.

"I think so." James replied.

Above them the bag pushed back a bit as the entity's massive, multi-limbed form, surged forward. A loud cry of anger rose from the west, toward the massive tree as the ground beneath them trembled like an earthquake.

Prince Alixan flew overhead in a flurry of black feathered wings.

"HELP the arch ^(mage!)" He yelled as he flew into the distance.

Vickers kicked Tom into motion with a confused look on his face as James ran and leapt into the air, blasting off.

The two monstrous constructs above them writhed and deformed as they wrestled against each other.

\---------------------------

Joey stood up on uneasy legs, and was surprised to find that he was only wearing his boxers and socks that he'd brought over from Earth. His robes were gone.

He pushed off of what his senses told him was the ground, though his eyes saw nothing except a wide expanse of dark grey nothingness. It had no features, and as his hand pushed off the ground below it seemed to ripple, as if made of some kind of slow moving liquid, maybe oobleck.

As he stood he noticed a set of rabidly hungry eyes that glared at him from within a many-limbed form that seemed to shift and morph as he looked at it. And, almost instantly, he recognized it for what it was. He knew it in his very soul.

It was the blight entity in a sentient and conscious form. It was the one that the original Blight Possessed had warned the Agency about in Vickers' footage.

The Cleanser.

It stared at him as he stood up, and Joey got the sense that it would have circled him like a hungry animal if it had been allowed to.

Joey slowly backed up, keeping his eyes locked on it as he did.

Then he bumped into something.

His skin crawled as every sense in his mind screamed at him for the mistake.

Joey spun around rapidly, eager to get eyes on the new threat and then back on the Cleanser.

And he saw a rather plain looking man.

The sight made him do a double take. He tried to activate his visual magic to help him process but nothing happened.

Joey, thrown off, looked at the man and was immediately reminded of Milton from the old movie Office Space. The man was taller. And his clothes were a touch more refined. But he had the glasses, and the pens in his pocket, and the look of someone who had spent their entire life analyzing data on spread sheets and balancing finance accounts.

And he was smiling at Joey in a way that was eerily serene.

"Um..... Hi?" Joey said uncertainly.

"Hello Joseph Choi." The man said in a voice that was deeper and softer than a swimming pool full of cotton balls.

"Who are you?" Joey asked as he quickly peered back at the Cleanser, glad to see that it hadn't moved. "What is this place?"

As he asked the question he looked up and was temporarily dumbfounded at the sight of countless galaxies, sitting above him and seemingly close enough to touch.

"What's happening?" He added.

"You accidentally touched me just now." The man said, still just as softly. "Both in the real world, and here." He continued. "And your... body.... has already told you what has happened both times. And as such, who I am. What I am."

Joey thought back to how he'd bumped into the man just moments ago.

Every instinct and reflex in his body had screamed at him that he was in danger.

The man nodded.

"I'm dead?" He asked. And as he said it, the truth of it rang like a bell in his mind. "And you're.... death?"

The man's soft smile faltered a bit.

"I'm sorry." He said.

"You're one of the so-called gods that James met." Joey said. "Like the moon. And that Defiance guy."

"He and I are well acquainted, though we haven't met just yet." The man said. "Soon enough though. In the grand scheme of things."

Joey let the words sink in.

He'd died.

But he was doing so well. He'd been making strides towards having a life of his own. One where he felt like he was in control and able to function. He couldn't die yet.

The man smiled and nodded, seeming to understand the thoughts running through Joeys head even as they did so.

Questions raced through his mind right beside them.

"Why am I here?" He asked, sensing that it was the RIGHT question. "This place here and now." He said as he gestured at the area around them, then at the Cleanser. "With that thing? Why am I here." Tears streaked down his cheeks. "Why? Does everyone get this treatment?"

Death shook its head slightly.

"No." It admitted. "You are in a precarious situation. You see. You have been taken by..." It glanced over at the Cleanser for a moment. "My least favorite creation. But it happened almost simultaneously as that part of it entering the trap."

Joey lowered himself to the ground as he started wiping at the tears.

He'd planned on asking Miss Veliry out on a proper date when they got back. So they could talk and figure out what exactly they were now.

"And so, while you are consumed... cleansed as it would say." Death continued. "You are also.... how should I phrase this?... You're in a sort of limbo."

"And that's where I come in doc." The familiar voice of Bugs Bunny said as a hand rested on his shoulder.

Joey jumped at the sudden contact and looked over at the newly arrived entity as he scrambled away.

And he saw his brother.

"Relax Jojo." James said as Joey scrambled to his feet. "And sorry to preemptively burst your bubble but I'm not actually your brother."

"What?" He asked, freezing in his tracks.

"I'm not James." It repeated. And as it did Joey realized that its voice was deeper. And its arm wasn't covered in fur and ending in claws. Also it was wearing a standard army uniform, minus the helmet.

He backed away from it slowly.

"Who are you?" He asked as his hands pressed onto his ears. "What are you?"

The new entity put on a pained smile as its form shifted to that of one of his favorite teachers from middle school, Mr. Rastenberg.

"I go by Defiance." It said. "And I've got an offer for you."

Joey looked over at Death, who simply nodded.

"What is it?" He asked.

"Right now someone else's life hangs in the balance." Defiance said. "If I had it my way." He said in a conspiratorial tone. "I'd save both of you. But.... it's not that easy. And they will want to save you just as much as you want to save them."

There were only two people that were currently in life threatening situations that Joey knew of. And one of them should, theoretically, have been safe if everything else had gone right.

"Miss Veliry." He said, as the facts clicked into place.

Defiance nodded.

"One of you must live in order for events to reach the conclusion that has been laid out." Death said, just as softly as before. "Either one will work. For different reasons that will take things down different paths."

"But if both of you die." Defiance cut in. "The path goes a different way that neither of us-" He gestured at death and himself. "want."

Joey's hands pinched at his ears and pulled at his hair as they clamped down on his head. He needed James. He needed Miss Veliry.

He needed his mom and dad.

This couldn't be real.

Then Defiance's hand rested on his shoulder again. And Death's hand took the other.

"It's gonna be difficult kid." Defiance admitted. "This is gonna be the hardest thing any of you have to do for a long time. But it has to happen."

"One way or the other." Death said, and its voice was harder than before.

"What...." Joey began. "What do I have to do?"

And the Cleanser prowled a little bit closer to them.

\---------------

James landed near the cluster of druids at a run.

The group was smaller now. Or rather, it had less LIVING members. Many of them had transformed, violently, into various forms of plant and animal life.

Veliry still stood in the center of it, her arms now reaching out as if to grab at something and strangle it. Her goat-like eyes flaring with a dazzling array of colors as energy flowed out of her in waves that made James ache in a way that he couldn't put to words. The antlers sprouting from her head looked less like the growths of a woodland creature than they did the branches of a great tree like the one behind her. He skin resembled the lichen coated bark of that same tree, even as scales and fur pulsed between the pieces of it.

Prince Alixan had waded into the throng of druid forms and placed his hands on the shoulders of two of the still present people. He was locked in place, his back arched and his head hunched down as if he'd been hit and was recoiling from it.

James ran forward on instinct and grabbed onto the prince's arm. But as he did, he wasn't sure if he was trying to remove the prince, or join him.

He wasn't given a choice.

The moment his hands made contact with the massive, muscular, limb he felt pain surge through him. It reminded him of the time he'd been working on a truck back at his unit and had accidentally put his hands on the terminals of its battery. Only it was scaled up to such a level that he felt like he was burning alive.

He felt his knees buckle as he pressed his face into the prince's arm as if clinging onto it for his life.

And he became aware of everything within a hundred miles.

Including a conversation between Veliry and a god whose power was so far beyond either of the two that he'd met before.

^("Life.") He groaned out as his consciousness melted into those flowing through him. ^("Mother.... Goddess..... Veliry!") Then, as the conversation moved forward, rapid and all encompassing even in the briefest of moments that his mortal flesh would never perceive, he heard what it was about.

"JOEY!" He yelled in a burst as he realized why he hadn't seen his little brother yet. ^("NNNNNNNNooooooooo!")

And then he felt himself wash away with the current of the energies flowing through him as he became one more wire in that engine that he'd been reminded of.

But not before he felt himself explode with rage.

And instead of fighting the current of energy and souls and life. James turned into it, and rode it towards its destination.

\----------

Veliry sat in the bright green grass with tears in her eyes as the Goddess and her daughter, and Defiance finished their explanation.

"I...." She tried to counter as she rocked back and forth. "I can't.... I... I have too much to do. I had inventions to finish. Spells to complete. I... I had to keep teaching Joey. And we'd... we'd just..." She looked up at them. "You can't ask me to do that."

"We know." Defiance said as it sat next down next to her in the grass, having taken the form of Marcos as he had looked some thirty years earlier, when he'd been teaching a precocious young apprentice with red hair and a million questions. "But it's either that or things go.... wrong."

Life, in her radiance, turned with a confused expression on her face.

"Defiance. Is this your doing?" She asked in the stern voice that she rarely used.

Defiance sighed as he turned a bit.

"Yes and no." He said. "There's a reason I like the guy.

>!"NO!"!< An angry voice said from nearby.

Veliry wiped some of the tears away as she looked around. She had the sense of a familiar presence.

>!"YOU CAN'T HAVE HIM!"!< The voice repeated, and Veliry felt the ground tremble as the grass pulsed, as if blown by a sudden breeze. >!"YOU CAN'T HAVE JOEY!"!<

There was a loud tearing noise, and part of the serene scenery nearby began to ripple.

A face pressed against the veil of the in-between space they were in, and Veliry stood up in surprise.

"James?" She asked in confusion.

A finger pointed at her through the membrane of whatever he was pressing against.

"VELIRY!" He yelled. "DON'T YOU LET THEM TAKE HIM! HE'S NOT THEIRS!"

She could feel the rage in the young man as she saw his hands begin pulling at the barrier between them. How could he possibly be here.

"This one." The Mother of the Land spoke. "Is.... tenacious..... And angry."

Defiance stepped up in front of its favorite mortal and James turned up to look him in the eyes.

"YOU CAN'T HAVE HIM!" James cried out. And Veliry could hear the strain, the fear, and the heart ache, in the claim. "HE'S MY BROTHER! I WON'T LET YOU TAKE HIM! I'LL FUCKING KILL YOU! I'LL KILL ALL OF YOU!"

Defiance reached up and placed a hand on the face that struggled so desperately to pierce the veil into a place it wasn't allowed. It rested its palm on James's forehead and whispered.

^("I know you would.") It said as it pushed James back. ^("Not today though.")

"You sonofabitch!" James hissed through gritted teeth as he was pressed back into the flow of energy again.

Veliry looked down at the grass. At her hands, which were human once more.

"I know what I have to do." She said as she sank back down to the grass.

"I am sorry child." Life said somberly, knowing what the decision was.

"Go to hell." She said as the two goddesses faded, along with the area around her.

Defiance stepped up next to her again.

She looked up at him with curiosity as tears continued to stream down her non-existant cheeks.

"And now I give you the same offer I gave little Jojo." He said as he eased down next to her. "By the way, James getting in here however briefly WAS me."

He looked over at her with a devilish grin.

"There's.... a very narrow path." He said as he looked away. "A razors edge that can be walked between the two others. Care to hear about it?"

Veliry stared at him uncertainly. Then nodded.

\---------------------------

Vickers landed behind him only a few moments after he'd grabbed onto the prince. He'd wanted to cry out for Choi to stop. But even he could feel the power in this area as it made every instinct in his newly bestial mind and body scream at him that he was in danger. Tom screeched and bucked as he came in for the landing, trying to toss his rider and run from the confluence of power.

He fell off of the terrified creature and wasn't surprised to see his mount's loyalty fail in the wash of druidic magical energy and run from the area.

The SEAL fell to his hands and knees and clawed at the flesh of the massive mushroom, releasing a growl as if he was trying to intimidate the very thing that was scaring him. His claws dug in as he forced his own body into obedience and pushed through towards the Captain.

RUN! His mind yelled at itself. And every ounce of him wanted to listen to it.

"No." He growled through gritted teeth. "Gotta.... get him.... out."

And just as his clawed hand reached out for Choi's leg, the magic in the area dropped down to almost nothing and he lurched forward, latching onto the young captain's legs so unexpectedly that he felt blood well up around his claws for a moment before Choi fell backwards on top of him.

He rolled over, rolling Choi's limp body with him and for a moment he thought that the young man had died. Then he felt a heartbeat under his fingers as he touched his neck. It was beating with a machine-gun tempo.

Choi's eyes opened and scanned around rapidly.

He exploded up off the ground and onto his feet, swatting Vickers out of the way with a backhand that would have knocked a normal person out.

"WHERE IS HE!" He yelled with a rage that Vickers had never seen from him. "WHERE IS JO-"

He stilled suddenly as a glowing green hand touched to his forehead, and Vickers covered his eyes.

Veliry floated before James, wreathed in flowers and vines and glowing like a green sun. The antlers still sprouted from her head, but otherwise her body was all but human again.

There was a loud cracking noise that emanated from above them, so loud and long that for a moment Vickers thought it was lightning.

Choi looked up at her with tears pouring from his eyes.

"I have to save him." Vickers heard the young man say, sounding like he was begging. "Don't let them have him."

Vickers flinched as another crack emanated from the sky, and he looked up as light dawned on him and the others around them.

The massive construct above them was falling, no longer supported by the massive structures that the young mage had helped grow to support it. It no longer glowed pink. And Vickers' jaw dropped as he saw that a large portion of it was missing.

"I know." Veliry said in a voice that echoed, as if spoken from far away beyond a great chasm. "But only this time you can't. It is between he and I."

The druids, who had slowly regained their senses, fell or rolled over to their knees and began chanting. Prince Alixan simply stared at what was occurring, unable to understand what was happening even though he had also just shared a consciousness with them.

The sky darkened for a moment and they all turned to look at what had caused it.

Floating above them, surrounded by writhing masses of hard to look at tendrils that emerged from his back, and with eyes of the same unfathomable nothingness, was a young man's half naked form.

Vickers gasped as he saw who it was. And he heard Choi let out a cry of agony as he saw what had happened to his little brother.

And Veliry rose up to meet him.

"Hi." They both said simultaneously. Veliry's cheeks flared with slightly pinkish light even as Joey's hand reached up and slapped his forehead.

"You know?" Joey asked.

Veliry nodded.

Joey looked her in the eyes and smiled.

"The hard way then." He said as he rested his forehead against hers. "Goodbye Miss Veliry. I'm sorry.""

And before anyone could react, except maybe Veliry who chose not to, Joey reached up with both hands and tore the antlers from her head in a spray of gore.

The area erupted in a maelstrom of wind, magical energy, flying wildlife (though not all of them could fly), and a scream of pain that echoed throughout the land.

Veliry's unconscious form, covered in her own blood, and no longer glowing with magic, plummeted to the ground.

And Joey began to ascend like a bullet fired from a gun.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10x7elm/wait_is_this_just_gate_310/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (309/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Well. Even I didn't know that was coming.

Shit.

\~

For the first time in this world's entire history, three separate Gods stepped foot onto it simultaneously and in the same general area. Two of them, the oldest and fairest of them all, though also the coldest and least forgiving, paid visit to two separate mortal beings who had taken into themselves entities of those god's purest forms.

The third simply trailed along after the other two. And as time imperceptibly halted for everyone except them and the two mortals they entreated with, the third god made counter offers that the first two gods already expected AND accepted.

Then, as they departed, time resumed.

And the two mortals, who were no longer TRULY mortal, began a metamorphosis.

\----------

James landed on the ground in a slide and turned to look up at the clash above him.

The ground shook as the supporting plant structures swelled with mass and helped press the massive, pink-glowing, form of the druidic bottomless bag against the tentacles of the blight entity.

He watched as one of the tentacles swooped around the side of the bag and attempted to break it like it had with the previous one that he'd helped make. Then he watched as the bag deformed around the damaged area and began encompassing the attacking tentacle, enclosing it like a white blood cell attacking a virus.

Vickers landed next to him, Tom scrambling to a stop as he did.

"Is it working?" He asked, his rifle still aimed skyward as Tom wheeled around.

"I think so." James replied.

Above them the bag pushed back a bit as the entity's massive, multi-limbed form, surged forward. A loud cry of anger rose from the west, toward the massive tree as the ground beneath them trembled like an earthquake.

Prince Alixan flew overhead in a flurry of black feathered wings.

"HELP the arch ^(mage!") He yelled as he flew into the distance.

Vickers kicked Tom into motion with a confused look on his face as James ran and leapt into the air, blasting off.

The two monstrous constructs above them writhed and deformed as they wrestled against each other.

\----------

Joey stood up on uneasy legs, and was surprised to find that he was only wearing his boxers and socks that he'd brought over from Earth. His robes were gone.

He pushed off of what his senses told him was the ground, though his eyes saw nothing except a wide expanse of dark grey nothingness. It had no features, and as his hand pushed off the ground below it seemed to ripple, as if made of some kind of slow moving liquid, maybe oobleck.

As he stood he noticed a set of rabidly hungry eyes that glared at him from within a many-limbed form that seemed to shift and morph as he looked at it. And, almost instantly, he recognized it for what it was. He knew it in his very soul.

It was the blight entity in a sentient and conscious form. It was the one that the original Blight Possessed had warned the Agency about in Vickers' footage.

The Cleanser.

It stared at him as he stood up, and Joey got the sense that it would have circled him like a hungry animal if it had been allowed to.

Joey slowly backed up, keeping his eyes locked on it as he did.

Then he bumped into something.

His skin crawled as every sense in his mind screamed at him for the mistake.

Joey spun around rapidly, eager to get eyes on the new threat and then back on the Cleanser.

And he saw a rather plain looking man.

The sight made him do a double take. He tried to activate his visual magic to help him process but nothing happened.

Joey, thrown off, looked at the man and was immediately reminded of Milton from the old movie Office Space. The man was taller. And his clothes were a touch more refined. But he had the glasses, and the pens in his pocket, and the look of someone who had spent their entire life analyzing data on spread sheets and balancing finance accounts.

And he was smiling at Joey in a way that was eerily serene.

"Um..... Hi?" Joey said uncertainly.

"Hello Joseph Choi." The man said in a voice that was deeper and softer than a swimming pool full of cotton balls.

"Who are you?" Joey asked as he quickly peered back at the Cleanser, glad to see that it hadn't moved. "What is this place?"

As he asked the question he looked up and was temporarily dumbfounded at the sight of countless galaxies, sitting above him and seemingly close enough to touch.

"What's happening?" He added.

"You accidentally touched me just now." The man said, still just as softly. "Both in the real world, and here." He continued. "And your... body.... has already told you what has happened both times. And as such, who I am. What I am."

Joey thought back to how he'd bumped into the man just moments ago.

Every instinct and reflex in his body had screamed at him that he was in danger.

The man nodded.

"I'm dead?" He asked. And as he said it, the truth of it rang like a bell in his mind. "And you're.... death?"

The man's soft smile faltered a bit.

"I'm sorry." He said.

"You're one of the so-called gods that James met." Joey said. "Like the moon. And that Defiance guy."

"He and I are well acquainted, though we haven't met just yet." The man said. "Soon enough though. In the grand scheme of things."

Joey let the words sink in.

He'd died.

But he was doing so well. He'd been making strides towards having a life of his own. One where he felt like he was in control and able to function. He couldn't die yet.

The man smiled and nodded, seeming to understand the thoughts running through Joeys head even as they did so.

Questions raced through his mind right beside them.

"Why am I here?" He asked, sensing that it was the RIGHT question. "This place here and now." He said as he gestured at the area around them, then at the Cleanser. "With that thing? Why am I here." Tears streaked down his cheeks. "Why? Does everyone get this treatment?"

Death shook its head slightly.

"No." It admitted. "You are in a precarious situation. You see. You have been taken by..." It glanced over at the Cleanser for a moment. "My least favorite creation. But it happened almost simultaneously as that part of it entering the trap."

Joey lowered himself to the ground as he started wiping at the tears.

He'd planned on asking Miss Veliry out on a proper date when they got back. So they could talk and figure out what exactly they were now.

"And so, while you are consumed... cleansed as it would say." Death continued. "You are also.... how should I phrase this?... You're in a sort of limbo."

"And that's where I come in doc." The familiar voice of Bugs Bunny said as a hand rested on his shoulder.

Joey jumped at the sudden contact and looked over at the newly arrived entity as he scrambled away.

And he saw his brother.

"Relax Jojo." James said as Joey scrambled to his feet. "And sorry to preemptively burst your bubble but I'm not actually your brother."

"What?" He asked, freezing in his tracks.

"I'm not James." It repeated. And as it did Joey realized that its voice was deeper. And its arm wasn't covered in fur and ending in claws. Also it was wearing a standard army uniform, minus the helmet.

He backed away from it slowly.

"Who are you?" He asked as his hands pressed onto his ears. "What are you?"

The new entity put on a pained smile as its form shifted to that of one of his favorite teachers from middle school, Mr. Rastenberg.

"I go by Defiance." It said. "And I've got an offer for you."

Joey looked over at Death, who simply nodded.

"What is it?" He asked.

"Right now someone else's life hangs in the balance." Defiance said. "If I had it my way." He said in a conspiratorial tone. "I'd save both of you. But.... it's not that easy. And they will want to save you just as much as you want to save them."

There were only two people that were currently in life threatening situations that Joey knew of. And one of them should, theoretically, have been safe if everything else had gone right.

"Miss Veliry." He said, as the facts clicked into place.

Defiance nodded.

"One of you must live in order for events to reach the conclusion that has been laid out." Death said, just as softly as before. "Either one will work. For different reasons that will take things down different paths."

"But if both of you die." Defiance cut in. "The path goes a different way that neither of us-" He gestured at death and himself. "want."

Joey's hands pinched at his ears and pulled at his hair as they clamped down on his head. He needed James. He needed Miss Veliry.

He needed his mom and dad.

This couldn't be real.

Then Defiance's hand rested on his shoulder again. And Death's hand took the other.

"It's gonna be difficult kid." Defiance admitted. "This is gonna be the hardest thing any of you have to do for a long time. But it has to happen."

"One way or the other." Death said, and its voice was harder than before.

"What...." Joey began. "What do I have to do?"

And the Cleanser prowled a little bit closer to them.

\---------------

James landed near the cluster of druids at a run.

The group was smaller now. Or rather, it had less LIVING members. Many of them had transformed, violently, into various forms of plant and animal life.

Veliry still stood in the center of it, her arms now reaching out as if to grab at something and strangle it. Her goat-like eyes flaring with a dazzling array of colors as energy flowed out of her in waves that made James ache in a way that he couldn't put to words. The antlers sprouting from her head looked less like the growths of a woodland creature than they did the branches of a great tree like the one behind her. Her skin resembled the lichen coated bark of that same tree, even as scales and fur pulsed between the pieces of it.

Prince Alixan had waded into the throng of druid forms and placed his hands on the shoulders of two of the still present people. He was locked in place, his back arched and his head hunched down as if he'd been hit and was recoiling from it.

James ran forward on instinct and grabbed onto the prince's arm. But as he did, he wasn't sure if he was trying to remove the prince, or join him.

He wasn't given a choice.

The moment his hands made contact with the massive, muscular, limb he felt pain surge through him. It reminded him of the time he'd been working on a truck back at his unit and had accidentally put his hands on the terminals of its battery. Only it was scaled up to such a level that he felt like he was burning alive.

He felt his knees buckle as he pressed his face into the prince's arm as if clinging onto it for his life.

And he became aware of everything within a hundred miles.

Including a conversation between Veliry and a god whose power was so far beyond either of the two that he'd met before.

^("Life.") He groaned out as his consciousness melted into those flowing through him. ^("Mother.... Goddess..... Veliry!") Then, as the conversation moved forward, rapid and all encompassing even in the briefest of moments that his mortal flesh would never perceive, he heard what it was about.

"JOEY!" He yelled in a burst as he realized why he hadn't seen his little brother yet. ^("NNNNNNNNooooooooo!")

And then he felt himself wash away with the current of the energies flowing through him as he became one more wire in that engine that he'd been reminded of.

But not before he felt himself explode with rage.

And instead of fighting the current of energy and souls and life. James turned into it, and rode it towards its destination.

\----------

Veliry sat in the bright green grass with tears in her eyes as the Goddess and her daughter, and Defiance finished their explanation.

"I...." She tried to counter as she rocked back and forth. "I can't.... I... I have too much to do. I had inventions to finish. Spells to complete. I... I had to keep teaching Joey. And we'd... we'd just..." She looked up at them. "You can't ask me to do that."

"We know." Defiance said as it sat next down next to her in the grass, having taken the form of Marcos as he had looked some thirty years earlier, when he'd been teaching a precocious young apprentice with red hair and a million questions. "But it's either that or things go.... wrong."

Life, in her radiance, turned with a confused expression on her face.

"Defiance. Is this your doing?" She asked in the stern voice that she rarely used.

Defiance sighed as he turned a bit.

"Yes and no." He said. "There's a reason I like the guy.

>!"NO!"!< An angry voice said from nearby.

Veliry wiped some of the tears away as she looked around. She had the sense of a familiar presence.

>!"YOU CAN'T HAVE HIM!"!< The voice repeated, and Veliry felt the ground tremble as the grass pulsed, as if blown by a sudden breeze. >!"YOU CAN'T HAVE JOEY!"!<

There was a loud tearing noise, and part of the serene scenery nearby began to ripple.

A face pressed against the veil of the in-between space they were in, and Veliry stood up in surprise.

"James?" She asked in confusion.

A finger pointed at her through the membrane of whatever he was pressing against.

"VELIRY!" He yelled. "DON'T YOU LET THEM TAKE HIM! HE'S NOT THEIRS!"

She could feel the rage in the young man as she saw his hands begin pulling at the barrier between them. How could he possibly be here.

"This one." The Mother of the Land spoke. "Is.... tenacious..... And angry."

Defiance stepped up in front of its favorite mortal and James turned up to look him in the eyes.

"YOU CAN'T HAVE HIM!" James cried out. And Veliry could hear the strain, the fear, and the heart ache, in the claim. "HE'S MY BROTHER! I WON'T LET YOU TAKE HIM! I'LL FUCKING KILL YOU! I'LL KILL ALL OF YOU!"

Defiance reached up and placed a hand on the face that struggled so desperately to pierce the veil into a place it wasn't allowed. It rested its palm on James's forehead and whispered.

^("I know you would.") It said as it pushed James back. ^("Not today though.")

"You sonofabitch!" James hissed through gritted teeth as he was pressed back into the flow of energy again.

Veliry looked down at the grass. At her hands, which were human once more.

"I know what I have to do." She said as she sank back down to the grass.

"I am sorry child." Life said somberly, knowing what the decision was.

"Go to hell." She said as the two goddesses faded, along with the area around her.

Defiance stepped up next to her again.

She looked up at him with curiosity as tears continued to stream down her non-existant cheeks.

"And now I give you the same offer I gave little Jojo." He said as he eased down next to her. "By the way, James getting in here however briefly WAS me."

He looked over at her with a devilish grin.

"There's.... a very narrow path." He said as he looked away. "A razors edge that can be walked between the two others. Care to hear about it?"

Veliry stared at him uncertainly. Then nodded.

\---------------------------

Vickers landed behind him only a few moments after he'd grabbed onto the prince. He'd wanted to cry out for Choi to stop. But even he could feel the power in this area as it made every instinct in his newly bestial mind and body scream at him that he was in danger. Tom screeched and bucked as he came in for the landing, trying to toss his rider and run from the confluence of power.

He fell off of the terrified creature and wasn't surprised to see his mount's loyalty fail in the wash of druidic magical energy and run from the area.

The SEAL fell to his hands and knees and clawed at the flesh of the massive mushroom, releasing a growl as if he was trying to intimidate the very thing that was scaring him. His claws dug in as he forced his own body into obedience and pushed through towards the Captain.

RUN! His mind yelled at itself. And every ounce of him wanted to listen to it.

"No." He growled through gritted teeth. "Gotta.... get him.... out."

And just as his clawed hand reached out for Choi's leg, the magic in the area dropped down to almost nothing and he lurched forward, latching onto the young captain's legs so unexpectedly that he felt blood well up around his claws for a moment before Choi fell backwards on top of him.

He rolled over, rolling Choi's limp body with him and for a moment he thought that the young man had died. Then he felt a heartbeat under his fingers as he touched his neck. It was beating with a machine-gun tempo.

Choi's eyes opened and scanned around rapidly.

He exploded up off the ground and onto his feet, swatting Vickers out of the way with a backhand that would have knocked a normal person out.

"WHERE IS HE!" He yelled with a rage that Vickers had never seen from him. "WHERE IS JO-"

He stilled suddenly as a glowing green hand touched to his forehead, and Vickers covered his eyes.

Veliry floated before James, wreathed in flowers and vines and glowing like a green sun. The antlers still sprouted from her head, but otherwise her body was all but human again.

There was a loud cracking noise that emanated from above them, so loud and long that for a moment Vickers thought it was lightning.

Choi looked up at her with tears pouring from his eyes.

"I have to save him." Vickers heard the young man say, sounding like he was begging. "Don't let them have him."

Vickers flinched as another crack emanated from the sky, and he looked up as light dawned on him and the others around them.

The massive construct above them was falling, no longer supported by the massive structures that the young mage had helped grow to support it. It no longer glowed pink. And Vickers' jaw dropped as he saw that a large portion of it was missing.

"I know." Veliry said in a voice that echoed, as if spoken from far away beyond a great chasm. "But only this time you can't. It is between he and I."

The druids, who had slowly regained their senses, fell or rolled over to their knees and began chanting. Prince Alixan simply stared at what was occurring, unable to understand what was happening even though he had also just shared a consciousness with them.

The sky darkened for a moment and they all turned to look at what had caused it.

Floating above them, surrounded by writhing masses of hard to look at tendrils that emerged from his back, and with eyes of the same unfathomable nothingness, was a young man's half naked form.

Vickers gasped as he saw who it was. And he heard Choi let out a cry of agony as he saw what had happened to his little brother.

And Veliry rose up to meet him.

"Hi." They both said simultaneously. Veliry's cheeks flared with slightly pinkish light even as Joey's hand reached up and slapped his forehead.

"You know?" Joey asked.

Veliry nodded.

Joey looked her in the eyes and smiled.

"The hard way then." He said as he rested his forehead against hers. "Goodbye Miss Veliry. I'm sorry.""

And before anyone could react, except maybe Veliry who chose not to, Joey reached up with both hands and tore the antlers from her head in a spray of gore.

The area erupted in a maelstrom of wind, magical energy, flying wildlife (though not all of them could fly), and a scream of pain that echoed throughout the land.

Veliry's unconscious form, covered in her own blood, and no longer glowing with magic, plummeted to the ground.

And Joey began to ascend like a bullet fired from a gun.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10x7cy2/wait_is_this_just_gate_310/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (308/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Whooo boy!..... That is one STEEP ass cliff! Helluva fall if you don't hold onto that one.

>!Remember that I don't know where the story is going until I write it!<.

Anyways, I'll see y'all tomorrow.

Enjoy!

\~

"SO!" James yelled as he and his brother flew through the air in their vastly different styles. "WHAT IS THE PLAN?"

Joey pointed over his shoulder and up into the sky. "THE DOME!"

James rolled over slowly as he flew and looked int he indicated direction. To his surprise, the dome that had formerly been protecting the druids from the Blight Entity was no longer a dome. Instead it had flexed and inverted itself into almost the opposite direction, resembling a massive satellite dish as opposed to a shield. Three massive columns of plant life almost as big as the central tree itself had sprouted from the ground below to support it.

To James, it looked almost like a catcher's mitt. One that was reaching towards... Then the whole thing made sense.

He was about to speak again as he rolled over, when he was suddenly caught off guard by the arrival of a massive, darkly feathered, form.

"You're going to use the druid shield as a bottomless bag?" Prince Alixan interrupted.

The darkly feathered mantle that the prince usually wore, which James could have sworn had burned up outside Jadesport, had sprouted from his shoulders and become two massive raven-like wings with which the prince flew. Rings of bright red energy pulsed around his legs and left spirals of red magic behind him like contrails, making him go faster.

Joey looked at the massive prince with no small amount of awe. Awe that James was certain was on his face as well. Then Joey nodded.

"Arch Mage Veliry has taken the conduit into herself hasn't she?" The Crown Prince asked.

This time when Joey nodded his face bore a grim expression.

Prince Alixan nodded his own understanding. "Then we'd best hurry. What's OUR part in it?"

James snapped out of his awestruck surprise and listened. He'd have to ask questions later. For now, he listened.

"WE'RE THE BAIT!" Joey said in response, and James realized that the prince hadn't been yelling to be heard. Another question for later, since he wasn't using magic to project his voice as far as James could tell.

The Prince didn't question it. He simply looked at the former shield dome and nodded. James looked up over his shoulder and saw that it had moved until it was almost past them now.

"Right!" The prince said instead. "Get it up and away from the ground and forest. Got it." He looked at James and grinned. "Your little brother exceeds you hero. Better keep up."

Then his wings flapped as he redirected himself up higher and away from them, and James suddenly felt himself being left behind by BOTH of the flying casters.

"What?" James asked himself sharply as he redirected his flight to follow.

Well fuck you. He thought somewhat hotly as he drew his rifle from the bottomless bag he had on his back. I've got the one thing that might catch its attention.

Then James almost fell from the sky as a sudden series of explosions went off as a massive, also feathered, form flew past him.

BA-BA-BA-BANG!!

Vickers flew past on the back of his griffin Tom while unleashing a burst of fire from his own rifle at the massive entity in the distance ahead.

"What the fuck!" James asked as he re-stabilized his flight.

"CATCH UP CHOI!" The massive were-jaguar yelled over his shoulder as he lifted his rifle back to his cheek with one hand, the other holding onto Tom's reins.

James burst into speed and caught back up to the flying SEAL.

"How the hell did you get up here?" He asked.

Vickers turned to look at him and James had to struggle not to laugh. The seal had a pair of glasses like his on. Only the arms had been covered by two strips of duct tape that held them to the front of his face sloppily.

"What do you mean?" The large man asked. "I'm on a damn griffin. This is an air fight right? Let me guess, the druids are gonna choke slam the bitch with the massive thingy."

James shrugged, though he doubted the gesture looked the same as he flew through the air.

"Pretty much." He answered.

"Bullets worked last time." Vickers continued. "So bullets."

James lifted his own rifle and tapped his glasses so that the lens feed switched from right to left.

"Yep." He said.

"And tall boy and your bro are probably gonna blast with magic?"

"Probably." James agreed.

"Then let's get to work." Vickers said as he shouldered his rifle again and opened fire as he kicked Tom into motion again.

James suppressed a grin as he saw how daintily the SEAL had to hold the weapon, using only the claw of his finger to actually depress the trigger when he fired.

Then he looked at the entity, and saw several small ripples in its IR image where he had to assume Vickers' rounds had just impacted.

And he saw the creature's tentacles begin writhing toward them.

He blasted his way up higher, leaving Vickers behind, shouldered his rifle, and looked down the sights.

BA-BA-BANG!

\----------

Veliry was not herself right now.

She was everything in the area.

She was the druids that held her in place even as they lent her their support.

She was the massive tree that loomed over them.

She was the woodland creatures. The birds, and beasts, and insects all, that were running from what she told them was danger.

She was the fungal spores that seeded the sky around them. The spores that multiplied faster than any fungus ever had before, refilling the voids that the entity left in the wake of its movement almost as fast as it could devour them, allowing her to see it clearly like never before.

She was the repurposed shield that moved to conform to the plan that the young man had told them about. The young man who to Veliry's mind, which seemed so inconsequential at the moment, was incredibly important. The one who had, for brief moments before, and the whole of the previous night, been a part of her.

All animals are part of each other. A deep part of her mind that wasn't really a part of it. The part that she had allowed in for the sake of this battle. That flowed around her like a storm of anger and fear and.... and love.... for all living things. People are of my kind too. My sentient shepherds forget this. But all that lives in nature is mine to nurture. The voice said. Then it took a much graver tone. AND DEFEND.

She had to protect him. Like he had tried to do for her before.

She had to protect all of them.

Then she felt a portion of the forest disappear into the monster's power, a long ragged slash that destroyed acres of trees, the soil beneath them, all the animals living within that were too slow to escape, and so much more.

And Veliry was consumed by the rage that the very world felt at the violation to its flesh.

The horns that had torn their way through her skin elongated and sprouted several new points as blood gushed from her temples. Her insect-like mandibles gnashed and tore one of her lips as she grimaced in pain and rage that her own body didn't register. One of the druids supporting her cried out as he burst into a cloud of dandelion fluff and gnats that blew away in the wind the flowed around them, his soul burning out from the magic that chenneled through it.

She would show this thing. This abomination from the gods that had created her, had created this whole world, what real power looked like.

Her hand, which now resembled the padded claw of some kind of gecko more than it did a human's, reached out as if trying to grasp at something. She snarled as pink magical energy, energy that was Veliry's and NOT nature's, flowed from it and up into the sky.

And the dome.... no the web.... that she now controlled, reached out towards the thing that had so offended it.

Hurry Joseph. She thought as she struggled with the power flowing through her.

\----------

Joey felt the energy that burst from behind him and stopped in his tracks, slowing to a hover, as he looked back.

He saw and felt the energy that WASN'T part of the druidic power he'd felt before when he'd inadvertently joined in on Veliry's circle.

And he saw the plant based construction above them reaching like a massive, grasping, hand toward the Blight Entity.

He turned toward the Entity just in time to see one of those tendrils, which he was somehow uniquely able to look at, moving toward him.

He lashed out at it with his wind magic, sending out pneumatic blasts that would punch wholes in normal people, and began running again.

"HIGHER!" He yelled out to the others. "IT'S ALMOST THERE!"

SHE... is almost there. He thought. And we have to help her get there before it's too late.

James and the others flew around him in a series of rapid spirals and loops as they unleashed their various attacks at the thing.

James and Vickers fired round after round at it as they rolled, and dove, and dipped their ways out of the tendril's paths.

Alixan seemed to shadow Joey's movements, using the young mage as a sign of where to go and where not to go since he couldn't SEE what he was fighting. He unleashed torrents of lightning and fire at any spot that Joey attacked with his wind magic. They watched as their attacks disappeared in mid air as they were vanished.

"IT'S WORKING!" James yelled as he passed Joey on a strafing run.

Joey felt the energy bloom behind him, heralded by a massive burst of pink light. He turned and saw that it was, in fact, working.

The entity had risen so high that it was no longer slashing at the land below it.

He turned back, his golden bright eyes watching as the massive bottomless bag neared him, and smiled.

Please be enough. He thought.

Then he let himself fall.

And as Joey plummeted toward the ground the two god-like entities of nature and destruction slammed into each other. He watched them, falling as if he was simply lying on his back, looking up at Miss Veliry's power as it clashed with the thing that wanted to devour this world.

Then something unexpected happened.

Joey felt himself immerse in something. Something soft, and yet also as physically THERE as anything else. Even though it really wasn't.

There was a.... tearing... sensation, that seemed to encompass his entire body. It was as if he was caught between two massive sources of suction or vacuum and being pulled into both at the same time.

I should have payed attention to where I was going. He thought as he saw everything above him go hazy for just a second. NO!

Then, though no one else saw it because they were all too busy getting out of the way of the titanic clash, Joseph Choi disappeared.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10wdxhc/wait_is_this_just_gate_309/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (308/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Whooo boy!..... That is one STEEP ass cliff! Helluva fall if you don't hold onto that one.

>!Remember that I don't know where the story is going until I write it.!<

Anyways, I'll see y'all tomorrow.

Enjoy!

\~

"SO!" James yelled as he and his brother flew through the air in their vastly different styles. "WHAT IS THE PLAN?"

Joey pointed over his shoulder and up into the sky. "THE DOME!"

James rolled over slowly as he flew and looked int he indicated direction. To his surprise, the dome that had formerly been protecting the druids from the Blight Entity was no longer a dome. Instead it had flexed and inverted itself into almost the opposite direction, resembling a massive satellite dish as opposed to a shield. Three massive columns of plant life almost as big as the central tree itself had sprouted from the ground below to support it.

To James, it looked almost like a catcher's mitt. One that was reaching towards... Then the whole thing made sense.

He was about to speak again as he rolled over, when he was suddenly caught off guard by the arrival of a massive, darkly feathered, form.

"You're going to use the druid shield as a bottomless bag?" Prince Alixan interrupted.

The darkly feathered mantle that the prince usually wore, which James could have sworn had burned up outside Jadesport, had sprouted from his shoulders and become two massive raven-like wings with which the prince flew. Rings of bright red energy pulsed around his legs and left spirals of red magic behind him like contrails, making him go faster.

Joey looked at the massive prince with no small amount of awe. Awe that James was certain was on his face as well. Then Joey nodded.

"Arch Mage Veliry has taken the conduit into herself hasn't she?" The Crown Prince asked.

This time when Joey nodded his face bore a grim expression.

Prince Alixan nodded his own understanding. "Then we'd best hurry. What's OUR part in it?"

James snapped out of his awestruck surprise and listened. He'd have to ask questions later. For now, he listened.

"WE'RE THE BAIT!" Joey said in response, and James realized that the prince hadn't been yelling to be heard. Another question for later, since he wasn't using magic to project his voice as far as James could tell.

The Prince didn't question it. He simply looked at the former shield dome and nodded. James looked up over his shoulder and saw that it had moved until it was almost past them now.

"Right!" The prince said instead. "Get it up and away from the ground and forest. Got it." He looked at James and grinned. "Your little brother exceeds you hero. Better keep up."

Then his wings flapped as he redirected himself up higher and away from them, and James suddenly felt himself being left behind by BOTH of the flying casters.

"What?" James asked himself sharply as he redirected his flight to follow.

Well fuck you. He thought somewhat hotly as he drew his rifle from the bottomless bag he had on his back. I've got the one thing that might catch its attention.

Then James almost fell from the sky as a sudden series of explosions went off as a massive, also feathered, form flew past him.

BA-BA-BA-BANG!!

Vickers flew past on the back of his griffin Tom while unleashing a burst of fire from his own rifle at the massive entity in the distance ahead.

"What the fuck!" James asked as he re-stabilized his flight.

"CATCH UP CHOI!" The massive were-jaguar yelled over his shoulder as he lifted his rifle back to his cheek with one hand, the other holding onto Tom's reins.

James burst into speed and caught back up to the flying SEAL.

"How the hell did you get up here?" He asked.

Vickers turned to look at him and James had to struggle not to laugh. The seal had a pair of glasses like his on. Only the arms had been covered by two strips of duct tape that held them to the front of his face sloppily.

"What do you mean?" The large man asked. "I'm on a damn griffin. This is an air fight right? Let me guess, the druids are gonna choke slam the bitch with the massive thingy."

James shrugged, though he doubted the gesture looked the same as he flew through the air.

"Pretty much." He answered.

"Bullets worked last time." Vickers continued. "So bullets."

James lifted his own rifle and tapped his glasses so that the lens feed switched from right to left.

"Yep." He said.

"And tall boy and your bro are probably gonna blast with magic?"

"Probably." James agreed.

"Then let's get to work." Vickers said as he shouldered his rifle again and opened fire as he kicked Tom into motion again.

James suppressed a grin as he saw how daintily the SEAL had to hold the weapon, using only the claw of his finger to actually depress the trigger when he fired.

Then he looked at the entity, and saw several small ripples in its IR image where he had to assume Vickers' rounds had just impacted.

And he saw the creature's tentacles begin writhing toward them.

He blasted his way up higher, leaving Vickers behind, shouldered his rifle, and looked down the sights.

BA-BA-BANG!

\----------

Veliry was not herself right now.

She was everything in the area.

She was the druids that held her in place even as they lent her their support.

She was the massive tree that loomed over them.

She was the woodland creatures. The birds, and beasts, and insects all, that were running from what she told them was danger.

She was the fungal spores that seeded the sky around them. The spores that multiplied faster than any fungus ever had before, refilling the voids that the entity left in the wake of its movement almost as fast as it could devour them, allowing her to see it clearly like never before.

She was the repurposed shield that moved to conform to the plan that the young man had told them about. The young man who to Veliry's mind, which seemed so inconsequential at the moment, was incredibly important. The one who had, for brief moments before, and the whole of the previous night, been a part of her.

All animals are part of each other. Said a deep part of her mind that wasn't really a part of it. The part that she had allowed in for the sake of this battle. That flowed around her like a storm of anger and fear and.... and love.... for all living things. People are of my kind too. My sentient shepherds forget this. But all that lives in nature is mine to nurture. The voice said. Then it took a much graver tone. AND DEFEND.

She had to protect him. Like he had tried to do for her before.

She had to protect all of them.

Then she felt a portion of the forest disappear into the monster's power, a long ragged slash that destroyed acres of trees, the soil beneath them, all the animals living within that were too slow to escape, and so much more.

And Veliry was consumed by the rage that the very world felt at the violation to its flesh.

The horns that had torn their way through her skin elongated and sprouted several new points as blood gushed from her temples. Her insect-like mandibles gnashed and tore one of her lips as she grimaced in pain and rage that her own body didn't register. One of the druids supporting her cried out as he burst into a cloud of dandelion fluff and gnats that blew away in the wind that flowed around them, his soul burning out from the magic that channeled through it.

She would show this thing. This abomination from the gods that had created her, had created this whole world, what real power looked like.

Her hand, which now resembled the padded claw of some kind of gecko more than it did a human's, reached out as if trying to grasp at something. She snarled as pink magical energy, energy that was Veliry's and NOT nature's, flowed from it and up into the sky.

And the dome.... no the web.... that she now controlled, reached out towards the thing that had so offended it.

Hurry Joseph. She thought as she struggled with the power flowing through her.

\----------

Joey felt the energy that burst from behind him and stopped in his tracks, slowing to a hover, as he looked back.

He saw and felt the energy that WASN'T part of the druidic power he'd felt before when he'd inadvertently joined in on Veliry's circle.

And he saw the plant based construction above them reaching like a massive, grasping, hand toward the Blight Entity.

He turned toward the Entity just in time to see one of those tendrils, which he was somehow uniquely able to look at, moving toward him.

He lashed out at it with his wind magic, sending out pneumatic blasts that would punch wholes in normal people, and began running again.

"HIGHER!" He yelled out to the others. "IT'S ALMOST THERE!"

SHE... is almost there. He thought. And we have to help her get there before it's too late.

James and the others flew around him in a series of rapid spirals and loops as they unleashed their various attacks at the thing.

James and Vickers fired round after round at it as they rolled, and dove, and dipped their ways out of the tendril's paths.

Alixan seemed to shadow Joey's movements, using the young mage as a sign of where to go and where not to go since he couldn't SEE what he was fighting. He unleashed torrents of lightning and fire at any spot that Joey attacked with his wind magic. They watched as their attacks disappeared in mid air as they were vanished.

"IT'S WORKING!" James yelled as he passed Joey on a strafing run.

Joey felt the energy bloom behind him, heralded by a massive burst of pink light. He turned and saw that it was, in fact, working.

The entity had risen so high that it was no longer slashing at the land below it.

He turned back, his golden bright eyes watching as the massive bottomless bag neared him, and smiled.

Please be enough. He thought.

Then he let himself fall.

And as Joey plummeted toward the ground the two god-like entities of nature and destruction slammed into each other. He watched them, falling as if he was simply lying on his back, looking up at Miss Veliry's power as it clashed with the thing that wanted to devour this world.

Then something unexpected happened.

Joey felt himself immerse in something. Something soft, and yet also as physically THERE as anything else. Even though it really wasn't.

There was a.... tearing... sensation, that seemed to encompass his entire body. It was as if he was caught between two massive sources of suction or vacuum and being pulled into both at the same time.

I should have payed attention to where I was going. He thought as he saw everything above him go hazy for just a second. NO!

Then, though no one else saw it because they were all too busy getting out of the way of the titanic clash, Joseph Choi disappeared.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10wd22z/wait_is_this_just_gate_309/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (307/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Magic. What CAN'T it do with a bit of know how and a whole lot of gumption?

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"Joey?" Amina asked from where she was regaining her feet next to him.

Ten yards away the youngest Choi stood, floating several inches off the ground, his arms outstretched in their direction. His eyes glowed with golden light that was painful to look at, and his clothes fluttered and blew as though the wind was still thrashing around them.

"NO TIME!" He yelled. "KEEP RUNNING!"

Vickers looked back and saw the approaching cliff of disappearing ground getting closer.

He didn't need to be told twice. Before they could react he wrapped his arms around the two women and began to run past the young man at a sprint, which for him was fast enough to dominate the autobahn.

Once they'd gotten clear Joey vanished in a blur and an explosion of the ground beneath his feet.

\-------------------------

James regained his senses only a moment before the log that had knocked him out of the air disappeared. He saw the massive inky form of the blight entity's expanding form in his right eye and knew that he was only a split second from following it.

He didn't know what would happen he did. He'd managed to resist the vanishing powers of the blight possessed outside of Jadesport. But it had been a close thing, and he'd only managed it through luck. And even then he'd lost all his Petravian equipment and felt like he was being ripped apart.

Who know what would happen now that he'd been here this long. Hell, even if he still proved immune, would his wolf arm? Or would he be left a cripple?

He didn't feel like finding out.

James's eyes glowed with gold light as he slowed down his perception of the world around him.

He scanned around to find an opening.

When he did he saw a world of inky black tentacles. And the only safe way out, relatively speaking, was behind him. And the tentacles were moving much faster now. And he needed to get turned around before he could get out.

Or did he?

He'd had the thought before. He'd just always been worried about what would happen to his teeth.

Energy gathered in his head as he focused it on his slowly opening mouth.

His magic stuttered a bit as he sensed a magical presence getting close to him that felt familiar, even as it made the hair on his left arm puff up in fear. He saw a blur of gold light approach that was almost too fast for him to track, and when he looked he saw someone who couldn't, and shouldn't, have been there for numerous reasons.

And then, hundreds of feet off the ground and in the middle of a writhing mass of tentacles of world ending destruction, his little brother tackled him.

Then he was hurtling through the open air like a comet, falling backwards and away from the blight entity with at least half a mile of distance between them.

And Joey was RUNNING through the air above him.

"JOEY!" He yelled as he plummeted.

"NO TIME!" His younger brother yelled. "CATCH UP!"

Oh, hell no you didn't. James thought as the childishly competitive part of his mind kicked him into a reaction.

James tucked into a roll and focused his energy on his feet.

\----------

Joey's thoughts were so fast and frantic that they couldn't be put on paper if he'd tried and had a whole day to translate them into words.

He was thinking of everything around him at once, while focusing only on whatever task he was actively doing. For now that meant moving fast.

He had a part of his mind focused on how it would pull of THE PLAN. But that could wait until he found Miss Veliry.

Part of his mind was focusing on keeping his eye magic running. He needed it at these speeds, especially with how the blight entity had sped itself up, and with all the plant life still falling from the sky, a large portion of which would be helpful if he could pull this off.

A part of his mind tangential to that part remembered what his teacher had taught him about making bottomless bags from scratch, which he'd done several times as practice to help him eventually learn full enchantment. Bottomless bags were commonly used as the first step to that field. That was what he would need to do now.

Another part was controlling the wind magic that was simultaneously stabilizing the air around him to help the people he was passing, and also allowing him to slide through it like a slipstream. Wind magic was the one type of magic that Joey had learned well enough to use in an emergency, and he used it now to move like nothing else. Images of bullets in slow motion, the SR-71 Blackbird and it's descendant the SRI

-34 Merlin, F1 race cars in wind tunnels, and birds of prey diving through the air ran through that part of his mind. Everything he'd ever learned about wind resistance, vortices, eddies, and aerodynamic flowed through his brain as he moved between currents of wind like a golden-lit wraith even as his feet pressed on cushions of air like they were stepping stones.

The rest of his mind, simultaneously overwhelmed AND focused as it was, processed everything around him.

And Joseph Choi flew while running like an Olympian.

Only a few scant few heartbeats after he'd saved him, his brother managed to catch up to him, twin jets of heat energy trailing from his feet.

"What are you doing here?" He yelled over the wind rushing past them.

"Helping." Joey answered. "Where's Miss Veliry? We'll need her."

James spun and dropped a bit to dodge a piece of falling tree, then rose back up.

"She went to the druids. You have a plan?" James asked.

"Yeah..... Well... more of an idea with a lot of hope. And we'll need them too." Joey said. He pointed up. "And we need to do it before the dome falls entirely."

"Then you better keep up." James said with a grin as he pushed himself to fly even faster.

Joey smirked. "You only caught up because I'm stabilizing the wind big bro." He retorted as he began running faster. He flew past James and smiled as he saw his older brother's look of shocked upset.

\------------------------

When the two brothers made it to the sight where the Five had fallen, they learned the hard way that Veliry was the only reason the dome above HADN'T fallen entirely.

Druids of all types, sizes, and even colors cried out as the two of them landed on the massive mushroom, sticking off of the even more massive tree the dominated the landscape,where the Five had been seated. Where they had been, several small forests of different kinds, and one large stone and sand column, had sprouted. And where another had sat there was now a massive chunk of the mushroom platform that was missing.

Veliry stood in the middle of their ruined forms, surrounded by a throng of the druids that had been aiding them in the casting that had raised the defenses, and as the two Choi's looked at her they couldn't tell if the druids were attempting to pull her away from the area, or help her stay there.

They were grabbing her, arms and legs and waist and shoulders alike. Some of them looked as if they had been on the verge of hauling her away from the Five. The rest looked as if they were joining her in prayer. It reminded James of how the werefolk had looked after he'd helped inter Kela. And they were chanting in hauntingly deep tones that vibrated through the very air around them.

Veliry glowed with a swirling mixture of colors that to James reminded him of images he'd seen of tropical beaches and birds of paradise. To Joey those same colors brought memories of fall leaves and forest animals foraging for the winter.

A pair of massive, many pointed, antlers sprouted from the sides of her head and dried blood marked where they had burst through her skin. Her arms were aimed at the sky above and seemed to shimmer as they shifted rapidly between being feathered, scaled, furred, and bare. The two brothers could feel the magical energy flowing from all around them, through her, and into the sky above. A thick growth of moss was covering her skin from her neck, down under her shirt, and down her left arm until the elbow. Roots that looked redder than beets anchored her feet to the mushroom beneath her feet. Her eyes, with sideways pupils like those of a goat were locked onto the upper branches of the great tree that she and the mushroom stood upon.

Into the dome above.

Joey rushed to her side.

"Miss Veliry?" He asked as he wedged his way between two of the druids and grabbed her shoulders.

Joey's head snapped backwards and his back arched as his mind flooded with images, and sounds, and smells, tastes, and even feelings of everything around him. His mouth opened as if to scream even though the only sound he made was a gasp of shock.

"JOEY!" James yelled as he reached for his brother.

"LEAVE HIM!" A voice that seemed to come from everywhere at once said, making James's bones ache. He realized that it was coming from the druids, who'd temporarily halted their chanting to speak, and from Veliry AND his brother.

James froze mid step as he recoiled at the sudden outburst.

Joey spasmed in a fashion that looked painful to James, but his hands never left his teacher's, and lover's, shoulders.

Suddenly Veliry's head snapped down to look at James and her mouth opened to reveal a set of insect like pincers at the corners of her lips that he thought came from a centipede. At the same moment that she did, Joey's hands flew off of her shoulder as he stumbled back into James's surprised arms.

"DO IT!" They all said, minus Joey now. "HURRY! OR THE INTERLOPER SHALL DO AS THE OTHERS DID!"

"They mean Miss Veliry." Joey said weakly as he regained his feet and held his head in between his hands. "We need to move."

"What?" James asked as his brother pushed away from him and stumbled into a jog. "What just happened."

Joey shook his head.

"Explain later. Work now." His little brother said as he jumped into the air. "We're gonna use the dome!"

"WHAT?" James asked in confusion. But his little brother was already moving through the air with that odd running/flying style that he had. "Oh.... Fuck it!" James said as he leaped up to follow.

And they began flying back towards the Entity.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10vf0gj/wait_is_this_just_gate_308/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (307/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Magic. What CAN'T it do with a bit of know how and a whole lot of gumption?

Enjoy.

\~

Vickers trudged against the pull of the yawning maw of nothingness that he knew from sound was getting closer behind him. He could hear the ground falling away, could hear the debris and wind flying past and then simply disappearing suddenly. Could hear the occasional scream that ended abruptly.

He had no idea how close it was, and knew that if he looked back he would be disheartened by the sight.

The princess and Atrafar hung from where he'd fastened them to his vest, Amina with a spare d-ring, and Atrafar by a pair of gauntleted claws that were latched to his belt and molle panels with a death grip. He ignored the way the silver tips of her gauntlet dug into, and burned, his torso. He could deal with that later.

For now his feet and clawed hands dug into the, unfortunately soft, ground beneath them. They gripped at saplings and bushes that had yet to succumb to the vacuum-like force behind them. He was using every ounce of strength his newfound body could spare to keep him low and allow him to keep making headway.

But at this point it was less like walking and more like scrambling up a nearly vertical cliff.

He was in the middle of wondering if anyone else even COULD survive this kind of devastation when the situation changed.

He reached for the stump of some kind of plant that was mostly naked of leaves when suddenly the wind stopped rushing past them and he felt his two passengers fall to the ground in a heap as he lurched and fell forward on his face.

"DON'T STOP!" A familiar voice yelled. Vickers looked up in surprise as he recognized it.

"Joey?" Amina asked from where she was regaining her feet next to him.

Ten yards away the youngest Choi stood, floating several inches off the ground, his arms outstretched in their direction. His eyes glowed with golden light that was painful to look at, and his clothes fluttered and blew as though the wind was still thrashing around them.

"NO TIME!" He yelled. "KEEP RUNNING!"

Vickers looked back and saw the approaching cliff of disappearing ground getting closer.

He didn't need to be told twice. Before they could react he wrapped his arms around the two women and began to run past the young man at a sprint, which for him was fast enough to dominate the autobahn.

Once they'd gotten clear Joey vanished in a blur and an explosion of the ground beneath his feet.

\------------------------

James regained his senses only a moment before the log that had knocked him out of the air disappeared. He saw the massive inky form of the blight entity's expanding form in his right eye and knew that he was only a split second from following it.

He didn't know what would happen if he did. He'd managed to resist the vanishing powers of the blight possessed outside of Jadesport. But it had been a close thing, and he'd only managed it through luck. And even then he'd lost all his Petravian equipment and felt like he was being ripped apart.

Who knew what would happen now that he'd been here this long. Hell, even if he still proved immune, would his wolf arm? Or would he be left a cripple?

He didn't feel like finding out.

James's eyes glowed with gold light as he slowed down his perception of the world around him.

He scanned around to find an opening.

When he did he saw a world of inky black tentacles. And the only safe way out, relatively speaking, was behind him. And the tentacles were moving much faster now. And he needed to get turned around before he could get out.

Or did he?

He'd had the thought before. He'd just always been worried about what would happen to his teeth.

Energy gathered in his head as he focused it on his slowly opening mouth.

His magic stuttered a bit as he sensed a magical presence getting close to him that felt familiar, even as it made the hair on his left arm puff up in fear. He saw a blur of gold light approach that was almost too fast for him to track, and when he looked he saw someone who couldn't, and shouldn't, have been there for numerous reasons.

And then, hundreds of feet off the ground and in the middle of a writhing mass of tentacles of world ending destruction, his little brother tackled him.

Then he was hurtling through the open air like a comet, falling backwards and away from the blight entity with at least half a mile of distance between them.

And Joey was RUNNING through the air above him.

"JOEY!" He yelled as he plummeted.

"NO TIME!" His younger brother yelled. "CATCH UP!"

Oh, hell no you didn't. James thought as the childishly competitive part of his mind kicked him into a reaction.

James tucked into a roll and focused his energy on his feet.

\----------

Joey's thoughts were so fast and frantic that they couldn't be put on paper if he'd tried and had a whole day to translate them into words.

He was thinking of everything around him at once, while focusing only on whatever task he was actively doing. For now that meant moving fast.

He had a part of his mind focused on how it would pull of THE PLAN. But that could wait until he found Miss Veliry.

Part of his mind was focusing on keeping his eye magic running. He needed it at these speeds, especially with how the blight entity had sped itself up, and with all the plant life still falling from the sky, a large portion of which would be helpful if he could pull this off.

A part of his mind tangential to that part remembered what his teacher had taught him about making bottomless bags from scratch, which he'd done several times as practice to help him eventually learn full enchantment. Bottomless bags were commonly used as the first step to that field. That was what he would need to do now.

Another part was controlling the wind magic that was simultaneously stabilizing the air around him to help the people he was passing, and also allowing him to slide through it like a slipstream. Wind magic was the one type of magic that Joey had learned well enough to use in an emergency, and he used it now to move like nothing else. Images of bullets in slow motion, the SR-71 Blackbird and it's descendant the SRI - 34 Merlin, F1 race cars in wind tunnels, and birds of prey diving through the air ran through that part of his mind. Everything he'd ever learned about wind resistance, vortices, eddies, and aerodynamic flowed through his brain as he moved between currents of wind like a golden-lit wraith even as his feet pressed on cushions of air like they were stepping stones.

The rest of his mind, simultaneously overwhelmed AND focused as it was, processed everything around him.

And Joseph Choi flew while running like an Olympian.

Only a few scant few heartbeats after he'd saved him, his brother managed to catch up to him, twin jets of heat energy trailing from his feet.

"What are you doing here?" He yelled over the wind rushing past them.

"Helping." Joey answered. "Where's Miss Veliry? We'll need her."

James spun and dropped a bit to dodge a piece of falling tree, then rose back up.

"She went to the druids. You have a plan?" James asked.

"Yeah..... Well... more of an idea with a lot of hope. And we'll need them too." Joey said. He pointed up. "And we need to do it before the dome falls entirely."

"Then you better keep up." James said with a grin as he pushed himself to fly even faster.

Joey smirked. "You only caught up because I'm stabilizing the wind big bro." He retorted as he began running faster. He flew past James and smiled as he saw his older brother's look of shocked upset.

\------------------------

When the two brothers made it to the sight where the Five had fallen, they learned the hard way that Veliry was the only reason the dome above HADN'T fallen entirely.

Druids of all types, sizes, and even colors cried out as the two of them landed on the massive mushroom, sticking off of the even more massive tree the dominated the landscape,where the Five had been seated. Where they had been, several small forests of different kinds, and one large stone and sand column, had sprouted. And where another had sat there was now a massive chunk of the mushroom platform that was missing.

Veliry stood in the middle of their ruined forms, surrounded by a throng of the druids that had been aiding them in the casting that had raised the defenses, and as the two Choi's looked at her they couldn't tell if the druids were attempting to pull her away from the area, or help her stay there.

They were grabbing her, arms and legs and waist and shoulders alike. Some of them looked as if they had been on the verge of hauling her away from the Five. The rest looked as if they were joining her in prayer. It reminded James of how the werefolk had looked after he'd helped inter Kela. And they were chanting in hauntingly deep tones that vibrated through the very air around them.

Veliry glowed with a swirling mixture of colors that to James reminded him of images he'd seen of tropical beaches and birds of paradise. To Joey those same colors brought memories of fall leaves and forest animals foraging for the winter.

A pair of massive, many pointed, antlers sprouted from the sides of her head and dried blood marked where they had burst through her skin. Her arms were aimed at the sky above and seemed to shimmer as they shifted rapidly between being feathered, scaled, furred, and bare. The two brothers could feel the magical energy flowing from all around them, through her, and into the sky above. A thick growth of moss was covering her skin from her neck, down under her shirt, and down her left arm until the elbow. Roots that looked redder than beets anchored her feet to the mushroom beneath her feet. Her eyes, with sideways pupils like those of a goat were locked onto the upper branches of the great tree that she and the mushroom stood upon.

Into the dome above.

Joey rushed to her side.

"Miss Veliry?" He asked as he wedged his way between two of the druids and grabbed her shoulders.

Joey's head snapped backwards and his back arched as his mind flooded with images, and sounds, and smells, tastes, and even feelings of everything around him. His mouth opened as if to scream even though the only sound he made was a gasp of shock.

"JOEY!" James yelled as he reached for his brother.

"LEAVE HIM!" A voice that seemed to come from everywhere at once said, making James's bones ache. He realized that it was coming from the druids, who'd temporarily halted their chanting to speak, and from Veliry AND his brother.

James froze mid step as he recoiled at the sudden outburst.

Joey spasmed in a fashion that looked painful to James, but his hands never left his teacher's, and lover's, shoulders.

Suddenly Veliry's head snapped down to look at James and her mouth opened to reveal a set of insect like pincers at the corners of her lips that he thought came from a centipede. At the same moment that she did, Joey's hands flew off of her shoulder as he stumbled back into James's surprised arms.

"DO IT!" They all said, minus Joey now. "HURRY! OR THE INTERLOPER SHALL DO AS THE OTHERS DID!"

"They mean Miss Veliry." Joey said weakly as he regained his feet and held his head in between his hands. "We need to move."

"What?" James asked as his brother pushed away from him and stumbled into a jog. "What just happened."

Joey shook his head.

"Explain later. Work now." His little brother said as he jumped into the air. "We're gonna use the dome!"

"WHAT?" James asked in confusion. But his little brother was already moving through the air with that odd running/flying style that he had. "Oh.... Fuck it!" James said as he leaped up to follow.

And they began flying back towards the Entity.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10veyb5/wait_is_this_just_gate_308/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (306/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Remember: No plan of action ever survived first contact with the enemy.

Enjoy

\~

"FALL BACK!" James yelled as he followed his own advice and jetted away from the part of the bag he'd been holding onto. "FALL BACK!"

Then as he turned and tried to yell again, James watched as a group of mages and druids vanished. The section of metal and wood reinforced cloth they'd been holding onto disappeared with them.

He saw the massive black mass of a tentacle sweep through the area they'd been in thanks to the infrared view on his glasses' right lens.

It had been going so well. Everything had been going so well. They'd been catching it. He'd seen them catching it, the writhing tentacles submerging slowly into the inky blackness of the bag they were holding between them.

Then the final druid ancient, the last of the group known as the Five, had died. There had been a massive roar of pain from somewhere behind him, and James had felt the magical energy of the area surging.

He hadn't understood at first. Why was the druid even still maintaining the massive living wall of plant life? They had not need of it anymore.

Then he had seen light bloom above him. Had seen the massive hole in the wall form a few hundred yards higher in the sky.

His glasses had shown him the squirming, otherwise invisible, tendril as it had snaked down and swiped at a group of people some hundred yards to his left.

He'd tried to warn them. But the tendril moved faster than he'd expected, and in a heartbeat the five people were devoured.

Then the last of the Five had detonated. And at almost the exact same moment, as energy flooded around him and everyone else, the bag's enchantment began to fail from the damage to its vessel.

Pink light began to glow from between the countless seams, at the stitching, and at the edge of the area the entity had taken, as the bag's magic unraveled.

James had never seen a bottomless bag fail before. He'd been warned about it, and had even had a couple of his bags damaged to near failure. But he'd never seen one actually fail.

As he raced away from the bag he became glad that it was empty.

There was a loud noise like nothing James had ever heard before. He was reminded of the noise that a soda can might make when being opened, only it was as if he was hearing the opposite of that. His brain struggled to understand the notion even as it heard it.

Then, James felt himself being pulled backwards in a rush.

He had a moment, brief as it was, to remember what he'd been taught about the destruction of bottomless bags. How they would violently expel anything inside them with enough energy to actually be hazardous to anyone nearby.

Normally, an empty bag would do little more than puff out a bit of magically charged air, and he wondered however briefly, why theirs hadn't done that.

Then he remembered that their massive bottomless bag wasn't actually filled with nothing, per se.

Or rather, it was, but it was filled with a different kind of nothing. A violent, evil, somewhat animated, and ravenous nothingness that was the blight.

They'd managed to jam three tendrils of the blight entity into the bag before it had counterattacked, if it was intelligent enough that this WAS a counter attack.

And now the bag was failing, and it was doing what bottomless bags did when they failed. It was ejecting its contents violently.

And now it was ejecting the blight entity violently.

All of this ran through James's mind in the split second between when his explosive flight style faltered.

He hadn't been able to fly at full speed because of his proximity to other flying people. But as he felt the backward tug he discarded the notion of safety in a subconscious effort to survive.

As he unleashed a larger blast from his feet, and was surprised to find he had gained no ground, he looked back and saw someone with a set of wings sprouting from their back as they disappeared in mid air.

The lens of his glasses that was still active showed the expanding cloud of dark cold space as it encroached rapidly.

James poured more power into his flight, releasing another massive explosion, this time even less restrained.

He felt himself gain a few feet and didn't bother looking back as he did.

Then something massive, and green, and rigid fell onto him from above and James began to fall.

\----------

Vickers felt the death of the last Druid holding the shield up as much as anyone else had. After all, he was magically attuned too, and with his new senses he heard the chorus of screams and wails of mourning that came from some miles away as the people helping the druid cried out.

He also heard the cacophony of startled exclamations up above as something happened to the people holding the upper side of the bag's opening.

He looked up and saw the piece of it that the entity destroyed first. Saw the small group of people disappear along with it.

"No." Princess Amina said softly from a few yards away.

Then the bag began to glow it's bright pink light around them.

"Oh, shit." He said.

"EVERYBODY RUN!!!!" The princess yelled as she herself began sprinting away.

The soldiers around them began bolting, and Vickers was one of them. He stumbled at first, having only done a small amount of running on his new legs so far, and still not being used to them all the way.

But as he did he moved faster than any of them. He'd already been faster than any Petravian as a human, his magically enhanced Earth muscle making him stronger and more capable than them by a large margin when it came to physical ability. Only werewolves had been capable of keeping up.

And now that he was one of the were, even they moved like they were in slow motion.

Vickers managed to get a hand on the back of Atrafar's armor just as the bag failed completely. He'd been on the verge of lifting her up and carrying her, then going and doing the same for the princess when the two of them were pulled from their feet as if someone had done that same thing to him and jerked him backwards roughly.

The two of them rolled backwards quickly before Atrafar managed to sink her silvered gauntlets into the ground and anchor them. Their roles reversed as she grabbed the handle on the back of his vest and kept him from rolling any further.

Vickers kicked over so that he was on all fours and watched as the ground behind them, and the people unfortunate enough to be on it, vanished.

He saw a blur of bright metal and Petravian crimson and growled as he lurched over and caught the princess by strap of her magical shield and hauled her into his arm.

He looked up at Atrafar, who was regaining her feet as she dug her clawed toes into the ground. He nodded at her and she released his vest as he matched her and dug in too. Princess Amina drew her sword and stabbed it into the dirt.

Vickers glanced back and saw the vanishing entity drawing nearer.

Something slammed into the ground ahead of him and he had to duck as something that looked like a massive, flower coated, log hit the ground, bounced, and flew over them and into the entity before disappearing.

He saw the princess glance up toward the sky, her eyes wide in surprise. He didn't need to hear her yell to know what was happening.

Without the druids holding it up, and with the destruction of both the bag, and the Blight Entity's tentacles, the dome of living wall around the Druidic forest was falling.

Vickers lowered himself down as far as he could go, took his empty hand off the ground, and hooked one of the numerous d-rings on his vest onto the princess's belt.

"HANG ON!" He shouted over the rush of wind and debris that was whipping past them and felt her latch onto the back of his vest with her non-sword arm.

Vickers clawed his way over to Atrafar, who was moving inches at a time as she kept digging her claws and gauntlets into the ground to maintain traction.

But Vickers was stronger and faster than she was now. And where she was moving inches at a time, he was stepping, slowly but surely, in full length strides as he leaned into the rushing wind.

Some piece of the dome slammed into his face, some kind of wide leaf that in the current conditions slapped him like a paddle, knocking him back just a bit. He absently looked back at it and saw it disappear only a few yards behind them.

Then he reached out and once again grabbed the back of Atrafar's armor.

With his support, the three of them began to make up some ground.

But so did the blight entity.

\----------

Joey watched everything unfold in horror.

"Guys?" He asked into the microphone. "What's happening?" He asked even though he KNEW what was going on.

He watched as the drone closest to the effort was sucked into the encroaching nothingness that read as a massive, growing, blotch of darkness to its heat sensors. Then he watched as its feed cut off and read as lost.

He watched as the people on the ground scrambled to safety, then began tumbling backwards, rolling and floundering as they did.

He watched as the people in the air began to slowly but surely pull back towards the nothingness, or else get knocked out of the air by falling debris and disappear only a moment later.

He saw the tell-tale explosions that his brother used to fly, and saw as they got closer and closer to the entity's expanding form. Then he saw a massive vine fall directly onto the point of the last explosion he'd seen, and then saw no more of them occur.

"James?" He asked into the microphone as the light around his eyes intensified, slowing the footage down even more.

He saw a small group of soldiers that were banded together into a human chain, and watched as they disappeared one by one, until a massive leaf slammed into the one who had managed to find some kind of handhold and knocked them loose. They disappeared only a moment later, along with the other three that had still been holding on.

"Miss Veliry?" He asked, not knowing WHERE she was in any of this.

Then he looked at the little notification that said he had a message to read. He clicked on it just as a reflex and the message to earth popped up with a response.

>How do those "bottomless" bags work? Do they have to be bags or can they be other containers? Explain nature of so called "Extra Dimensional Space" as you understand it.

Joey considered the message for only the briefest of moments before looking up at the video feeds again, tears welling up in his eyes as he struggled to keep his hands on the controls.

"Someone please answer." He said. Someone tried, and his screen showed Vickers' microphone going active for a moment. But all he heard was rushing wind and something that might have been a grunt of pain. "Anyone."

He watched as the remainder of the dome shield fell and was surprised at how intact it was despite having shed so much debris already.

Something clicked in his head, and he looked back at the message from Earth.

Then he looked at the feed of the falling dome of plant life.

The door to the room he was in exploded outward in a shower of wooden and metal shrapnel as Joey once more moved faster than any living being this world had ever seen.

Castle staff jumped out of the way as a blur of light and wind and terrified younger Choi flew through the halls and into the door that he had promised not to walk through only hours before.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10sxqpg/wait_is_this_just_gate_307/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (306/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Remember: No plan of action ever survived first contact with the enemy.

Enjoy

\~\~\~

Then the last of the Five had detonated. And at almost the exact same moment, as energy flooded around him and everyone else, the bag's enchantment began to fail from the damage to its vessel.

Pink light began to glow from between the countless seams, at the stitching, and at the edge of the area the entity had taken, as the bag's magic unraveled.

James had never seen a bottomless bag fail before. He'd been warned about it, and had even had a couple of his bags damaged to near failure. But he'd never seen one actually fail.

As he raced away from the bag he became glad that it was empty.

There was a loud noise like nothing James had ever heard before. He was reminded of the noise that a soda can might make when being opened, only it was as if he was hearing the opposite of that. His brain struggled to understand the notion even as it heard it.

Then, James felt himself being pulled backwards in a rush.

He had a moment, brief as it was, to remember what he'd been taught about the destruction of bottomless bags. How they would violently expel anything inside them with enough energy to actually be hazardous to anyone nearby.

Normally, an empty bag would do little more than puff out a bit of magically charged air, and he wondered however briefly, why theirs hadn't done that.

Then he remembered that their massive bottomless bag wasn't actually filled with nothing, per se.

Or rather, it was, but it was filled with a different kind of nothing. A violent, evil, somewhat animated, and ravenous nothingness that was the blight.

They'd managed to jam three tendrils of the blight entity into the bag before it had counterattacked, if it was intelligent enough that this WAS a counter attack.

And now the bag was failing, and it was doing what bottomless bags did when they failed. It was ejecting its contents violently.

And now it was ejecting the blight entity violently.

All of this ran through James's mind in the split second between when his explosive flight style faltered.

He hadn't been able to fly at full speed because of his proximity to other flying people. But as he felt the backward tug he discarded the notion of safety in a subconscious effort to survive.

As he unleashed a larger blast from his feet, and was surprised to find he had gained no ground, he looked back and saw someone with a set of wings sprouting from their back as they disappeared in mid air.

The lens of his glasses that was still active showed the expanding cloud of dark cold space as it encroached rapidly.

James poured more power into his flight, releasing another massive explosion, this time even less restrained.

He felt himself gain a few feet and didn't bother looking back as he did.

Then something massive, and green, and rigid fell onto him from above and James began to fall.

\----------

Vickers felt the death of the last Druid holding the shield up as much as anyone else had. After all, he was magically attuned too, and with his new senses he heard the chorus of screams and wails of mourning that came from some miles away as the people helping the druid cried out.

He also heard the cacophony of startled exclamations up above as something happened to the people holding the upper side of the bag's opening.

He looked up and saw the piece of it that the entity destroyed first. Saw the small group of people disappear along with it.

"No." Princess Amina said softly from a few yards away.

Then the bag began to glow it's bright pink light around them.

"Oh, shit." He said.

"EVERYBODY RUN!!!!" The princess yelled as she herself began sprinting away.

The soldiers around them began bolting, and Vickers was one of them. He stumbled at first, having only done a small amount of running on his new legs so far, and still not being used to them all the way.

But as he did he moved faster than any of them. He'd already been faster than any Petravian as a human, his magically enhanced Earth muscle making him stronger and more capable than them by a large margin when it came to physical ability. Only werewolves had been capable of keeping up.

And now that he was one of the were, even they moved like they were in slow motion.

Vickers managed to get a hand on the back of Atrafar's armor just as the bag failed completely. He'd been on the verge of lifting her up and carrying her, then going and doing the same for the princess when the two of them were pulled from their feet as if someone had done that same thing to him and jerked him backwards roughly.

The two of them rolled backwards quickly before Atrafar managed to sink her silvered gauntlets into the ground and anchor them. Their roles reversed as she grabbed the handle on the back of his vest and kept him from rolling any further.

Vickers kicked over so that he was on all fours and watched as the ground behind them, and the people unfortunate enough to be on it, vanished.

He saw a blur of bright metal and Petravian crimson and growled as he lurched over and caught the princess by strap of her magical shield and hauled her into his arm.

He looked up at Atrafar, who was regaining her feet as she dug her clawed toes into the ground. He nodded at her and she released his vest as he matched her and dug in too. Princess Amina drew her sword and stabbed it into the dirt.

Vickers glanced back and saw the vanishing entity drawing nearer.

Something slammed into the ground ahead of him and he had to duck as something that looked like a massive, flower coated, log hit the ground, bounced, and flew over them and into the entity before disappearing.

He saw the princess glance up toward the sky, her eyes wide in surprise. He didn't need to hear her yell to know what was happening.

Without the druids holding it up, and with the destruction of both the bag, and the Blight Entity's tentacles, the dome of living wall around the Druidic forest was falling.

Vickers lowered himself down as far as he could go, took his empty hand off the ground, and hooked one of the numerous d-rings on his vest onto the princess's belt.

"HANG ON!" He shouted over the rush of wind and debris that was whipping past them and felt her latch onto the back of his vest with her non-sword arm.

Vickers clawed his way over to Atrafar, who was moving inches at a time as she kept digging her claws and gauntlets into the ground to maintain traction.

But Vickers was stronger and faster than she was now. And where she was moving inches at a time, he was stepping, slowly but surely, in full length strides as he leaned into the rushing wind.

Some piece of the dome slammed into his face, some kind of wide leaf that in the current conditions slapped him like a paddle, knocking him back just a bit. He absently looked back at it and saw it disappear only a few yards behind them.

Then he reached out and once again grabbed the back of Atrafar's armor.

With his support, the three of them began to make up some ground.

But so did the blight entity.

\----------

Joey watched everything unfold in horror.

"Guys?" He asked into the microphone. "What's happening?" He asked even though he KNEW what was going on.

He watched as the drone closest to the effort was sucked into the encroaching nothingness that read as a massive, growing, blotch of darkness to its heat sensors. Then he watched as its feed cut off and read as lost.

He watched as the people on the ground scrambled to safety, then began tumbling backwards, rolling and floundering as they did.

He watched as the people in the air began to slowly but surely pull back towards the nothingness, or else get knocked out of the air by falling debris and disappear only a moment later.

He saw the tell-tale explosions that his brother used to fly, and saw as they got closer and closer to the entity's expanding form. Then he saw a massive vine fall directly onto the point of the last explosion he'd seen, and then saw no more of them occur.

"James?" He asked into the microphone as the light around his eyes intensified, slowing the footage down even more.

He saw a small group of soldiers that were banded together into a human chain, and watched as they disappeared one by one, until a massive leaf slammed into the one who had managed to find some kind of handhold and knocked them loose. They disappeared only a moment later, along with the other three that had still been holding on.

"Miss Veliry?" He asked, not knowing WHERE she was in any of this.

Then he looked at the little notification that said he had a message to read. He clicked on it just as a reflex and the message to earth popped up with a response.

>How do those "bottomless" bags work? Do they have to be bags or can they be other containers? Explain nature of so called "Extra Dimensional Space" as you understand it.

Joey considered the message for only the briefest of moments before looking up at the video feeds again, tears welling up in his eyes as he struggled to keep his hands on the controls.

"Someone please answer." He said. Someone tried, and his screen showed Vickers' microphone going active for a moment. But all he heard was rushing wind and something that might have been a grunt of pain. "Anyone."

He watched as the remainder of the dome shield fell and was surprised at how intact it was despite having shed so much debris already.

Something clicked in his head, and he looked back at the message from Earth.

Then he looked at the feed of the falling dome of plant life.

The door to the room he was in exploded outward in a shower of wooden and metal shrapnel as Joey once more moved faster than any living being this world had ever seen.

Castle staff jumped out of the way as a blur of light and wind and terrified younger Choi flew through the halls and into the door that he had promised not to walk through only hours before.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10sxozs/wait_is_this_just_gate_307/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (305/?)

Previous

Writer's note: In which a Great Value Brand Lord of the Rings army meets a Lovecraftian horror in battle. Grab the popcorn.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

being wrapped in miles of rope and chain and placed inside the fabric channel that would be woven into the mouth of the "bag".

The result was a construction that could have scooped up a small lake if it had wanted to. The sum of its colors and materials made it appear grayish brown when seen from a distance, not that any of them would save those not taking part in its deployment.

In the time it took to finish another of the Five fell to the magical energy they were using to power the living shield around the area. Everyone in the area felt the detonation of pure magical energy as Manadra the Soother erupted in a blast of magical energy that caused every plant in the area, even those that were on the new bag, to writhe and shudder.

The wall protecting them did much the same, and the two Choi brothers watched in fearful awe as the writhing tentacles of the blight entity took advantage of the temporary weakness to devour even more of it.

James joined in once the bag was complete and the casters that Veliry had brought over began tracing intricate runes and symbols on the inside of the bag's body in large strokes of red paint that glittered with bits of material. They cast forth with the bright pint magic that James had seen before as each of them lent their power to the creation of the new bottomless space.

They backed out slowly as the back/bottom of the bag began to glow, first with the bright pink light coming from their hands, then darkening to the dark black abyss that marked the artificially induced extra dimensional space. They continued, pouring more and more magic into the container even as some of them, Veliry included, kept the black space contained and stable while they added to it.

When it was done, they had enchanted square miles of material into a massive bottomless bag the likes of which their world had never seen before.

James sat on the ground just outside of it panting as he and Amina leaned their backs into each other. All the other mages and casters were in much the same state on the edges of the acres of inky darkness that now sat between them. Some of them even had the blackened veins of magical exhaustion formed on their arms and hands.

James could see the hints of them forming on his right hand, at the fingertips and just under his nails. He'd never made one of the bags before, though Veliry had taught him how.

"James." Joey said into their ears. "Everyone. You have to get up."

James tapped the button on his neck. "Yeah." He said as he brought his breathing back under control. "We know."

"No." Joey said firmly. "I've got one of the drones watching the last of the druid guys holding up the shield."

"The five." Veliry chimed in.

"Right. The five." He said absently. "I think another is starting to wear down. She's some kind of bird person so I can't be a hundred percent. But she's not looking too good."

"That'd be Trien." Veliry said. "It's not important. With three of the five down, they'll only wear out faster. We need to hurry."

James and Amina pressed their backs into each other as they rose up to their feet. James knocked his forhead against her shoulder armor real quick.

"All you general." He said and she nodded.

"Alright everyone!" She shouted as her throat glowed, amplifying her voice to supernatural volumes. "On your feet! We need to get this deployed!" She pointed to the side farthest from where the blight entity was attacking. "Anyone capable of flight on that side! You'll be lifting the top of the opening!" She pointed at the opposite side. "Everyone else on this side moving the bottom! Strongest people get priority! Druids with plant manipulation powers; stand back from those two groups! You'll be erecting trees as supports once its in place! Anyone that doesn't fit into those groups is moving the main body of the bag! We need to keep it from tearing!"

The mages, and laborers, and druids, and soldiers, all looked at her as if she was mad. James could see the looks of doubt on their faces. They were tired, and the sensation of the druid leader detonating only a few minutes before they'd enchanted the bag still weighed on them.

So he spoke up too.

"IF YOU'RE FROM THE CAPITAL RAISE YOUR HAND!" He shouted as loud as he could. Most of the soldiers and mages raised their hands, and James noticed that the ones on the far side of the bag weren't even looking at him, and probably couldn't hear him.

He pointed at the wall, just in time for a hole to form and shift back and forth. He couldn't help but notice that it filled itself in a lot slower than before.

"If you're from the capital than you know the stakes!" He said, not yelling as loudly this time. "That thing right there is gonna do to this place what the Elemental did to the capital way back when." He let that statement sink in as he saw the haunted, grim expressions on the faces of the people who'd slowly begun to lower their hands. "Only unlike the elemental, it doesn't leave anyone alive, and it can't be fought the normal way! And unlike the capital, if we don't stop it from destroying this place, then the impact on this world's plants and animals will be devastating!" He pointed at the bag next to them. "That's our best hope! But it's gonna take all of us to use it!"

He could see the severity of the situation sinking in. Nobody who was from the capital could forget what the elemental had done to their home. Everyone there knew somebody, or some place, that would never be in their lives again. He felt Amina's hand snake its way into his and he gripped it tightly.

"We fought that together!" She yelled. "We've.... recovered... from it together!"

Some of the people nearby began to nod, most of them were already moving to stand back up.

"Let's fight this one too!" She finished.

James leapt into the air and began flying over to the side of the bag she'd indicated for flyers. He marveled at the inky blackness below him as he did, and made a note not to fall into it. Other mages and druids leaped up and began flying in their various fashions as they joined him. Amina and Vickers began guiding the ground forces over to the opposite side. He cinched down the securing strap on his glasses as he did. He'd need them for this fight.

"GET TO YOUR STATIONS EVERYONE!" He shouted as he flew. "IT'S TIME TO SHOW THIS THING WHAT PETRAVIANS CAN DO!"

The people around the edge of the bag burst into motion again, their weary limbs and magically exhausted bodies forgotten in favor of action. They'd stopped one apocalyptic monster before. They would stop this one too.

Joey watched the speech from the drone he'd stations on one of the massive leaves overhanging the clearing the bag had been made in.

He'd always idolized James. But as he watched he finally saw the hero that he had actually become. The one that the King's people had summoned him to be, and that the gods had decided he WOULD be.

And part of him wanted to linger on the footage and fanboy his older brother.

Then he saw motion out of the corner of his eye and looked at the camera feed that was watching the Druids known as the Five.

He watched in mute horror as the one he'd warned them about began to convulse. Vines, moss, flowers, and tree branches began to erupt erupt from their body with wet tearing noises that he could hear even over the chanting of the druids around them, some of whom rushed to aid them. red feathers flew as the skin they were previously rooted in tore and burst. They screamed as a small forest of plant life exploded from the bird like druid as the magical energy overwhelmed what their already formidable body could handle. Several of the closest druids were injured by the sudden, and violent, act of creation. One of them was even impaled through the leg by something that looked like a cactus spine.

And as Joey panned the camera over to look at the last of the Five he saw the turtle-like and lichen crusted person beginning to strain. Druids of all kinds were at their side and Joey knew that if he'd been there in person he'd've been able to feel magical energy flowing like a maelstrom.

"Guys." He said into his microphone even as he looked and saw all of them recoiling from the backlash of the magic-infused death spasm. "Another one fell. You need to hurry."

He typed a message into the window that let them communicate via text back to Earth command.

>I know you guys are already watching. And I know you're a little busy with everything going on back on Earth. But if you've got any ideas, we could use some help.

Joey hit send.

Then he watched as the little dots popped up that meant the people back on Earth were typing.

A chorus of acknowledgments came over the throat microphones as everyone moved.

Then he watched as the world's largest bottomless bag began to shimmy and move, one side of it rising up off the ground even as people made their way underneath it to keep it up off the ground.

And a hole larger than any before it opened in the living shield wall, as multiple tendrils of nothingness devoured their way through it and began to spread.

Joey's robes and hair began to rustle, almost as if he was in a strong wind, though he was too focused to notice it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10rylg8/wait_is_this_just_gate_306/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (305/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: In which a Great Value Brand Lord of the Rings army meets a Lovecraftian horror in battle. Grab the popcorn.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

When all was said and done, it took nearly three hours to get the container, that would become the bottomless bag weapon, constructed after James arrived in the druid forest.

It wasn't a bag so much as a massive, round, cloth behemoth. Canvas and sheeting and silk and other materials of all colors and sizes had been brought from the capital and the domiciles of the druids to form it. Kai the Weaver and his spiders wove stitching into every seam and weak point of the cloth, binding them in layers and layers of the various colors of spider silk he had at his disposal. The druids had vines and creeping tendrils of foliage and moss coat the entire thing in layers of vegetative reinforcement that the spiders also reinforced and adhered to it.

Metal pipes and poles and beams were welded using fire and lightning magic. Oars and spears and staffs and boards were nailed, tied, and even glued together and joined to the metal by fastenings of all sorts before being wrapped in miles of rope and chain and placed inside the fabric channel that would be woven into the mouth of the "bag".

The result was a construction that could have scooped up a small lake if it had wanted to. The sum of its colors and materials made it appear grayish brown when seen from a distance, not that any of them would save those not taking part in its deployment.

In the time it took to finish another of the Five fell to the magical energy they were using to power the living shield around the area. Everyone in the area felt the detonation of pure magical energy as Manadra the Soother erupted in a blast of magical energy that caused every plant in the area, even those that were on the new bag, to writhe and shudder.

The wall protecting them did much the same, and the two Choi brothers watched in fearful awe as the writhing tentacles of the blight entity took advantage of the temporary weakness to devour even more of it.

James joined in once the bag was complete and the casters that Veliry had brought over began tracing intricate runes and symbols on the inside of the bag's body in large strokes of red paint that glittered with bits of material. They cast forth with the bright pint magic that James had seen before as each of them lent their power to the creation of the new bottomless space.

They backed out slowly as the back/bottom of the bag began to glow, first with the bright pink light coming from their hands, then darkening to the dark black abyss that marked the artificially induced extra dimensional space. They continued, pouring more and more magic into the container even as some of them, Veliry included, kept the black space contained and stable while they added to it.

When it was done, they had enchanted square miles of material into a massive bottomless bag the likes of which their world had never seen before.

James sat on the ground just outside of it panting as he and Amina leaned their backs into each other. All the other mages and casters were in much the same state on the edges of the acres of inky darkness that now sat between them. Some of them even had the blackened veins of magical exhaustion formed on their arms and hands.

James could see the hints of them forming on his right hand, at the fingertips and just under his nails. He'd never made one of the bags before, though Veliry had taught him how.

"James." Joey said into their ears. "Everyone. You have to get up."

James tapped the button on his neck. "Yeah." He said as he brought his breathing back under control. "We know."

"No." Joey said firmly. "I've got one of the drones watching the last of the druid guys holding up the shield."

"The five." Veliry chimed in.

"Right. The five." He said absently. "I think another is starting to wear down. She's some kind of bird person so I can't be a hundred percent. But she's not looking too good."

"That'd be Trien." Veliry said. "It's not important. With three of the five down, they'll only wear out faster. We need to hurry."

James and Amina pressed their backs into each other as they rose up to their feet. James knocked his forhead against her shoulder armor real quick.

"All you general." He said and she nodded.

"Alright everyone!" She shouted as her throat glowed, amplifying her voice to supernatural volumes. "On your feet! We need to get this deployed!" She pointed to the side farthest from where the blight entity was attacking. "Anyone capable of flight on that side! You'll be lifting the top of the opening!" She pointed at the opposite side. "Everyone else on this side moving the bottom! Strongest people get priority! Druids with plant manipulation powers; stand back from those two groups! You'll be erecting trees as supports once its in place! Anyone that doesn't fit into those groups is moving the main body of the bag! We need to keep it from tearing!"

The mages, and laborers, and druids, and soldiers, all looked at her as if she was mad. James could see the looks of doubt on their faces. They were tired, and the sensation of the druid leader detonating only a few minutes before they'd enchanted the bag still weighed on them.

So he spoke up too.

"IF YOU'RE FROM THE CAPITAL RAISE YOUR HAND!" He shouted as loud as he could. Most of the soldiers and mages raised their hands, and James noticed that the ones on the far side of the bag weren't even looking at him, and probably couldn't hear him.

He pointed at the wall, just in time for a hole to form and shift back and forth. He couldn't help but notice that it filled itself in a lot slower than before.

"If you're from the capital than you know the stakes!" He said, not yelling as loudly this time. "That thing right there is gonna do to this place what the Elemental did to the capital way back when." He let that statement sink in as he saw the haunted, grim expressions on the faces of the people who'd slowly begun to lower their hands. "Only unlike the elemental, it doesn't leave anyone alive, and it can't be fought the normal way! And unlike the capital, if we don't stop it from destroying this place, then the impact on this world's plants and animals will be devastating!" He pointed at the bag next to them. "That's our best hope! But it's gonna take all of us to use it!"

He could see the severity of the situation sinking in. Nobody who was from the capital could forget what the elemental had done to their home. Everyone there knew somebody, or some place, that would never be in their lives again. He felt Amina's hand snake its way into his and he gripped it tightly.

"We fought that together!" She yelled. "We've.... recovered... from it together!"

Some of the people nearby began to nod, most of them were already moving to stand back up.

"Let's fight this one too!" She finished.

James leapt into the air and began flying over to the side of the bag she'd indicated for flyers. He marveled at the inky blackness below him as he did, and made a note not to fall into it. Other mages and druids leaped up and began flying in their various fashions as they joined him. Amina and Vickers began guiding the ground forces over to the opposite side. He cinched down the securing strap on his glasses as he did. He'd need them for this fight.

"GET TO YOUR STATIONS EVERYONE!" He shouted as he flew. "IT'S TIME TO SHOW THIS THING WHAT PETRAVIANS CAN DO!"

The people around the edge of the bag burst into motion again, their weary limbs and magically exhausted bodies forgotten in favor of action. They'd stopped one apocalyptic monster before. They would stop this one too.

Joey watched the speech from the drone he'd stations on one of the massive leaves overhanging the clearing the bag had been made in.

He'd always idolized James. But as he watched he finally saw the hero that he had actually become. The one that the King's people had summoned him to be, and that the gods had decided he WOULD be.

And part of him wanted to linger on the footage and fanboy his older brother.

Then he saw motion out of the corner of his eye and looked at the camera feed that was watching the Druids known as the Five.

He watched in mute horror as the one he'd warned them about began to convulse. Vines, moss, flowers, and tree branches began to erupt erupt from their body with wet tearing noises that he could hear even over the chanting of the druids around them, some of whom rushed to aid them. red feathers flew as the skin they were previously rooted in tore and burst. They screamed as a small forest of plant life exploded from the bird like druid as the magical energy overwhelmed what their already formidable body could handle. Several of the closest druids were injured by the sudden, and violent, act of creation. One of them was even impaled through the leg by something that looked like a cactus spine.

And as Joey panned the camera over to look at the last of the Five he saw the turtle-like and lichen crusted person beginning to strain. Druids of all kinds were at their side and Joey knew that if he'd been there in person he'd've been able to feel magical energy flowing like a maelstrom.

"Guys." He said into his microphone even as he looked and saw all of them recoiling from the backlash of the magic-infused death spasm. "Another one fell. You need to hurry."

He typed a message into the window that let them communicate via text back to Earth command.

>I know you guys are already watching. And I know you're a little busy with everything going on back on Earth. But if you've got any ideas, we could use some help.

Joey hit send.

Then he watched as the little dots popped up that meant the people back on Earth were typing.

A chorus of acknowledgments came over the throat microphones as everyone moved.

Then he watched as the world's largest bottomless bag began to shimmy and move, one side of it rising up off the ground even as people made their way underneath it to keep it up off the ground.

And a hole larger than any before it opened in the living shield wall, as multiple tendrils of nothingness devoured their way through it and began to spread.

Joey's robes and hair began to rustle, almost as if he was in a strong wind, though he was too focused to notice it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10ryjw2/wait_is_this_just_gate_306/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (304/?)

Previous

Writer's note: In which Joey both comes in clutch, AND fucks up just a tiny bit.

\~

"Who all's over there?" James asked as he and Amina found Vickers waiting a few yards away from the self supporting door that had been set up in the main entryway of the castle.

The door was nearly as wide as that of a stable, or maybe the castle great hall, and a constant stream of soldiers and mages moved in and out of each side carrying bundles of cloth, various poles, and bundles of rope.

"The little redhead mage. That spider guy. The non-douche prince. You know, the tall one. Atrafar for some reason. And about a hundred other people." The massive were-jaguar said in a rumble.

James couldn't deny that Vickers looked absolutely badass in his new form. He was further along the transition to full jaguar at this point. His camo pants were cuffed just above his knees since they wouldn't fit any further down. His vest was fitting only in the loosest of definitions, its straps extended as far as they would go. And he had a dark black hooded jacket that had been made in this world underneath it. He had his shield on his back and had forgone a rifle in favor of a massive wooden mallet that James thought might have been meant for some kind of construction work rather than battle. But when he looked at the man's hands he saw why. His fingers likely wouldn't fit into a trigger well without some extensive modification.

"Dude you look fuckin insane." He said as they began walking toward the door. "What's your girlfriend doing over there?"

Vickers glossed over the title. He and Atrafar hadn't had THAT conversation yet.

"Helping." He said simply.

"You really catch Driscoll last night?" James asked.

Vickers see-sawed his hand. "He turned himself in." He said. "I take it the King told you what's going on?"

"He caught us this morning." Amina said as she fiddled with the holster to her new 1911.

Vickers eyed the pistol. Then he looked over at James, in his mish-mash of Earth military garb and Petravian gear, and saw the massive revolver in the place of his standard issue pistol, which had been relocated to the front of his vest.

"Wedding gifts." James said.

"Nice." Vickers replied with only a small amount of jealousy.

"I'll see if they can get one in Panthro sizing later." James said with a grin.

"Shut up and lets get to work." Vickers snapped back as he stepped through the door.

James followed suit. He felt his equilibrium go haywire for a moment and was reminded of the fact that last time he'd used one of these doors he'd been unconscious. Then he was on the other side.

And was surrounded by a world that exploded with color.

James looked around at the setting on the other side and leaped out of the way as Amina stumbled into his back as she emerged from the door behind him.

"Woah." He said as he saw all the lush vegetation around him.

"Mask up." Vickers said, breaking him out of his awestruck wonder as the SEAL handed him a piece of red cloth that hummed with low magical energy.

James pressed it to his face and tied it behind his head as the other two did the same. The King had already told him about the way the Druids were "imaging" the creature, whatever it was.

Then he looked up at the massive tree that dominated the landscape.

And he kept looking up.

And further up.

He kept craning his neck back until he threatened to fall over backwards.

"Jesus." He said softly.

"That is a bit of a sight." Vickers admitted. "Look at the wall."

James turned and saw the massive living wall of plant-life.

"Woah." He said again.

"Gentlemen." Amina interrupted. "Child-like wonder later. We've got lives to save."

That snapped James out of it. He turned back to face them and saw Vickers already moving to follow the stream of supplies over to a clearing a few hundred yards away.

He ignored the subtle shaking that his sword was doing on the side of his belt opposite of his holstered revolver.

And behind them, a section of the living wall disappeared before rapidly regenerating back into place.

\---------------

Joey managed to catch one of the mages on their way to the door way and pulled them aside. They turned to him in surprise, nearly dropping the numerous metal pipes they were carrying.

"Ah. Mr. Choi." The young elf said as they recognized him. "How can I help you?" He made a point of not looking at Joey's glowing eyes as he spoke.

Joey took one of the throat microphones he'd gotten from the communication hub room and handed it to the man, who juggled their grip a bit as they kept the pipes under control.

"Just get that to the Arch Mage and let her know that I said for her to wear it." Joey said as he attempted to sound authoritative. "She'll know what it is."

"Are you not going?" The mage asked. "I assumed you would. Being her apprentice and all."

Joey looked over to where he could see a bit of the door down the hallway. He felt his thumb rub the scars on his palm again.

"No." He said. "No I'm um. I'm gonna help coordinate things here." He replied

The elf mage considered it, then simply nodded. "I'll get it to her." He said and resumed his walk toward the door again.

"Thank you." Joey called behind them. Then he headed back to the communication hub. "Good luck!"

When he got to the communication hub he put his own microphone on, a headset style piece that hooked directly into the machine, and pulled up the drone control screen. He took over a few of the spare drones that were in a box in the Summoning room. They were there in case any in the network around the capital had issues. But they'd work for today.

He took control of four of them, telling them to lift up one at a time. It was a pain to juggle their controls, especially since it was his first time interacting with them. But the interface was remarkably similar to the program his high school had used in their electronics lab. In fact he thought it was a bit simpler. And after a few minutes of searching he found the setting to make them follow each other. Then he made them fly through the halls and toward the door.

"Joseph?" Veliry's voice called out in his ears. "Are you there? Why did you have An'Arkius give me a microphone?"

"Hi Miss Veliry." He said. He still wasn't sure where the two of them stood with each other now. She'd kind of stormed off to save the world before they'd gotten a chance to talk about it. "You forgot to take yours this morning when you left."

"I... Thank you-" She began

"Jojo?" His brother's voice asked, interrupting her. "What do you mean 'this morning when she left'? Didn't this all happen at like-" Then James went silent for a moment as it clicked for him. "Oh."

"Damn kid." The rumbling voice of Chief Vickers weighed in. "Nice."

"Everyone get the hell off of the line!" Veliry interrupted in an agitated voice.

There were a few moments of awkward silence as Joey sat at the hub with his face burning hot and scarlet red. His eyes were glowing furiously. He didn't know it, but Veliry was in much the same state, minus the eyes.

"Joseph." She began. "We can talk about that after this is all over. For now. What is going on? Why did you send me a throat mic?" She asked in slow, precise, words that even he could tell meant she was upset.

Joey gulped.

"I'm... gonna help." He said after a moment. "But I'm... not going through the door. Not this time." Then he told the drones to go through the door in his place as they reached the room in question. "But I am sending drones. I'll... be you're um.... info guy. Or overwatch, or whatever." He said. "James will know what I mean."

"I understand." She said. "That makes a lot of sense. Thank you."

Joey hesitated as he looked at the screen. And at the four little lights near the channel they were on.

"Um guys?" He said. "I'm at the comms hub right now. I know you... didn't actually switch channels."

There was another awkward silence.

"Seriously kid. Mad respect." Vickers said after a few moments.

"Vickers I'm going to skin you alive and use your fur for a rug when this is over." Veliry said harshly. "And I'll use magic to make sure you stay awake for it."

"Meeeeoooowww." Said James before mocking a hiss.

"CHOI!" Vickers cut in.

Joey manipulated his headset microphone into one of its own ear speakers and hit them with feedback for a few seconds.

When he put the headset back on he was greeted by a chorus of "Ow!"'s and one "What the fuck man?"

"Giant inter-dimensional universe devourer everyone." He said. "Let's stay focused."

Then as the drones made their way out the other side of the door, with some INTERESTING footage, he began to maneuver them into position.

His phone pinged with a single message.

>James: Does mom know?

Instead of replying on the phone he simply spoke into the headset.

"Yes James." Then as he began looking through the drone's cameras, flipping through view modes as he did, he spoke again. "Hey James? Chief Vickers?"

"Yeah?" They responded in unison.

"Do you guys still have those cool sunglasses that you used before?" His eyes widened and he unconsciously recoiled a bit as he saw one of the tendrils move through the dome that the druids had raised.

"Uh. Yeah." Vickers responded first. "Don't uh.... well. They don't fit me anymore."

"Mine got broken when the Miffy's shot me." James admitted glumly.

"Chief. Go IR with them and take a peek at the wall the next time a piece of it goes missing." He said. "Then give them to James, since he can actually wear them."

"Um.... okay." Vickers replied curiously. A few minutes later he spoke again. "Oh.... Damn. Good eye kid."

A few moments later James replied in a very similar fashion.

"James." Joey said. "You've got the glasses. Everyone else. I'll do what I can to help you stay out of the way of those things using the drones. Can you guys see if the druids can raise a couple tall, preferably limbless trees? The drones don't have a lot of fly time left on their batteries."

"I'll ask." Amina chimed in.

"That's fuckin biiiiiiig." James said. "God damn."

And as much as he hated it, Joey began to doubt the plan.

Wait, is this just GATE? (304/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: In which Joey both comes in clutch, AND fucks up just a tiny bit.

\~

"Who all's over there?" James asked as he and Amina found Vickers waiting a few yards away from the self supporting door that had been set up in the main entryway of the castle.

The door was nearly as wide as that of a stable, or maybe the castle great hall, and a constant stream of soldiers and mages moved in and out of each side carrying bundles of cloth, various poles, and bundles of rope.

"The little redhead mage. That spider guy. The non-douche prince. You know, the tall one. Atrafar for some reason. And about a hundred other people." The massive were-jaguar said in a rumble.

James couldn't deny that Vickers looked absolutely badass in his new form. He was further along the transition to full jaguar at this point. His camo pants were cuffed just above his knees since they wouldn't fit any further down. His vest was fitting only in the loosest of definitions, its straps extended as far as they would go. And he had a dark black hooded jacket that had been made in this world underneath it. He had his shield on his back and had forgone a rifle in favor of a massive wooden mallet that James thought might have been meant for some kind of construction work rather than battle. But when he looked at the man's hands he saw why. His fingers likely wouldn't fit into a trigger well without some extensive modification.

"Dude you look fuckin insane." He said as they began walking toward the door. "What's your girlfriend doing over there?"

Vickers glossed over the title. He and Atrafar hadn't had THAT conversation yet.

"Helping." He said simply.

"You really catch Driscoll last night?" James asked.

Vickers see-sawed his hand. "He turned himself in." He said. "I take it the King told you what's going on?"

"He caught us this morning." Amina said as she fiddled with the holster to her new 1911.

Vickers eyed the pistol. Then he looked over at James, in his mish-mash of Earth military garb and Petravian gear, and saw the massive revolver in the place of his standard issue pistol, which had been relocated to the front of his vest.

"Wedding gifts." James said.

"Nice." Vickers replied with only a small amount of jealousy.

"I'll see if they can get one in Panthro sizing later." James said with a grin.

"Shut up and lets get to work." Vickers snapped back as he stepped through the door.

James followed suit. He felt his equilibrium go haywire for a moment and was reminded of the fact that last time he'd used one of these doors he'd been unconscious. Then he was on the other side.

And was surrounded by a world that exploded with color.

James looked around at the setting on the other side and leaped out of the way as Amina stumbled into his back as she emerged from the door behind him.

"Woah." He said as he saw all the lush vegetation around him.

"Mask up." Vickers said, breaking him out of his awestruck wonder as the SEAL handed him a piece of red cloth that hummed with low magical energy.

James pressed it to his face and tied it behind his head as the other two did the same. The King had already told him about the way the Druids were "imaging" the creature, whatever it was.

Then he looked up at the massive tree that dominated the landscape.

And he kept looking up.

And further up.

He kept craning his neck back until he threatened to fall over backwards.

"Jesus." He said softly.

"That is a bit of a sight." Vickers admitted. "Look at the wall."

James turned and saw the massive living wall of plant-life.

"Woah." He said again.

"Gentlemen." Amina interrupted. "Child-like wonder later. We've got lives to save."

That snapped James out of it. He turned back to face them and saw Vickers already moving to follow the stream of supplies over to a clearing a few hundred yards away.

He ignored the subtle shaking that his sword was doing on the side of his belt opposite of his holstered revolver.

And behind them, a section of the living wall disappeared before rapidly regenerating back into place.

\---------------

Joey managed to catch one of the mages on their way to the door way and pulled them aside. They turned to him in surprise, nearly dropping the numerous metal pipes they were carrying.

"Ah. Mr. Choi." The young elf said as they recognized him. "How can I help you?" He made a point of not looking at Joey's glowing eyes as he spoke.

Joey took one of the throat microphones he'd gotten from the communication hub room and handed it to the man, who juggled their grip a bit as they kept the pipes under control.

"Just get that to the Arch Mage and let her know that I said for her to wear it." Joey said as he attempted to sound authoritative. "She'll know what it is."

"Are you not going?" The mage asked. "I assumed you would. Being her apprentice and all."

Joey looked over to where he could see a bit of the door down the hallway. He felt his thumb rub the scars on his palm again.

"No." He said. "No I'm um. I'm gonna help coordinate things here." He replied

The elf mage considered it, then simply nodded. "I'll get it to her." He said and resumed his walk toward the door again.

"Thank you." Joey called behind them. Then he headed back to the communication hub. "Good luck!"

When he got to the communication hub he put his own microphone on, a headset style piece that hooked directly into the machine, and pulled up the drone control screen. He took over a few of the spare drones that were in a box in the Summoning room. They were there in case any in the network around the capital had issues. But they'd work for today.

He took control of four of them, telling them to lift up one at a time. It was a pain to juggle their controls, especially since it was his first time interacting with them. But the interface was remarkably similar to the program his high school had used in their electronics lab. In fact he thought it was a bit simpler. And after a few minutes of searching he found the setting to make them follow each other. Then he made them fly through the halls and toward the door.

"Joseph?" Veliry's voice called out in his ears. "Are you there? Why did you have An'Arkius give me a microphone?"

"Hi Miss Veliry." He said. He still wasn't sure where the two of them stood with each other now. She'd kind of stormed off to save the world before they'd gotten a chance to talk about it. "You forgot to take yours this morning when you left."

"I... Thank you-" She began

"Jojo?" His brother's voice asked, interrupting her. "What do you mean 'this morning when she left'? Didn't this all happen at like-" Then James went silent for a moment as it clicked for him. "Oh."

"Damn kid." The rumbling voice of Chief Vickers weighed in. "Nice."

"Everyone get the hell off of the line!" Veliry interrupted in an agitated voice.

There were a few moments of awkward silence as Joey sat at the hub with his face burning hot and scarlet red. His eyes were glowing furiously. He didn't know it, but Veliry was in much the same state, minus the eyes.

"Joseph." She began. "We can talk about that after this is all over. For now. What is going on? Why did you send me a throat mic?" She asked in slow, precise, words that even he could tell meant she was upset.

Joey gulped.

"I'm... gonna help." He said after a moment. "But I'm... not going through the door. Not this time." Then he told the drones to go through the door in his place as they reached the room in question. "But I am sending drones. I'll... be you're um.... info guy. Or overwatch, or whatever." He said. "James will know what I mean."

"I understand." She said. "That makes a lot of sense. Thank you."

Joey hesitated as he looked at the screen. And at the four little lights near the channel they were on.

"Um guys?" He said. "I'm at the comms hub right now. I know you... didn't actually switch channels."

There was another awkward silence.

"Seriously kid. Mad respect." Vickers said after a few moments.

"Vickers I'm going to skin you alive and use your fur for a rug when this is over." Veliry said harshly. "And I'll use magic to make sure you stay awake for it."

"Meeeeoooowww." Said James before mocking a hiss.

"CHOI!" Vickers cut in.

Joey manipulated his headset microphone into one of its own ear speakers and hit them with feedback for a few seconds.

When he put the headset back on he was greeted by a chorus of "Ow!"'s and one "What the fuck man?"

"Giant inter-dimensional universe devourer everyone." He said. "Let's stay focused."

Then as the drones made their way out the other side of the door, with some INTERESTING footage, he began to maneuver them into position.

His phone pinged with a single message.

>James: Does mom know?

Instead of replying on the phone he simply spoke into the headset.

"Yes James." Then as he began looking through the drone's cameras, flipping through view modes as he did, he spoke again. "Hey James? Chief Vickers?"

"Yeah?" They responded in unison.

"Do you guys still have those cool sunglasses that you used before?" His eyes widened and he unconsciously recoiled a bit as he saw one of the tendrils move through the dome that the druids had raised.

"Uh. Yeah." Vickers responded first. "Don't uh.... well. They don't fit me anymore."

"Mine got broken when the Miffy's shot me." James admitted glumly.

"Chief. Go IR with them and take a peek at the wall the next time a piece of it goes missing." He said. "Then give them to James, since he can actually wear them."

"Um.... okay." Vickers replied curiously. A few minutes later he spoke again. "Oh.... Damn. Good eye kid."

A few moments later James replied in a very similar fashion.

"James." Joey said. "You've got the glasses. Everyone else. I'll do what I can to help you stay out of the way of those things using the drones. Can you guys see if the druids can raise a couple tall, preferably limbless trees? The drones don't have a lot of fly time left on their batteries."

"I'll ask." Amina chimed in.

"That's fuckin biiiiiiig." James said. "God damn."

And as much as he hated it, Joey began to doubt the plan.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10r6ci6/wait_is_this_just_gate_305/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (303/?)

Previous

Writer's note: A present revealed. A bit of expansion on the druids and the beginning of a plan coming together. And a talk with mom. Then, a boy is acknowledged as a MAN.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"I almost forgot." James said as he tied his robe in place and stood up. "In fact, scratch that, I did forget." He admitted as he walked over to the small wooden box that had been sent from Earth. "THEY sent wedding gifts too."

Amina rolled over to lie on her stomach with one arm propping up her head as she yawned the good night's..... sleep... away.

"Yeah?" She asked sleepily.

James smiled at the sight of his new wife, covered only in blankets and her sleep frazzled hair.

"Yeah. And I think you'll like it." He said as he opened the lid. "These are very rare nowadays on Earth. And even before they were rare, they were expensive. So the big question is this; Do you want the one that's gonna be easy to use? Or the one that's going to be reliable?"

Her eyebrows furrowed a bit at the question. "Depends." She said hesitantly. "What are they?"

James lifted the box easily and carried it over to her. Her eyes widened as she saw the nickel plated items inside.

"Pistols?" She asked in amazement. "Why's that one so round?"

"That." James said. "Is a revolver. It's a pistol. But it's also a lot harder to use than a normal pistol. Less rounds before you have to reload, and you have to reload one round at a time. But as long as you don't break it, it's pretty much faultless."

Amina ran her fingers across the cylinder of a Colt Python with fascination.

"That's kinda the one I want." James admitted. "But it's your choice. Whichever you want, I'll show you how to use it."

"And this one?" She asked as she then inspected the long flat sides of a Colt 1911. "This looks almost like the one you already carry."

"That one." He said with a nod at the 1911. "Is the grandfather of my pistol. Same caliber too."

"Is it a good weapon?" She asked. as her fingers ran over the small diamond pattern on the wooden grips.

"One of the best." He informed her. "Its name is the year it was designed. And it's still in use throughout our world."

She thought about that for a moment. "That's over a century of use." She said after she'd done the math.

"And it's still popular." He agreed. "Goes to show how good of a design it is."

"It functions like your pistol?" She wondered.

He wobbled his hand a bit. "Close enough." He said. "Like the difference between a long sword and a short sword. Same basic design and principles. But a few key differences when in ACTUAL use."

She nodded understanding. Then she picked up the revolver and held it in her hand, testing its grip.

"Remember the rules." He said as he stood up. "Check em out. I'm gonna go grab us some breakfast." He smirked as he watched her lift it up and check its sights on the far wall.

He opened the door, and was greeted by the King, who was only a split second away from knocking on their door.

"Oh..... shit." He said softly as he saw the King's grim, if somewhat startled, expression. James's shoulders sagged as he asked. "Trouble?"

"Indeed." The King agreed.

\------------------------

Veliry stepped through the new door and into the woods around the Druid's tree with the beginning of a long bolt of clothe in hand.

Above them the massive tree that marked the Druid's center of power for this continent reached so far that its crown was partially hidden in the clouds. Branches hung out in odd fashions that wouldn't have looked natural on a normal tree, and in places great leaves the size of a ship's sails provided shade to certain areas beneath. She could see people moving about all over it, and could feel them sending magical energies out in every direction.

A mass green and brown formed a dome that descended from its highest reaches, all the way down to the ground nearly two miles away. It writhed and convulsed as its living mass of plant matter worked to grow it stronger and thicker.

Kai, who had still been present near the castle and had wanted to wish James and Amina well before departing again since he'd had to leave the dinner party early, stepped out behind her along with a large mass of his spiders.

"Holy hells." Veliry said as she saw the shield wall that the remaining members of the Five were maintaining up above them.

Even as she spoke a section of the shield disappeared as the blight entity devoured it. Vines and branches and leaves swelled around the area behind it en masse as its tentacle-like appendage writhed about inside the shield. Then as it retreated back, apparently having its fill (even if only temporarily), the wall reformed.

The very air itself shimmered with a faint yellowish tinge from the fungal spores that the druids had dispersed to get tactile information on the entity as it moved. Even now, she and Kai were wearing magically imbued face masks to keep the spores out of their airways.

The air also vibrated with a loud, low, humming noise as every druid in the forest bastion chanted and sang, lending their powers to the efforts of the remaining three guardians powering the shield.

She could feel the energy flowing through the area and was amazed that anyone could even move.

"Hurry." Said the familiar, though much less hollow, voice of Tine Vineheart. the druid who had contacted her using the small tree in her lab. He rushed over to them in his own physical body as they looked about. "This way. We have our spare creators in the next grove shade." He bowed to Kai before pointing the way.

More mages and royal guards poured out of the door. Each of them carrying either poles, staffs, and pipes of all kinds, or else large bundles of clothe.

"It is a great blessing to meet a Prince of the darkness below." Tine said as he jogged ahead of them. "Even under such dire circumstances. I know you are outside of your normal domain."

"The honor is mine." Kai said simply. "I had never expected to visit the Tree of ages."

"Heh. Tree of ages." Tine said with a small laugh. "An old name. Though fitting."

A few moments they were in a small clearing beneath a canopy of oversized maple leaves that the tree itself had branched in their direction for shade. Beneath them was a field nearly five acres in either direction that was covered in fine, soft, very pleasant looking grass.

"We have cleared this area for the construction." Tine said. "Please begin." He waved at a group of druids nearby who quickly moved over.

"Alright." Veliry said to the line of Petravian's behind her. She pointed at the clearing. "Cloth spread out as wide as possible over there. Follow the weavers directions." She said, pointing to Kai. "Poles and such over there." She pointed at the side of the clearing where a stone pathway lay. "Mages with fire powers work the metal. Everyone else get going with rope and adhesive for the wood and other kinds of supports. Make them strong. Mages, save a bit of energy for the last bit."

The soldiers, mages, and seamstress's/tailors began spreading out and assembling the massive bag and its supports.

"Tine." She said, getting the druid's attention. "We need to know precise size for this thing. Can you show me to the fungal-mancers that are getting you its information?"

He nodded and gestured for her to follow.

\----------

Joey sat on the chair with his eyes focused on a piece of stone in their room's floor that had always looked slightly askew to him.

His hands were under his legs to keep them from rising up to his ears.

He was making a point of NOT activating the eye magic that normally helped him slow things down. He needed to learn to exist without it sometimes. Especially during important moments like this.

His mother sat on the chair she'd been sitting on when he'd first walked in.

Joey had told her everything.

Well.... maybe not EVERYTHING. He wasn't going to give a play-by-play breakdown or anything. But he'd told her enough.

Now, as she sat with her hands rubbing her eyes and forehead, he awaited her verdict on the matter.

They sat like that in increasingly uncomfortable silence for several long minutes while she thought. He was about to say something when she let out a long, exhausted, sigh.

"Joseph look at me." She said as she turned toward his chair and placed her hands on her lap.

Joey looked up nervously, uncertain of what was coming next.

He locked eyes with her for as long as he could manage, and saw the weariness and concern there.

"She's much older than you Joseph." She said as he turned away. "Old enough that, if she wanted to, she could easily manipulate you if she wanted to. And for that reason I view this whole thing with..." She sighed again. "Incredible worry. Because you are my son. And because, and you know this part, you have difficulty recognizing that kind of thing."

He listened to the words. Really listened. Then looked at her eyes again as he nodded.

She nodded back and continued.

"But you ARE... an adult." She looked away for a moment as she thought. "God, you'll be twenty in a month or so.... And I've done what I can to teach you how to think before you act." She said. "Obviously there's still some learning there. We learned that in the desert." She reminded him. "But.... I know you have a good heart mijo. And I know you've liked her pretty much since you first met her." She took a deep breath. "And.... I saw how much she cares about you too." She admitted. "Also after the desert."

Joey ran his thumbs across some of the scars that still lingered on his palms and knew what she was talking about.

"So... I don't really approve of this kind of thing. But.... I'm also not dumb enough to think that I can stop it." She admitted. "I just... I just want you to be careful mijo."

He nodded again. "I will mom."

They sat in awkward silence once more.

"We'll have to ask the King if he has another set of quarters for you." She said at last as she stood up and walked over to the small tea set nearby. "I don't want to hear any of that." She let out a quick, nervous chuckle.

Joey walked over and wrapped his mom up in a bear hug. Just as he was about to let go he felt her hand grab his arm and hold him in place a moment longer.

"Please just be careful." She said again.

He nodded before they released.

Then, before he could over think it, he walked out of the room and began walking toward where all the action was.

There was an emergency going on. And, magic or not, he intended to do whatever he could to help.

Joeys eyes blazed with light as the door latched shut behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10q9d4i/wait_is_this_just_gate_304/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (303/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: A present revealed. A bit of expansion on the druids and the beginning of a plan coming together. And a talk with mom. Then, a boy is acknowledged as a MAN.

Enjoy.

\~

"I almost forgot." James said as he tied his robe in place and stood up. "In fact, scratch that, I did forget." He admitted as he walked over to the small wooden box that had been sent from Earth. "THEY sent wedding gifts too."

Amina rolled over to lie on her stomach with one arm propping up her head as she yawned the good night's..... sleep... away.

"Yeah?" She asked sleepily.

James smiled at the sight of his new wife, covered only in blankets and her sleep frazzled hair.

"Yeah. And I think you'll like it." He said as he opened the lid. "These are very rare nowadays on Earth. And even before they were rare, they were expensive. So the big question is this; Do you want the one that's gonna be easy to use? Or the one that's going to be reliable?"

Her eyebrows furrowed a bit at the question. "Depends." She said hesitantly. "What are they?"

James lifted the box easily and carried it over to her. Her eyes widened as she saw the nickel plated items inside.

"Pistols?" She asked in amazement. "Why's that one so round?"

"That." James said. "Is a revolver. It's a pistol. But it's also a lot harder to use than a normal pistol. Less rounds before you have to reload, and you have to reload one round at a time. But as long as you don't break it, it's pretty much faultless."

Amina ran her fingers across the cylinder of a Colt Python with fascination.

"That's kinda the one I want." James admitted. "But it's your choice. Whichever you want, I'll show you how to use it."

"And this one?" She asked as she then inspected the long flat sides of a Colt 1911. "This looks almost like the one you already carry."

"That one." He said with a nod at the 1911. "Is the grandfather of my pistol. Same caliber too."

"Is it a good weapon?" She asked as her fingers ran over the small diamond pattern on the wooden grips.

"One of the best." He informed her. "Its name is the year it was designed. And it's still in use throughout our world."

She thought about that for a moment. "That's over a century of use." She said after she'd done the math.

"And it's still popular." He agreed. "Goes to show how good of a design it is."

"It functions like your pistol?" She wondered.

He wobbled his hand a bit. "Close enough." He said. "Like the difference between a long sword and a short sword. Same basic design and principles. But a few key differences when in ACTUAL use."

She nodded understanding. Then she picked up the revolver and held it in her hand, testing its grip.

"Remember the rules." He said as he stood up. "Check em out. I'm gonna go grab us some breakfast." He smirked as he watched her lift it up and check its sights on the far wall.

He opened the door, and was greeted by the King, who was only a split second away from knocking on their door.

"Oh..... shit." He said softly as he saw the King's grim, if somewhat startled, expression. James's shoulders sagged as he asked. "Trouble?"

"Indeed." The King agreed.

\----------

Veliry stepped through the new door and into the woods around the Druid's tree with the beginning of a long bolt of cloth in hand.

Above them the massive tree that marked the Druid's center of power for this continent reached so far that its crown was partially hidden in the clouds. Branches hung out in odd fashions that wouldn't have looked natural on a normal tree, and in places great leaves the size of a ship's sails provided shade to certain areas beneath. She could see people moving about all over it, and could feel them sending magical energies out in every direction.

A mass green and brown formed a dome that descended from its highest reaches, all the way down to the ground nearly two miles away. It writhed and convulsed as its living mass of plant matter worked to grow it stronger and thicker.

Kai, who had still been present near the castle and had wanted to wish James and Amina well before departing again since he'd had to leave the dinner party early, stepped out behind her along with a large mass of his spiders.

"Holy hells." Veliry said as she saw the shield wall that the remaining members of the Five were maintaining up above them.

Even as she spoke a section of the shield disappeared as the blight entity devoured it. Vines and branches and leaves swelled around the area behind it en masse as its tentacle-like appendage writhed about inside the shield. Then as it retreated back, apparently having its fill (even if only temporarily), the wall reformed.

The very air itself shimmered with a faint yellowish tinge from the fungal spores that the druids had dispersed to get tactile information on the entity as it moved. Even now, she and Kai were wearing magically imbued face masks to keep the spores out of their airways.

The air also vibrated with a loud, low, humming noise as every druid in the forest bastion chanted and sang, lending their powers to the efforts of the remaining three guardians powering the shield.

She could feel the energy flowing through the area and was amazed that anyone could even move.

"Hurry." Said the familiar, though much less hollow, voice of Tine Vineheart. the druid who had contacted her using the small tree in her lab. He rushed over to them in his own physical body as they looked about. "This way. We have our spare creators in the next grove shade." He bowed to Kai before pointing the way.

More mages and royal guards poured out of the door. Each of them carrying either poles, staffs, and pipes of all kinds, or else large bundles of clothe.

"It is a great blessing to meet a Prince of the darkness below." Tine said as he jogged ahead of them. "Even under such dire circumstances. I know you are outside of your normal domain."

"The honor is mine." Kai said simply. "I had never expected to visit the Tree of ages."

"Heh. Tree of ages." Tine said with a small laugh. "An old name. Though fitting."

A few moments they were in a small clearing beneath a canopy of oversized maple leaves that the tree itself had branched in their direction for shade. Beneath them was a field nearly five acres in either direction that was covered in fine, soft, very pleasant looking grass.

"We have cleared this area for the construction." Tine said. "Please begin." He waved at a group of druids nearby who quickly moved over.

"Alright." Veliry said to the line of Petravian's behind her. She pointed at the clearing. "Cloth spread out as wide as possible over there. Follow the weavers directions." She said, pointing to Kai. "Poles and such over there." She pointed at the side of the clearing where a stone pathway lay. "Mages with fire powers work the metal. Everyone else get going with rope and adhesive for the wood and other kinds of supports. Make them strong. Mages, save a bit of energy for the last bit."

The soldiers, mages, and seamstress's/tailors began spreading out and assembling the massive bag and its supports.

"Tine." She said, getting the druid's attention. "We need to know precise size for this thing. Can you show me to the fungal-mancers that are getting you its information?"

He nodded and gestured for her to follow.

\----------

Joey sat on the chair with his eyes focused on a piece of stone in their room's floor that had always looked slightly askew to him.

His hands were under his legs to keep them from rising up to his ears.

He was making a point of NOT activating the eye magic that normally helped him slow things down. He needed to learn to exist without it sometimes. Especially during important moments like this.

His mother sat on the chair she'd been sitting on when he'd first walked in.

Joey had told her everything.

Well.... maybe not EVERYTHING. He wasn't going to give a play-by-play breakdown or anything. But he'd told her enough.

Now, as she sat with her hands rubbing her eyes and forehead, he awaited her verdict on the matter.

They sat like that in increasingly uncomfortable silence for several long minutes while she thought. He was about to say something when she let out a long, exhausted, sigh.

"Joseph look at me." She said as she turned toward his chair and placed her hands on her lap.

Joey looked up nervously, uncertain of what was coming next.

He locked eyes with her for as long as he could manage, and saw the weariness and concern there.

"She's much older than you Joseph." She said as he turned away. "Old enough that, if she wanted to, she could easily manipulate you if she wanted to. And for that reason I view this whole thing with..." She sighed again. "Incredible worry. Because you are my son. And because, and you know this part, you have difficulty recognizing that kind of thing."

He listened to the words. Really listened. Then looked at her eyes again as he nodded.

She nodded back and continued.

"But you ARE... an adult." She looked away for a moment as she thought. "God, you'll be twenty in a month or so.... And I've done what I can to teach you how to think before you act." She said. "Obviously there's still some learning there. We learned that in the desert." She reminded him. "But.... I know you have a good heart mijo. And I know you've liked her pretty much since you first met her." She took a deep breath. "And.... I saw how much she cares about you too." She admitted. "Also after the desert."

Joey ran his thumbs across some of the scars that still lingered on his palms and knew what she was talking about.

"So... I don't really approve of this kind of thing. But.... I'm also not dumb enough to think that I can stop it." She admitted. "I just... I just want you to be careful mijo."

He nodded again. "I will mom."

They sat in awkward silence once more.

"We'll have to ask the King if he has another set of quarters for you." She said at last as she stood up and walked over to the small tea set nearby. "I don't want to hear any of that." She let out a quick, nervous chuckle.

Joey walked over and wrapped his mom up in a bear hug. Just as he was about to let go he felt her hand grab his arm and hold him in place a moment longer.

"Please just be careful." She said again.

He nodded before they released.

Then, before he could over think it, he walked out of the room and began walking toward where all the action was.

There was an emergency going on. And, magic or not, he intended to do whatever he could to help.

Joeys eyes blazed with light as the door latched shut behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10q9aoh/wait_is_this_just_gate_304/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (302/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Mexican moms just know bro.

Enjoy

\~\~\~

"Chief Vickers." They greeted. "Someone found and got word to you?"

"Uh. No?" He said hesitantly. He thought the sergeant's name was Rorik or something like that. "Why? What's happening?"

"The blight's acting up again." The man replied. "We're being scrambled to help the druids."

"Druids?" He asked in surprise at the unexpected news. "What? Shit."

He changed his direction and began moving faster even as he noticed that there were more and more castle guards now.

"Where are you going sir?" The Sergeant asked behind him.

"Gearing up." He said. "Be there in a minute."

And he began jogging toward his room.

\---

Veliry, fully dressed now, paced back and forth at the front of the room as she explained what was happening, and what the plan was. King Farrick sat at his desk on the side of the small presentation area, looking angry and concerned. The stands were loaded with high ranking soldiers and mages of all kind. In between Veliry and the King stood a cow faced elf wrought in living wood, who glowed a faint green.

"This is unlike anything we've seen before." She said. "Not at Jadesport. Not in any of the surrounding areas. And not in any of the reports we've seen from other countries or our spies. This is some kind of.... entity... of the blight."

The druid's tree envoy, which still bore some of the berries that it had had in Veliry's lab, raised its hand and several branches grew rapidly.

"When we realized that we couldn't see what was attacking us, we had several of our fungal brethren seed the air with spores and determine its nature." The druid said.

The branches from its hands formed the shape of the tree that the Druids used as their home. Then a thin lattice of branches formed a dome-like shape around it. A vine sprouted from the dome and began forming a writhing set of tentacles that began lashing at the shield structure violently. Trees formed around the display, sprouting from the druids arms and shoulders. Anywhere the tentacle vines lashed out the trees tumbled and disappeared into them.

"Whatever it is." The druid continued. "It's massive. Larger than any of the ancient dragons, or any of the leviathans of the deep ocean. And it seems to have no primary body."

Sure enough, the tentacles all seemed to emerge from the same point, and at times even seemed to overlap each other with no issues.

"How have the five been able to hold it back?" Veliry asked. "Normal shield constructs didn't seem to have any effect on the blight possessed at Jadesport."

"They are not normal shields." The druid admitted. "What you see here is more accurate of a visual representation than you'd expect."

"A living wall?" Veliry asked.

"Preposterous." Marcos chimed in from where he was sitting in the front row. "The amount of mass that the blight and its creatures can devour is effectively limitless as far as we can tell. To fuel a shield of that mass against such a creature. And to sustain regrowing it? No mage of any kind has that kind of power."

"The five can." The druid assured him. "They draw upon the souls of the ascendants before them. And they channel the collected energy of every druid present save myself and the other messengers. And the energy of the land."

"But that would burn them out." Veliry said in shock. "Their souls will be devoured by that much energy. And the souls of the ascendant."

The druid nodded solemnly. "Already two have fallen." He said grimly. "Shak'Ras the Hardy even entered rampancy. We lost a lot of people."

"And that will simply accelerate the rate of failure for the others." Veliry said. "We need to hurry."

"This was not intended as a plea for rescue." The druid said. "There is no time and the capital is too far away from our land. We have already begun evacuating our people through the deep dark and the wood ways." He said while gesturing at his own body. "I was sent as a warning of what is coming. We are lost. But our people shall need aid. Even as they lend it should this.... thing.... come for you as well."

"Not an option." The King said with finality.

Everyone in the room looked at him as their murmurs and whispers silenced.

"If the five fall then the wilds of the land will fall to chaos." The King said. "And my kingdom is already dealing with so many refugees from the Elemental attack that it still hasn't recovered." Among other more.... malign threats. He thought as he recalled the unexpected events the night before. He looked at Veliry. "Can you create one of those doors to the druids land?" He asked.

She turned to the druid. "Your people know how to create bottomless bags right?" She asked.

He nodded. "Of course."

"Good." She said as she nodded at the king.

"Listen up!" The king commanded. "Gather all Earth arrows. All explosive rune stones. Gather every ounce of cloth you can gather from every tailor, seamstress, sail boat, and wherever the hell else we can get it. And poles." He said as people began looking at each other in confusion. "Iron poles. Steel poles. Wooden poles. I don't care what kind. Grab the damn spears if you have to and break the tips off."

He looked over at Veliry, who already understood where he was going. She nodded and turned to the druid's form and began explaining.

"We have a plan. And it's going to take everything we've got to try it. Mages stay here. Everyone else get to work." He said in a tone that allowed no questions.

The room broke into chaos as everyone scrambled to follow the orders.

King Farrick turned to Veliry. "Make it work." He said before turning to leave. "I have to go interrupt a honeymoon." He said mostly to himself.

\------------------------

Joey stood outside the door to his and his mother's shared rooms with his eyes glowing.

Last night had been..... well... it had been amazing if he was honest. But it had also been completely unexpected. And more importantly it had been new.

Entirely new. For him at least.

It had also been ended in a completely unexpected, and significantly more dire, fashion.

And now he had to get back into his room without his mom finding out about any of it.

He figured he had three choices. And none of them were very good.

Option 1: Sneak in like that time he and James had gone out late at night to try to see if one of the local folk tales was true in the junkyard a few blocks away. That hadn't been successful.

Option 2: Use magic to move faster than his mom could comprehend. This one had very obvious and potentially dangerous downsides.

Option 3: Simply walk in like nothing had happened.

Lying.... was not an option. His ticks made him almost incapable of doing so in most situations. But if there was anyone he COULDN'T lie to it was his mother. She knew every tick and tell he had.

Joey, his eyes still glowing, looked over at the windows in the hallway nearby. The sun was only barely rising.

His head hurt from the drinking he'd done the night before. It hadn't been his first time drinking. Half of the parties he'd gone to on his mothers side of the family had involved alcohol. Even some of his own birthdays as a child.

This was however his first hangover, and his magical vision wasn't helping it any.

He just had to hope that his mom was as exhausted and hungover as he was. Though he kind of doubted it.

Especially the exhausted part.

He decided to start with Option 1 until he could get an idea of what kind of state his mother was in. He would reassess once he had that information.

Quietly, and ever so slowly, Joey opened the door to their rooms and readied himself to move in.

And his plan, what little there was of it, was ruined almost immediately by his mothers presence in a chair against the far wall, facing the door with a still steaming cup of coffee in her hand.

Option 3 it is then. He decided as he straightened up and put on his best "Nothing to see here" expression, and stepped through the door.

"Morning mom." He said with a forced smile. "That was a great wedding huh?"

"Hola Josephito." She said without breaking eye contact with him before sipping from the cup. "How was your night?"

Crap. He thought as he heard the door swing shut and latch behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10pcgf5/wait_is_this_just_gate_303/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (302/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Mexican moms just know bro.

Enjoy

\~\~\~

When Vickers emerged from Atrafar's room the next day, he did so while suppressing a grin.

His legs hurt.

His back and arms hurt.

His jaw and tongue even hurt a bit, side effects of having his new mouth structure tested (in more ways than one), and he felt more than a little dehydrated.

But as he heard the gentle rumbling snore of the exhausted Outer Light knight slumbering inside, he couldn't help but let the grin show for a few moments as he stretched his back a bit.

Then he saw a mage go running by in a hurry.

He didn't know this one, not by name anyways, but he could hear their heart jack-hammering inside their chest and knew that they were in some kind of excited state.

So he decided to follow them. It was easy in his new form.

Only a few moments later he came across a small squad of the guards who were half running in the same direction.

One of them recognized him.

"Chief Vickers." They greeted. "Someone found and got word to you?"

"Uh. No?" He said hesitantly. He thought the sergeant's name was Rorik or something like that. "Why? What's happening?"

"The blight's acting up again." The man replied. "We're being scrambled to help the druids."

"Druids?" He asked in surprise at the unexpected news. "What? Shit."

He changed his direction and began moving faster even as he noticed that there were more and more castle guards now.

"Where are you going sir?" The Sergeant asked behind him.

"Gearing up." He said. "Be there in a minute."

And he began jogging toward his room.

\---

Veliry, fully dressed now, paced back and forth at the front of the room as she explained what was happening, and what the plan was. King Farrick sat at his desk on the side of the small presentation area, looking angry and concerned. The stands were loaded with high ranking soldiers and mages of all kind. In between Veliry and the King stood a cow faced elf wrought in living wood, who glowed a faint green.

"This is unlike anything we've seen before." She said. "Not at Jadesport. Not in any of the surrounding areas. And not in any of the reports we've seen from other countries or our spies. This is some kind of.... entity... of the blight."

The druid's tree envoy, which still bore some of the berries that it had had in Veliry's lab, raised its hand and several branches grew rapidly.

"When we realized that we couldn't see what was attacking us, we had several of our fungal brethren seed the air with spores and determine its nature." The druid said.

The branches from its hands formed the shape of the tree that the Druids used as their home. Then a thin lattice of branches formed a dome-like shape around it. A vine sprouted from the dome and began forming a writhing set of tentacles that began lashing at the shield structure violently. Trees formed around the display, sprouting from the druids arms and shoulders. Anywhere the tentacle vines lashed out the trees tumbled and disappeared into them.

"Whatever it is." The druid continued. "It's massive. Larger than any of the ancient dragons, or any of the leviathans of the deep ocean. And it seems to have no primary body."

Sure enough, the tentacles all seemed to emerge from the same point, and at times even seemed to overlap each other with no issues.

"How have the five been able to hold it back?" Veliry asked. "Normal shield constructs didn't seem to have any effect on the blight possessed at Jadesport."

"They are not normal shields." The druid admitted. "What you see here is more accurate of a visual representation than you'd expect."

"A living wall?" Veliry asked.

"Preposterous." Marcos chimed in from where he was sitting in the front row. "The amount of mass that the blight and its creatures can devour is effectively limitless as far as we can tell. To fuel a shield of that mass against such a creature. And to sustain regrowing it? No mage of any kind has that kind of power."

"The five can." The druid assured him. "They draw upon the souls of the ascendants before them. And they channel the collected energy of every druid present save myself and the other messengers. And the energy of the land."

"But that would burn them out." Veliry said in shock. "Their souls will be devoured by that much energy. And the souls of the ascendant."

The druid nodded solemnly. "Already two have fallen." He said grimly. "Shak'Ras the Hardy even entered rampancy. We lost a lot of people."

"And that will simply accelerate the rate of failure for the others." Veliry said. "We need to hurry."

"This was not intended as a plea for rescue." The druid said. "There is no time and the capital is too far away from our land. We have already begun evacuating our people through the deep dark and the wood ways." He said while gesturing at his own body. "I was sent as a warning of what is coming. We are lost. But our people shall need aid. Even as they lend it should this.... thing.... come for you as well."

"Not an option." The King said with finality.

Everyone in the room looked at him as their murmurs and whispers silenced.

"If the five fall then the wilds of the land will fall to chaos." The King said. "And my kingdom is already dealing with so many refugees from the Elemental attack that it still hasn't recovered." Among other more.... malign threats. He thought as he recalled the unexpected events the night before. He looked at Veliry. "Can you create one of those doors to the druids land?" He asked.

She turned to the druid. "Your people know how to create bottomless bags right?" She asked.

He nodded. "Of course."

"Good." She said as she nodded at the king.

"Listen up!" The king commanded. "Gather all Earth arrows. All explosive rune stones. Gather every ounce of cloth you can gather from every tailor, seamstress, sail boat, and wherever the hell else we can get it. And poles." He said as people began looking at each other in confusion. "Iron poles. Steel poles. Wooden poles. I don't care what kind. Grab the damn spears if you have to and break the tips off."

He looked over at Veliry, who already understood where he was going. She nodded and turned to the druid's form and began explaining.

"We have a plan. And it's going to take everything we've got to try it. Mages stay here. Everyone else get to work." He said in a tone that allowed no questions.

The room broke into chaos as everyone scrambled to follow the orders.

King Farrick turned to Veliry. "Make it work." He said before turning to leave. "I have to go interrupt a honeymoon." He said mostly to himself.

\------------------------

Joey stood outside the door to his and his mother's shared rooms with his eyes glowing.

Last night had been..... well... it had been amazing if he was honest. But it had also been completely unexpected. And more importantly it had been new.

Entirely new. For him at least.

It had also been ended in a completely unexpected, and significantly more dire, fashion.

And now he had to get back into his room without his mom finding out about any of it.

He figured he had three choices. And none of them were very good.

Option 1: Sneak in like that time he and James had gone out late at night to try to see if one of the local folk tales was true in the junkyard a few blocks away. That hadn't been successful.

Option 2: Use magic to move faster than his mom could comprehend. This one had very obvious and potentially dangerous downsides.

Option 3: Simply walk in like nothing had happened.

Lying.... was not an option. His ticks made him almost incapable of doing so in most situations. But if there was anyone he COULDN'T lie to it was his mother. She knew every tick and tell he had.

Joey, his eyes still glowing, looked over at the windows in the hallway nearby. The sun was only barely rising.

His head hurt from the drinking he'd done the night before. It hadn't been his first time drinking. Half of the parties he'd gone to on his mothers side of the family had involved alcohol. Even some of his own birthdays as a child.

This was however his first hangover, and his magical vision wasn't helping it any.

He just had to hope that his mom was as exhausted and hungover as he was. Though he kind of doubted it.

Especially the exhausted part.

He decided to start with Option 1 until he could get an idea of what kind of state his mother was in. He would reassess once he had that information.

Quietly, and ever so slowly, Joey opened the door to their rooms and readied himself to move in.

And his plan, what little there was of it, was ruined almost immediately by his mothers presence in a chair against the far wall, facing the door with a still steaming cup of coffee in her hand.

Option 3 it is then. He decided as he straightened up and put on his best "Nothing to see here" expression, and stepped through the door.

"Morning mom." He said with a forced smile. "That was a great wedding huh?"

"Hola Josephito." She said without breaking eye contact with him before sipping from the cup. "How was your night?"

Crap. He thought as he heard the door swing shut and latch behind him.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10pcdek/wait_is_this_just_gate_303/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (301/?)

Previous

Writer's note: And now the night winds down for everyone else too.

Enjoy.

\~

"High mage!" A voice with an odd timbre called out into the lab. "High Mage Veliry!"

Veliry shot up from where she'd been slumbering, her head pounding from the alcohol she'd drank the night before.

A dull, dark green, light glowed from the tree in the corner of her lab.

"Druid?" She asked groggily as she rose to her feet.

"High mage?" The voice called again. "Are you here? Please answer!"

"I'm here!" She called back, rubbing her eyes as she did. "Not so loud." She begged.

Then, as she felt a bit of wind blow through from an open window somewhere she remembered that she was no longer wearing the green dress she'd been wearing. She quickly grabbed a discarded apron from off of a nearby table and put it on quickly. Then she stepped out of the still open door to her personal quarters and into the lab where the light was coming from.

A face, with the snout of some kind of cow or horse, and the eyes and ears of an elf, protruded from the small berry tree that she kept in the corner of her lab for both snacks and occasional experiments. It was ringed with the dull green energy that was causing the light.

It turned a bit as she entered the room and grabbed a robe that she quickly threw on over the apron.

"Are you the High Mage?" The semi-bovine man asked as it saw her.

"Arch mage. Yes. What can I do for a woodland druid at... lord knows what hour this is?" She replied as she pulled the robe shut.

"I am with the druidic sphere." It replied, anxiousness in its voice. "We were told by our royal envoys to alert them if anything occurred that we couldn't explain. Namely disappearances of people or large swathes of land and forest."

"Yes." She said as the sudden realization of what he was talking about woke her up a bit more. "The vanishing blight. And the blight possessed."

"Aye miss." He said. "It is here. At the soul grove. It... it.... destroyed an entire path of the forest. We sent our woodlings out to find out what happened. And to fight whatever was doing it. None returned. Now whatever it is is at our walls. The Five fight to hold it at bay as we speak. But whatever it is is formidable. We can all feel their defenses weakening even as we speak."

Her jaw dropped open wider with each sentence. If even the five Beast-borne elders of the druids were being defeated then they didn't have much time.

"Wait here." She said as she stood up. "I have to go tell the king."

"Please hurry." The disembodied face in the tree requested as she rushed out of the room.

The face turned a few moments later as someone else emerged from the room with a blanket wrapped around their waist.

"Ms. Veliry?" Joey asked curiously as he rubbed at his eyes. Then he saw the face in the small tree. "Umm.... Hi?" He said hesitantly.

The tree man just stared at him in mild curiosity.

\------------------------------

Vickers knocked on the door with only a little bit of discomfort.

And a surprising, at least to him, amount of embarrassment.

He hadn't MEANT to leave the party early. But duty had called, and it had ended up being even more shocking AND important than either he or the King had expected.

He probably could have lessened the awkwardness of his current wait outside the door if he had returned immediately upon getting Driscoll secured in the healing ward's small sterile room and in the care of the two toolies.

But his HUMAN instincts, the ones that had made him a good SEAL, had kicked in and forced him to see the job done.

By the time he'd ensured that Driscoll wasn't a threat, namely by seeing that what was left of his body was outside of the suit and being tended to, the party was over and everyone had gone their separate ways. He'd left the so-called Agency members to the King's people.

Now he was back in his off duty clothes, though not the bright green and blue formal robes he'd worn to the wedding, and standing in front of Atrafar's door. He'd made sure to bathe before coming here, since he was certain that she wouldn't want to smell what he'd smelled once the Muck Marcher had been extricated from the metal suit.

He could hear her moving inside, despite her effort to be silent. He could also smell the faintly cinnamon scented perfume she'd put on while changing from her armor to the loose formal wear she'd put on for the dinner. She was awake, and he thought she was waiting on the other side of the door.

Vickers knocked again, and a moment later the door opened.

"You ditched me." She said in a flat tone.

Vickers didn't balk. "Duty called." He replied simply. "An... unexpected development. The King deferred to me so that the Captain wouldn't be pulled from his party and new spouse."

She looked at him, and he could see the one ear in the opening of the door turned his direction, listening to him intently. He knew that she understood duty better than most.

"You could have returned." She said. "The party lasted nearly six hours."

That was fair, in his mind. "I had to see it finished properly. The threat neutralized to a safe enough level. It took time." He nodded. "I'm sorry that I left you hanging."

She nodded back. "I understand." She said as she opened the door. "Come in. Let's not waste the good mood of a fun night."

Vickers looked up and down the hallway. He knew that the elder Choi was not going to be seen likely for a few days, based both on the event, and the fact that he'd already been halfway off his feet even before Vickers had been called away.

He was also fairly certain that the younger of the Chois was going to be in a similar state for an entirely different reason.

But he still didn't want to risk either of them knowing where he was going, as he scanned and sniffed at the hallway around him.

A moment later he stepped into the room, shutting it firmly behind him.

It was time to test out the new hardware.

It took every ounce of will in his mind to resist his new animal instincts and attack her as she almost literally pounced on him.

\---

Mrs. Choi was just standing up to leave when the King entered the small temple that she'd been kneeling in.

"Lady Choi." He said softly as he took a seat in one of the benches nearby. "I did not expect to run into anyone here. Much less you. Is everything alright?" He asked.

"Yes." She said as she wiped the dust from her dress where she'd been kneeling. She kept the small crucifix tucked into her hand as she did. "I just came to pray a bit."

"You're religious?" He wondered. "Your son doesn't strike me as being so."

"No." She admitted. "No neither of them are. But I was raised catholic. And their father was.... Well." She see-sawed her hand a bit. "Kind of stuck between my family's beliefs and his family's."

The king nodded understanding. "Praying for the new couple?" He asked. "Wealth, health, and happiness?"

She nodded. "In part." She replied. "But also I just wanted to let my husband know how well his son is doing."

The king nodded again. "Then you were doing much the same as I was about to." He said as he looked over at a door with a metal cage over it. In the center of the cage door was a plaque with a crown that didn't look like his, and a bouquet of flowers engraved upon it. "I came to tell Amina's mother how lovely her daughter has grown. And how alike they would find each other." He said with a deep breath that he sighed out afterward.

She didn't know how to respond to that. She hadn't expected to encounter anyone here either.

"In our world." She said after a few moments of awkward silence. "In our world the gods did not exist." She said with a look of concern. "At least... not until this whole... werewolf thing happened. And who knows what any of that means." She thought for a moment. "I don't know if them actually existing, here or there, means anything for those we've lost. I... I don't know much about your pantheon." She shook her head. "In fact. People on Earth have even waged wars over which religion is RIGHT.

I don't know if any of them are. I don't know if a soul really exists. Even if your mages say they do." She shrugged. "Wouldn't change the fact that my husband died on a world where they probably didn't. And in a time before magic had come to it." She looked up at the painting above. It depicted some kind of goddess of light raising an impaled soldier up into her embrace. "I stopped believing years ago." She said. She didn't mention that her husband's death had been the thing that had finally killed that belief.

The whole time she'd spoken the King had simply listened and watched her. He understood the sentiment far too well, even if he DID live in a world where souls and gods were a bit more real. Or at least a bit more tangible anyways.

"Yet you still pray?" He asked. "You still speak to him?"

She shrugged.

"I figure it doesn't hurt anyone." She said. "If I'm wrong, then I'm just one more person screaming into the air. And if I'm right. Then maybe he can hear me. And maybe he can see how strong our sons have become."

"He is a good man." The King agreed. "Both of them are. I don't know much about your husband except what little James has told me. But... I can't imagine a father who wouldn't be proud to have sired him."

She smiled. "I know." She said. "And so does he. We've always known that." She added with a nod toward the painting. She stood up and bowed ever so slightly. "Your wife would be proud too." She said. "Amina is a lovely woman. My son has a good eye."

King Farrick smiled and nodded as she turned to leave.

"Have a good night Lady Choi." He said.

Then he walked over to the door with the cage over it, and pulled a key from around his neck.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10my5qc/wait_is_this_just_gate_302/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (301/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: And now the night winds down for everyone else too.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

"High mage!" A voice with an odd timbre called out into the lab. "High Mage Veliry!"

Veliry shot up from where she'd been slumbering, her head pounding from the alcohol she'd drank the night before.

A dull, dark green, light glowed from the tree in the corner of her lab.

"Druid?" She asked groggily as she rose to her feet.

"High mage?" The voice called again. "Are you here? Please answer!"

"I'm here!" She called back, rubbing her eyes as she did. "Not so loud." She begged.

Then, as she felt a bit of wind blow through from an open window somewhere she remembered that she was no longer wearing the green dress she'd been wearing. She quickly grabbed a discarded apron from off of a nearby table and put it on quickly. Then she stepped out of the still open door to her personal quarters and into the lab where the light was coming from.

A face, with the snout of some kind of cow or horse, and the eyes and ears of an elf, protruded from the small berry tree that she kept in the corner of her lab for both snacks and occasional experiments. It was ringed with the dull green energy that was causing the light.

It turned a bit as she entered the room and grabbed a robe that she quickly threw on over the apron.

"Are you the High Mage?" The semi-bovine man asked as it saw her.

"Arch mage. Yes. What can I do for a woodland druid at... lord knows what hour this is?" She replied as she pulled the robe shut.

"I am with the druidic sphere." It replied, anxiousness in its voice. "We were told by our royal envoys to alert them if anything occurred that we couldn't explain. Namely disappearances of people or large swathes of land and forest."

"Yes." She said as the sudden realization of what he was talking about woke her up a bit more. "The vanishing blight. And the blight possessed."

"Aye miss." He said. "It is here. At the soul grove. It... it.... destroyed an entire path of the forest. We sent our woodlings out to find out what happened. And to fight whatever was doing it. None returned. Now whatever it is is at our walls. The Five fight to hold it at bay as we speak. But whatever it is is formidable. We can all feel their defenses weakening even as we speak."

Her jaw dropped open wider with each sentence. If even the five Beast-borne elders of the druids were being defeated then they didn't have much time.

"Wait here." She said as she stood up. "I have to go tell the king."

"Please hurry." The disembodied face in the tree requested as she rushed out of the room.

The face turned a few moments later as someone else emerged from the room with a blanket wrapped around their waist.

"Ms. Veliry?" Joey asked curiously as he rubbed at his eyes. Then he saw the face in the small tree. "Umm.... Hi?" He said hesitantly.

The tree man just stared at him in mild curiosity.

\------------------------------

Vickers knocked on the door with only a little bit of discomfort.

And a surprising, at least to him, amount of embarrassment.

He hadn't MEANT to leave the party early. But duty had called, and it had ended up being even more shocking AND important than either he or the King had expected.

He probably could have lessened the awkwardness of his current wait outside the door if he had returned immediately upon getting Driscoll secured in the healing ward's small sterile room and in the care of the two toolies.

But his HUMAN instincts, the ones that had made him a good SEAL, had kicked in and forced him to see the job done.

By the time he'd ensured that Driscoll wasn't a threat, namely by seeing that what was left of his body was outside of the suit and being tended to, the party was over and everyone had gone their separate ways. He'd left the so-called Agency members to the King's people.

Now he was back in his off duty clothes, though not the bright green and blue formal robes he'd worn to the wedding, and standing in front of Atrafar's door. He'd made sure to bathe before coming here, since he was certain that she wouldn't want to smell what he'd smelled once the Muck Marcher had been extricated from the metal suit.

He could hear her moving inside, despite her effort to be silent. He could also smell the faintly cinnamon scented perfume she'd put on while changing from her armor to the loose formal wear she'd put on for the dinner. She was awake, and he thought she was waiting on the other side of the door.

Vickers knocked again, and a moment later the door opened.

"You ditched me." She said in a flat tone.

Vickers didn't balk. "Duty called." He replied simply. "An... unexpected development. The King deferred to me so that the Captain wouldn't be pulled from his party and new spouse."

She looked at him, and he could see the one ear in the opening of the door turned his direction, listening to him intently. He knew that she understood duty better than most.

"You could have returned." She said. "The party lasted nearly six hours."

That was fair, in his mind. "I had to see it finished properly. The threat neutralized to a safe enough level. It took time." He nodded. "I'm sorry that I left you hanging."

She nodded back. "I understand." She said as she opened the door. "Come in. Let's not waste the good mood of a fun night."

Vickers looked up and down the hallway. He knew that the elder Choi was not going to be seen likely for a few days, based both on the event, and the fact that he'd already been halfway off his feet even before Vickers had been called away.

He was also fairly certain that the younger of the Chois was going to be in a similar state for an entirely different reason.

But he still didn't want to risk either of them knowing where he was going, as he scanned and sniffed at the hallway around him.

A moment later he stepped into the room, shutting it firmly behind him.

It was time to test out the new hardware.

It took every ounce of will in his mind to resist his new animal instincts and attack her as she almost literally pounced on him.

\----------

Mrs. Choi was just standing up to leave when the King entered the small temple that she'd been kneeling in.

"Lady Choi." He said softly as he took a seat in one of the benches nearby. "I did not expect to run into anyone here. Much less you. Is everything alright?" He asked.

"Yes." She said as she wiped the dust from her dress where she'd been kneeling. She kept the small crucifix tucked into her hand as she did. "I just came to pray a bit."

"You're religious?" He wondered. "Your son doesn't strike me as being so."

"No." She admitted. "No neither of them are. But I was raised catholic. And their father was.... Well." She see-sawed her hand a bit. "Kind of stuck between my family's beliefs and his family's."

The king nodded understanding. "Praying for the new couple?" He asked. "Wealth, health, and happiness?"

She nodded. "In part." She replied. "But also I just wanted to let my husband know how well his son is doing."

The king nodded again. "Then you were doing much the same as I was about to." He said as he looked over at a door with a metal cage over it. In the center of the cage door was a plaque with a crown that didn't look like his, and a bouquet of flowers engraved upon it. "I came to tell Amina's mother how lovely her daughter has grown. And how alike they would find each other." He said with a deep breath that he sighed out afterward.

She didn't know how to respond to that. She hadn't expected to encounter anyone here either.

"In our world." She said after a few moments of awkward silence. "In our world the gods did not exist." She said with a look of concern. "At least... not until this whole... werewolf thing happened. And who knows what any of that means." She thought for a moment. "I don't know if them actually existing, here or there, means anything for those we've lost. I... I don't know much about your pantheon." She shook her head. "In fact. People on Earth have even waged wars over which religion is RIGHT. I don't know if any of them are. I don't know if a soul really exists. Even if your mages say they do." She shrugged. "Wouldn't change the fact that my husband died on a world where they probably didn't. And in a time before magic had come to it." She looked up at the painting above. It depicted some kind of goddess of light raising an impaled soldier up into her embrace. "I stopped believing years ago." She said. She didn't mention that her husband's death had been the thing that had finally killed that belief.

The whole time she'd spoken the King had simply listened and watched her. He understood the sentiment far too well, even if he DID live in a world where souls and gods were a bit more real. Or at least a bit more tangible anyways.

"Yet you still pray?" He asked. "You still speak to him?"

She shrugged.

"I figure it doesn't hurt anyone." She said. "If I'm wrong, then I'm just one more person screaming into the air. And if I'm right. Then maybe he can hear me. And maybe he can see how strong our sons have become."

"He is a good man." The King agreed. "Both of them are. I don't know much about your husband except what little James has told me. But... I can't imagine a father who wouldn't be proud to have sired him."

She smiled. "I know." She said. "And so does he. We've always known that." She added with a nod toward the painting. She stood up and bowed ever so slightly. "Your wife would be proud too." She said. "Amina is a lovely woman. My son has a good eye."

King Farrick smiled and nodded as she turned to leave.

"Have a good night Lady Choi." He said.

Then he walked over to the door with the cage over it, and pulled a key from around his neck.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10my46e/wait_is_this_just_gate_302/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (300/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Sorry bout the delay. Just dealing with a case of the black lung.

Big 300. Huzzah. I'm gonna go eat some chicken noodle soup.

Anyways, enjoy.

\~\~\~

stop basis as they stopped at each table. James's with ale, and Amina's with wine.

Eventually, when greetings were had, and scuffles were settled, and just as both James and Amina's stomachs were beginning to rumble for food, the newlywed couple was able to relax in a pair of comfortable chairs at the main table. Even the King's seat was moved off-center in favor of honoring them.

James hugged his mom as he sat down, and rustled Joey's hair behind her back as he did. Amina did very similar to her brother Alixan and sister Ferria. Artair and his new ranger companion were currently engaging in arm wrestling competitions down in the main seating area. Batty was asking Vickers about a million questions about his new jaguar form as Atrafar devoured plate after plate of carnitas tacos with gusto. Vickers mostly just stonewalled the man as he tried to resist eating the plate of grilled fish that a servant had placed in front of him at James's request. He glared daggers at James over Batty's head before making a point of biting one of the fish nearly in half and swallowing it without chewing. Head and all.

Then, just as a plate full of tacos was set in front of him by one of the castle staff, James was thrown into a near mournful state as he heard the familiar tune of the chicken dance song begin to pick up from the band across the hall.

He quickly shoveled a taco into his mouth as Amina pulled at his arm and his brother rushed over to help him to his feet.

"I JUSH WUNNA EAD!" He complained through a full mouth as he was practically hauled bodily over to the dance floor.

He didn't miss the way Veliry, in a remarkably pretty dress of green satin, made her way over to Joey and offered her hand to him. James smiled as his little brother shot to his feet, his eyes suddenly glowing with magic as he steadied himself. He'd forgotten that Veliry knew the chicken dance for the same reason that Amina, and formerly Kela and Gixelle, would have.

He did, however, miss the fact that a guard had walked over to the King with Guardian Ira'Nyl and whispered into his ear. A moment later the King stood up, walked over to Vickers, and spoke with him for a moment.

Then the two of them excused themselves from the party for a moment, and with the royal guards escorting them, made their way out of the room.

James was too drunk, and laughing far too hard as he and Amina bobbed their heads and flapped their arms, to see the small party rush out of the room. A hanbok, he thought, only made the chicken dance that much funnier.

\---

Driscoll's head hung as he stayed on his knees on the cobblestones in front of the Castle's side entrance.

He wasn't oblivious to the countless spears, swords, axes, bows and crossbows, and even rifles of a crude sort, that were currently aimed at him.

His helmet lay on the ground in front of him, having been ejected using his emergency access command only a few minutes earlier.

Clamped in his one hand, unconscious only because he'd allowed it, was the person.... or thing... that he'd formerly known as Brick. And trailing behind him on a long rope that was hooked to one of the numerous recovery hooks on his suit, were five more people, also unconscious. Or at least they had been when he'd left the wreckage of the tavern behind.

He now suspected that he'd never known who the.... person... in his hand was. He hadn't known anything. They hadn't let him.

They'd done something to his mind, and to his ability to interface with his suit. Something using magic. And he didn't know what, or how to counter it moving forward.

But he HAD known something was wrong. And however they'd gone about messing with him, they hadn't done it completely enough to stop him from finding it.

It had taken the better part of two days. But eventually he'd been capable of pulling up the "Phantom Files" as he'd come to think of them. A bit of fancy reprogramming of his helmet feed, and a broken mirror that he'd sneakily placed a shard of INSIDE his helmet, and he'd finally been able to see the footage that the Agency had been trying to keep him from watching.

Everything after that had made TOO much sense.

So he'd played along with them. Right up until they'd been on the verge of storming the castle.

Right up until they'd foolishly handed him the pistol that they'd taken from him after they'd abducted him.

The first round had gone into the face of the small, fairy-like, woman who had placed him under whatever enchantment they'd used on him in the first place. He'd seen her do it in the mirrored footage.

There had been a moment of shock on her face as she'd seen the pistol raising up to aim at her.

He hadn't given her enough time to change that expression.

And after that, the small subterranean complex under the tavern had exploded into violence of a kind that he'd never experienced before. His battle in the desert had been his first look at what real combat magic was like. And that was what this had been.

Only it hadn't occurred out in the wide open air like the desert. It had gone down in musty, dark, cramped, tunnels.

Add a bit of water and it would have been the exact kind of setting he was, almost literally, made for.

And now here he was, only an hour or so after that had started. Five prisoners behind him unconscious on a rope, and one on the edge of death under the grip of his robotic hand.

He coughed, and the soldiers flinched nervously, as he spat blood out onto the ground in front of him.

He didn't think he had a lot of time left in this world or any other. It didn't help that there was a three foot long section of spear sticking out of what would have been his stomach in his old body. His shit-can was compromised, he knew that much. And that was a death sentence for any of his kind.

He wished they had been dumb enough to have given him his rifle.

"Is it...." He began. "Gonna be long?" He moved to rub some of the blood on his face before realizing that he didn't have a left arm anymore. Then he simply moved the, no longer small, form of Brick up so he could use the man's shirt collar instead. The sight of the massive orc angered him. He hadn't even been the same species that Driscoll had "SEEN" during the made up months of time he'd spent with the Agency.

As if hearing his complaint, the door suddenly opened and King Farrick, who he recognized from recordings, came jogging out with a large armored elf and a..... well, Driscoll didn't know what the other person was. They looked like one of the Thundercats had donned a bunch of Military camo and carried a CT6.5.

Then he saw the insignia on the chest of the, stretched to its limits, plate carrier. The anchor, eagle, trident, and pistol.

"Chief Vickers?" He wondered.

"Driscoll." The man growled as he skidded to a halt and held his rifle at the ready. The large elf did much the same with a shield and halberd next to him.

"What is the meaning of this?" The King bellowed from behind them.

"This is the Muck Marcher that escaped with the Agency during the desert battle." Vickers informed him.

So they knew what had happened to him. Driscoll realized. He began wondering about whether or not they'd sent anyone looking for him. And how that might have gone if they had.

"Through...." He wheezed. "No fault of my own." He finished. Then he pulled Brick (or whoever he actually was) up and dropped his limp, unconscious, body in front of him. "Bee Tee Dubs." He said with a wheezing chuckle. "Here's some of your.... boogeymen." Then he reached back and grabbed the rope. With a quick tug he snapped it and held its end out to the side.

"What do you mean?" Vickers demanded. "Who are these people?"

Driscoll, in a now herculean effort, raised his head up to look at the newly feline SEAL.

"They messed with me." He said, tapping his finger painfully on his temple. "With my head. Made me.... see things different. Made me think.... they were on my side." He reached down and grabbed the helmet off of the ground and looked at the front of it. There was a metal spike protruding from its face plate, a remnant of some kind of club that had been smashed into it. "Couldn't change the video logs so they just changed the way I saw them." The servos in his hand whined loudly before the helmet started to crunch under its pressure. "Couldn't stop me though."

Vickers reached forward and in a quick swipe ripped the helmet from Driscoll's hand. Driscoll blinked at that. There was no way he was strong enough to pull something from the grip of one of their suits. No living creature was. Then he looked up at Vickers, as if finally realizing what the chief had done to himself.

"Relax squiddy cat." He said as his head drooped down. "Don't think I'm a threat to anyone now."

Then he passed out.

"CAUTION:" A synthetic voice said from somewhere in the suit. "VITAL SIGNS WEAK. RECOVER IMMEDIATELY. CAUTION: VITAL SIGNS WEAK. RECOVER IMMEDIATELY. SIGNALLING RECOVERY TEAM"

"Is he dead?" The King asked.

Vickers moved forward and placed a pair of fingers on the unconscious man's neck. A moment later he shook his head.

"No. But He probably will be soon. We need to get him to the toolies." Vickers said.

"And the others?" King Farrick wondered. "He said they're members of the Agency."

"If that's the case sir." Ira'Nyl chimed in. "We need to get them in custody, and magically constrained immediately."

"They came from a tavern about half a mile from here." One of the soldiers said. "We've already dispatched men to investigate."

"Good." She replied. "See if those ones are alive. If they are bind them. Get them into the caster cells. And get them healers." The men present jumped to follow the commands.

"I'll get this one." Vickers said as he attempted to move Driscoll's suited body. But it remained rigid. "Shit. That's gonna make it awkward. Guardian, mind lending a hand?"

The two of them made quick work of lifting the heavy cyborg and moving him indoors.

"Careful." Vickers said. "If he so much as moves it's go time." Ira'Nyl simply nodded.

King Farrick watched all of this with mild agitation.

"Tonight of all nights." He muttered to himself as he moved back into the castle behind them. "Sergeant." He said to the guard that had spoken a few moments earlier. "Put the castle guard on high alert. Assign additional manpower to the party. Inform me the moment anything is found out about wherever he came here from."

The sergeant in question snapped off a salute and then jogged to delegate his duties as needed.

"Of all the bloody nights." He said as he stalked back into the castle.

\----------

James and Amina stumbled into their shared room hours later after having been carried there by a large assortment of people from the party. They'd practically been launched through the door and James had to do everything in his power not to literally fall on top of Amina.

And then, as they recovered their wits from the drunken maelstrom of the crowd surfing trip to their room, James DID fall on top of her. Though this time was intentional.

Her back arched up as his hand snaked beneath it and pulled her up so that her face met his.

"Hello MRS. Amina Petravius." He said as he kissed her neck, causing her to gasp a bit as she wrapped her arms around his neck.

"Hello Prince Consort Choi." She said in a purr as he blew air out of his nose and right at her ear lobe The action made her fingers dig into his neck and shoulder.

He pulled back suddenly, looking mildly curious.

"Is that my actual title?" He asked.

She giggled a bit. "Well you're not ACTUAL royalty." She replied as she relaxed a bit. Though her legs were now wrapped around his waist. "You're just married INTO the family."

He considered it for a moment. "Prince consort." He said in his mockingly posh British accent. Then he lowered back down. "Prince.... Consort." He said softly, causing more giggles which he interrupted with a deep kiss.

They could still hear party-goers making merry outside their shut door.

Amina tugged at the blue rope holding James's hanbok in place even as he quickly undid the leather straps that kept her gilded armor chest plate on.

Neither of them let the commotion outside stop them from enjoying what came next.

For them, only the person in front of them existed.

And a mischievously defiant god looked on with a wry smile at the mating couple, before reaching down to touch the two souls for just the briefest of moments. One they, as mortals, wouldn't even perceive as having happened.

Then, duty done, they blinked back over to that other, most interesting, universe that they called home.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10m1o0n/wait_is_this_just_gate_301/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (300/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Sorry bout the delay. Just dealing with a case of the black lung.

Big 300. Huzzah. I'm gonna go eat some chicken noodle soup.

Anyways, enjoy.

\~\~\~

To James's pride, tacos and churros were a massive success. People of all shapes and sizes sampled the different meat and tortilla based food stuffs, and the cinnamon and sugar pastries with mild trepidation at first. Then the line around the serving table became a nearly constant flow as the guests made repeat trips over and over. The cheese and chocolate fondue fountains only caused more wonder as people dipped their food in it. James chuckled as a handful of them dipped the wrong foods in the wrong fountains though.

The two of them moved among the tables together and greeted people from all over the world. Amina spent most of that time introducing people to James that he had never met before, and of more than a few species that James hadn't seen even here in the capital. But James's affable nature and ability to roll with punches allowed him to take part in the conversations easily. The latter proved especially necessary with some of the dwarves and orcs they spoke with, especially Kraug, who James thought might have been crying recently.

They also got progressively more and more intoxicated as they moved through the crowd. Their cups were filled and refilled on an almost non-stop basis as they stopped at each table. James's with ale, and Amina's with wine.

Eventually, when greetings were had, and scuffles were settled, and just as both James and Amina's stomachs were beginning to rumble for food, the newlywed couple was able to relax in a pair of comfortable chairs at the main table. Even the King's seat was moved off-center in favor of honoring them.

James hugged his mom as he sat down, and rustled Joey's hair behind her back as he did. Amina did very similar to her brother Alixan and sister Ferria. Artair and his new ranger companion were currently engaging in arm wrestling competitions down in the main seating area. Batty was asking Vickers about a million questions about his new jaguar form as Atrafar devoured plate after plate of carnitas tacos with gusto. Vickers mostly just stonewalled the man as he tried to resist eating the plate of grilled fish that a servant had placed in front of him at James's request. He glared daggers at James over Batty's head before making a point of biting one of the fish nearly in half and swallowing it without chewing. Head and all.

Then, just as a plate full of tacos was set in front of him by one of the castle staff, James was thrown into a near mournful state as he heard the familiar tune of the chicken dance song begin to pick up from the band across the hall.

He quickly shoveled a taco into his mouth as Amina pulled at his arm and his brother rushed over to help him to his feet.

"I JUSH WUNNA EAD!" He complained through a full mouth as he was practically hauled bodily over to the dance floor.

He didn't miss the way Veliry, in a remarkably pretty dress of green satin, made her way over to Joey and offered her hand to him. James smiled as his little brother shot to his feet, his eyes suddenly glowing with magic as he steadied himself. He'd forgotten that Veliry knew the chicken dance for the same reason that Amina, and formerly Kela and Gixelle, would have.

He did, however, miss the fact that a guard had walked over to the King with Guardian Ira'Nyl and whispered into his ear. A moment later the King stood up, walked over to Vickers, and spoke with him for a moment.

Then the two of them excused themselves from the party for a moment, and with the royal guards escorting them, made their way out of the room.

James was too drunk, and laughing far too hard as he and Amina bobbed their heads and flapped their arms, to see the small party rush out of the room. A hanbok, he thought, only made the chicken dance that much funnier.

\---

Driscoll's head hung as he stayed on his knees on the cobblestones in front of the Castle's side entrance.

He wasn't oblivious to the countless spears, swords, axes, bows and crossbows, and even rifles of a crude sort, that were currently aimed at him.

His helmet lay on the ground in front of him, having been ejected using his emergency access command only a few minutes earlier.

Clamped in his one hand, unconscious only because he'd allowed it, was the person.... or thing... that he'd formerly known as Brick. And trailing behind him on a long rope that was hooked to one of the numerous recovery hooks on his suit, were five more people, also unconscious. Or at least they had been when he'd left the wreckage of the tavern behind.

He now suspected that he'd never known who the.... person... in his hand was. He hadn't known anything. They hadn't let him.

They'd done something to his mind, and to his ability to interface with his suit. Something using magic. And he didn't know what, or how to counter it moving forward.

But he HAD known something was wrong. And however they'd gone about messing with him, they hadn't done it completely enough to stop him from finding it.

It had taken the better part of two days. But eventually he'd been capable of pulling up the "Phantom Files" as he'd come to think of them. A bit of fancy reprogramming of his helmet feed, and a broken mirror that he'd sneakily placed a shard of INSIDE his helmet, and he'd finally been able to see the footage that the Agency had been trying to keep him from watching.

Everything after that had made TOO much sense.

So he'd played along with them. Right up until they'd been on the verge of storming the castle.

Right up until they'd foolishly handed him the pistol that they'd taken from him after they'd abducted him.

The first round had gone into the face of the small, fairy-like, woman who had placed him under whatever enchantment they'd used on him in the first place. He'd seen her do it in the mirrored footage.

There had been a moment of shock on her face as she'd seen the pistol raising up to aim at her.

He hadn't given her enough time to change that expression.

And after that, the small subterranean complex under the tavern had exploded into violence of a kind that he'd never experienced before. His battle in the desert had been his first look at what real combat magic was like. And that was what this had been.

Only it hadn't occurred out in the wide open air like the desert. It had gone down in musty, dark, cramped, tunnels.

Add a bit of water and it would have been the exact kind of setting he was, almost literally, made for.

And now here he was, only an hour or so after that had started. Five prisoners behind him unconscious on a rope, and one on the edge of death under the grip of his robotic hand.

He coughed, and the soldiers flinched nervously, as he spat blood out onto the ground in front of him.

He didn't think he had a lot of time left in this world or any other. It didn't help that there was a three foot long section of spear sticking out of what would have been his stomach in his old body. His shit-can was compromised, he knew that much. And that was a death sentence for any of his kind.

He wished they had been dumb enough to have given him his rifle.

"Is it...." He began. "Gonna be long?" He moved to rub some of the blood on his face before realizing that he didn't have a left arm anymore. Then he simply moved the, no longer small, form of Brick up so he could use the man's shirt collar instead. The sight of the massive orc angered him. He hadn't even been the same species that Driscoll had "SEEN" during the made up months of time he'd spent with the Agency.

As if hearing his complaint, the door suddenly opened and King Farrick, who he recognized from recordings, came jogging out with a large armored elf and a..... well, Driscoll didn't know what the other person was. They looked like one of the Thundercats had donned a bunch of Military camo and carried a CT6.5.

Then he saw the insignia on the chest of the, stretched to its limits, plate carrier. The anchor, eagle, trident, and pistol.

"Chief Vickers?" He wondered.

"Driscoll." The man growled as he skidded to a halt and held his rifle at the ready. The large elf did much the same with a shield and halberd next to him.

"What is the meaning of this?" The King bellowed from behind them.

"This is the Muck Marcher that escaped with the Agency during the desert battle." Vickers informed him.

So they knew what had happened to him. Driscoll realized. He began wondering about whether or not they'd sent anyone looking for him. And how that might have gone if they had.

"Through...." He wheezed. "No fault of my own." He finished. Then he pulled Brick (or whoever he actually was) up and dropped his limp, unconscious, body in front of him. "Bee Tee Dubs." He said with a wheezing chuckle. "Here's some of your.... boogeymen." Then he reached back and grabbed the rope. With a quick tug he snapped it and held its end out to the side.

"What do you mean?" Vickers demanded. "Who are these people?"

Driscoll, in a now herculean effort, raised his head up to look at the newly feline SEAL.

"They messed with me." He said, tapping his finger painfully on his temple. "With my head. Made me.... see things different. Made me think.... they were on my side." He reached down and grabbed the helmet off of the ground and looked at the front of it. There was a metal spike protruding from its face plate, a remnant of some kind of club that had been smashed into it. "Couldn't change the video logs so they just changed the way I saw them." The servos in his hand whined loudly before the helmet started to crunch under its pressure. "Couldn't stop me though."

Vickers reached forward and in a quick swipe ripped the helmet from Driscoll's hand. Driscoll blinked at that. There was no way he was strong enough to pull something from the grip of one of their suits. No living creature was. Then he looked up at Vickers, as if finally realizing what the chief had done to himself.

"Relax squiddy cat." He said as his head drooped down. "Don't think I'm a threat to anyone now."

Then he passed out.

"CAUTION:" A synthetic voice said from somewhere in the suit. "VITAL SIGNS WEAK. RECOVER IMMEDIATELY. CAUTION: VITAL SIGNS WEAK. RECOVER IMMEDIATELY. SIGNALLING RECOVERY TEAM"

"Is he dead?" The King asked.

Vickers moved forward and placed a pair of fingers on the unconscious man's neck. A moment later he shook his head.

"No. But He probably will be soon. We need to get him to the toolies." Vickers said.

"And the others?" King Farrick wondered. "He said they're members of the Agency."

"If that's the case sir." Ira'Nyl chimed in. "We need to get them in custody, and magically constrained immediately."

"They came from a tavern about half a mile from here." One of the soldiers said. "We've already dispatched men to investigate."

"Good." She replied. "See if those ones are alive. If they are bind them. Get them into the caster cells. And get them healers." The men present jumped to follow the commands.

"I'll get this one." Vickers said as he attempted to move Driscoll's suited body. But it remained rigid. "Shit. That's gonna make it awkward. Guardian, mind lending a hand?"

The two of them made quick work of lifting the heavy cyborg and moving him indoors.

"Careful." Vickers said. "If he so much as moves it's go time." Ira'Nyl simply nodded.

King Farrick watched all of this with mild agitation.

"Tonight of all nights." He muttered to himself as he moved back into the castle behind them. "Sergeant." He said to the guard that had spoken a few moments earlier. "Put the castle guard on high alert. Assign additional manpower to the party. Inform me the moment anything is found out about wherever he came here from."

The sergeant in question snapped off a salute and then jogged to delegate his duties as needed.

"Of all the bloody nights." He said as he stalked back into the castle.

\----------

James and Amina stumbled into their shared room hours later after having been carried there by a large assortment of people from the party. They'd practically been launched through the door and James had to do everything in his power not to literally fall on top of Amina.

And then, as they recovered their wits from the drunken maelstrom of the crowd surfing trip to their room, James DID fall on top of her. Though this time was intentional.

Her back arched up as his hand snaked beneath it and pulled her up so that her face met his.

"Hello MRS. Amina Petravius." He said as he kissed her neck, causing her to gasp a bit as she wrapped her arms around his neck.

"Hello Prince Consort Choi." She said in a purr as he blew air out of his nose and right at her ear lobe The action made her fingers dig into his neck and shoulder.

He pulled back suddenly, looking mildly curious.

"Is that my actual title?" He asked.

She giggled a bit. "Well you're not ACTUAL royalty." She replied as she relaxed a bit. Though her legs were now wrapped around his waist. "You're just married INTO the family."

He considered it for a moment. "Prince consort." He said in his mockingly posh British accent. Then he lowered back down. "Prince.... Consort." He said softly, causing more giggles which he interrupted with a deep kiss.

They could still hear party-goers making merry outside their shut door.

Amina tugged at the blue rope holding James's hanbok in place even as he quickly undid the leather straps that kept her gilded armor chest plate on.

Neither of them let the commotion outside stop them from enjoying what came next.

For them, only the person in front of them existed.

And a mischievously defiant god looked on with a wry smile at the mating couple, before reaching down to touch the two souls for just the briefest of moments. One they, as mortals, wouldn't even perceive as having happened.

Then, duty done, they blinked back over to that other, most interesting, universe that they called home.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10m1mo1/wait_is_this_just_gate_301/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (299/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Cue the bells. And maybe just a bit of cheesiness.

And remember, in real life the ceremony is rarely more than ten or twenty minutes long. If it IS longer than that, than someone wanted it to be.

Enjoy.

\~

When Mrs. Choi walked into the grand hall and saw her youngest son standing near the dais she gasped in shock at the hanbok that Joey was wearing. She'd known ahead of time that the two brothers had worked together to keep their wedding outfits a surprise, mainly on her behalf, but the sight of the black and blue outfit still managed to startle her to tears. She hugged Joey for a minute before moving up a step to her place of honor on a chair only marginally smaller than the King's.

Two empty seats sat next to each of them. For the spouses, and parents of the people getting married, that they each had lost.

A few minutes later, and to the sound of horns, James walked in in his own hanbok. He smiled wide and proud when he saw her in her seat and did what he could not to rush his way up to the platform and hug her. But he had a ceremony to perform.

James stepped up to the bottom step of the dais.

In one swift motion James drew his sword from its sheath and pointed it at the King. Several of the guards around the room flinched reflexively as he did before remembering that it was a show and nothing more. Ironically, that was also an expected part of the ceremony. He also drew his pistol from its holster and held it at his side.

"King Farrick Petravius!" He announced. "I have spent the allotted time in courtship with your eldest daughter. In that time I have given my life, and every ounce of my love to her. And I have found no reason to stop doing so." He dropped the two weapons to the ground with a loud clatter. "On my life. Will you allow me to marry her on this day?"

Then he dropped to a knee, held his arms out to the side and lowered his head into a bow.

King Farrick stood up and drew the long narrow sword at his own hip and touched the tip of it to the back of James's neck. If the king desired, the position would allow him to kill James with only a pound or so of pressure, a flick of his wrist.

The two of them stayed that way for several long seconds as the crowd watched. Then the King sheathed the sword in a motion as fluid as the draw had been.

"I have seen this love, and this life, Captain Choi." He said in his booming voice. "And you may."

James stood up, doing everything he could to hide the fact that his legs were shaking, and nodded to the King. King Farrick returned the nod with a small smile. Then James moved to the side of the platform near his mom and brother.

The horns sounded again and everyone present turned to the door.

Amina stepped through the door, and James felt his heart jump in his chest.

She wore a gilded version of her normal breastplate. But that was the only armor she wore. The rest was flowing golden silk with red and blue embroidery. In her hair was a ring of the yellowish white flowers that grew in vines on the balcony near their room. He knew that they smelled of lavender and citrus.

On one of her arms was the magical blue shield that had kept her alive ever since the two of them had become betrothed to each other.

And in the other hand was a large, double edged battle axe that James recognized immediately, though he hadn't seen anyone carry it since Kela had died.

James was reminded of an image he'd seen years before in a history class about ancient Norse culture, and the Valkyries that they had worshiped.

He did what he could to keep his jaw from dropping. He'd yet to see her wedding outfit.

She stopped at the foot of the platform, just as he had and slowly lowered herself into the same kneel as she placed her weapons at her feet.

"Lady Choi." She said softly. "I have spent the allotted time in courtship with your eldest son. In that time I have given my life, and every ounce of my love to him. And I have found no reason to stop doing so." She said as she raised her arms up and dropped her head. "Will you allow me to marry him on this day?"

Mrs. Choi didn't have a sword, and when offered one had declined it. Instead she dropped down a bit and lifted Amina's head with her hand.

"I've also seen this love." She said. "From both of you." She looked at James and smiled. "Please do." Then she lifted Amina up with an offered hand, hugged her, and took her place back at her seat.

Amina joined James in front of her father and the two of them held hands.

"It is the way of Captain Choi's world for the two being married to say a short speech defining their love for each other." The King said. "And after speaking it over with each other, my daughter has offered to forgo hers in favor of Captain Choi's."

The two of them smiled at each other as the King nodded to them.

"Amina." James began. "The first time I ever met you, I was naked, afraid, and angry." He said with a small laugh. "And you punched me in the face."

The murmuring from those in attendance rose at the mention of the premarital violence.

"And... as much as my jaw hurt. That pain's nothing compared to the pain I'd feel without you now." He continued, his voice quavering a bit. "We have lived together for over a year now. Traveled. Fought. Bled." He looked down at the weapons they'd discarded, especially the axe. "Lost people." He said. He reached up and wiped the single tear that had rolled down her cheek. "But we've done it together..... I have gone through some of the worst days of my life since arriving in this world. And each time you've been the one that let me get through it. You've seen me at my lowest. And helped drive me to new heights I couldn't even have imagined before now. My life is better with you in it. And I'm so happy that we get to bind our lives together like this. I never want to go back to the life before I met you."

James looked back at his mother, and brother, as he said the last line. It was the first time they'd heard it. And now that he'd finally said it out loud in front of them, the truth of it resonated within him.

"This is my life now." He said. "You are my life now." He shrugged a bit as he grinned. "At least until you get tired of me."

The crowd laughed even as Amina smiled.

"I love you Amina." He finished.

"I love you." She replied.

The King nodded, knowing that the speech was over. Then he turned to Arch-Mage Marcos who stepped forward and James and Amina turned until they were back to back, then clasped hands again.

Marcos began chanting, and a ring of blue light formed around them.

"James Michael Choi of Earth!" The King bellowed. "Do you love Amina Petravius?"

James felt the magical compulsion to speak the truth.

"I do." He said calmly. "More than I've ever loved another."

"Will you safeguard her life and livelihood for the rest of your life?"

"I will." He said.

"Amina Petravius. Princess of Petravus. Do you love James Choi?" The King asked.

"With my entire heart." She said with a squeeze of James's hand. He squeezed back.

"And do you intend to safeguard his life and livelihood for the rest of your life?"

"I will." She replied.

The ring of magical light lowered until it was level with their chests. Then it moved in until it was inside of them, glowing inside of their abdomens.

"Let this magic curse any lies it finds." Marcos said with a grave tone.

The light grew brighter, and James felt warmth in his chest.

Then it faded, and nothing happened.

James squeezed Amina's hands with his, and felt them get squeezed in return.

"Then let these two people." The King said softly, yet still loud enough to be heard by all. "Call each other husband and wife."

Joey walked up and stood in front of James, holding a small box in his hands. James smiled at his brother as he took it and pulled the two small silver bands from them. Each of them had a small black stone that shone with dull red light inside.

He turned and took Amina's hand.

"It is the way of the Captain's world, for those who are married to wear rings as a sign of connection to each other." The King said. "A sign of devotion, commitment, and love. And... according to Captain Choi. To let other people know that they are, his words not mine, off the market. He has had these made of a silver dragon scale, and a piece of elemental obsidian. Two materials that he has told me carry great meaning to his and my daughter's relationship."

Amina had known about the rings. But she hadn't known about what they were made of. She looked at James in surprise as he slid the ring onto her finger.

"Yeah." He said softly, so that only she would hear him. Then she took her turn putting his ring on his hand.

"And the last of the Earth rituals is this." The King said as the two of them looked at each other again.

The crowd waited with bated breath.

"James. You may now kiss the bride."

James's hands wrapped around Amina's waist as hers went to his neck and shoulder.

And the newly married couple kissed as all the attendees from Earth began to cheer. The Petravian crowd followed suit only a moment later.

And neither James or Amina wanted the kiss to ever end.

They didn't know about the commotion occurring at the castle's main gate on the other side of the castle grounds.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10lefrl/wait_is_this_just_gate_300/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (299/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Cue the bells. And maybe just a bit of cheesiness.

And remember, in real life the ceremony is rarely more than ten or twenty minutes long. If it IS longer than that, than someone wanted it to be.

Enjoy.

\~

When Mrs. Choi walked into the grand hall and saw her youngest son standing near the dais she gasped in shock at the hanbok that Joey was wearing. She'd known ahead of time that the two brothers had worked together to keep their wedding outfits a surprise, mainly on her behalf, but the sight of the black and blue outfit still managed to startle her to tears. She hugged Joey for a minute before moving up a step to her place of honor on a chair only marginally smaller than the King's.

Two empty seats sat next to each of them. For the spouses, and parents of the people getting married, that they each had lost.

A few minutes later, and to the sound of horns, James walked in in his own hanbok. He smiled wide and proud when he saw her in her seat and did what he could not to rush his way up to the platform and hug her. But he had a ceremony to perform.

James stepped up to the bottom step of the dais.

In one swift motion James drew his sword from its sheath and pointed it at the King. Several of the guards around the room flinched reflexively as he did before remembering that it was a show and nothing more. Ironically, that was also an expected part of the ceremony. He also drew his pistol from its holster and held it at his side.

"King Farrick Petravius!" He announced. "I have spent the allotted time in courtship with your eldest daughter. In that time I have given my life, and every ounce of my love to her. And I have found no reason to stop doing so." He dropped the two weapons to the ground with a loud clatter. "On my life. Will you allow me to marry her on this day?"

Then he dropped to a knee, held his arms out to the side and lowered his head into a bow.

King Farrick stood up and drew the long narrow sword at his own hip and touched the tip of it to the back of James's neck. If the king desired, the position would allow him to kill James with only a pound or so of pressure, a flick of his wrist.

The two of them stayed that way for several long seconds as the crowd watched. Then the King sheathed the sword in a motion as fluid as the draw had been.

"I have seen this love, and this life, Captain Choi." He said in his booming voice. "And you may."

James stood up, doing everything he could to hide the fact that his legs were shaking, and nodded to the King. King Farrick returned the nod with a small smile. Then James moved to the side of the platform near his mom and brother.

The horns sounded again and everyone present turned to the door.

Amina stepped through the door, and James felt his heart jump in his chest.

She wore a gilded version of her normal breastplate. But that was the only armor she wore. The rest was flowing golden silk with red and blue embroidery. In her hair was a ring of the yellowish white flowers that grew in vines on the balcony near their room. He knew that they smelled of lavender and citrus.

On one of her arms was the magical blue shield that had kept her alive ever since the two of them had become betrothed to each other.

And in the other hand was a large, double edged battle axe that James recognized immediately, though he hadn't seen anyone carry it since Kela had died.

James was reminded of an image he'd seen years before in a history class about ancient Norse culture, and the Valkyries that they had worshiped.

He did what he could to keep his jaw from dropping. He'd yet to see her wedding outfit.

She stopped at the foot of the platform, just as he had and slowly lowered herself into the same kneel as she placed her weapons at her feet.

"Lady Choi." She said softly. "I have spent the allotted time in courtship with your eldest son. In that time I have given my life, and every ounce of my love to him. And I have found no reason to stop doing so." She said as she raised her arms up and dropped her head. "Will you allow me to marry him on this day?"

Mrs. Choi didn't have a sword, and when offered one had declined it. Instead she dropped down a bit and lifted Amina's head with her hand.

"I've also seen this love." She said. "From both of you." She looked at James and smiled. "Please do." Then she lifted Amina up with an offered hand, hugged her, and took her place back at her seat.

Amina joined James in front of her father and the two of them held hands.

"It is the way of Captain Choi's world for the two being married to say a short speech defining their love for each other." The King said. "And after speaking it over with each other, my daughter has offered to forgo hers in favor of Captain Choi's."

The two of them smiled at each other as the King nodded to them.

"Amina." James began. "The first time I ever met you, I was naked, afraid, and angry." He said with a small laugh. "And you punched me in the face."

The murmuring from those in attendance rose at the mention of the premarital violence.

"And... as much as my jaw hurt. That pain's nothing compared to the pain I'd feel without you now." He continued, his voice quavering a bit. "We have lived together for over a year now. Traveled. Fought. Bled." He looked down at the weapons they'd discarded, especially the axe. "Lost people." He said. He reached up and wiped the single tear that had rolled down her cheek. "But we've done it together..... I have gone through some of the worst days of my life since arriving in this world. And each time you've been the one that let me get through it. You've seen me at my lowest. And helped drive me to new heights I couldn't even have imagined before now. My life is better with you in it. And I'm so happy that we get to bind our lives together like this. I never want to go back to the life before I met you."

James looked back at his mother, and brother, as he said the last line. It was the first time they'd heard it. And now that he'd finally said it out loud in front of them, the truth of it resonated within him.

"This is my life now." He said. "You are my life now." He shrugged a bit as he grinned. "At least until you get tired of me."

The crowd laughed even as Amina smiled.

"I love you Amina." He finished.

"I love you." She replied.

The King nodded, knowing that the speech was over. Then he turned to Arch-Mage Marcos who stepped forward and James and Amina turned until they were back to back, then clasped hands again.

Marcos began chanting, and a ring of blue light formed around them.

"James Michael Choi of Earth!" The King bellowed. "Do you love Amina Petravius?"

James felt the magical compulsion to speak the truth.

"I do." He said calmly. "More than I've ever loved another."

"Will you safeguard her life and livelihood for the rest of your life?"

"I will." He said.

"Amina Petravius. Princess of Petravus. Do you love James Choi?" The King asked.

"With my entire heart." She said with a squeeze of James's hand. He squeezed back.

"And do you intend to safeguard his life and livelihood for the rest of your life?"

"I will." She replied.

The ring of magical light lowered until it was level with their chests. Then it moved in until it was inside of them, glowing inside of their abdomens.

"Let this magic curse any lies it finds." Marcos said with a grave tone.

The light grew brighter, and James felt warmth in his chest.

Then it faded, and nothing happened.

James squeezed Amina's hands with his, and felt them get squeezed in return.

"Then let these two people." The King said softly, yet still loud enough to be heard by all. "Call each other husband and wife."

Joey walked up and stood in front of James, holding a small box in his hands. James smiled at his brother as he took it and pulled the two small silver bands from them. Each of them had a small black stone that shone with dull red light inside.

He turned and took Amina's hand.

"It is the way of the Captain's world, for those who are married to wear rings as a sign of connection to each other." The King said. "A sign of devotion, commitment, and love. And... according to Captain Choi. To let other people know that they are, his words not mine, off the market. He has had these made of a silver dragon scale, and a piece of elemental obsidian. Two materials that he has told me carry great meaning to his and my daughter's relationship."

Amina had known about the rings. But she hadn't known about what they were made of. She looked at James in surprise as he slid the ring onto her finger.

"Yeah." He said softly, so that only she would hear him. Then she took her turn putting his ring on his hand.

"And the last of the Earth rituals is this." The King said as the two of them looked at each other again.

The crowd waited with bated breath.

"James. You may now kiss the bride."

James's hands wrapped around Amina's waist as hers went to his neck and shoulder.

And the newly married couple kissed as all the attendees from Earth began to cheer. The Petravian crowd followed suit only a moment later.

And neither James or Amina wanted the kiss to ever end.

They didn't know about the commotion occurring at the castle's main gate on the other side of the castle grounds.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10ledvv/wait_is_this_just_gate_300/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (298/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Vickers: Deadly operative. Newly transformed were-guar. Startlingly skilled banjo player. And most importantly.... master of ~~seduction~~ AWKWARDNESS... he's the master of awkwardness.

Enjoy.

\~

James spent the first thirty minutes of flight simply marveling at the sights he was seeing.

Sure, he'd flown over the capital numerous times since he'd learned how. But those had all been slightly taxing because HE had been the one flying. Plus his method of flight typically resulted in him not having much time to enjoy the views. Aaaaand it didn't help much that for a lot of those flights he was headed somewhere to handle an emergency.

The trip that he and Amina took on her sister's flying ship however, was more akin to being on a day cruise on some kind of sailboat.

It had taken a few days for the ships crew to give it a once over after it had arrived. Its trip to the capital had been only its seventh time flying, and easily the longest trip it had ever taken, and they'd needed to make sure that it was working.

Now it floated lazily, and with a slight up and down bob, over the farmland near the capital's north eastern borders.

James and Amina stood on the prow of the ship, hands on each others waist as they took in the view. Alixan lounged next to a table that was a few feet smaller than him playing some kind of chess game with one of the ship's crew members. And Xarina and a few of her "ACTUAL SAILORS" as she'd loudly called them, were meticulously going over every inch of the ship with a fine toothed comb as they inspected it.

James liked Princess Ferria, who stood a few yards away with her eyes closed as she enjoyed the wind. She was the one sibling out of the royal family who had, at least so far, not started some kind of fight with him. The fact that she looked like a slightly shorter, lighter haired version of Amina, albeit not as battle hardened, only helped.

But she also made him feel as though he should keep her at arms length.

Something about her unsettled him.

He wasn't sure if it was her seemingly TOO friendly ambassador husband. Or if it was the fact that she was extremely religious. Even now she looked as though she was on the verge of breaking into prayer. But something about her just set off the little voice in his head that said she was trouble.

Maybe, he thought, it was just his brain being intelligent for a change and telling him that she was a little TOO similar to Amina, and that that in and of itself was a danger to him.

Either way he had resolved very quickly to keep his guard up around her.

"We should ask Ferria if she'll let us ride this for our first few post marriage visitations." Amina said as she leaned into his shoulder and rested her head on top of his. "It'll make the trip much easier. Then we can just travel by conventional means for the rest of them."

James bristled at that. He peered over at the serene sister nearby for a moment, then over at the Ambassador, who was standing next to the ship's captain beaming as he answered Xarina's borderline interrogation.

"Oh. I don't know." He replied as he planted a kiss on Amina's cheek. "I kinda like traveling on the road with you." He said. "Besides. I need to spend more time with Steve. Feel like I haven't taken him for a nice long ride in months."

"That's because you haven't." She shot back. "But this ship's big enough for him."

"Yeah." He agreed. "But also, look at my track record with trips." He reminded her. "What happens if the Agency or some other asshole decides to mess with us again and we're up in this thing? Even the Ambassador admitted that this thing isn't fit for actual battle."

Amina grumbled. The General in her being uncomfortable with the reminder that they were currently in a very indefensible position.

"Hmmmm. Fair." She admitted. "Still. We could at least ride it out to the eastern sea. Save us a few weeks."

James conceded the point. They had already made that trip a few times before. And he couldn't deny how incredible this ship was.

"Fine." He said. Then he grinned devilishly. "But we're christening this ship the first chance we get. I have a feeling that the priest and priestess have neglected that particular duty." He said with a nod toward her sister.

"Christening?" She asked curiously.

James whispered in her ear and Amina had to fight not to blush and join him with a grin of her own.

\----------

"So. The Army wasn't exactly happy about the interview." Fletcher said as he joined Samantha and Dr. Munro at their lunch table. "But they admitted that none of the information in it was classified. Most of what happened is on camera in one form or another, and the president already admitted that it was real. So they backed off."

Samantha fidgeted a bit as the lawyer finished sitting down and rolled up the sleeves of his flannel shirt above his elbows. This was one of the first days she'd ever left her room WITHOUT her hoodie. It was one of the next steps toward being able to live normally again, relatively speaking. Instead she wore a long navy style peacoat. It still obscured her body enough to let her relax a bit. But there was no hood to hide behind. And even as large as it would have been on a human, it only barely reached past her waist.

"But it was a good interview." He said as he blew on a spoonful of chili from his bowl. "They sent me the final edit for review. It's well done."

"That's good." Dr. Munro said with a smile. "Did they add the last bit?"

Fletcher nodded as he savored the food for a moment. "Mmhmm. Yep."

"Last part?" Samantha asked. She didn't actually know much about the video other than that she would be in it and it would be played on the news in a few days.

"An announcement to anyone else who might have been.... affected... in the same way you were." Dr. Munro said with a hand on Samantha's shoulder. "But who didn't join with the two packs that split off and escaped from the military."

"They got the southern one." Fletcher said before wiping his mouth with a napkin. "Caught them just north of Amarillo. They tried to take on one of the shanty militias. The commotion brought them a bit too much attention and the Military caught up to em."

"That's terrible." Dr. Munro said in shock.

Samantha squirmed a bit. She still didn't know how she felt about the fact that there were other werewolves out there. Hell, she'd still yet to meet any of the others that were supposedly here in THIS very hospital. Though she had smelled traces of them a handful of times. She thought there were maybe four.

"What was the announcement?" She asked, still wondering about the video.

"A statement of sanctuary." Dr. Munro replied. Samantha looked at her curiously. Dr. Munro shrugged. "We're currently the only hospital in the country that's currently working on helping werewolves adjust to their new lives and attempting to find a cure." She said. "At least as far as we know. Who knows what your former employers have going on."

"You want them to come here?" She asked.

"Well. Not necessarily HERE." Fletcher weighed in. "But we've uh... set up a bit of a network of hospitals and clinics that would be willing to work with us."

"What?" She wondered. "Like an underground railroad for werewolves?"

Fletcher looked visibly uncomfortable. "I..... wouldn't equate the two." He said uncertainly. "More like an offer of safe harbor."

"Can you do that?" She asked.

Fletcher just shrugged as he crushed some cheese crackers into his bowl. "No idea. There's no laws pertaining to the treatment of werewolves just yet."

She thought about the statement for a moment. She'd never thought about what HER own legal status was. She also did everything in her power NOT to look at the lawyer's arms as he smashed the little crackers between them.

"Well. I hope they answer it." She said. "It would suck to deal with what I'm dealing with alone."

Dr. Munro just smiled as she sipped her tea.

\-------------------------

"So..." Vickers began as the tailor measured him. "How does this work with the tail and the monthly transformation?"

Nearby Atrafar was inspecting a set of some kind of light blue silky material.

"Easily enough." The tailor said as he measured Vickers' bicep. "Twenty two." He said to his assistant, who quickly noted the number. "For this first month we'll have you come back a few more times. Once at full were-form. Once at your mostly human form. Plus twice in between. Once at the halfway point, and once at the other quarter way."

"Okay." Vickers said, seeing where this was going. "Measurements at each. And I'm guessing a wide array of fits for each."

The tailor nodded as he pulled a pin from the corner of his mouth and used it to hold some cloth in place. "Plus some stuff that we calculate to fit the spaces in between." He paused as he adjusted the cloth a bit and repositioned the pin. "Given enough time you'll learn how your transformations USUALLY go. And you'll be able to swap what you wear around to fit you best. Same with any armor or weapons you like to use. Though, that's a blacksmith's problem, not mine. How's that feel? Move your arm up like you're waving."

Vickers did as told. "Kind of rubs a bit just under the back of the armpit." He said. The tailor nodded and readjusted. "And the tail?" He asked again. It had been bugging him a bit to feel wind on his ass while wearing the robes that the Lunar Council had provided.

"What about it?" The tailor asked. "Not much you can do with it except leave an opening or cut it off."

"I do not recommend the latter." Atrafar chimed in.

Vickers turned to look at her and was surprised to see her being wrapped up in some of the blue cloth she'd been inspecting. The tailor, who had four arms, with her was measuring the amount even as she helped apply it to the werewolf's body.

"It's true." His tailor chimed in. "I've known a few of the folk who have opted to rid themselves of their tails. It's doable. But they all ended up regretting it."

"Really?" He asked, more curious than anything. He had no intention of cutting parts of himself off.

"Throws off the balance." Atrafar replied. "Especially for feline types. Plus leaves a hell of a deformity when you transition back to your more human form."

"I can sew a flap for you." His tailor said. "Make it overlap the base of your tail a bit more than normal. It'll be uncomfortable if your tail raises for any reason. But that'll be a minor inconvenience."

"Lots of people ask for that?" He wondered. The tailor simply grunted. Then Vickers jolted as his tail was grabbed by the man and measured.

"Get used to that." The man said. "Especially around children."

Vickers was about to reply when Atrafar spoke.

"What do you think?" She asked.

Vickers turned to look at her and his eyebrows rose even as his mouth dropped open just a tiny bit.

Atrafar was wearing the blue cloth, which actually faded to a dark green in some places, in a style that reminded him of Old India back on Earth. The cloth was simply bundled around her chest and then draped over her shoulders in a simple wrap. It turned into a simple dress as it passed her waist and wrapped around her.

"Woah." He said without realizing it, and Atrafar smiled awkwardly.

The Tailor chuckled quietly.

"So. Wedding's in two days?" The man asked as he noted the length of Vickers' legs. "Same day as the royal wedding?"

"Hmm?" Vickers wondered as he looked down, broken out of his thoughts by the question.

"You two make a handsome couple. And big. Litter should be strong." The tailor mused.

"Oh." Vickers said as he realized the man's meaning. "No. We're not..." He gulped as the tailor looked up at him questioningly. Then he looked over at Atrafar, who made a point of looking away as she resisted smiling.

"Relax." Said the tailor after a moment. "I recognize the robes of a member of the Outer Light. She's never getting married. And you still have a body to get used to. Highly doubt you'd be going through a wedding ceremony all clumsy like you are."

"Besides." Atrafar said. "I'm only here for a bit of shopping. I'll be wearing my armor as an escort to Elder Tadrias during the wedding."

"You're not going with me?" Vickers asked.

"Are you ACTUALLY asking me to?" She shot back.

"I mean. I kinda thought th-" He tried to reply.

"Because last time I checked, Royal weddings require invitation." She said, ignoring him.

The tailor made a point of remaining dead silent as he gingerly continued his measurements.

Vickers... was tired of being messed with. And also too stressed and tired from his new body to handle any more.

He looked dead at her as his eyes darkened with determination.

"Atrafar. When your duties as a knight or whatever are over. Will you attend the remainder of the wedding with me?" He asked in a monotone. Then he added in a much quieter voice, one that he hoped only she would be able to hear. ^("Also, I don't know how to dance in this body yet.")

Then he took a deep breath.

"Was that so hard?" She asked.

He simply stared back at her.

The two of them stared at each other for several seconds that Vickers thought probably felt longer for him than they did for her.

"Yes. I'll go with you." She said finally, and he took a breath that he hadn't even realized he'd been holding.

Then she turned and walked away with the tailor that had been attending to her.

A few moments later Vickers' tailor spoke up.

"I don't know if you two are ACTUALLY a couple." He said as he held a swathe of cloth up to the side of Vickers' thigh. "But if you are; you're sleeping in the guest room tonight."

Vickers was starting to wonder about that first part too.

"Her quarters at the castle are nicer than mine." He said instead. "Her guest room is nicer than my entire room."

"Ah." The tailor said. "Upgrades then."

Vickers looked at his newly triangular ears in the mirror for a moment.

"All over the place." He said simply.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10h9u01/wait_is_this_just_gate_299/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (298/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Vickers: Deadly operative. Newly transformed were-guar. Startlingly skilled banjo player. And most importantly.... master of ~~seduction~~ AWKWARDNESS... he's the master of awkwardness.

Enjoy.

\~

James spent the first thirty minutes of flight simply marveling at the sights he was seeing.

Sure, he'd flown over the capital numerous times since he'd learned how. But those had all been slightly taxing because HE had been the one flying. Plus his method of flight typically resulted in him not having much time to enjoy the views. Aaaaand it didn't help much that for a lot of those flights he was headed somewhere to handle an emergency.

The trip that he and Amina took on her sister's flying ship however, was more akin to being on a day cruise on some kind of sailboat.

It had taken a few days for the ships crew to give it a once over after it had arrived. Its trip to the capital had been only its seventh time flying, and easily the longest trip it had ever taken, and they'd needed to make sure that it was working.

Now it floated lazily, and with a slight up and down bob, over the farmland near the capital's north eastern borders.

James and Amina stood on the prow of the ship, hands on each others waist as they took in the view. Alixan lounged next to a table that was a few feet smaller than him playing some kind of chess game with one of the ship's crew members. And Xarina and a few of her "ACTUAL SAILORS" as she'd loudly called them, were meticulously going over every inch of the ship with a fine toothed comb as they inspected it.

James liked Princess Ferria, who stood a few yards away with her eyes closed as she enjoyed the wind. She was the one sibling out of the royal family who had, at least so far, not started some kind of fight with him. The fact that she looked like a slightly shorter, lighter haired version of Amina, albeit not as battle hardened, only helped.

But she also made him feel as though he should keep her at arms length.

Something about her unsettled him.

He wasn't sure if it was her seemingly TOO friendly ambassador husband. Or if it was the fact that she was extremely religious. Even now she looked as though she was on the verge of breaking into prayer. But something about her just set off the little voice in his head that said she was trouble.

Maybe, he thought, it was just his brain being intelligent for a change and telling him that she was a little TOO similar to Amina, and that that in and of itself was a danger to him.

Either way he had resolved very quickly to keep his guard up around her.

"We should ask Ferria if she'll let us ride this for our first few post marriage visitations." Amina said as she leaned into his shoulder and rested her head on top of his. "It'll make the trip much easier. Then we can just travel by conventional means for the rest of them."

James bristled at that. He peered over at the serene sister nearby for a moment, then over at the Ambassador, who was standing next to the ship's captain beaming as he answered Xarina's borderline interrogation.

"Oh. I don't know." He replied as he planted a kiss on Amina's cheek. "I kinda like traveling on the road with you." He said. "Besides. I need to spend more time with Steve. Feel like I haven't taken him for a nice long ride in months."

"That's because you haven't." She shot back. "But this ship's big enough for him."

"Yeah." He agreed. "But also, look at my track record with trips." He reminded her. "What happens if the Agency or some other asshole decides to mess with us again and we're up in this thing? Even the Ambassador admitted that this thing isn't fit for actual battle."

Amina grumbled. The General in her being uncomfortable with the reminder that they were currently in a very indefensible position.

"Hmmmm. Fair." She admitted. "Still. We could at least ride it out to the eastern sea. Save us a few weeks."

James conceded the point. They had already made that trip a few times before. And he couldn't deny how incredible this ship was.

"Fine." He said. Then he grinned devilishly. "But we're christening this ship the first chance we get. I have a feeling that the priest and priestess have neglected that particular duty." He said with a nod toward her sister.

"Christening?" She asked curiously.

James whispered in her ear and Amina had to fight not to blush and join him with a grin of her own.

\----------

"So. The Army wasn't exactly happy about the interview." Fletcher said as he joined Samantha and Dr. Munro at their lunch table. "But they admitted that none of the information in it was classified. Most of what happened is on camera in one form or another, and the president already admitted that it was real. So they backed off."

Samantha fidgeted a bit as the lawyer finished sitting down and rolled up the sleeves of his flannel shirt above his elbows. This was one of the first days she'd ever left her room WITHOUT her hoodie. It was one of the next steps toward being able to live normally again, relatively speaking. Instead she wore a long navy style peacoat. It still obscured her body enough to let her relax a bit. But there was no hood to hide behind. And even as large as it would have been on a human, it only barely reached past her waist.

"But it was a good interview." He said as he blew on a spoonful of chili from his bowl. "They sent me the final edit for review. It's well done."

"That's good." Dr. Munro said with a smile. "Did they add the last bit?"

Fletcher nodded as he savored the food for a moment. "Mmhmm. Yep."

"Last part?" Samantha asked. She didn't actually know much about the video other than that she would be in it and it would be played on the news in a few days.

"An announcement to anyone else who might have been.... affected... in the same way you were." Dr. Munro said with a hand on Samantha's shoulder. "But who didn't join with the two packs that split off and escaped from the military."

"They got the southern one." Fletcher said before wiping his mouth with a napkin. "Caught them just north of Amarillo. They tried to take on one of the shanty militias. The commotion brought them a bit too much attention and the Military caught up to em."

"That's terrible." Dr. Munro said in shock.

Samantha squirmed a bit. She still didn't know how she felt about the fact that there were other werewolves out there. Hell, she'd still yet to meet any of the others that were supposedly here in THIS very hospital. Though she had smelled traces of them a handful of times. She thought there were maybe four.

"What was the announcement?" She asked, still wondering about the video.

"A statement of sanctuary." Dr. Munro replied. Samantha looked at her curiously. Dr. Munro shrugged. "We're currently the only hospital in the country that's currently working on helping werewolves adjust to their new lives and attempting to find a cure." She said. "At least as far as we know. Who knows what your former employers have going on."

"You want them to come here?" She asked.

"Well. Not necessarily HERE." Fletcher weighed in. "But we've uh... set up a bit of a network of hospitals and clinics that would be willing to work with us."

"What?" She wondered. "Like an underground railroad for werewolves?"

Fletcher looked visibly uncomfortable. "I..... wouldn't equate the two." He said uncertainly. "More like an offer of safe harbor."

"Can you do that?" She asked.

Fletcher just shrugged as he crushed some cheese crackers into his bowl. "No idea. There's no laws pertaining to the treatment of werewolves just yet."

She thought about the statement for a moment. She'd never thought about what HER own legal status was. She also did everything in her power NOT to look at the lawyer's arms as he smashed the little crackers between them.

"Well. I hope they answer it." She said. "It would suck to deal with what I'm dealing with alone."

Dr. Munro just smiled as she sipped her tea.

\--------------------------

"So..." Vickers began as the tailor measured him. "How does this work with the tail and the monthly transformation?"

Nearby Atrafar was inspecting a set of some kind of light blue silky material.

"Easily enough." The tailor said as he measured Vickers' bicep. "Twenty two." He said to his assistant, who quickly noted the number. "For this first month we'll have you come back a few more times. Once at full were-form. Once at your mostly human form. Plus twice in between. Once at the halfway point, and once at the other quarter way."

"Okay." Vickers said, seeing where this was going. "Measurements at each. And I'm guessing a wide array of fits for each."

The tailor nodded as he pulled a pin from the corner of his mouth and used it to hold some cloth in place. "Plus some stuff that we calculate to fit the spaces in between." He paused as he adjusted the cloth a bit and repositioned the pin. "Given enough time you'll learn how your transformations USUALLY go. And you'll be able to swap what you wear around to fit you best. Same with any armor or weapons you like to use. Though, that's a blacksmith's problem, not mine. How's that feel? Move your arm up like you're waving."

Vickers did as told. "Kind of rubs a bit just under the back of the armpit." He said. The tailor nodded and readjusted. "And the tail?" He asked again. It had been bugging him a bit to feel wind on his ass while wearing the robes that the Lunar Council had provided.

"What about it?" The tailor asked. "Not much you can do with it except leave an opening or cut it off."

"I do not recommend the latter." Atrafar chimed in.

Vickers turned to look at her and was surprised to see her being wrapped up in some of the blue cloth she'd been inspecting. The tailor, who had four arms, with her was measuring the amount even as she helped apply it to the werewolf's body.

"It's true." His tailor chimed in. "I've known a few of the folk who have opted to rid themselves of their tails. It's doable. But they all ended up regretting it."

"Really?" He asked, more curious than anything. He had no intention of cutting parts of himself off.

"Throws off the balance." Atrafar replied. "Especially for feline types. Plus leaves a hell of a deformity when you transition back to your more human form."

"I can sew a flap for you." His tailor said. "Make it overlap the base of your tail a bit more than normal. It'll be uncomfortable if your tail raises for any reason. But that'll be a minor inconvenience."

"Lots of people ask for that?" He wondered. The tailor simply grunted. Then Vickers jolted as his tail was grabbed by the man and measured.

"Get used to that." The man said. "Especially around children."

Vickers was about to reply when Atrafar spoke.

"What do you think?" She asked.

Vickers turned to look at her and his eyebrows rose even as his mouth dropped open just a tiny bit.

Atrafar was wearing the blue cloth, which actually faded to a dark green in some places, in a style that reminded him of Old India back on Earth. The cloth was simply bundled around her chest and then draped over her shoulders in a simple wrap. It turned into a simple dress as it passed her waist and wrapped around her.

"Woah." He said without realizing it, and Atrafar smiled awkwardly.

The Tailor chuckled quietly.

"So. Wedding's in two days?" The man asked as he noted the length of Vickers' legs. "Same day as the royal wedding?"

"Hmm?" Vickers wondered as he looked down, broken out of his thoughts by the question.

"You two make a handsome couple. And big. Litter should be strong." The tailor mused.

"Oh." Vickers said as he realized the man's meaning. "No. We're not..." He gulped as the tailor looked up at him questioningly. Then he looked over at Atrafar, who made a point of looking away as she resisted smiling.

"Relax." Said the tailor after a moment. "I recognize the robes of a member of the Outer Light. She's never getting married. And you still have a body to get used to. Highly doubt you'd be going through a wedding ceremony all clumsy like you are."

"Besides." Atrafar said. "I'm only here for a bit of shopping. I'll be wearing my armor as an escort to Elder Tadrias during the wedding."

"You're not going with me?" Vickers asked.

"Are you ACTUALLY asking me to?" She shot back.

"I mean. I kinda thought th-" He tried to reply.

"Because last time I checked, Royal weddings require invitation." She said, ignoring him.

The tailor made a point of remaining dead silent as he gingerly continued his measurements.

Vickers... was tired of being messed with. And also too stressed and tired from his new body to handle any more.

He looked dead at her as his eyes darkened with determination.

"Atrafar. When your duties as a knight or whatever are over. Will you attend the remainder of the wedding with me?" He asked in a monotone. Then he added in a much quieter voice, one that he hoped only she would be able to hear. ^("Also, I don't know how to dance in this body yet.")

Then he took a deep breath.

"Was that so hard?" She asked.

He simply stared back at her.

The two of them stared at each other for several seconds that Vickers thought probably felt longer for him than they did for her.

"Yes. I'll go with you." She said finally, and he took a breath that he hadn't even realized he'd been holding.

Then she turned and walked away with the tailor that had been attending to her.

A few moments later Vickers' tailor spoke up.

"I don't know if you two are ACTUALLY a couple." He said as he held a swathe of cloth up to the side of Vickers' thigh. "But if you are; you're sleeping in the guest room tonight."

Vickers was starting to wonder about that first part too.

"Her quarters at the castle are nicer than mine." He said instead. "Her guest room is nicer than my entire room."

"Ah." The tailor said. "Upgrades then."

Vickers looked at his newly triangular ears in the mirror for a moment.

"All over the place." He said simply.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10h9ro7/wait_is_this_just_gate_299/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (297/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Future IT. Just advanced enough to find a problem. But simplified enough so that I can write about it cause I don't know shit about fuck when it comes to operating systems.

Enjoy.

\~

"Can you state your full name, for the camera?" The young woman says as she sits down in the small chair across the table.

Samantha nods as she struggles to resist the urge to pull her hood back up and over her face. But this is part of the healing. She's learned to look in a mirror again. Now she has to learn how to handle being SEEN again. By other people.

Plus this will get her story out there.

"Yes. Um.... Corporal Samantha Leray Jenkins." She says to the camera. Then she sees her reflection on its lens and has a moment of doubt, flinching back just a bit.

But Doctor Munro is behind it with Mr. Fletcher, the hospital lawyer, right next to her. The doctor gives her a "go ahead" signal with her hand.

"We can edit this." The young woman assures her. "Take your time. We've got all day."

"It's fine." She replies, even if she doesn't believe it. "Let's just... Let's get it over with."

The woman looks at her, and Samantha can't help but smell the makeup she has caked on for the camera.

"So. Corporal Jenkins. You are, at least until a better name is figured out, a werewolf. And also one of the people that survived the violence that occurred here in Sturgis three months ago. Tell us what happened."

Samantha looked back past the camera and saw both the doctor and Mr. Fletcher watching her. Fletcher nodded just a bit with a small smile.

"Well." She begins. "I'm legally not allowed to tell you too much about what occurred inside the base. Um... it's still classified. But I can tell you that I was an M.P. there when the event occurred."

The memory of that night make her pause and take a deep breath. How she had seen her battle buddies killed.

How she had tried to run.

How she'd failed.

"And while the event was um... kicking off... I guess... I was bitten." She gestures at her shoulder, remembering the feeling of the massive teeth puncturing it as they broke her bones. A shudder runs through her and she has to look away for a moment.

"That must have been terrifying." The woman says, and Samantha can hear genuine sympathy in her voice. This level of empathy must have been why Dr. Munro had chosen her for this interview.

Samantha nods.

"The next thing I remember, I was IN Sturgis." She continues. "I was covered in blood. Hurting. And there was this.... compulsion.... almost like I wasn't in control of what I was doing." She gulped. "And when.... when I looked down I was..... this." She said with a gesture to her body and face.

And before she can let her nerves stop her, Samantha began recounting the tale as the camera records. The reporter asked questions every now and then, all relevant, and only occasionally prying deeply. She's good at her job.

Samantha only needed to take a few breaks to recover.

And when it's done she finds that Dr. Munro was right. She does feel better after having gotten the story out.

\------------------------------

Vickers simmers as he sits on the bed letting the healer examine him.

It had taken nearly an hour to get one of the castle staff members who could clear the imitation kitty litter out of his room using earth magic. And even after that he can smell the traces of the stone on the floor, and things are dusty.

Choi had even painted a small section of the stone blue before he'd used his magic to pulverize it, creating a startlingly convincing replica of the real deal.

"Looks good." Says the healer as she finishes her examination. "All transformative properties were successful. No abnormalities. And your magical flow seems well aligned." She steps in front of him with the glow fading from her eyes. "How do you feel?"

"Constantly overwhelmed by sound and smell." He admitted. "But other than that fine."

"Well then I'd say you're good to go Chief." She says with a smile. "Let us know if anything comes up."

Vickers nods and stands up. He was never a fan of hospitals or this place. But now his enhanced sense of smell makes it almost intolerable.

He was nearly at the seating area where Atrafar was waiting for him when he heard something unexpected.

Something mechanical.

He listened closer for a few moments, focusing on the sound.

It's like a small motor with a bearing messed up somewhere inside. And it was powering something that seemed to almost breath. Maybe some kind of bellows or something.

Curious, both about the sound AND about how accurate his new senses are, Vickers followed the sound.

Its source surprised him, even though it shouldn't have.

A pair of human eyes, glazed over slightly from pain medicine, stare at him with chemically dulled curiosity. A pane of plexiglass separates the two of them.

The sound he had been hearing was the air circulator that had been set up for the sterile room that the so-called Toolies had set up for the Muck Marcher known as Five.

She watched him approach quietly.

Vickers had seen her once before after the battle. He'd been shocked at her survival. And he hadn't had many chances to check in on her status since. So he was even more surprised now. He hadn't expected her to last this long without her suit.

The Toolie in the room with her was busy working on one of the legs of her suit. It was in pieces on a table in front of them as they pressed something into place inside its shin.

Vickers was mildly repulsed by the sight of the..... person.... that had once resided in that suit.

"Good....." A rasping voice said from the other side of the glass. Vickers felt the fur on his neck and back stand up even as the Toolie's head jerked toward the woman. "Fight." She rasped.

Vickers stared at her as he processed the fact that she wasn't just ALIVE... but also cognizant.

"You recognize me?" He asked uncertainly.

She stared at him as she took long, deep, rattling breaths from the tube in her neck.

"Eyes." She said simply.

Vickers raises an eyebrow. Of course it was the eyes.

"Different color." She wheezes. "Same..... person..... behind them." She moves a bit and Vickers gets the sense that she was trying to move an arm. Though she didn't have one. "Tags." She says with a small smirk that only moves half of her mouth. The teeth inside it shine with metal caps.

Vickers doesn't need to look down to suddenly remember that he WAS in fact wearing his dog-tags.

"You're not mad?" He asked.

"No point." She said with a small nod as she settles back a bit. "No.... time."

And just like that he knows what she means.

He'd almost killed her in the desert. Had tried to actually. But simply hadn't had the time or energy to see it finished at the time.

Even then, with his human senses, he'd known that he'd damaged something inside her suit that had been vital. He'd felt it breaking beneath his fists, and smelled the results as he'd stood over her.

And now, months later, she was dying. For real this time

"Lived..... longer..... than... expected..... after bombs." She wheezed. "Good... run."

He looked at the Toolie, and as if knowing what he was going to ask the young man just nodded and shruged. Then turned back to the leg assembly that would likely never see use again anyways.

Vickers turned to walk away when she rasped out one last sentence, stopping him in his tracks.

"Now..... both.... monsters.... our.... own..... making."

He looked back and saw that same, metal-capped, half grin.

Then he resumed walking back out to the waiting area.

Though he couldn't help but study the base of his thumb, and how it no longer bore the small triangular scar anymore.

\--------------------

"So I'm thinking that as a gag we serve Vickers a bunch of raw fish." James said as he bit into the carnitas taco that the castle cooks had just sent out for them to test. It was delicious, but not QUITE right in his mind. "Just for like.... a minute. Then when he gets mad bringing out his real food."

"He's going to kill you." Amina replied as she took a hesitant bite of the al pastor chicken taco, after she'd examined its brightly colored meat. Then she melted as she savored the deliciousness. "Oh muh guds jmsh." She said with a full mouth. The taco didn't last much longer.

"Meh. Worth it." He replied as he wrote the note about the carnitas. They just needed a bit more of the citrus flavoring and he needed to find some kind of cilantro substitute. "Mom, how's the ceviche?" He asked as he saw her take a bite with the chips he'd made.

His mom's mouth opened and raw fish plopped out onto the napkin she held underneath it.

"Did you make it with the uh... smeplie juice?" She asked as she grabbed for the pitcher of water.

"Yeah. They don't have limes or lemons here." He admitted. "Did it not work? I added salt."

His mom took a mouthful of water and swished it around before spitting it into one of the empty cups.

"It did not mijo." She said. James struggled not to laugh.

The doors to the small dining area slammed open and the three of them looked, surprised to see Joey standing in the doorway. His eyes were glowing faintly green.

"Jojo?" James asked curiously.

"It worked!" Joey exclaimed.

Amina's mouth dropped open, letting a bit of carnitas and tortilla fall out in her surprise.

"Are those tacos?" Joey asked.

\----------

Driscoll looked at the small blurb on his HUD with intense interest as Brick droned on and on about some bar fight he'd been in. Driscoll had heard it before.

Or at least that's what he felt like, even though he only felt the words of the story gain familiarity AS they were spoken.

>\-WARNING!-BLOOD TOXICITY NEUTRALIZERS AT 50%

That couldn't be right.

He ran through his suit's status feeds.

Limbs and motors were fine. Though his damaged arm was reading as such.

Energy was fine. Not a surprise given the miniature reactor in his pack. Plus solar, thermal, and movement based generators scattered about the whole suit.

But there were three things that were wrong.

The neutralizers were one of them.

The nutrient paste was another. It was down to only twenty five percent. His suit, when fully loaded, had enough to last him nearly six months. He hadn't topped it off before the battle because food was readily available. But he'd still been sitting at nearly eighty percent when the fighting had kicked off.

Where was the rest? He hadn't eaten any that he could remember.

Yet as his tongue checked the tube, and the section of his mouth nearest it, he felt the tell tale seam in his mouth that meant he'd been "on the drip" for a while now. That was what they called it when he and his comrades went deep for extended periods of time and fed solely off of the admittedly disgusting, but vitamin and calorie rich paste. It left a small dent on the side of the mouth from where the tube went. And he had one again.

He looked at Brick as the small man segued into a story about some festival in some country named Vatria.

Did he.... know... Brick?

Thinking back he couldn't remember anything about the man save what he could see now.

Yet he KNEW that he and Brick had become..... if not friends, then at least buddies.... over the past few-

MONTHS!

Something screamed in his head as his eyes were drawn to the last issue on his HUD.

>MEMORY STORAGE:
>
>\-POSITIONAL DATA=5%
>
>\-SENSOR DATA= 13%
>
>\-COMMUNICATION DATA (SAVED)= 21.5%
>
>\-V/A DATA = 49% **
>
>\-OTHER= 3%

Driscoll stared at the stars.

They meant that the suit had tried to backup the data by either sending it back to command or prompting him to use an encrypted connection to upload it.

He selected the stars and saw that it had made ten different attempts.

Then he looked over at the other window and saw no videos or recordings save those he had already seen. And those didn't account for all the V/A data saved.

His suit had nearly thirty terabytes of space on their drives. A lot of it was taken up by the suit's OS. But there was room to spare. And in a single mission their sensors and everything else could fill the space easily if they didn't routinely upload it for command.

So why, if his V/A files were almost empty, was he reading as being almost half full of that kind of data. With numerous upload/backup requests.

And as Brick once again segued into a story that felt as familiar as it did novel, Driscoll began to dig into his suit's files.

One at a time.

It would take days. But he'd make time.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10gh783/wait_is_this_just_gate_298/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (297/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Future IT. Just advanced enough to find a problem. But simplified enough so that I can write about it cause I don't know shit about fuck when it comes to operating systems.

Enjoy.

\~

"Can you state your full name, for the camera?" The young woman says as she sits down in the small chair across the table.

Samantha nods as she struggles to resist the urge to pull her hood back up and over her face. But this is part of the healing. She's learned to look in a mirror again. Now she has to learn how to handle being SEEN again. By other people.

Plus this will get her story out there.

"Yes. Um.... Corporal Samantha Leray Jenkins." She says to the camera. Then she sees her reflection on its lens and has a moment of doubt, flinching back just a bit.

But Doctor Munro is behind it with Mr. Fletcher, the hospital lawyer, right next to her. The doctor gives her a "go ahead" signal with her hand.

"We can edit this." The young woman assures her. "Take your time. We've got all day."

"It's fine." She replies, even if she doesn't believe it. "Let's just... Let's get it over with."

The woman looks at her, and Samantha can't help but smell the makeup she has caked on for the camera.

"So. Corporal Jenkins. You are, at least until a better name is figured out, a werewolf. And also one of the people that survived the violence that occurred here in Sturgis three months ago. Tell us what happened."

Samantha looked back past the camera and saw both the doctor and Mr. Fletcher watching her. Fletcher nodded just a bit with a small smile.

"Well." She begins. "I'm legally not allowed to tell you too much about what occurred inside the base. Um... it's still classified. But I can tell you that I was an M.P. there when the event occurred."

The memory of that night make her pause and take a deep breath. How she had seen her battle buddies killed.

How she had tried to run.

How she'd failed.

"And while the event was um... kicking off... I guess... I was bitten." She gestures at her shoulder, remembering the feeling of the massive teeth puncturing it as they broke her bones. A shudder runs through her and she has to look away for a moment.

"That must have been terrifying." The woman says, and Samantha can hear genuine sympathy in her voice. This level of empathy must have been why Dr. Munro had chosen her for this interview.

Samantha nods.

"The next thing I remember, I was IN Sturgis." She continues. "I was covered in blood. Hurting. And there was this.... compulsion.... almost like I wasn't in control of what I was doing." She gulped. "And when.... when I looked down I was..... this." She said with a gesture to her body and face.

And before she can let her nerves stop her, Samantha began recounting the tale as the camera records. The reporter asked questions every now and then, all relevant, and only occasionally prying deeply. She's good at her job.

Samantha only needed to take a few breaks to recover.

And when it's done she finds that Dr. Munro was right. She does feel better after having gotten the story out.

\------------------------------

Vickers simmers as he sits on the bed letting the healer examine him.

It had taken nearly an hour to get one of the castle staff members who could clear the imitation kitty litter out of his room using earth magic. And even after that he can smell the traces of the stone on the floor, and things are dusty.

Choi had even painted a small section of the stone blue before he'd used his magic to pulverize it, creating a startlingly convincing replica of the real deal.

"Looks good." Says the healer as she finishes her examination. "All transformative properties were successful. No abnormalities. And your magical flow seems well aligned." She steps in front of him with the glow fading from her eyes. "How do you feel?"

"Constantly overwhelmed by sound and smell." He admitted. "But other than that fine."

"Well then I'd say you're good to go Chief." She says with a smile. "Let us know if anything comes up."

Vickers nods and stands up. He was never a fan of hospitals or this place. But now his enhanced sense of smell makes it almost intolerable.

He was nearly at the seating area where Atrafar was waiting for him when he heard something unexpected.

Something mechanical.

He listened closer for a few moments, focusing on the sound.

It's like a small motor with a bearing messed up somewhere inside. And it was powering something that seemed to almost breath. Maybe some kind of bellows or something.

Curious, both about the sound AND about how accurate his new senses are, Vickers followed the sound.

Its source surprised him, even though it shouldn't have.

A pair of human eyes, glazed over slightly from pain medicine, stare at him with chemically dulled curiosity. A pane of plexiglass separates the two of them.

The sound he had been hearing was the air circulator that had been set up for the sterile room that the so-called Toolies had set up for the Muck Marcher known as Five.

She watched him approach quietly.

Vickers had seen her once before after the battle. He'd been shocked at her survival. And he hadn't had many chances to check in on her status since. So he was even more surprised now. He hadn't expected her to last this long without her suit.

The Toolie in the room with her was busy working on one of the legs of her suit. It was in pieces on a table in front of them as they pressed something into place inside its shin.

Vickers was mildly repulsed by the sight of the..... person.... that had once resided in that suit.

"Good....." A rasping voice said from the other side of the glass. Vickers felt the fur on his neck and back stand up even as the Toolie's head jerked toward the woman. "Fight." She rasped.

Vickers stared at her as he processed the fact that she wasn't just ALIVE... but also cognizant.

"You recognize me?" He asked uncertainly.

She stared at him as she took long, deep, rattling breaths from the tube in her neck.

"Eyes." She said simply.

Vickers raises an eyebrow. Of course it was the eyes.

"Different color." She wheezes. "Same..... person..... behind them." She moves a bit and Vickers gets the sense that she was trying to move an arm. Though she didn't have one. "Tags." She says with a small smirk that only moves half of her mouth. The teeth inside it shine with metal caps.

Vickers doesn't need to look down to suddenly remember that he WAS in fact wearing his dog-tags.

"You're not mad?" He asked.

"No point." She said with a small nod as she settles back a bit. "No.... time."

And just like that he knows what she means.

He'd almost killed her in the desert. Had tried to actually. But simply hadn't had the time or energy to see it finished at the time.

Even then, with his human senses, he'd known that he'd damaged something inside her suit that had been vital. He'd felt it breaking beneath his fists, and smelled the results as he'd stood over her.

And now, months later, she was dying. For real this time

"Lived..... longer..... than... expected..... after bombs." She wheezed. "Good... run."

He looked at the Toolie, and as if knowing what he was going to ask the young man just nodded and shruged. Then turned back to the leg assembly that would likely never see use again anyways.

Vickers turned to walk away when she rasped out one last sentence, stopping him in his tracks.

"Now..... both.... monsters.... our.... own..... making."

He looked back and saw that same, metal-capped, half grin.

Then he resumed walking back out to the waiting area.

Though he couldn't help but study the base of his thumb, and how it no longer bore the small triangular scar anymore.

\--------------------

"So I'm thinking that as a gag we serve Vickers a bunch of raw fish." James said as he bit into the carnitas taco that the castle cooks had just sent out for them to test. It was delicious, but not QUITE right in his mind. "Just for like.... a minute. Then when he gets mad bringing out his real food."

"He's going to kill you." Amina replied as she took a hesitant bite of the al pastor chicken taco, after she'd examined its brightly colored meat. Then she melted as she savored the deliciousness. "Oh muh guds jmsh." She said with a full mouth. The taco didn't last much longer.

"Meh. Worth it." He replied as he wrote the note about the carnitas. They just needed a bit more of the citrus flavoring and he needed to find some kind of cilantro substitute. "Mom, how's the ceviche?" He asked as he saw her take a bite with the chips he'd made.

His mom's mouth opened and raw fish plopped out onto the napkin she held underneath it.

"Did you make it with the uh... smeplie juice?" She asked as she grabbed for the pitcher of water.

"Yeah. They don't have limes or lemons here." He admitted. "Did it not work? I added salt."

His mom took a mouthful of water and swished it around before spitting it into one of the empty cups.

"It did not mijo." She said. James struggled not to laugh.

The doors to the small dining area slammed open and the three of them looked, surprised to see Joey standing in the doorway. His eyes were glowing faintly green.

"Jojo?" James asked curiously.

"It worked!" Joey exclaimed.

Amina's mouth dropped open, letting a bit of carnitas and tortilla fall out in her surprise.

"Are those tacos?" Joey asked.

\----------------

Driscoll looked at the small blurb on his HUD with intense interest as Brick droned on and on about some bar fight he'd been in. Driscoll had heard it before.

Or at least that's what he felt like, even though he only felt the words of the story gain familiarity AS they were spoken.

>\-WARNING!-
>
>BLOOD TOXICITY NEUTRALIZERS AT 50%

That couldn't be right.

He ran through his suit's status feeds.

Limbs and motors were fine. Though his damaged arm was reading as such.

Energy was fine. Not a surprise given the miniature reactor in his pack. Plus solar, thermal, and movement based generators scattered about the whole suit.

But there were three things that were wrong.

The neutralizers were one of them.

The nutrient paste was another. It was down to only twenty five percent. His suit, when fully loaded, had enough to last him nearly six months. He hadn't topped it off before the battle because food was readily available. But he'd still been sitting at nearly eighty percent when the fighting had kicked off.

Where was the rest? He hadn't eaten any that he could remember.

Yet as his tongue checked the tube, and the section of his mouth nearest it, he felt the tell tale seam in his mouth that meant he'd been "on the drip" for a while now. That was what they called it when he and his comrades went deep for extended periods of time and fed solely off of the admittedly disgusting, but vitamin and calorie rich paste. It left a small dent on the side of the mouth from where the tube went. And he had one again.

He looked at Brick as the small man segued into a story about some festival in some country named Vatria.

Did he.... know... Brick?

Thinking back he couldn't remember anything about the man save what he could see now.

Yet he KNEW that he and Brick had become..... if not friends, then at least buddies.... over the past few-

MONTHS!

Something screamed in his head as his eyes were drawn to the last issue on his HUD.

>MEMORY STORAGE:
>
>\-POSITIONAL DATA=5%

>
>\-SENSOR DATA= 13%
>
>\-COMMUNICATION DATA (SAVED)= 21.5%
>
>\-V/A DATA = 49% **
>
>\-OTHER= 3%

Driscoll stared at the stars.

They meant that the suit had tried to backup the data by either sending it back to command or prompting him to use an encrypted connection to upload it.

He selected the stars and saw that it had made ten different attempts.

Then he looked over at the other window and saw no videos or recordings save those he had already seen. And those didn't account for all the V/A data saved.

His suit had nearly thirty terabytes of space on their drives. A lot of it was taken up by the suit's OS. But there was room to spare. And in a single mission their sensors and everything else could fill the space easily if they didn't routinely upload it for command.

So why, if his V/A files were almost empty, was he reading as being almost half full of that kind of data. With numerous upload/backup requests.

And as Brick once again segued into a story that felt as familiar as it did novel, Driscoll began to dig into his suit's files.

One at a time.

It would take days. But he'd make time.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10ggt98/wait_is_this_just_gate_298/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (296/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hmmmm.... those are interesting developments.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

Choi and Amina were walking past the castle's main entrance, looking over the list of people that had been invited to the wedding, when they saw Vickers for the first time since his transformation. Atrafar walked next to him in her day clothes, though she still had her gauntlets on, and was helping him maneuver through the bustling people in his unfamiliar form.

"Hey dude." Choi said as they passed. "Sick paint job."

"Congratulations Chief." Amina said in kind, then went back to checking the list.

"Thanks." Vickers said as he and Atrafar moved into the building.

Vickers watched the distracted couple continue moving in mounting confusion.

"Wait." He called out. "Is that all you've got to say?" He asked.

Amina and James paused and turned back, though Amina kept reading the list.

"We're a little busy dude. Wedding and all." Choi said as he finally looked over Vickers' new form fully. "You want me to make a catnip joke or something. You look cool. Good Job. Good to see you Atrafar." He added with a wave, which Atrafar returned with a nod.

Then the two of them departed again.

"Hmmm." Atrafar hummed. "Not the reaction I expected."

Vickers simply watched them leave, confused. He'd just made a massive lifestyle change. And that was it?

"Which way to your quarters?" Atrafar asked, determined to keep them on task. "We need to drop off your stuff. Then we can get you some new gear at the shops."

Vickers did what he could not to let his annoyance show, though he doubted it was working.

He'd spent the last four days in the building that had been used for his conversion. The first two had been the conversion itself, and a day of mostly sleeping and bathing in hot water to relax his muscles. Days three and four had been about learning how to move again.

Walking had been the biggest difficulty. His new legs were longer, and his feet were like any feline or canine animal where his ankles were farther back and higher up, resulting in him walking on tip toes as a default. It made things difficult and tiring. But he was getting used to it.

The biggest change was his senses.

His tinnitus, a result of years of exposure to gunfire and explosions, was gone. In its place was a sense of hearing that could hear people's heartbeats if he was withing a few feet of them. His sense of smell was so strong that most of the time he had to resist throwing up as he smelled people's sweat and....other.... scents coming from their bodies. It was revealingly disgusting.

He'd had to jam cotton balls into his ears, and had smeared little dabs of scented ointment just under his nose to keep most of it dampened or covered.

But he was up and moving, and Jaegheri had cleared him for release under Atrafar's guidance. Once the other converted people had been dispatched to the care of their host families, the two of them had left for the castle.

Vickers..... wasn't sure how he felt about leading Atrafar to his room. But they did need to get his stuff there. Mostly his old clothes and a few new sets of robes like the ones he was wearing.

He didn't want to stoke the fires of the jokes that Choi kept making.

Then he and Atrafar actually reached his room and his nose gave him a warning that something was amiss.

"Why does it smell like...." She began beside him, her sense of smell much stronger than even his own. "What does that smell like?"

Vickers thought he had an idea of what the smell was as he opened the door with his eyes closed.

Then he stepped in and was met with a grating, crunching, noise beneath his feet.

Vickers' eye twitched as he opened it and beheld his rooms new floor.

"Why is your bedroom floor covered in gravel sand?" Atrafar asked as she bent down to study some of it.

"CHOOOOIIIIII!!!!!" He yelled as he saw the hundreds of pounds of crushed gravel, that he knew was meant to emulate kitty litter, scattered about his room.

\------------------------------

"Was that Vickers?" Amina asked as she and James continued walking.

"Yeah, we should keep walking." James said as he subtly sped up his pace. "Faster." He said as he continued accelerating. "In fact. I'm gonna run for a bit."

\------------------------------

Joey, Veliry, and everyone else present looked at the bottomless bag as it lay on the grass of the field they were in with mild confusion.

"So....." One of the soldiers present began, bringing voice to all of their thoughts. "What do we do now?"

That had been the golden question since they'd sealed up the blight patch the day before.

The moment they'd recovered from their initial shock at the experiment's success Veliry and the General had both ordered everyone to back away from it. A cordon had been set around it and nobody had been able to go near it.

But it had just been sitting there, not doing anything. None of the other blight patches had done anything either, and none of the blight possessed had appeared to harass them.

"Now." Veliry said in response to the soldier's question. "We move it."

Joey gulped at the thought, his eyes glowing very faintly as he reined in his mind.

"Then what?" General Sigbert asked, concern evident in his voice too.

"Uuuuuh. We'll saddle that Bogren when we de-spike it?" She mused. Joey looked at her curiously at the odd metaphor.

"Aye." Sigbert said as if that made sense.

The three of them, plus the dwarf mage that Joey had worked with before moved forward. Sigbert cautiously kicked at the bag with his foot, as if expecting it to wake up and attack. When it didn't he bent down and picked up one of the poles that lifted and opened it's entrance.

Once again the darkness inside yawned open and they peered inside.

"Any resistance?" Joey asked.

Sigbert waved the pole around a bit, almost as if using a flag to signal someone. "No?" He replied.

"Alright then." Veliry said. "Let's give it a try."

Joey and the dwarf grabbed their poles as Veliry took up the one next to Sigbert. Sure enough the bag moved as easily as before the Blight had entered it.

"You four." The General said as he waved over some of his soldiers. "Pick up the back of the bag."

The soldiers nodded hesitantly, then joined in as they lifted the back end of the bag up.

"Still light." Joey said. "Can you guys roll it up?"

The four new soldiers looked at each other. Then Sigbert nodded at them over Veliry's head.

Slowly, and nervously, the four soldiers began rolling the bag up like a sleeping bag.

And nothing happened.

Then they began moving the bag away from the other blight patches, slowly, step by step.

And still nothing happened.

"Okay." The General said once they'd moved a few yards with no effect on the bag's contents. "Um... what now?"

"Boldness?" Veliry asked.

The General looked down at her with his eyebrows raised. "How.....so?" He asked cautiously.

"Try for another?" Joey asked, knowing where she was going.

"You're mad." The General countered.

Joey looked over at a nearby blight patch, fixxing it in his mind as he compared it to the burnt tree stump a few feet from it.

"That one will work." He said as he pointed at it.

"Oh. You're BOTH mad." The dwarf next to him said.

\----------

Driscoll stepped through the door and into the cellar confidently as he scanned the area with his helmet's sensors.

It was nice to have the helmet back, he thought as he looked at the readouts on the inside of it once more. He'd gone nearly a week without it as the Agency's mages warded it against detection by Choi and co. His video feeds had confirmed as much. He didn't understand magic, but he'd understood the conversations the mages had had around the helmet while they'd worked. And their bio readings, where applicable, had confirmed that they weren't lying.

Did they though? Some small voice in his mind asked.

He thought about it for a moment. The past few weeks were still kind of hazy for him. He'd been concussed in the battle, despite his suit's attempts to prevent it. But it still felt.... off.... to him.

"Hey Driz. You good?" Asked the short man by the name of Braekern that Driscoll had come to like over the past few weeks. Not enough to call a friend. But he was okay.

"Yeah." Driscoll said as he snapped out of his thoughts. "Just taking it in. Haven't been above ground in weeks. Where are we?"

"Under the tavern from the brief." Braekern, or Brick as he thought of him, reminded him. "Half a mile from the castle."

"Right. The briefings." Driscoll recalled. Of course there had been briefings. "Wedding in two days."

How long has it really been? The little voice asked in the back of his head. Wasn't the wedding supposed to be months away?

He thought of that for a moment. Then Brick was ushering him over toward the door hidden behind a rack of wine bottles and into their temporary staging room.

And a certain GOD smiled as he knew that a seed of defiance had been planted successfully.

And as he followed his "friend" Driscoll began looking at the settings on his data files.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10fltus/wait_is_this_just_gate_297/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (296/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hmmmm.... those are interesting developments.

Enjoy.

\~

Choi and Amina were walking past the castle's main entrance, looking over the list of people that had been invited to the wedding, when they saw Vickers for the first time since his transformation. Atrafar walked next to him in her day clothes, though she still had her gauntlets on, and was helping him maneuver through the bustling people in his unfamiliar form.

"Hey dude." Choi said as they passed. "Sick paint job."

"Congratulations Chief." Amina said in kind, then went back to checking the list.

"Thanks." Vickers said as he and Atrafar moved into the building.

Vickers watched the distracted couple continue moving in mounting confusion.

"Wait." He called out. "Is that all you've got to say?" He asked.

Amina and James paused and turned back, though Amina kept reading the list.

"We're a little busy dude. Wedding and all." Choi said as he finally looked over Vickers' new form fully. "You want me to make a catnip joke or something. You look cool. Good Job. Good to see you Atrafar." He added with a wave, which Atrafar returned with a nod.

Then the two of them departed again.

"Hmmm." Atrafar hummed. "Not the reaction I expected."

Vickers simply watched them leave, confused. He'd just made a massive lifestyle change. And that was it?

"Which way to your quarters?" Atrafar asked, determined to keep them on task. "We need to drop off your stuff. Then we can get you some new gear at the shops."

Vickers did what he could not to let his annoyance show, though he doubted it was working.

He'd spent the last four days in the building that had been used for his conversion. The first two had been the conversion itself, and a day of mostly sleeping and bathing in hot water to relax his muscles. Days three and four had been about learning how to move again.

Walking had been the biggest difficulty. His new legs were longer, and his feet were like any feline or canine animal where his ankles were farther back and higher up, resulting in him walking on tip toes as a default. It made things difficult and tiring. But he was getting used to it.

The biggest change was his senses.

His tinnitus, a result of years of exposure to gunfire and explosions, was gone. In its place was a sense of hearing that could hear people's heartbeats if he was withing a few feet of them. His sense of smell was so strong that most of the time he had to resist throwing up as he smelled people's sweat and....other.... scents coming from their bodies. It was revealingly disgusting.

He'd had to jam cotton balls into his ears, and had smeared little dabs of scented ointment just under his nose to keep most of it dampened or covered.

But he was up and moving, and Jaegheri had cleared him for release under Atrafar's guidance. Once the other converted people had been dispatched to the care of their host families, the two of them had left for the castle.

Vickers..... wasn't sure how he felt about leading Atrafar to his room. But they did need to get his stuff there. Mostly his old clothes and a few new sets of robes like the ones he was wearing.

He didn't want to stoke the fires of the jokes that Choi kept making.

Then he and Atrafar actually reached his room and his nose gave him a warning that something was amiss.

"Why does it smell like...." She began beside him, her sense of smell much stronger than even his own. "What does that smell like?"

Vickers thought he had an idea of what the smell was as he opened the door with his eyes closed.

Then he stepped in and was met with a grating, crunching, noise beneath his feet.

Vickers' eye twitched as he opened it and beheld his rooms new floor.

"Why is your bedroom floor covered in gravel sand?" Atrafar asked as she bent down to study some of it.

"CHOOOOIIIIII!!!!!" He yelled as he saw the hundreds of pounds of crushed gravel, that he knew was meant to emulate kitty litter, scattered about his room.

\------------------------------

"Was that Vickers?" Amina asked as she and James continued walking.

"Yeah, we should keep walking." James said as he subtly sped up his pace. "Faster." He said as he continued accelerating. "In fact. I'm gonna run for a bit."

\------------------------------

Joey, Veliry, and everyone else present looked at the bottomless bag as it lay on the grass of the field they were in with mild confusion.

"So....." One of the soldiers present began, bringing voice to all of their thoughts. "What do we do now?"

That had been the golden question since they'd sealed up the blight patch the day before.

The moment they'd recovered from their initial shock at the experiment's success Veliry and the General had both ordered everyone to back away from it. A cordon had been set around it and nobody had been able to go near it.

But it had just been sitting there, not doing anything. None of the other blight patches had done anything either, and none of the blight possessed had appeared to harass them.

"Now." Veliry said in response to the soldier's question. "We move it."

Joey gulped at the thought, his eyes glowing very faintly as he reined in his mind.

"Then what?" General Sigbert asked, concern evident in his voice too.

"Uuuuuh. We'll saddle that Bogren when we de-spike it?" She mused. Joey looked at her curiously at the odd metaphor.

"Aye." Sigbert said as if that made sense.

The three of them, plus the dwarf mage that Joey had worked with before moved forward. Sigbert cautiously kicked at the bag with his foot, as if expecting it to wake up and attack. When it didn't he bent down and picked up one of the poles that lifted and opened it's entrance.

Once again the darkness inside yawned open and they peered inside.

"Any resistance?" Joey asked.

Sigbert waved the pole around a bit, almost as if using a flag to signal someone. "No?" He replied.

"Alright then." Veliry said. "Let's give it a try."

Joey and the dwarf grabbed their poles as Veliry took up the one next to Sigbert. Sure enough the bag moved as easily as before the Blight had entered it.

"You four." The General said as he waved over some of his soldiers. "Pick up the back of the bag."

The soldiers nodded hesitantly, then joined in as they lifted the back end of the bag up.

"Still light." Joey said. "Can you guys roll it up?"

The four new soldiers looked at each other. Then Sigbert nodded at them over Veliry's head.

Slowly, and nervously, the four soldiers began rolling the bag up like a sleeping bag.

And nothing happened.

Then they began moving the bag away from the other blight patches, slowly, step by step.

And still nothing happened.

"Okay." The General said once they'd moved a few yards with no effect on the bag's contents. "Um... what now?"

"Boldness?" Veliry asked.

The General looked down at her with his eyebrows raised. "How.....so?" He asked cautiously.

"Try for another?" Joey asked, knowing where she was going.

"You're mad." The General countered.

Joey looked over at a nearby blight patch, fixxing it in his mind as he compared it to the burnt tree stump a few feet from it.

"That one will work." He said as he pointed at it.

"Oh. You're BOTH mad." The dwarf next to him said.

\----------

Driscoll stepped through the door and into the cellar confidently as he scanned the area with his helmet's sensors.

It was nice to have the helmet back, he thought as he looked at the readouts on the inside of it once more. He'd gone nearly a week without it as the Agency's mages warded it against detection by Choi and co. His video feeds had confirmed as much. He didn't understand magic, but he'd understood the conversations the mages had had around the helmet while they'd worked. And their bio readings, where applicable, had confirmed that they weren't lying.

Did they though? Some small voice in his mind asked.

He thought about it for a moment. The past few weeks were still kind of hazy for him. He'd been concussed in the battle, despite his suit's attempts to prevent it. But it still felt.... off.... to him.

"Hey Driz. You good?" Asked the short man by the name of Braekern that Driscoll had come to like over the past few weeks. Not enough to call a friend. But he was okay.

"Yeah." Driscoll said as he snapped out of his thoughts. "Just taking it in. Haven't been above ground in weeks. Where are we?"

"Under the tavern from the brief." Braekern, or Brick as he thought of him, reminded him. "Half a mile from the castle."

"Right. The briefings." Driscoll recalled. Of course there had been briefings. "Wedding in two days."

How long has it really been? The little voice asked in the back of his head. Wasn't the wedding supposed to be months away?

He thought of that for a moment. Then Brick was ushering him over toward the door hidden behind a rack of wine bottles and into their temporary staging room.

And a certain GOD smiled as he knew that a seed of defiance had been planted successfully.

And as he followed his "friend" Driscoll began looking at the settings on his data files.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10fls58/wait_is_this_just_gate_297/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (295/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Section 1= wholesomeness.

Section 2= a different kind of wholesomeness and toe beans.

Section 3= SCIENTIFIC EXCELLENCE (you know, by magical fantasy land standards. No actual science.) And just a tiny bit of wholesomeness, even if it makes someone uncomfortable.

Enjoy.

Also, I won't be back on until tuesday.

\~

For James and Amina, the four days between when her youngest sister and oldest brother had arrived and when their wedding was scheduled were a blur.

The first night was a large dinner and banquet to celebrate the return of all the King's children, and James got to know Xarina and Ferria a bit better, while also discussing the desert battle with Xarina and Alixan. Amina and Ferria also got into a heated debate about politics and the role of religion in government. James opted not to even come near that conversation as he and Xarina egged on the two brothers in a drinking contest.

To James the following days were a non-stop flurry of planning, activity, and coordination that he hadn't even seen matched by his unit's preparation for N.T.C. back on Earth. And that had been an entire stryker batallion coordinating what was effectively a small deployment across the country.

He was, thanks largely to his culinary endeavors that had by now swept across Petravia, been put in charge of figuring out the menu for the wedding and after party. He decided, with the King's permission, to keep things simple. The wedding would simply have an open bar and servers with trays of finger foods available. The party however was a tougher nut to crack. He didn't want to repeat his prior food reveals of burgers, soup, and pizza.

So he taught the castle cook staff how to run a taco bar. He taught them the basics of making carne asada, carnitas, al pastor, and all the fixings to go with them using this world's equivalent ingredients. The fact that the food was easy to make en masse, and easy to serve on the fly made it ideal. Plus it allowed him to use the two fondue fountains he'd helped make to serve melted cheese for the tacos, and melted chocolate for the churros that he also taught them how to make.

Amina had struggles of her own. For the first day she attempted to run the event's security detail and organize the castles defensive measures. Her brother Alixan didn't need prompting from his sisters to take the reins of that particular task into his own hands. He was a General too after all.

Then she attempted to take over decorations. But the youngest of the siblings, her sister Ferria, quickly took control of that from her after she'd attempted, in her admittedly understandable paranoia, to make everyone wear armor.

Instead she was put in charge of helping James rehearse the ceremonial part of the wedding and help him merge the traditions of their two home worlds together in a way that would appease the local nobility, while also making James's people happy.

James, seeing how flustered she was, used it as a chance to remind her of the traditional dance that he'd taught the small lumber based village after their battle with the grabber clan almost a year and a half before.

James's mother walked in on the young couple dancing as she looked for James to ask about what he was wearing for the ceremony.

She paused in the door and watched the two of them dancing around each other in circles while flapping their arms and bobbing their heads to the timeless chicken dance that played from his phone, and laughing. She couldn't help but smile as she remembered her own wedding decades before.

"That can not possibly be-" Amina began as she wheezed for breath from laughter. "a required dance at weddings on your world." She said as he wrapped an arm around her waist and pulling her close.

"I'm afraid it is actually." Mrs. Choi said, startling the two of them.

"Hey mom." James said, still smiling. "What's going on?"

"I was just wondering what you were going to wear?" She said as she stepped a little further into the room. "I know you have a dress uniform, but I was just wondering."

"Ooh, I've wondered that too." Amina chimed in as she finally settled herself.

James's face suddenly beamed with a mischievous grin.

"I'm afraid." He said as he mocked zipping his lips. "That I can't tell you mom."

"What?" She asked with a look of annoyance at her son's antics. Her hand found its way to her hip as she glared at him.

"It's a secret." He said as he pointedly ignored her anger. "You'll see." Then he looked at Amina, who was also looking at him with annoyed curiosity. "And you just wouldn't get what it is."

"James Michael Choi." His mother said with a pointed finger as she approached him. "I swear to god if you try to get married in a stupid red water warrior costume I will-" She tried to grab him, but James spun Amina around on her heels and used her as an impromptu shield while he laughed.

"James!" Amina exclaimed in annoyed surprise as she regained her footing and tried to grab at him too. But James bounded out of the room cackling as the two women made a show of chasing him.

\----------

"I don't know if you've ever noticed..." Atrafar said as she held Vickers hand and helped him down the stairs. "but most of the werefolk, especially those with morphed legs like us, go down stairs a touch differently."

Vickers wobbled as he attempted to walk down the last handful of steps. His ankles, which were now closer to rear-facing knees, kept bumping against the stair above wherever his feet were landing. This caused him to slip once or twice and have to catch himself on the railing and Atrafars arm.

Jaegheri was currently assisting the other person in the group who had opted to be turned by him, a young formerly orc woman who'd converted for the sake of an impending marriage. So Vickers was being aided by Atrafar for a bit.

"The key is to lift your feet up, like you're walking on tip-toes." She said as she gestured at her own legs. Sure enough she was hyper extending her foot.

"I'm already on my tip-toes." Vickers replied.

"True. But even more so." She said. Then she pointed at where his hand was gripping the rail. "Careful with the claws. We don't actually OWN this building. We're just renting it."

Vickers looked down and saw that his vice-like grip had caused his claws to extend out and dig small marks into the wood of the rail.

"Sorry." He said with mild embarrassment. Then he extended his feet even higher. Sure enough it made the steps easier.

"No need." She replied simply. "We expect these kinds of things. Just... be wary." She saw him make the last three steps with no issue. "There you go."

"You killed someone?" He asked suddenly, causing her to look at him with only mild surprise. He pointed. "Can smell the blood on your hands. Gauntlets didn't stop all of it."

She nodded, impressed. "Unfortunately one of our conversions lost themselves to it." She said. "And his type allowed him to almost escape. Luckily he didn't retain enough intelligence to actually get around the cage. But he did hurt himself badly enough that a... mercy killing.... was deemed necessary."

"That happen a lot?" He asked as he flexed his sore legs. It had only been one floors worth of stairs. But getting used to his new body, and not knowing how to use it to get down them at first, had taken a lot out of him.

"A lot? No." She replied. "We get maybe... one... every few conversions. But, it's part of why the Outer Light is sent along."

He grunted as he straitened back up and followed her to the room he would be staying at, which turned out to be the one he'd also turned in. Only now it had a simple bed and a trunk with more robes like the ones he was wearing. Plus a small table and chair.

"First three days are spent in the cage." She said. "Your body is still changing, even if only in small ways. Plus your dreams WILL be affected by your new instincts. For a normal person that's usually not too much of an issue." She said. Then she placed a hand on his shoulder. "But for lifelong warriors it can have.... adverse effects."

He new what she was talking about. He himself wasn't an overly emotional person. But he, like most "lifelong warriors" as she'd called them, knew more than a little bit about night terrors.

The thought of how his new mind, his new primal instincts, might be affected by them was a concerning notion to him.

He nodded understanding as he walked into the room and opened the chest to see what was inside.

"The elder will return with food soon." She said behind him. "Plenty of nice juicy meat for you. Keep the door closed unless you need to use the bathroom. A few of the other people are prey species and we don't need any accidents to occur."

"Got it." He said as he plopped down onto the bed. He could do hurry up and wait.

"And Sebastien?" She asked before she shut the cage door.

He looked at her curiously.

"Congratulations." She said with a slight nod.

"Thanks." He said, returning the nod.

"Rest up."

"Will do." He said as he laid back in the bed. He raised his hand up in front of him and practiced making the claws extend and retract a few times.

He could still smell his blood on the floor beneath him despite how well they'd tried to clean it.

\----------

"Ready?" Veliry asked as she and the mage on her side of the bag grabbed the two poles on their side.

Joey looked at the older dwarf mage on his side with him. He'd taken the upper pole just in case. The dwarf nodded.

"Yep." He replied.

"Alright." She said. "On three. One... Two... Three!"

Joey raised his pole up as the mage on Veliry's side did the same, lifting them until the top of the bag's opening was nearly six feet off the ground. Veliry and the dwarf lifted theirs up, but only enough so they could move it over the ground without dragging. The handful of soldiers, lifted the canvas body of the bag and followed their lead.

"Now move right." She said. "No. Right for them Tnias." She corrected the mage next to her. "Left for us."

Joey couldn't help but look into the massive bottomless bag with mild curiosity. It was odd seeing so much darkness inside something that should have been fairly well lit. But that was a question for later as he and the dwarf shuffled to their right.

And the whole bag moved toward the large, slightly football shaped, patch of vanishing blight.

Joey cringed back a bit as he did. He knew from D&D rules and a handful of video games based on them that having two extra-dimensional spaces intermingle was a bad idea. But that was just game logic. He actually had no idea what to expect here. This was all hypothesis work and his best guess was as good as anyone else's.

Before he knew it, the inky darkness of the bag's interior and the fuzzy nothingness of the blight were mixing.

And as soon as they did, he and the other three mages began having to push to continue moving.

The bar he was holding was vibrating. It was as if millions of bees or hornets had landed on it and were using every ounce of flight power they had to resist the advance of the mages and the bag.

And the metal beneath his hands was heating up.

"What in the hells?" The dwarf asked in confusion.

"It's resisting somehow!" Veliry exclaimed. "Keep pushing!"

Joey hadn't had any intentions not to. He planted his shoulder behind the bar and marveled at how the buzzing vibration suddenly seemed to transfer to his collar bone too. Whatever it was, it was more violent of a vibration than his hands had led him to believe.

"Come help us!" Veliry demanded as she waved some of the soldiers present over. They jogged to assist as Joey's feet dug into the ground.

General Sigbert's massive hand clamped onto the pole just above his head and the large man grunted as he pushed along side Joey.

For just a moment Joey looked over at the opening and saw the darkness in the bag moving. It was hard for his brain to understand it. But it looked as though the blight was pushing it, forcing it to flex inward as if it was an elastic surface that it was being pressed into.

Then, as they moved forward just a fraction of an inch, he saw a bit of the blight move INTO the darkness of the bag.

"It's doing it." He grunted between breaths. "It's moving!"

"Keep pushing!" The General roared. "Put your backs into it or go on extra duty later you bastards!" He challenged his soldiers.

The soldiers who had previously been holding the bag up dropped it in favor of rushing over to help, and suddenly Joey was being pressed into the pole by the weight of their bodies. He forced energy into his eyes, and they began to glow, as he actively resisted being overwhelmed by everything going on.

There was a loud ripping noise, and for a moment Joey feared that one of the poles had ripped through its channel in the bag's mouth. Then there was a loud bang, just shy of gunshot volume.

Then they all fell over.

The poles landed on top of them in a mostly muffled clatter. He was suddenly reminded of a tug-o-war he'd seen in middle school where one side had tricked the other and simply released their end of the rope the second the whistle had blown.

After a moment of disentangling themselves Joey looked up to see what had happened.

He blinked a few times, his eyes still glowing behind his lids as he did.

The bag was lying flat on the ground.

And the air above it was empty.

Not empty in a magical, formless, hard-to-look-at, void kind of way. But just plain empty like it was supposed to be.

"IT WORKED!" Veliry yelled as she shot to her feet. Joey and the soldiers joined her, clambering up ignorant of the dirt on their clothes and staring with wide eyes at the space the blight HAD been in. "IT WORKED!"

Cautiously, and mildly afraid of what would happen when he did so, Joey lifted the edge of the bag up to peer inside.

All he saw was the familiar darkness that was supposed to be there.

He looked back up at the normal, empty, air again.

"Holy shit." He said softly.

"It worked." Another soldier said just as softly.

Suddenly a pair of small arms were wrapped around Joey's neck as Veliry leapt up into his arms and planted a quick kiss on his cheek. This made him lose focus on his spell as he blushed furiously.

"It worked!" She said. "Joey you're a genius! IT WORKED!"

Then she realized what she'd done and quickly pulled back. But she planted her hands on his shoulders and looked him in the eyes.

"IT WORKED!" She exclaimed again.

"By the gods." Sigbert said from next to them. Then he lifted Joey AND Veliry up in a bear-hug and also planted a kiss on both of their cheeks.

Joey looked at him. Still reeling from EVERYTHING that had just happened.

"It worked." He echoed.

Then everyone burst into motion as they began to investigate the results.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10el0wv/wait_is_this_just_gate_296/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (295/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Section 1= wholesomeness.

Section 2= a different kind of wholesomeness and toe beans.

Section 3= SCIENTIFIC EXCELLENCE (you know, by magical fantasy land standards. No actual science.) And just a tiny bit of wholesomeness, even if it makes someone uncomfortable.

Enjoy.

Also, I won't be back on until tuesday.

\~\~\~

fly made it ideal. Plus it allowed him to use the two fondue fountains he'd helped make to serve melted cheese for the tacos, and melted chocolate for the churros that he also taught them how to make.

Amina had struggles of her own. For the first day she attempted to run the event's security detail and organize the castles defensive measures. Her brother Alixan didn't need prompting from his sisters to take the reins of that particular task into his own hands. He was a General too after all.

Then she attempted to take over decorations. But the youngest of the siblings, her sister Ferria, quickly took control of that from her after she'd attempted, in her admittedly understandable paranoia, to make everyone wear armor.

Instead she was put in charge of helping James rehearse the ceremonial part of the wedding and help him merge the traditions of their two home worlds together in a way that would appease the local nobility, while also making James's people happy.

James, seeing how flustered she was, used it as a chance to remind her of the traditional dance that he'd taught the small lumber based village after their battle with the grabber clan almost a year and a half before.

James's mother walked in on the young couple dancing as she looked for James to ask about what he was wearing for the ceremony.

She paused in the door and watched the two of them dancing around each other in circles while flapping their arms and bobbing their heads to the timeless chicken dance that played from his phone, and laughing. She couldn't help but smile as she remembered her own wedding decades before.

"That can not possibly be-" Amina began as she wheezed for breath from laughter. "a required dance at weddings on your world." She said as he wrapped an arm around her waist and pulling her close.

"I'm afraid it is actually." Mrs. Choi said, startling the two of them.

"Hey mom." James said, still smiling. "What's going on?"

"I was just wondering what you were going to wear?" She said as she stepped a little further into the room. "I know you have a dress uniform, but I was just wondering."

"Ooh, I've wondered that too." Amina chimed in as she finally settled herself.

James's face suddenly beamed with a mischievous grin.

"I'm afraid." He said as he mocked zipping his lips. "That I can't tell you mom."

"What?" She asked with a look of annoyance at her son's antics. Her hand found its way to her hip as she glared at him.

"It's a secret." He said as he pointedly ignored her anger. "You'll see." Then he looked at Amina, who was also looking at him with annoyed curiosity. "And you just wouldn't get what it is."

"James Michael Choi." His mother said with a pointed finger as she approached him. "I swear to god if you try to get married in a stupid red water warrior costume I will-" She tried to grab him, but James spun Amina around on her heels and used her as an impromptu shield while he laughed.

"James!" Amina exclaimed in annoyed surprise as she regained her footing and tried to grab at him too. But James bounded out of the room cackling as the two women made a show of chasing him.

\----------

"I don't know if you've ever noticed..." Atrafar said as she held Vickers hand and helped him down the stairs. "but most of the werefolk, especially those with morphed legs like us, go down stairs a touch differently."

Vickers wobbled as he attempted to walk down the last handful of steps. His ankles, which were now closer to rear-facing knees, kept bumping against the stair above wherever his feet were landing. This caused him to slip once or twice and have to catch himself on the railing and Atrafars arm.

Jaegheri was currently assisting the other person in the group who had opted to be turned by him, a young formerly orc woman who'd converted for the sake of an impending marriage. So Vickers was being aided by Atrafar for a bit.

"The key is to lift your feet up, like you're walking on tip-toes." She said as she gestured at her own legs. Sure enough she was hyper extending her foot.

"I'm already on my tip-toes." Vickers replied.

"True. But even more so." She said. Then she pointed at where his hand was gripping the rail. "Careful with the claws. We don't actually OWN this building. We're just renting it."

Vickers looked down and saw that his vice-like grip had caused his claws to extend out and dig small marks into the wood of the rail.

"Sorry." He said with mild embarrassment. Then he extended his feet even higher. Sure enough it made the steps easier.

"No need." She replied simply. "We expect these kinds of things. Just... be wary." She saw him make the last three steps with no issue. "There you go."

"You killed someone?" He asked suddenly, causing her to look at him with only mild surprise. He pointed. "Can smell the blood on your hands. Gauntlets didn't stop all of it."

She nodded, impressed. "Unfortunately one of our conversions lost themselves to it." She said. "And his type allowed him to almost escape. Luckily he didn't retain enough intelligence to actually get around the cage. But he did hurt himself badly enough that a... mercy killing.... was deemed necessary."

"That happen a lot?" He asked as he flexed his sore legs. It had only been one floors worth of stairs. But getting used to his new body, and not knowing how to use it to get down them at first, had taken a lot out of him.

"A lot? No." She replied. "We get maybe... one... every few conversions. But, it's part of why the Outer Light is sent along."

He grunted as he straitened back up and followed her to the room he would be staying at, which turned out to be the one he'd also turned in. Only now it had a simple bed and a trunk with more robes like the ones he was wearing. Plus a small table and chair.

"First three days are spent in the cage." She said. "Your body is still changing, even if only in small ways. Plus your dreams WILL be affected by your new instincts. For a normal person that's usually not too much of an issue." She said. Then she placed a hand on his shoulder. "But for lifelong warriors it can have.... adverse effects."

He new what she was talking about. He himself wasn't an overly emotional person. But he, like most "lifelong warriors" as she'd called them, knew more than a little bit about night terrors.

The thought of how his new mind, his new primal instincts, might be affected by them was a concerning notion to him.

He nodded understanding as he walked into the room and opened the chest to see what was inside.

"The elder will return with food soon." She said behind him. "Plenty of nice juicy meat for you. Keep the door closed unless you need to use the bathroom. A few of the other people are prey species and we don't need any accidents to occur."

"Got it." He said as he plopped down onto the bed. He could do hurry up and wait.

"And Sebastien?" She asked before she shut the cage door.

He looked at her curiously.

"Congratulations." She said with a slight nod.

"Thanks." He said, returning the nod.

"Rest up."

"Will do." He said as he laid back in the bed. He raised his hand up in front of him and practiced making the claws extend and retract a few times.

He could still smell his blood on the floor beneath him despite how well they'd tried to clean it.

\----------

"Ready?" Veliry asked as she and the mage on her side of the bag grabbed the two poles on their side.

Joey looked at the older dwarf mage on his side with him. He'd taken the upper pole just in case. The dwarf nodded.

"Yep." He replied.

"Alright." She said. "On three. One... Two... Three!"

Joey raised his pole up as the mage on Veliry's side did the same, lifting them until the top of the bag's opening was nearly six feet off the ground. Veliry and the dwarf lifted theirs up, but only enough so they could move it over the ground without dragging. The handful of soldiers, lifted the canvas body of the bag and followed their lead.

"Now move right." She said. "No. Right for them Tnias." She corrected the mage next to her. "Left for us."

Joey couldn't help but look into the massive bottomless bag with mild curiosity. It was odd seeing so much darkness inside something that should have been fairly well lit. But that was a question for later as he and the dwarf shuffled to their right.

And the whole bag moved toward the large, slightly football shaped, patch of vanishing blight.

Joey cringed back a bit as he did. He knew from D&D rules and a handful of video games based on them that having two extra-dimensional spaces intermingle was a bad idea. But that was just game logic. He actually had no idea what to expect here. This was all hypothesis work and his best guess was as good as anyone else's.

Before he knew it, the inky darkness of the bag's interior and the fuzzy nothingness of the blight were mixing.

And as soon as they did, he and the other three mages began having to push to continue moving.

The bar he was holding was vibrating. It was as if millions of bees or hornets had landed on it and were using every ounce of flight power they had to resist the advance of the mages and the bag.

And the metal beneath his hands was heating up.

"What in the hells?" The dwarf asked in confusion.

"It's resisting somehow!" Veliry exclaimed. "Keep pushing!"

Joey hadn't had any intentions not to. He planted his shoulder behind the bar and marveled at how the buzzing vibration suddenly seemed to transfer to his collar bone too. Whatever it was, it was more violent of a vibration than his hands had led him to believe.

"Come help us!" Veliry demanded as she waved some of the soldiers present over. They jogged to assist as Joey's feet dug into the ground.

General Sigbert's massive hand clamped onto the pole just above his head and the large man grunted as he pushed along side Joey.

For just a moment Joey looked over at the opening and saw the darkness in the bag moving. It was hard for his brain to understand it. But it looked as though the blight was pushing it, forcing it to flex inward as if it was an elastic surface that it was being pressed into.

Then, as they moved forward just a fraction of an inch, he saw a bit of the blight move INTO the darkness of the bag.

"It's doing it." He grunted between breaths. "It's moving!"

"Keep pushing!" The General roared. "Put your backs into it or go on extra duty later you bastards!" He challenged his soldiers.

The soldiers who had previously been holding the bag up dropped it in favor of rushing over to help, and suddenly Joey was being pressed into the pole by the weight of their bodies. He forced energy into his eyes, and they began to glow, as he actively resisted being overwhelmed by everything going on.

There was a loud ripping noise, and for a moment Joey feared that one of the poles had ripped through its channel in the bag's mouth. Then there was a loud bang, just shy of gunshot volume.

Then they all fell over.

The poles landed on top of them in a mostly muffled clatter. He was suddenly reminded of a tug-o-war he'd seen in middle school where one side had tricked the other and simply released their end of the rope the second the whistle had blown.

After a moment of disentangling themselves Joey looked up to see what had happened.

He blinked a few times, his eyes still glowing behind his lids as he did.

The bag was lying flat on the ground.

And the air above it was empty.

Not empty in a magical, formless, hard-to-look-at, void kind of way. But just plain empty like it was supposed to be.

"IT WORKED!" Veliry yelled as she shot to her feet. Joey and the soldiers joined her, clambering up ignorant of the dirt on their clothes and staring with wide eyes at the space the blight HAD been in. "IT WORKED!"

Cautiously, and mildly afraid of what would happen when he did so, Joey lifted the edge of the bag up to peer inside.

All he saw was the familiar darkness that was supposed to be there.

He looked back up at the normal, empty, air again.

"Holy shit." He said softly.

"It worked." Another soldier said just as softly.

Suddenly a pair of small arms were wrapped around Joey's neck as Veliry leapt up into his arms and planted a quick kiss on his cheek. This made him lose focus on his spell as he blushed furiously.

"It worked!" She said. "Joey you're a genius! IT WORKED!"

Then she realized what she'd done and quickly pulled back. But she planted her hands on his shoulders and looked him in the eyes.

"IT WORKED!" She exclaimed again.

"By the gods." Sigbert said from next to them. Then he lifted Joey AND Veliry up in a bear-hug and also planted a kiss on both of their cheeks.

Joey looked at him. Still reeling from EVERYTHING that had just happened.

"It worked." He echoed.

Then everyone burst into motion as they began to investigate the results.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10ekz0b/wait_is_this_just_gate_296/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (294/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yaaaaay more characters to keep track of, and a new nation to involve in..... stuff.

yaaaaay

Enjoy.

\~

When Vickers awoke, he did so to the startling feeling of being in water.

He jumped a bit in an attempt to get up and out. But a firm hand on his shoulder, coupled with screaming muscles and a pounding migraine, prevented him from doing so.

"Relax, new blood." The rumbling voice of Jaegheri said before his hand had a chance to intercept the restraining limb. "You are safe."

Vickers took a moment to take in his new surroundings.

He was in some kind of large bathtub. He could smell salt in the water, which explained how he was remaining above the surface. But he also smelled flowers, and herbs, and several other things he couldn't place, but which reminded him of a forest after the rain.

He also smelled blood, which alarmed him for a moment until he remembered the state he had been in before he'd passed out. Of course the water had blood in it.

A single, small, candle lit the room from high up near the door and smelled of cinnamon and citrus.

Yet despite the minuscule amount of lighting, he could see everything as clearly as if the sun was out, and he knew that if he could look in a mirror he would see his pupils dilated far wider than ever before.

Something in his mind complained about being wet. But his body quickly shut down its protests as his weary muscles relaxed and loosened from the warmth of the bath.

"Where?" He asked.

"Same building."Jaegheri answered simply. "Just upstairs." And even though Vickers' ears were submerged..... and also much further back on his head than normal, he heard the man much clearer than he should have. "How do you feel?"

Vickers hands quested over his stomach and thigh as they inspected the new body they were a part of now.

"Feel like Choi's drake ate me and I survived the trip." He said after a moment. "Feel big."

"You are." The werefolk said as he scanned the bathing man's physique for a moment. "You already were. But you've put on at least a foot and good third of your original weight in muscle."

"Hmmm." Vickers hummed as he considered the numbers. "Big."

"Indeed. How are your senses?"

"I can smell the blood downstairs." Vickers answered. "And the.... other stuff. Did I piss myself too?" He wondered. "During the change?"

Jaegheri shrugged. "Most do. It wouldn't surprise me." Then he snapped his fingers and Vickers winced as the sound made his head throb. "Hearing is good. Even muffled."

"Yeah." Vickers agreed. "Very good. What's a.... a night brother? Is that what you called me?"

"I'm surprised you remembered that." Jaegheri replied. Then he rummaged around on a table out of Vickers' line of sight. A moment later he held a hand mirror up above Vickers, though he paused before he got it to where anything could be seen. "Prepare." He said sternly. Vickers looked at him curiously. "This is your truth now. Your life."

Then he moved the mirror up in front of Vickers' face.

The face of a predator, with gleaming green eyes, looked back at him.

He recoiled and looked away for a moment as his brain tried to line things up.

Then he looked back, and saw that the eyes sat in a face coated in dark brown, almost black, fur with even darker patches that he knew were his new spots. His hand reached up to touch his new face. To feel the snout that jutted out over a massively muscular jaw. To touch the points of teeth that looked like they could pierce armor. To caress the area around his eyes and feel them move as he instinctively blinked.

Then he looked at the hands and saw how long and thick his fingers were now. He flexed them and a set of sharp claws extended with hooks designed to latch onto prey and hold in in place as he killed it.

And by god did he long to do so.

His mouth salivated immediately as the thought of prey brought the smell of the blood downstairs to the front of his mind. He could smell the Lunar Council elder, who he knew wasn't even IN the building anymore, and he wanted nothing more than to hunt him down and latch onto him. Feel his bones crunching between his tee-

Suddenly a raw steak materialized in front of his face, held in the hand of Jaegheri, who had pulled it from a bottomless bag nearby.

A single drop of blood fell and Vickers lurched to catch it with his tongue before the pain in his muscles prevented him from doing so.

"And now you learn the downside." Jaegheri said grimly as Vickers' hand rose up and clutched at the steak. Jaegheri held it fast despite the anger in his new kin's eyes. "We warned you about it as best we could. But experiencing it is the only way to know its truth."

He let the steak go and it practically disappeared into Vickers' mouth.

The human part of his mind recoiled at the action. He'd eaten plenty of disgusting things in his life. Especially in survival training to become a seal, and out in the field during deployments. But the act of eating a steak raw, with the small circular bone included, repulsed him.

But god the meat and blood were delicious, and exactly what his exhausted body desired. And it was still warm! Jagheri must have put the steak in the bag almost as soon as the creature it had been part of had been killed. He crunched the bone in it into a slurry of powdered bone and marrow.

"Night brothers are one in a hundred." Jaegheri said as he finished the meat, ignoring the ravenously questing eyes of the man beneath him. "I've never created one myself until now." He made no move to retrieve any more food. "It is an omen of luck."

Realizing that no more meat would be made available, at least not yet, Vickers spoke again.

"Good or bad?" He asked as he licked his lips. He winced as he accidentally bit his own tongue, then his eyes widened as the pain disappeared almost immediately.

"Depends on the person." Atrafar said as she opened the door to the room and stepped in with a set of towels and robes folded in her arms. "But for a person like you? With your skill set? Probably bad."

"Really?" Vickers asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "For anyone who gets in your way."

\------------------

Joey stepped through the doorway and into the fields outside of Jadesport for the first time and stumbled a bit as he tripped on the thick grass.

"Careful." Veliry said as she gripped his arm and helped him back up. "Welcome to Jadesport Joey." She said as she released him and he dusted off his pants a bit.

He did what he could to not look at her. Things had become.... awkward... since their "Conversation".

"Thanks." He said as he stood up fully and looked around. "So that's why they call it that." He added as he saw the walls of the city off in the distance.

It was at least a good days travel away. But the forests in between here and there had been burned to a crisp during the battle against the blight. And General Sigbert had set his remaining soldiers to clear the burned trees away so that the city could see anything that might come out of the blight.

"Indeed." She replied as she began marching toward the nearby tents with her two bottomless bags of supplies. "Come on. We have work to get to."

"Okay." He said as he moved to follow. He had several of the bags himself, and as they moved the seamstresses and fellow mages that they'd enlisted for the project came through the door behind them.

"General!" She called with a wave as they approached the tents. A large, burly man in a General's uniform turned and waved back then waved them over.

The small group approached and the General greeted Veliry with a small bow.

"Lady Veliry." He said with a warm smile, and Joey decided then and there that he liked this General. "And I take it that this is the young captain's wee brother."

"Joseph sir." Joey said as he held out his hand. "But please, call me Joey."

Sigbert clasped his hand at the wrist and squeezed hard.

"Nice to meet you lad." He said. "I understand this little idea was yours. Let's hope it works."

"Have you found a patch that you think would suit our needs?" Veliry asked, trying to keep things moving.

"Aye. We've got a couple of good candidates." He replied. "Follow me."

And a few minutes later Joey laid his eyes upon the blight for the first time ever.

"Woah. That's weird." He said as stared at the odd non-material.

Veliry watched him curiously. She herself STRUGGLED to look at the blight patches. Most people did. Even pictures and recordings of them on the tablet, that James had taken on his phone, were difficult to focus on.

But Joey was STARING at it.

"Joey?" She wondered.

"Hmm?" He said as he turned to look at her.

"You're staring at it." She said with a hint of curiosity.

"Yeah?" He replied.

"It's not.... making you uncomfortable?" She asked. "You don't feel your eyes repelled by it?"

He shrugged as he looked back at the patch that he thought looked like it was slightly football shaped.

"I mean. It's weird looking for sure." He said. "It's like T.V. static from an old tube television." His head tilted a bit. "Or like a rendering error from an old game. Missingno or something."

"Interesting." She said quietly. "Well... stay back okay? Don't touch it."

"Oh. No worries." He said as his eyes began to glow with green light and he began pacing around and studying the flow of energy around the blob.

"Joey." She said as he continued his studying. "Do us a favor and use your foot to mark out a perimeter around it that will let us create the bag in the right dimensions."

"Okay." He said simply, and a moment later he began dragging his heel on the ground to mark out one side. And Veliry motioned for the seamstresses to get to work.

The two women pulled the bolts of canvas out and began getting to work.

\----------

"So..... that's a thing." James said as he, Amina, and the rest of the people that had been in the meeting finally got to the top of the tower where the last princess's flying ship was tying itself off.

The ship in question looked like a viking ship with no sails. And where a normal viking long-ship would have oars, this ship had a series of long metal poles that were linked to each other in groups of three by long membranes of some kind of stretchy rubber looking material. The poles themselves glowed with a subtle blue light. These sections moved up and down like the sides of an animal, and James was reminded of a video he'd seen of sea slugs.

The end result was a nearly five hundred foot long long-ship that was hovering over the castle with a loud humming noise.

Just as King Farrick made it up to the top of the stairs, panting a bit as he leaned against the wall nearby, a pair of were-folk jumped off of the ship holding the end of a length of blue cloth with golden embroidery.

"XHLAENAGH!" One of the two people, an eagle headed soldier, yelled. And as they did, the cloth runner writhed and squirmed. Then slowly formed into a set of stairs.

The other person, of a species James didn't recognize, turned to them and bowed to the King.

"The Ambassador Tanier VaunLoren!" The man said in a jilting, slightly off tempo Petravian. "His words and actions representative of the Vatrian God King's will!"

As they finished the announcement, a somewhat short stature man, likely a few inches shorter than James, stepped up to the top of the cloth staircase on the ship. He was wearing a bright, topaz-blue, robe that reminded James of something from Mexico or central America. His hair and skin were opposites of each other, with the former being nearly snow white, and his skin being even darker than James's deceased former Sergeant.

"And his most holy wife, and bishop second of Southern Vatria!" The man announced as a woman who could have been Amina's twin, albeit with blonde hair and less muscle, took the offered hand and joined the man on the top of the stairs. "Petravian Princess Ferria!"

If Amina or Xarina's eyes had rolled any harder James would have been chasing them over the side of the tower to get them back.

The two of them began strutting down the stairs, her just a half step ahead of him, and approached.

The King put on a big smile as he leaned forward and held his arm out at a right angle.

"Ambassador Tanier." He said as the other man matched the half bow and arm gesture and the two men bumped forearms against each other's. "It has been too long since we've welcomed you to the capital."

"You're eminence." He replied with a faintly Greek sounding accent, though his pronunciation was much better than that of the herald who had announced him. "I must admit that I have missed your land's wines." He gestured back and above at the ship. "But as you can see; I have been quite preoccupied."

"So I do." Replied King Farrick as he stepped up next to the ambassador and wrapped his daughter in his arms. She kissed him lightly on the cheek before they broke the embrace. "I must demand a tour once you have had a chance to relax. How are you dear?" He asked of his daughter. She smiled and nodded.

"I shall show you what I am allowed." Tanier said enthusiastically. "I can even take you on a flight if you'd like."

Then the three sisters were greeting each other with hugs and whispers, and James once again felt like a third wheel.

"It's going to be like this until they're gone." Said a familiar, though entirely unexpected voice from just behind James, causing him to jump a bit even as Artair looked up with a grin.

"Alixan?" Amina asked curiously. "When did you get here?"

Standing just behind James was the nearly eight foot tall crown prince, who had somehow arrived at the castle with none of them knowing

"About an hour ago." He said with a grin. "I stopped for a drink first."

This time it was the King's turn to roll his eyes. Then he went back to his conversation with the Ambassador.

"Don't worry." Artair piped up this time. "One of them will remember you exist in a moment when they need to brag about you."

As if that was a cue, Amina held her hand out to him and pulled her into the gaggle of sisters and began bragging about all his exploits to her youngest sister.

Despite being in a completely different world, the similarity to his own family gatherings over the years was unmissable.

Even as he was being used as a trophy piece, James couldn't help but smile at the family interaction.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10b894r/wait_is_this_just_gate_295/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (294/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yaaaaay more characters to keep track of, and a new nation to involve in..... stuff.

yaaaaay

Enjoy.

\~

When Vickers awoke, he did so to the startling feeling of being in water.

He jumped a bit in an attempt to get up and out. But a firm hand on his shoulder, coupled with screaming muscles and a pounding migraine, prevented him from doing so.

"Relax, new blood." The rumbling voice of Jaegheri said before his hand had a chance to intercept the restraining limb. "You are safe."

Vickers took a moment to take in his new surroundings.

He was in some kind of large bathtub. He could smell salt in the water, which explained how he was remaining above the surface. But he also smelled flowers, and herbs, and several other things he couldn't place, but which reminded him of a forest after the rain.

He also smelled blood, which alarmed him for a moment until he remembered the state he had been in before he'd passed out. Of course the water had blood in it.

A single, small, candle lit the room from high up near the door and smelled of cinnamon and citrus.

Yet despite the minuscule amount of lighting, he could see everything as clearly as if the sun was out, and he knew that if he could look in a mirror he would see his pupils dilated far wider than ever before.

Something in his mind complained about being wet. But his body quickly shut down its protests as his weary muscles relaxed and loosened from the warmth of the bath.

"Where?" He asked.

"Same building."Jaegheri answered simply. "Just upstairs." And even though Vickers' ears were submerged..... and also much further back on his head than normal, he heard the man much clearer than he should have. "How do you feel?"

Vickers hands quested over his stomach and thigh as they inspected the new body they were a part of now.

"Feel like Choi's drake ate me and I survived the trip." He said after a moment. "Feel big."

"You are." The werefolk said as he scanned the bathing man's physique for a moment. "You already were. But you've put on at least a foot and good third of your original weight in muscle."

"Hmmm." Vickers hummed as he considered the numbers. "Big."

"Indeed. How are your senses?"

"I can smell the blood downstairs." Vickers answered. "And the.... other stuff. Did I piss myself too?" He wondered. "During the change?"

Jaegheri shrugged. "Most do. It wouldn't surprise me." Then he snapped his fingers and Vickers winced as the sound made his head throb. "Hearing is good. Even muffled."

"Yeah." Vickers agreed. "Very good. What's a.... a night brother? Is that what you called me?"

"I'm surprised you remembered that." Jaegheri replied. Then he rummaged around on a table out of Vickers' line of sight. A moment later he held a hand mirror up above Vickers, though he paused before he got it to where anything could be seen. "Prepare." He said sternly. Vickers looked at him curiously. "This is your truth now. Your life."

Then he moved the mirror up in front of Vickers' face.

The face of a predator, with gleaming green eyes, looked back at him.

He recoiled and looked away for a moment as his brain tried to line things up.

Then he looked back, and saw that the eyes sat in a face coated in dark brown, almost black, fur with even darker patches that he knew were his new spots. His hand reached up to touch his new face. To feel the snout that jutted out over a massively muscular jaw. To touch the points of teeth that looked like they could pierce armor. To caress the area around his eyes and feel them move as he instinctively blinked.

Then he looked at the hands and saw how long and thick his fingers were now. He flexed them and a set of sharp claws extended with hooks designed to latch onto prey and hold in in place as he killed it.

And by god did he long to do so.

His mouth salivated immediately as the thought of prey brought the smell of the blood downstairs to the front of his mind. He could smell the Lunar Council elder, who he knew wasn't even IN the building anymore, and he wanted nothing more than to hunt him down and latch onto him. Feel his bones crunching between his tee-

Suddenly a raw steak materialized in front of his face, held in the hand of Jaegheri, who had pulled it from a bottomless bag nearby.

A single drop of blood fell and Vickers lurched to catch it with his tongue before the pain in his muscles prevented him from doing so.

"And now you learn the downside." Jaegheri said grimly as Vickers' hand rose up and clutched at the steak. Jaegheri held it fast despite the anger in his new kin's eyes. "We warned you about it as best we could. But experiencing it is the only way to know its truth."

He let the steak go and it practically disappeared into Vickers' mouth.

The human part of his mind recoiled at the action. He'd eaten plenty of disgusting things in his life. Especially in survival training to become a seal, and out in the field during deployments. But the act of eating a steak raw, with the small circular bone included, repulsed him.

But god the meat and blood were delicious, and exactly what his exhausted body desired. And it was still warm! Jagheri must have put the steak in the bag almost as soon as the creature it had been part of had been killed. He crunched the bone in it into a slurry of powdered bone and marrow.

"Night brothers are one in a hundred." Jaegheri said as he finished the meat, ignoring the ravenously questing eyes of the man beneath him. "I've never created one myself until now." He made no move to retrieve any more food. "It is an omen of luck."

Realizing that no more meat would be made available, at least not yet, Vickers spoke again.

"Good or bad?" He asked as he licked his lips. He winced as he accidentally bit his own tongue, then his eyes widened as the pain disappeared almost immediately.

"Depends on the person." Atrafar said as she opened the door to the room and stepped in with a set of towels and robes folded in her arms. "But for a person like you? With your skill set? Probably bad."

"Really?" Vickers asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "For anyone who gets in your way."

\------------------

Joey stepped through the doorway and into the fields outside of Jadesport for the first time and stumbled a bit as he tripped on the thick grass.

"Careful." Veliry said as she gripped his arm and helped him back up. "Welcome to Jadesport Joey." She said as she released him and he dusted off his pants a bit.

He did what he could to not look at her. Things had become.... awkward... since their "Conversation".

"Thanks." He said as he stood up fully and looked around. "So that's why they call it that." He added as he saw the walls of the city off in the distance.

It was at least a good days travel away. But the forests in between here and there had been burned to a crisp during the battle against the blight. And General Sigbert had set his remaining soldiers to clear the burned trees away so that the city could see anything that might come out of the blight.

"Indeed." She replied as she began marching toward the nearby tents with her two bottomless bags of supplies. "Come on. We have work to get to."

"Okay." He said as he moved to follow. He had several of the bags himself, and as they moved the seamstresses and fellow mages that they'd enlisted for the project came through the door behind them.

"General!" She called with a wave as they approached the tents. A large, burly man in a General's uniform turned and waved back then waved them over.

The small group approached and the General greeted Veliry with a small bow.

"Lady Veliry." He said with a warm smile, and Joey decided then and there that he liked this General. "And I take it that this is the young captain's wee brother."

"Joseph sir." Joey said as he held out his hand. "But please, call me Joey."

Sigbert clasped his hand at the wrist and squeezed hard.

"Nice to meet you lad." He said. "I understand this little idea was yours. Let's hope it works."

"Have you found a patch that you think would suit our needs?" Veliry asked, trying to keep things moving.

"Aye. We've got a couple of good candidates." He replied. "Follow me."

And a few minutes later Joey laid his eyes upon the blight for the first time ever.

"Woah. That's weird." He said as stared at the odd non-material.

Veliry watched him curiously. She herself STRUGGLED to look at the blight patches. Most people did. Even pictures and recordings of them on the tablet, that James had taken on his phone, were difficult to focus on.

But Joey was STARING at it.

"Joey?" She wondered.

"Hmm?" He said as he turned to look at her.

"You're staring at it." She said with a hint of curiosity.

"Yeah?" He replied.

"It's not.... making you uncomfortable?" She asked. "You don't feel your eyes repelled by it?"

He shrugged as he looked back at the patch that he thought looked like it was slightly football shaped.

"I mean. It's weird looking for sure." He said. "It's like T.V. static from an old tube television." His head tilted a bit. "Or like a rendering error from an old game. Missingno or something."

"Interesting." She said quietly. "Well... stay back okay? Don't touch it."

"Oh. No worries." He said as his eyes began to glow with green light and he began pacing around and studying the flow of energy around the blob.

"Joey." She said as he continued his studying. "Do us a favor and use your foot to mark out a perimeter around it that will let us create the bag in the right dimensions."

"Okay." He said simply, and a moment later he began dragging his heel on the ground to mark out one side. And Veliry motioned for the seamstresses to get to work.

The two women pulled the bolts of canvas out and began getting to work.

\---

"So..... that's a thing." James said as he, Amina, and the rest of the people that had been in the meeting finally got to the top of the tower where the last princess's flying ship was tying itself off.

The ship in question looked like a viking ship with no sails. And where a normal viking long-ship would have oars, this ship had a series of long metal poles that were linked to each other in groups of three by long membranes of some kind of stretchy rubber looking material. The poles themselves glowed with a subtle blue light. These sections moved up and down like the sides of an animal, and James was reminded of a video he'd seen of sea slugs.

The end result was a nearly five hundred foot long long-ship that was hovering over the castle with a loud humming noise.

Just as King Farrick made it up to the top of the stairs, panting a bit as he leaned against the wall nearby, a pair of were-folk jumped off of the ship holding the end of a length of blue cloth with golden embroidery.

"XHLAENAGH!" One of the two people, an eagle headed soldier, yelled. And as they did, the cloth runner writhed and squirmed. Then slowly formed into a set of stairs.

The other person, of a species James didn't recognize, turned to them and bowed to the King.

"The Ambassador Tanier VaunLoren!" The man said in a jilting, slightly off tempo Petravian. "His words and actions representative of the Vatrian God King's will!"

As they finished the announcement, a somewhat short stature man, likely a few inches shorter than James, stepped up to the top of the cloth staircase on the ship. He was wearing a bright, topaz-blue, robe that reminded James of something from Mexico or central America. His hair and skin were opposites of each other, with the former being nearly snow white, and his skin being even darker than James's deceased former Sergeant.

"And his most holy wife, and bishop second of Southern Vatria!" The man announced as a woman who could have been Amina's twin, albeit with blonde hair and less muscle, took the offered hand and joined the man on the top of the stairs. "Petravian Princess Ferria!"

If Amina or Xarina's eyes had rolled any harder James would have been chasing them over the side of the tower to get them back.

The two of them began strutting down the stairs, her just a half step ahead of him, and approached.

The King put on a big smile as he leaned forward and held his arm out at a right angle.

"Ambassador Tanier." He said as the other man matched the half bow and arm gesture and the two men bumped forearms against each other's. "It has been too long since we've welcomed you to the capital."

"You're eminence." He replied with a faintly Greek sounding accent, though his pronunciation was much better than that of the herald who had announced him. "I must admit that I have missed your land's wines." He gestured back and above at the ship. "But as you can see; I have been quite preoccupied."

"So I do." Replied King Farrick as he stepped up next to the ambassador and wrapped his daughter in his arms. She kissed him lightly on the cheek before they broke the embrace. "I must demand a tour once you have had a chance to relax. How are you dear?" He asked of his daughter. She smiled and nodded.

"I shall show you what I am allowed." Tanier said enthusiastically. "I can even take you on a flight if you'd like."

Then the three sisters were greeting each other with hugs and whispers, and James once again felt like a third wheel.

"It's going to be like this until they're gone." Said a familiar, though entirely unexpected voice from just behind James, causing him to jump a bit even as Artair looked up with a grin.

"Alixan?" Amina asked curiously. "When did you get here?"

Standing just behind James was the nearly eight foot tall crown prince, who had somehow arrived at the castle with none of them knowing

"About an hour ago." He said with a grin. "I stopped for a drink first."

This time it was the King's turn to roll his eyes. Then he went back to his conversation with the Ambassador.

"Don't worry." Artair piped up this time. "One of them will remember you exist in a moment when they need to brag about you."

As if that was a cue, Amina held her hand out to him and pulled her into the gaggle of sisters and began bragging about all his exploits to her youngest sister.

Despite being in a completely different world, the similarity to his own family gatherings over the years was unmissable.

Even as he was being used as a trophy piece, James couldn't help but smile at the family interaction.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10b87cr/wait_is_this_just_gate_295/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (293/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey. Kai's back. Yay.

Also, the king is basically me in this conversation.

Enjoy.

\~

Shil'Varyon'Kai had spent the last few months since the battle in the desert scouring the Deep Dark for more of the Agency's hiding places.

He had known, or at least suspected, the locations of several of them for the past few decades. But the agency rarely interfered with the Deep Dark or any of its denizens. Each of their hiding places had been established at least a few centuries before he had even been born, and the occupants rarely ventured out of them in any tangible way. But his spiders found the locations easily enough.

But their interference had taken a measure of justice from him and his Petravian allies, and he had every intention of recovering this "Chief Driscoll" if he was able.

But every location he checked was the same.

Empty.

Only bodies, poisonous gases, and dust remained in any of the hidden chambers and empty halls he found.

The third such place had had the only thing of any note. A chamber that he recognized as being a golemancy enclave. Several of the bodies bore magical injuries that matched up with the story James had told him of his fight with a Golem Amalgamation.

They had been discarded as casually as any bit of refuse outside a tavern's kitchen. Their bodies stank and wept foul putrescence that he sensed even through the minds of his spiders.

And even as the most recent sign of activity he'd found, they were clearly months old and forgotten.

Still.... he had to continue searching.

Because of his distance and his narrowed focus on the task at hand, and because it occurred so close to the surface and under a large city, and also because it didn't occur IN the Deep Dark, but simply near it, in a cellar on the outskirts of the capital, Shil'Varyon'Kai didn't notice the door that burst into existence.

Several small spiders, of limited intelligence on their own, and only tangentially under his control, saw the door but thought nothing of it.

And so the door waited for its purpose.

\-------------------------

"So it's attacking again?" The King asked as he listened to his son's report.

"If I'm honest, I don't know." Artair admitted. "But the damage we saw is the same. The injuries on what few villagers were... still present... were just like the injuries we saw in Jadesport. But on a massive scale."

King Farrick turned to Amina, who was reading reports from the garrisons in the area. "Has it, or they, or anything, been tracked?" He asked.

Amina wobbled her head a bit.

"There's a path." She said hesitantly. "But even with instructions on WHAT to look for; the blight spots, the possessed.... they still haven't found the source. And, whatever it is, it's currently moved either into, or over, the Frakian range. It um.... destroyed a mountain. Apparently."

James, who had been sipping from a cup of coffee as he listened in, struggled to resist spitting it out.

"A mountain?" Kor'Os asked as her jaw dropped open. "How is such a thing possible?"

Amina shook her head. "We don't know. We have a small wing of griffin riders flying over the range to see if any more have fallen. But they're progress is slow. We sent orders not to fly too fast in areas where it's presence is suspected, that way they don't fly into it unexpectedly."

King Farrick rubbed his hands over his face. His kingdom had succumbed to disaster after disaster over the past year, and now another one was moving through and his people couldn't even pinpoint its location.

The rest of the people in the room waited for his word.

"Have the griffin riders accompanied by any arbalestiers we can find in the area and convince to join them." He said after a moment. "Supply them with whatever they need for their smoke shot arrows, preferably with as much color in the smoke as possible."

The other people in the room looked at him curiously.

"Once they're equipped and riding, have the arbalestiers fire the arrows ahead of the griffins every few seconds with smoke already billowing." He continued, and both James and Amina saw where he was going. "If the arrows suddenly disappear it will give them ample warning of incoming blight. Also, ensure that they ride in pairs."

Amina looked to one of the soldiers in the room and the two exchanged nods before the soldier marched out of the room to deliver the message.

Xarina considered the idea and then nodded her own approval. She'd have to try that herself. Of course none of her ships HAD found any seaborne blight yet, so she wasn't hopeful about its necessity.

"Should we go inspect it?" James asked. "I can probably be there in a few days. Week if I go around to be safe."

Amina placed a hand over his and shook her head.

"No." The King said. "Not until we figure out WHERE this.... thing... is." He pointed a stern finger at James. "Besides. You have a bad track record with traveling."

James held up his hands in mock surrender. "Just offering." He said. Then to himself he muttered. "It's just why I'm here in the first place."

"We." Veliry cut in. "Are already setting up to try something that Captain Choi's brother, my assistant Joseph, has come up with. No guarantee. But I think it has merit."

"When will we have an answer?" The King asked.

"The other side of the doorway, like the one we used in the desert, should be there in a day or so." Veliry replied. "After that its simply a matter of sizing up one of the blights and enclosing it."

"And if it does work, what can we expect to see?" The King followed up.

"In theory." She began. "We should be able to MOVE, or at the very least CAPTURE the blight. But like any other experiment; we won't know until we've tried."

"Joey came up with that?" James asked curiously. Veliry nodded. James nodded back with a smile. "Nice."

"Keep me updated." The King said, ignoring James's interjection. "In less serious matters." He nodded to Amina and James. "Not that it isn't serious. The wedding is in five days. Are you two ready?"

"Ye-" Amina began.

"Is that it?" Kor'Os cut her off. She looked at Amina and held her hands up in apology. "Sorry General. Your Majesty." She said to the King in apology. "But that's all? An entire village was wiped out. At least a hundred people dead or missing or.... possessed? And an entire lake drained. A lake that hundreds more people rely upon to live is gone. And that's it?"

Artair looked at her with zero shock. He'd known ever since she'd climbed onto his drake behind him that she was bold. But he did watch his father.

"Do you have an alternative solution Commander?" King Farrick asked, keeping his tone flat. "Because if you do, then you're a step ahead of every mage and scholar under my command, and every scientist from Captain Choi's world. Plus who knows how many people in any of the other kingdoms of this world, since we know some of them have blight patches of their own."

Kor'Os hung her head as she sat back down. She hadn't thought of that.

"I understand your frustration commander. I assure you that I feel the same tenfold." The King said with a weary sigh. "But sadly we haven't figured out an answer, or a preventative measure, for what this thing is capable of. Not yet anyways." He pointed at Veliry. "But we are working on one."

Kor'Os deflated a bit. She'd only come to the capital with the prince because she was certain that the King and his staff had to have some kind of answer for this. But she'd never been foolish enough to think that the King had an answer to EVERYTHING. It had just been a hope, and that hopes loss hurt more than she'd expected.

"Everything that CAN be done to solve this, is being done commander." Amina assured her. "But, and please don't let this slip in public, this particular issue was set upon our world by the gods themselves. It is going to take everything we have to solve it."

James bristled subtly at her side as she mentioned the last bit.

"The gods?" Kor'Os asked softly.

"Indeed." The King said. "I am sorry if that upsets you commander. But to the best of our knowledge it is true."

"Well then...." She began. "What CAN we do? Sir?" She asked.

Everyone in the room donned looks of concern and discomfort, even the King.

"We can prepare." James said before anyone else could. "At Jadesport we turned the possessed back. Veliry and my brother are gonna do what they can. So are the other mages. But for the rest of us it's just a matter of prepping as best as we can and hoping we make it through."

He looked at King Farrick, who nodded his approval.

"You're a scout right?" James asked. Kor'Os nodded. "Think you can track something that doesn't like to be seen?"

"Haven't had to in years." She admitted. "But I was one of the top hunters during the last Chamex swarm in the north." She looked at Artair. "Your former Clan mother was one of the few who outscored me."

Artair arched an eyebrow. "That was nasty hunting." He said. "But a good match for this I suppose."

"Think you can find whatever's doing this?" James asked, not wanting to think of Gixelle, who'd been like a big sister to him. "Especially with all the intel we have here in the castle about it."

Kor'Os looked at Amina, who nodded and handed over some of the scrolls and a map. Kor'Os turned away the map in favor of her own though. It was better notated for the area in question.

Outside horns blew marking the return of a member of the royal family.

The King looked behind himself out the window for a moment.

"It appears that Niarra is home." He said with a sigh. "Time for our yearly sermon."

James's face scrunched a bit at the comment. Then he saw Amina's eyes roll harder than he'd ever seen before.

And then the window darkened as a massive shadow fell over it.

"Is that a bleeding long-ship with wings?" Xarina asked as she rushed over to the window.

"Holy shit." James said under his breath as he saw the vehicle clearly. "It's a DaVinci plane."

"Oh, we're never going to hear the end of this." Amina said with a look of weariness suddenly on her face.

\-----------------

Atrafar approached the room slowly and cautiously.

She'd been at enough conversions to know that a new member of her kind wasn't necessarily safe just because it was being quiet. Especially when that new member was of the kind that Sebastien had become.

"Chief Vickers?" She asked, remaining formal since she was still on duty. Cautiously, she peered around the edge of the door and through the bars.

Crouching on the floor, in a dark stain of red and brown blood in varying states of dryness, and still exuding steam from his flesh from the heat that came with the change, was Vickers' new form.

He was curled into a near fetal position, his arms outstretched with his hands braced on the ground as he held himself steady.

It was hard to tell, but she estimated him at being nearly a foot taller than his previous height of just over six feet. He also looked to have grown nearly a hundred pounds of solid, fur coated, muscle.

His hands clenched and expanded repeatedly, running his new claws over the small wooden section of the floor that they rested on. Already there were deep furrows there, though she knew that he wouldn't get through. She also knew he wasn't trying to. This was simply his mind subconsciously feeling out its new body. His feet were doing much the same, albeit to lesser effect.

"Sebastien?" She asked softly. "Are you in there?"

She did not personally know the struggle of conversion. She was a born wolf. Her body and mind had been hers for her entire life.

But she knew from others that the struggle to retain sanity and consciousness in the first few hours after conversion were a godly struggle against a creature that no mortal mind could ever fully prepare for.

In fact, that struggle was the entire reason that a member of the Outer Light was always required at sanctioned conversions.

They were there in case the converted became a threat to the local community should they fall to their instincts.

Vickers grunted, breaking her out of her thoughts as he rustled, wobbling on his haunches as he did.

"Sebastien?" She asked again. "Can you answer me."

A rumble emanated from the room, so loud and deep and bass filled that her hackles raised, short as they were at the moment. Without even realizing it her arms had raised into a guarding position, her silvered gauntlet tips readied to fight.

Then a pair of green reflective eyes met hers above a mouth of bared fangs that made her own look small as Vickers raised his head to look at her.

"Vickers?" She asked.

"That...." He said, his voice now several octaves lower than it had been only hours before. "Hurt... like.... fuck."

Jaegheri stepped up next to her, causing her to jump just a bit.

"I tried to-" He began. But he stopped as he saw Vickers, his eyes widening. "By the moon." He said after a moment. "A night brother."

"What's.... What's tha-" Vickers began. Then he wavered and fell over on his side.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/10aeesi/wait_is_this_just_gate_294/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (293/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey. Kai's back. Yay.

Also, the king is basically me in this conversation.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

But every location he checked was the same.

Empty.

Only bodies, poisonous gases, and dust remained in any of the hidden chambers and empty halls he found.

The third such place had had the only thing of any note. A chamber that he recognized as being a golemancy enclave. Several of the bodies bore magical injuries that matched up with the story James had told him of his fight with a Golem Amalgamation.

They had been discarded as casually as any bit of refuse outside a tavern's kitchen. Their bodies stank and wept foul putrescence that he sensed even through the minds of his spiders.

And even as the most recent sign of activity he'd found, they were clearly months old and forgotten.

Still.... he had to continue searching.

Because of his distance and his narrowed focus on the task at hand, and because it occurred so close to the surface and under a large city, and also because it didn't occur IN the Deep Dark, but simply near it, in a cellar on the outskirts of the capital, Shil'Varyon'Kai didn't notice the door that burst into existence.

Several small spiders, of limited intelligence on their own, and only tangentially under his control, saw the door but thought nothing of it.

And so the door waited for its purpose.

\-------------------------

"So it's attacking again?" The King asked as he listened to his son's report.

"If I'm honest, I don't know." Artair admitted. "But the damage we saw is the same. The injuries on what few villagers were... still present... were just like the injuries we saw in Jadesport. But on a massive scale."

King Farrick turned to Amina, who was reading reports from the garrisons in the area. "Has it, or they, or anything, been tracked?" He asked.

Amina wobbled her head a bit.

"There's a path." She said hesitantly. "But even with instructions on WHAT to look for; the blight spots, the possessed.... they still haven't found the source. And, whatever it is, it's currently moved either into, or over, the Frakian range. It um.... destroyed a mountain. Apparently."

James, who had been sipping from a cup of coffee as he listened in, struggled to resist spitting it out.

"A mountain?" Kor'Os asked as her jaw dropped open. "How is such a thing possible?"

Amina shook her head. "We don't know. We have a small wing of griffin riders flying over the range to see if any more have fallen. But they're progress is slow. We sent orders not to fly too fast in areas where it's presence is suspected, that way they don't fly into it unexpectedly."

King Farrick rubbed his hands over his face. His kingdom had succumbed to disaster after disaster over the past year, and now another one was moving through and his people couldn't even pinpoint its location.

The rest of the people in the room waited for his word.

"Have the griffin riders accompanied by any arbalestiers we can find in the area and convince to join them." He said after a moment. "Supply them with whatever they need for their smoke shot arrows, preferably with as much color in the smoke as possible."

The other people in the room looked at him curiously.

"Once they're equipped and riding, have the arbalestiers fire the arrows ahead of the griffins every few seconds with smoke already billowing." He continued, and both James and Amina saw where he was going. "If the arrows suddenly disappear it will give them ample warning of incoming blight. Also, ensure that they ride in pairs."

Amina looked to one of the soldiers in the room and the two exchanged nods before the soldier marched out of the room to deliver the message.

Xarina considered the idea and then nodded her own approval. She'd have to try that herself. Of course none of her ships HAD found any seaborne blight yet, so she wasn't hopeful about its necessity.

"Should we go inspect it?" James asked. "I can probably be there in a few days. Week if I go around to be safe."

Amina placed a hand over his and shook her head.

"No." The King said. "Not until we figure out WHERE this.... thing... is." He pointed a stern finger at James. "Besides. You have a bad track record with traveling."

James held up his hands in mock surrender. "Just offering." He said. Then to himself he muttered. "It's just why I'm here in the first place."

"We." Veliry cut in. "Are already setting up to try something that Captain Choi's brother, my assistant Joseph, has come up with. No guarantee. But I think it has merit."

"When will we have an answer?" The King asked.

"The other side of the doorway, like the one we used in the desert, should be there in a day or so." Veliry replied. "After that its simply a matter of sizing up one of the blights and enclosing it."

"And if it does work, what can we expect to see?" The King followed up.

"In theory." She began. "We should be able to MOVE, or at the very least CAPTURE the blight. But like any other experiment; we won't know until we've tried."

"Joey came up with that?" James asked curiously. Veliry nodded. James nodded back with a smile. "Nice."

"Keep me updated." The King said, ignoring James's interjection. "In less serious matters." He nodded to Amina and James. "Not that it isn't serious. The wedding is in five days. Are you two ready?"

"Ye-" Amina began.

"Is that it?" Kor'Os cut her off. She looked at Amina and held her hands up in apology. "Sorry General. Your Majesty." She said to the King in apology. "But that's all? An entire village was wiped out. At least a hundred people dead or missing or.... possessed? And an entire lake drained. A lake that hundreds more people rely upon to live is gone. And that's it?"

Artair looked at her with zero shock. He'd known ever since she'd climbed onto his drake behind him that she was bold. But he did watch his father.

"Do you have an alternative solution Commander?" King Farrick asked, keeping his tone flat. "Because if you do, then you're a step ahead of every mage and scholar under my command, and every scientist from Captain Choi's world. Plus who knows how many people in any of the other kingdoms of this world, since we know some of them have blight patches of their own."

Kor'Os hung her head as she sat back down. She hadn't thought of that.

"I understand your frustration commander. I assure you that I feel the same tenfold." The King said with a weary sigh. "But sadly we haven't figured out an answer, or a preventative measure, for what this thing is capable of. Not yet anyways." He pointed at Veliry. "But we are working on one."

Kor'Os deflated a bit. She'd only come to the capital with the prince because she was certain that the King and his staff had to have some kind of answer for this. But she'd never been foolish enough to think that the King had an answer to EVERYTHING. It had just been a hope, and that hopes loss hurt more than she'd expected.

"Everything that CAN be done to solve this, is being done commander." Amina assured her. "But, and please don't let this slip in public, this particular issue was set upon our world by the gods themselves. It is going to take everything we have to solve it."

James bristled subtly at her side as she mentioned the last bit.

"The gods?" Kor'Os asked softly.

"Indeed." The King said. "I am sorry if that upsets you commander. But to the best of our knowledge it is true."

"Well then...." She began. "What CAN we do? Sir?" She asked.

Everyone in the room donned looks of concern and discomfort, even the King.

"We can prepare." James said before anyone else could. "At Jadesport we turned the possessed back. Veliry and my brother are gonna do what they can. So are the other mages. But for the rest of us it's just a matter of prepping as best as we can and hoping we make it through."

He looked at King Farrick, who nodded his approval.

"You're a scout right?" James asked. Kor'Os nodded. "Think you can track something that doesn't like to be seen?"

"Haven't had to in years." She admitted. "But I was one of the top hunters during the last Chamex swarm in the north." She looked at Artair. "Your former Clan mother was one of the few who outscored me."

Artair arched an eyebrow. "That was nasty hunting." He said. "But a good match for this I suppose."

"Think you can find whatever's doing this?" James asked, not wanting to think of Gixelle, who'd been like a big sister to him. "Especially with all the intel we have here in the castle about it."

Kor'Os looked at Amina, who nodded and handed over some of the scrolls and a map. Kor'Os turned away the map in favor of her own though. It was better notated for the area in question.

Outside horns blew marking the return of a member of the royal family.

The King looked behind himself out the window for a moment.

"It appears that Niarra is home." He said with a sigh. "Time for our yearly sermon."

James's face scrunched a bit at the comment. Then he saw Amina's eyes roll harder than he'd ever seen before.

And then the window darkened as a massive shadow fell over it.

"Is that a bleeding long-ship with wings?" Xarina asked as she rushed over to the window.

"Holy shit." James said under his breath as he saw the vehicle clearly. "It's a DaVinci plane."

"Oh, we're never going to hear the end of this." Amina said with a look of weariness suddenly on her face.

\----------

Atrafar approached the room slowly and cautiously.

She'd been at enough conversions to know that a new member of her kind wasn't necessarily safe just because it was being quiet. Especially when that new member was of the kind that Sebastien had become.

"Chief Vickers?" She asked, remaining formal since she was still on duty. Cautiously, she peered around the edge of the door and through the bars.

Crouching on the floor, in a dark stain of red and brown blood in varying states of dryness, and still exuding steam from his flesh from the heat that came with the change, was Vickers' new form.

He was curled into a near fetal position, his arms outstretched with his hands braced on the ground as he held himself steady.

It was hard to tell, but she estimated him at being nearly a foot taller than his previous height of just over six feet. He also looked to have grown nearly a hundred pounds of solid, fur coated, muscle.

His hands clenched and expanded repeatedly, running his new claws over the small wooden section of the floor that they rested on. Already there were deep furrows there, though she knew that he wouldn't get through. She also knew he wasn't trying to. This was simply his mind subconsciously feeling out its new body. His feet were doing much the same, albeit to lesser effect.

"Sebastien?" She asked softly. "Are you in there?"

She did not personally know the struggle of conversion. She was a born wolf. Her body and mind had been hers for her entire life.

But she knew from others that the struggle to retain sanity and consciousness in the first few hours after conversion were a godly struggle against a creature that no mortal mind could ever fully prepare for.

In fact, that struggle was the entire reason that a member of the Outer Light was always required at sanctioned conversions.

They were there in case the converted became a threat to the local community should they fall to their instincts.

Vickers grunted, breaking her out of her thoughts as he rustled, wobbling on his haunches as he did.

"Sebastien?" She asked again. "Can you answer me."

A rumble emanated from the room, so loud and deep and bass filled that her hackles raised, short as they were at the moment. Without even realizing it her arms had raised into a guarding position, her silvered gauntlet tips readied to fight.

Then a pair of green reflective eyes met hers above a mouth of bared fangs that made her own look small as Vickers raised his head to look at her.

"Vickers?" She asked.

"That...." He said, his voice now several octaves lower than it had been only hours before. "Hurt... like.... fuck."

Jaegheri stepped up next to her, causing her to jump just a bit.

"I tried to-" He began. But he stopped as he saw Vickers, his eyes widening. "By the moon." He said after a moment. "A night brother."

"What's.... What's tha-" Vickers began. Then he wavered and fell over on his side.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/10aedgq/wait_is_this_just_gate_294/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (292/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Fairly short one. And yes, this is poking fun at how often this has happened with the royal siblings.

And what do you know? A lot of you were right about the last part.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

What is it with every SINGLE member of this family challenging me to duels as fast as they can? James wondered as he flipped over backwards to avoid the rapidly moving bolts that flew at him faster than he thought his rifle could cycle. What's next? The King and I going to twenty paces? Is the last sister going to challenge me to a wizard battle or something?

"SIT STILL YOU DIRT STOMPING SOT!" Princess Xarina yelled as she flew through the air following a weight at the end of a chain, towards him.

The crowd around the training yard cheered at the insult.

The bolts she fired were padded on their ends, but after taking a hit to the side of his calf earlier James knew that they still hurt like hell. He'd have a bruise there later, and he already had a charlie horse there now.

He had not been aware during her drunken exclamation of challenge the night before, that the princess was an Arbalestier like the one he'd met the year before while fighting an elemental. He and Amina had simply been recounting their adventures over the past year to her and her sailor friends. Now he was paying for that lack of knowledge.

James countered the princess's rapid method of transportation with his own chain, lashing it around the one she was being pulled by and redirecting her unexpectedly.

He heard, and saw with his enhanced reflexes, her crossbow twang as it released another bolt at him. His foot released a small explosion that sent him into a spin just below it as it flew harmlessly past his helmeted face.

Then Xarina's helmeted head slammed into his stomach like a ram charging a challenging opponent.

James's spin caused the impact not to wind him as much as the stocky sailor had probably expected, but it did send him to the ground in a mild daze as she rolled across the dirt and back onto her feet.

PANG! James's semi-sentient blade reported as it put itself between him and one of her bolts.

James blasted toward her without even looking, his cheeks were hot with frustration at the remarkably adaptive woman's attacks. The sudden burst of motion, and its unexpected trajectory actually caught her off guard for a change, but only for a moment as she pushed forward and slid under him and his slicing blade.

But slicing HER hadn't been the objective, and he smiled as she raised the weapon to her shoulder to fire, and only heard a light click.

James's smile grew as she looked at the weapon in confusion as she realized that he'd cut the string with a small dagger in his off hand.

Then he spun and was blasting back toward her, both blades out.

To his surprise, she dropped the crossbow and drew a pair of cutlasses that shone and shimmered with heat as they left their scabbards.

She touched the pommels of the two blades together and green hued flames sprang to life around the blades as she moved them into a spin, her own eyes beginning to glow in the same color as James's.

The crowd Oohed at the sight, and many of the sailors present began cheering loudly.

He, was going to lose this fight if he tried to stick to blades.

His sword had other ideas.

James felt it tug at his hand and he let go of it, knowing that it would defend him by any means necessary.

Then, as her swords flashed out to intercept him, James blasted with the hand that had been holding it and directed himself into a long slide in the dirt.

Xarina's eyes widened a bit as she realized what was happening.

Her blades met his with a loud clatter as the three magical weapons competed to protect their wielders.

Then, just under and between the three of them, James's wolf hand flashed forward and slammed into the woman's leather padded sternum like a hammer.

Princess Xarina flew backwards, leaving one of her swords behind to fall in the dirt as the flames on its blade guttered out.

The crowd around the ring went silent as the woman slid to just under a pair of her sailors.

"Fuck." She gasped as she caught her breath. "That hurt."

"He punched the Cap'n's soul out of her!" One of the sailors somewhere else yelled with a laugh.

As Xarina picked herself up she muttered. "Treon you're on cleaning duty for that."

"Worth it!" The same voice answered.

Then Xarina broke out into a smile and the gathered crowd erupted into cheers and laughter as the two sailors she'd landed next to lifted her up onto her feet.

The whole time she'd been laying there James had simply stayed in the half seated position that he'd been in when he'd punched her. He'd won, but he was still exhausted.

"Good enough?" He asked as he stood up and offered his hand to the short woman.

She flicked her dropped blade up into the air with the one still in her hand, then sheathed them both. James couldn't help but notice that the ground underneath where the blade had rested was scorched black.

"Ha!" She laughed as she took the hand. "Aye, you can still marry my sister." She said, causing James to don a look of confusion. "Didn't think you could actually fly. Guess I was wrong. Weird way to do it though." She dusted some of the dirt off her hands as the men from the crowd began to jostle James with claps on the back.

Then a bottle of something that tasted like brake cleaner, grape kool-aid, and shoe polish was pressed to James's lips and he was being shuffled off with a bunch of sailors who were cheering his impromptu victory.

Amina didn't hear him call out to her as he sputtered from the vile concoction.

"Told you he'd win." Amina said smugly as she stepped up next to her sister, who was rubbing at the spot on her chest where she'd been punched.

"I shoulda known that someone who trained with you wouldn't exactly be an easy match." Xarina replied. Then she grunted as she tried taking a deep breath. "Think Treon's right though. Pretty sure he actually punched the damn soul out of me."

"Saves me having to do it myself." Amina said with a grin.

The two sisters stood in amiable silence for a moment as they watched the cohort of sailors, a handful of Amina's soldiers, and James flood into the castle. To the dining hall they assumed.

Then Xarina began laughing, and a few moments later Amina joined.

Xarina wrapped an arm around Amina's waist and hugged her. "Good to see you sis. He's a good'n."

"That he is." Amina agreed.

"When's Ferria get here?"

"You'd know better." Amina replied. "She has to sail here. Unless her husband is going to finally use this as a chance to show of these 'sky-ships' or 'sky barges' whatever the Vatrian government is calling them now." She rolled her eyes at the idea. "But her last letter said she should be here any day now."

"And the brothers?" Xarina wondered.

"Oh, well you know Alixan. He'll show up last minute and make a show of it. Probably riding a new griffin or something." Then she shook her head. "Artair is actually very nearly here already."

As if on cue, the doors to the courtyard opened, and a large drake with a familiar rider on top came striding through. Next to Artair and Xhalya was a horse with a young orc scout on it.

"Speak of the deep." Xarina said.

She made to move toward her brother, but Amina's hand landed on her shoulder and stopped her.

Xarina looked back curiously.

"Remember the task father gave you a few years back?" Amina asked, her tone serious. "Looking for blights while at sea?"

"Yeah." Xarina answered. "Why?"

Amina nodded at Artair and his traveling companion as they approached.

"We've got problems." She said grimly.

\------------------------------

Vickers looked around at the solid metal bars that layered over the walls of the room he was in, and knew that they were made of silver, or at least coated it in.

"Sebastien Anthony Vickers of Earth." The old fox faced were-folk said from the other side of the cage's door. They wore the white with green trim of the Lunar Council's elders. "You have requested conversion into a member of the Folk. That request has been approved. You have had time to think over the selections we have given you, and ask questions of those we have brought with us. The kind you have chosen is ready. Are you?"

Vickers looked at the other rooms nearby, each of which also had the metal bar doors like his. Almost all of them were also occupied, and simply awaiting the same confirmation.

He looked down at his body, naked except for a pair of spandex boxers that he wore whenever he was planning on being active. He hoped they would hold up to what was about to happen.

This was the last time his body would look like this.

His scars would disappear.

His tattoos, few as they were, would simply be patches of slightly different colored fur.

Given time, the damage to his intestines, gifts from a Thai dam-breaker who'd shot him nearly a decade before, would eventually repair. Especially if he got injured there again.

He looked at the little triangle scar near his thumb again.

Then he looked back at the fox man again, and nodded.

Atrafar, standing behind the man, closed her eyes and nodded too. Then she turned and gestured to the man who would turn Vickers.

Jaegheri stepped up to the door. Vickers still couldn't believe that a person who was part jaguar also had a name like that. But for now, such curious coincidences had to simply be chalked up to bad luck.

"Arm." The were-jaguar said.

Vickers thrust his arm out between two of the bars.

The man grabbed it with his hands and turned it slightly.

"This will hurt." He said in a serious tone. "And the bite shall be the least of it."

"I can handle it." Vickers said softly.

"They all say that." Jaegheri said with a look of sorrow.

"Then let's get to it and find out." Vickers said with a grin.

Behind Jaegheri, Atrafar grimaced at the bravado. Then she and the elder moved on to the next door.

Before Vickers could say anything more Jaegheri bent down and he felt the man's wickedly long, sharp teeth pierce into his arm.

For a moment, he thought the were-jaguar wasn't going to let go, and if anything was going to bite harder, as he felt the pressure increase for a moment. He knew that the man could shatter the limb with the strength of his jaw alone if he wanted to.

But instead Jaegheri released him, and spat the blood in his mouth out onto the straw and sawdust that was spread upon the ground.

Vickers pulled his arm back into the cage as blood gushed from the punctures in his forearm.

"Shit." He said as he tried to staunch the bleeding. It wasn't arterial, he knew that much. But it still gushed much more rapidly than he thought it should.

Then something popped in the arm, and Vickers felt cold fire course through his veins.

His hand flexed as something, he thought it might have been a muscle, made a long tearing noise and his thumb bent almost backwards. As he looked the nails lengthened into long, slightly hooked, points.

The skin around the bite wound burned as it darkened. Then a fine fuzz of dark brown, bordering on black, hair erupted in a volume the skin had never known before.

Vickers' jaw clenched as he fought back the urge to scream, and as it clenched it grew. It became longer, wider, more pronounced. His gums split and bled and healed within moments as his teeth shattered or else fell out of his mouth and were replaced by larger, sharper, pointed teeth.

He was about to reach up to try to inspect his mouth with the hand of his un-bitten arm. But instead he fell forward as his left leg made a noise he had only ever heard bones make when they were hit by blunt objects in fights.

The pain of his bones rearranging themselves took him over his limit, and for the first time in years, Vickers screamed in pain.

"Good luck new brother." Jaegheri said softly as he gave the cage door one last shake, checking to see if it was locked one last time, and then walked over near the other applicant who had requested to join his kind.

There was a tearing noise as Vickers' skin split from the rapid growth of new muscle, and he screamed again as he thrashed and rolled about on the floor of the caged room.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/109gub7/wait_is_this_just_gate_293/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (292/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Fairly short one. And yes, this is poking fun at how often this has happened with the royal siblings.

And what do you know? A lot of you were right about the last part.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

What is it with every SINGLE member of this family challenging me to duels as fast as they can? James wondered as he flipped over backwards to avoid the rapidly moving bolts that flew at him faster than he thought his rifle could cycle. What's next? The King and I going to twenty paces? Is the last sister going to challenge me to a wizard battle or something?

"SIT STILL YOU DIRT STOMPING SOT!" Princess Xarina yelled as she flew through the air following a weight at the end of a chain, towards him.

The crowd around the training yard cheered at the insult.

The bolts she fired were padded on their ends, but after taking a hit to the side of his calf earlier James knew that they still hurt like hell. He'd have a bruise there later, and he already had a charlie horse there now.

He had not been aware during her drunken exclamation of challenge the night before, that the princess was an Arbalestier like the one he'd met the year before while fighting an elemental. He and Amina had simply been recounting their adventures over the past year to her and her sailor friends. Now he was paying for that lack of knowledge.

James countered the princess's rapid method of transportation with his own chain, lashing it around the one she was being pulled by and redirecting her unexpectedly.

He heard, and saw with his enhanced reflexes, her crossbow twang as it released another bolt at him. His foot released a small explosion that sent him into a spin just below it as it flew harmlessly past his helmeted face.

Then Xarina's helmeted head slammed into his stomach like a ram charging a challenging opponent.

James's spin caused the impact not to wind him as much as the stocky sailor had probably expected, but it did send him to the ground in a mild daze as she rolled across the dirt and back onto her feet.

PANG! James's semi-sentient blade reported as it put itself between him and one of her bolts.

James blasted toward her without even looking, his cheeks were hot with frustration at the remarkably adaptive woman's attacks. The sudden burst of motion, and its unexpected trajectory actually caught her off guard for a change, but only for a moment as she pushed forward and slid under him and his slicing blade.

But slicing HER hadn't been the objective, and he smiled as she raised the weapon to her shoulder to fire, and only heard a light click.

James's smile grew as she looked at the weapon in confusion as she realized that he'd cut the string with a small dagger in his off hand.

Then he spun and was blasting back toward her, both blades out.

To his surprise, she dropped the crossbow and drew a pair of cutlasses that shone and shimmered with heat as they left their scabbards.

She touched the pommels of the two blades together and green hued flames sprang to life around the blades as she moved them into a spin, her own eyes beginning to glow in the same color as James's.

The crowd Oohed at the sight, and many of the sailors present began cheering loudly.

He, was going to lose this fight if he tried to stick to blades.

His sword had other ideas.

James felt it tug at his hand and he let go of it, knowing that it would defend him by any means necessary.

Then, as her swords flashed out to intercept him, James blasted with the hand that had been holding it and directed himself into a long slide in the dirt.

Xarina's eyes widened a bit as she realized what was happening.

Her blades met his with a loud clatter as the three magical weapons competed to protect their wielders.

Then, just under and between the three of them, James's wolf hand flashed forward and slammed into the woman's leather padded sternum like a hammer.

Princess Xarina flew backwards, leaving one of her swords behind to fall in the dirt as the flames on its blade guttered out.

The crowd around the ring went silent as the woman slid to just under a pair of her sailors.

"Fuck." She gasped as she caught her breath. "That hurt."

"He punched the Cap'n's soul out of her!" One of the sailors somewhere else yelled with a laugh.

As Xarina picked herself up she muttered. "Treon you're on cleaning duty for that."

"Worth it!" The same voice answered.

Then Xarina broke out into a smile and the gathered crowd erupted into cheers and laughter as the two sailors she'd landed next to lifted her up onto her feet.

The whole time she'd been laying there James had simply stayed in the half seated position that he'd been in when he'd punched her. He'd won, but he was still exhausted.

"Good enough?" He asked as he stood up and offered his hand to the short woman.

She flicked her dropped blade up into the air with the one still in her hand, then sheathed them both. James couldn't help but notice that the ground underneath where the blade had rested was scorched black.

"Ha!" She laughed as she took the hand. "Aye, you can still marry my sister." She said, causing James to don a look of confusion. "Didn't think you could actually fly. Guess I was wrong. Weird way to do it though." She dusted some of the dirt off her hands as the men from the crowd began to jostle James with claps on the back.

Then a bottle of something that tasted like brake cleaner, grape kool-aid, and shoe polish was pressed to James's lips and he was being shuffled off with a bunch of sailors who were cheering his impromptu victory.

Amina didn't hear him call out to her as he sputtered from the vile concoction.

"Told you he'd win." Amina said smugly as she stepped up next to her sister, who was rubbing at the spot on her chest where she'd been punched.

"I shoulda known that someone who trained with you wouldn't exactly be an easy match." Xarina replied. Then she grunted as she tried taking a deep breath. "Think Treon's right though. Pretty sure he actually punched the damn soul out of me."

"Saves me having to do it myself." Amina said with a grin.

The two sisters stood in amiable silence for a moment as they watched the cohort of sailors, a handful of Amina's soldiers, and James flood into the castle. To the dining hall they assumed.

Then Xarina began laughing, and a few moments later Amina joined.

Xarina wrapped an arm around Amina's waist and hugged her. "Good to see you sis. He's a good'n."

"That he is." Amina agreed.

"When's Ferria get here?"

"You'd know better." Amina replied. "She has to sail here. Unless her husband is going to finally use this as a chance to show of these 'sky-ships' or 'sky barges' whatever the Vatrian government is calling them now." She rolled her eyes at the idea. "But her last letter said she should be here any day now."

"And the brothers?" Xarina wondered.

"Oh, well you know Alixan. He'll show up last minute and make a show of it. Probably riding a new griffin or something." Then she shook her head. "Artair is actually very nearly here already."

As if on cue, the doors to the courtyard opened, and a large drake with a familiar rider on top came striding through. Next to Artair and Xhalya was a horse with a young orc scout on it.

"Speak of the deep." Xarina said.

She made to move toward her brother, but Amina's hand landed on her shoulder and stopped her.

Xarina looked back curiously.

"Remember the task father gave you a few years back?" Amina asked, her tone serious. "Looking for blights while at sea?"

"Yeah." Xarina answered. "Why?"

Amina nodded at Artair and his traveling companion as they approached.

"We've got problems." She said grimly.

\------------------------------

Vickers looked around at the solid metal bars that layered over the walls of the room he was in, and knew that they were made of silver, or at least coated it in.

"Sebastien Anthony Vickers of Earth." The old fox faced were-folk said from the other side of the cage's door. They wore the white with green trim of the Lunar Council's elders. "You have requested conversion into a member of the Folk. That request has been approved. You have had time to think over the selections we have given you, and ask questions of those we have brought with us. The kind you have chosen is ready. Are you?"

Vickers looked at the other rooms nearby, each of which also had the metal bar doors like his. Almost all of them were also occupied, and simply awaiting the same confirmation.

He looked down at his body, naked except for a pair of spandex boxers that he wore whenever he was planning on being active. He hoped they would hold up to what was about to happen.

This was the last time his body would look like this.

His scars would disappear.

His tattoos, few as they were, would simply be patches of slightly different colored fur.

Given time, the damage to his intestines, gifts from a Thai dam-breaker who'd shot him nearly a decade before, would eventually repair. Especially if he got injured there again.

He looked at the little triangle scar near his thumb again.

Then he looked back at the fox man again, and nodded.

Atrafar, standing behind the man, closed her eyes and nodded too. Then she turned and gestured to the man who would turn Vickers.

Jaegheri stepped up to the door. Vickers still couldn't believe that a person who was part jaguar also had a name like that. But for now, such curious coincidences had to simply be chalked up to bad luck.

"Arm." The were-jaguar said.

Vickers thrust his arm out between two of the bars.

The man grabbed it with his hands and turned it slightly.

"This will hurt." He said in a serious tone. "And the bite shall be the least of it."

"I can handle it." Vickers said softly.

"They all say that." Jaegheri said with a look of sorrow.

"Then let's get to it and find out." Vickers said with a grin.

Behind Jaegheri, Atrafar grimaced at the bravado. Then she and the elder moved on to the next door.

Before Vickers could say anything more Jaegheri bent down and he felt the man's wickedly long, sharp teeth pierce into his arm.

For a moment, he thought the were-jaguar wasn't going to let go, and if anything was going to bite harder, as he felt the pressure increase for a moment. He knew that the man could shatter the limb with the strength of his jaw alone if he wanted to.

But instead Jaegheri released him, and spat the blood in his mouth out onto the straw and sawdust that was spread upon the ground.

Vickers pulled his arm back into the cage as blood gushed from the punctures in his forearm.

"Shit." He said as he tried to staunch the bleeding. It wasn't arterial, he knew that much. But it still gushed much more rapidly than he thought it should.

Then something popped in the arm, and Vickers felt cold fire course through his veins.

His hand flexed as something, he thought it might have been a muscle, made a long tearing noise and his thumb bent almost backwards. As he looked the nails lengthened into long, slightly hooked, points.

The skin around the bite wound burned as it darkened. Then a fine fuzz of dark brown, bordering on black, hair erupted in a volume the skin had never known before.

Vickers' jaw clenched as he fought back the urge to scream, and as it clenched it grew. It became longer, wider, more pronounced. His gums split and bled and healed within moments as his teeth shattered or else fell out of his mouth and were replaced by larger, sharper, pointed teeth.

He was about to reach up to try to inspect his mouth with the hand of his un-bitten arm. But instead he fell forward as his left leg made a noise he had only ever heard bones make when they were hit by blunt objects in fights.

The pain of his bones rearranging themselves took him over his limit, and for the first time in years, Vickers screamed in pain.

"Good luck new brother." Jaegheri said softly as he gave the cage door one last shake, checking to see if it was locked one last time, and then walked over near the other applicant who had requested to join his kind.

There was a tearing noise as Vickers' skin split from the rapid growth of new muscle, and he screamed again as he thrashed and rolled about on the floor of the caged room.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/109gs9n/wait_is_this_just_gate_293/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (291/?)

Previous

Writer's note: My bad about the unexpected absence. Took a bit of time off and went on vacation. I did ZERO work on this series in that time.

Anyways. Enjoy.

Oh, yeah NEW CHARACTER!!!!

^(I 100% don't remember if I've given names to this, or the remaining sibling yet. If so, new canon established. Deal with it.)

\~

When Amina's oldest sister arrived in the Petravian capital, she did so surrounded by a throng of people that made James think of old pirate movies. The Petravian sailors that she brought as her personal guard looked less like the refined knights that most of Amina's soldiers resembled, and more like drunken hell's angels.

Additionally; Amina's sister looked nothing like any of the other three siblings James had met.

To James, Amina looked like someone had taken a super model and run her through a medieval war zone. Her scars and armor did nothing to take away from her beauty, especially to James, and if anything simply made her look more exotic. Artair looked like someone's recreation of a generic prince charming, even if he lacked the "charming" part. His older, and much taller, brother Crown Prince Alixan was much the same, but with an aloofness that made it difficult to pin down his personality.

After seeing a portrait of their mother, who had passed away when they were all children, James had been able to see where they'd gotten their looks from. To put it simply, Queen Xhalyanna Petravius was beautiful, and significantly taller than her husband the King.

But Xarina Petravius, the second daughter and fourth child of the Petravius family, had clearly taken her looks from her father.

When James first met her, in the courtyard of the castle, he had initially thought she was a dwarf.

She was shorter than he was. She was plump, though it was hard to tell under the old fashioned ship's captain uniform she was wearing. He suspected that she was more muscular than the outfit let on. And she had black curly hair that hung around her head in a style that reminded James of the styles he'd seen people wearing in old shows from the sixties and seventies. Her skin was deeply tanned and she had a scar that ran from the corner of her mouth almost all the way to her ear.

And.... she was very loud.

James looked at Amina curiously as the ragtag party of sailors staggered their way through the courtyard, harassing the soldiers as they passed and weaving about haphazardly.

Amina was beaming with a smile.

"AMINA!" The stocky woman exclaimed with her arms held out in the multiversal gesture for a hug.

"Xa!" Amina yelled back as she embraced the shorter woman. She grunted as her sister lifter her up off the ground and squeezed her in a display of strength that surprised James. "Every time." She wheezed as she was lowered to the ground and held her sister at arms length.

"Well I only see ya 'bout once every few years ya damnable work horse." Xarina said with a slam of her fist into Amina's breastplate. "Gotta make the hugs memorable."

"Well maybe if you came in off the ocean from time to time I'd see you more often." Amina countered as she ruffled her sister's hair, which seemed to upset her, even if only a little. "I spent damn near a month in Jadesport working with YOUR merchants. Don't act like you couldn't have stopped by."

"Pah!" Xarina spat. "I was on the other side of the ocean dealing with the runt's religious nuts." She shook her head in mock disgust. "Bunch of glow kelp addicts." She added.

"Yeah. I'll bet." Amina said sarcastically.

James just smiled and nodded at the sailors that passed by. Feeling like a third wheel.

"This him?" Xarina asked suddenly, breaking him out of his awkward silence. "This the so-called Hero?"

"Hi." James said, holding his hand out for a shake.

The hand was slapped away suddenly and James felt himself being crushed and lifted in the same way Amina had only moments before.

"You're smaller than I expected. But thank the gods someone finally got this one to think about a sword that aint made of steel for a change." She said, surprising James with the crudeness of the joke even as he gasped for breath. "It's about time she found a man worth a damn."

"XA!" Amina hissed through her teeth, her face red.

"Ha!" Xarina laughed as she pointed at her sister's red face. "There it is!" Then she waved an arm at her last few sailor cohorts. "Come on lads, let's raid my father's larders!"

The last handful of men all huzzahed at the order and pushed past as the second princess moved around James as fluidly as if she were dancing, leaving the two of them standing there in a daze.

"What just happened?" James asked.

Amina rubbed her eyes as she grimaced.

"She fucking did it again!" She spat suddenly. "Every time!" She said. Then she groaned and flexed her hands as if she wanted to strangle something. Then she took a deep breath as she steadied herself.

"Hon?" James asked nervously. "You.... okay?"

Amina took a moment longer to calm herself.

"Yes." She said sharply, as if trying to convince herself too. "Yes I'm fine." She took another deep breath. "That went better than normal." She said. "Come on. We'll need to redirect her AWAY from the wine room."

"Ooookay." James said and began following his fiance as she stormed off trailing her sister.

\------------------------

Vickers read the scroll one last time as he looked up at the building in front of him. He also looked at the list of choices on the scroll. He'd made his choice, but he'd always been one to check, double check, and triple check intel before he made a move.

Then he looked at the hand holding the scroll.

The human hand.

The hand that WOULDN'T be human much longer.

He looked at the small scar on his thumb. It wasn't much. Just a small little triangular bump right at the base of it.

He'd gotten that scar back when he'd still been just a kid trying to survive the opening attacks that were the precursor to the Water War. He'd gotten it because he'd ignored his father's advice while learning to fire a pistol. He'd gripped the thing incorrectly, and when he'd fired it the slide had cycled back and taken a chunk of thumb with it. It wasn't a terrible injury, but it had hurt, and it had bled. And his father had used it as a lesson.

Would it still be there once he'd transformed?

"Too late for second guessing." He muttered to himself as he stepped forward.

The door opened before he had a chance to knock.

Atrafar stood on the other side, looking minutely less wolfen than the last time he'd seen her. She was wearing her ceremonial armor. It's gauntlets had had their spiked, silver, fingers lengthened and sharpened compared to what they normally looked like.

"Ready?" She asked. "This is your last chance to back out."

Vickers didn't speak. Instead he simply nodded and stepped through the door.

\----------

Samantha sat in the small courtyard near the hospital's cafeteria with her hood drawn down tight over her face.

She jittered nervously as Dr. Munro approached with the tray of food in her hands and set it down on the table between them.

"How is it?" She asked as she sat down opposite of Samantha and grabbed a small bowl with what looked like chowder in it. "It's been a while since you were outside."

Samantha inhaled deeply, the end of her snout only inches away from a bowl that, to her at least, reeked of ham and chilies. No, she realized as she inhaled, it was only chili powder. How she could tell the difference she didn't know. But she could.

"Too many smells." She said as she covered her nose and fought off a sneeze. "Too much sound. Even here." Her left ear twitched as a car honked somewhere.

Normally she wouldn't have been able to hear that from inside a place like this. After all, the small courtyard was surrounded on all sides by the hospital. But her new senses, even halfway through her transformation like now, were stronger than she'd realized before she'd been brought here.

"Is it overwhelming you?" The doctor asked as she blew on a spoon of the soup. "We can go back inside if you'd like."

Samantha shook her head.

"No." She said. "It'd just be worse in the cafeteria. Besides, grass and trees smell better than hospital hallways. Even if I can still smell those too."

Doctor Munro simply nodded. The dislike of a hospital's scent wasn't exactly a revelation, though she hadn't considered how much worse it must have been for her patient now that she was smelling something different.

"And the noise?" She asked. "I can't imagine that this place is worse than inside." She mused as she looked around.

"It's not.... It's not bad." Samantha answered. "And the cafeteria was much louder, even in the few moments I was in there. But..." She looked around, peering out from under her hood for a moment as she looked about. "That tree has a birds nest in it. Birds haven't been pushed out just yet." She looked up and out at the small bit of sky visible above. "I can hear the cars out in the parking lot. And the reporters near the main entrance. It's.... It's like a dull roar of noise... all of it at once."

"But not overwhelming?" The doctor repeated. When Samantha shook her head again she followed up. "Tell me about the birds."

Samantha looked at her curiously. "The birds?" She wondered.

"Yes." Doctor Munro confirmed. "You said there's some birds in a nest. Which tree? How many?"

Samantha's eyebrows furrowed, then she looked the direction of the noise she'd heard.

It was difficult to narrow down her focus. Someone somewhere in the cafeteria was laughing at a joke with way too much volume. Someone was yelling at someone in Spanish on the second floor somewhere behind her. Plus she could still smell the soup setting in front of her.

"Take your time." Doctor Munro said softly. "There's not time limit on any of this. We can sit here all day. There's always more soup."

Samantha put the bowl to her mouth and drank it down in defiance of the statement. The plan backfired as her elongated snout made a mess of the attempt.

"Or you can do that." The doctor said with only mild smugness.

Samantha ignored her in favor of focusing on the task at hand.

It took a few minutes, but eventually she managed to hone in on the nest. She pointed at the tree in question, even as she continued focusing.

"That.... elm?" She said uncertainly. "I don't know trees."

Doctor Munro let out a light laugh. "That's fine." She said. "Now how many?"

THAT was a significantly tougher question. Samantha had no idea how many there were in there. Maybe if she knew what kind of birds they were she might have an answer. But even then, she didn't really know a lot about birds either.

She focused even harder. And as she did, she didn't even notice the way the rest of the world seemed to fall away.

She heard the cheeping and twittering of the young birds. Heard their little clawed feet scraping and rustling in the nest. Heard one of them peck at some part of it with its little beak.

Then as she focused even harder, her eyes shut to keep distractions at a minimum, she began to hear subtle little differences in the noises.

One of the birds was just a tiny bit deeper than the others. It wasn't even a full octave, but it was a difference.

Two of the birds were almost cheeping on top of each other, but their notes were almost identical, and she could hear the two of them.

Then there was the one that was continuously pecking at something. Maybe some left over food or something. Or maybe it was just the bird equivalent of scratching graffiti into your desk.

"Four.... I think." She said hesitantly.

Doctor Munro wiped her mouth with a napkin and stood up, walking over to the tree quietly. Samantha watched her curiously. After a few moments the doctor stood on tiptoes and pressed her phone into a small nook on the tree.

"Sorry little ones." She said softly, though Samantha heard it as clearly as if she was still at the table. Then there was a small snapshot noise as she took a picture with the phone.

She looked at it for a moment, then nodded and walked back over and handed her the phone.

"Five?" Samantha asked, a little upset at being wrong.

"I think the one in the back is sleeping." The doctor said. "Or dead. But I imagine the parents would have gotten rid of it if that was the case."

Then the doctor placed a hand on Samantha's shoulder, pulling her focus back to her.

"Did you hear what I said while you were trying to figure it out?" She asked.

Samantha thought about it, then shook her head as she handed the phone back.

"I said.... this adjustment will be easier once you get used to it." The doctor said with a smile. "I whispered it. But still." She held the phone up with the picture still on display. "Far as I'm concerned that's a pass. And a big step."

Samantha grinned a bit as she looked over at the tree. She'd really HEARD the difference between a bunch of birds from almost twenty yards away. It was just another item on a long list of things that never should have been possible for her. But she'd done it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/108pm57/wait_is_this_just_gate_292/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (291/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: If you're not on r/GATEhouse then my bad about the unexpected absence. Took a bit of time off and went on vacation. I did ZERO work on this series in that time.

Anyways. Enjoy.

Oh, yeah NEW CHARACTER!!!!

^(I 100% don't remember if I've given names to this, or the remaining sibling yet. If so, new canon established. Deal with it.)

\~

When Amina's oldest sister arrived in the Petravian capital, she did so surrounded by a throng of people that made James think of old pirate movies. The Petravian sailors that she brought as her personal guard looked less like the refined knights that most of Amina's soldiers resembled, and more like drunken hell's angels.

Additionally; Amina's sister looked nothing like any of the other three siblings James had met.

To James, Amina looked like someone had taken a super model and run her through a medieval war zone. Her scars and armor did nothing to take away from her beauty, especially to James, and if anything simply made her look more exotic. Artair looked like someone's recreation of a generic prince charming, even if he lacked the "charming" part. His older, and much taller, brother Crown Prince Alixan was much the same, but with an aloofness that made it difficult to pin down his personality.

After seeing a portrait of their mother, who had passed away when they were all children, James had been able to see where they'd gotten their looks from. To put it simply, Queen Xhalyanna Petravius was beautiful, and significantly taller than her husband the King.

But Xarina Petravius, the second daughter and fourth child of the Petravius family, had clearly taken her looks from her father.

When James first met her, in the courtyard of the castle, he had initially thought she was a dwarf.

She was shorter than he was. She was plump, though it was hard to tell under the old fashioned ship's captain uniform she was wearing. He suspected that she was more muscular than the outfit let on. And she had black curly hair that hung around her head in a style that reminded James of the styles he'd seen people wearing in old shows from the sixties and seventies. Her skin was deeply tanned and she had a scar that ran from the corner of her mouth almost all the way to her ear.

And.... she was very loud.

James looked at Amina curiously as the ragtag party of sailors staggered their way through the courtyard, harassing the soldiers as they passed and weaving about haphazardly.

Amina was beaming with a smile.

"AMINA!" The stocky woman exclaimed with her arms held out in the multiversal gesture for a hug.

"Xa!" Amina yelled back as she embraced the shorter woman. She grunted as her sister lifter her up off the ground and squeezed her in a display of strength that surprised James. "Every time." She wheezed as she was lowered to the ground and held her sister at arms length.

"Well I only see ya 'bout once every few years ya damnable work horse." Xarina said with a slam of her fist into Amina's breastplate. "Gotta make the hugs memorable."

"Well maybe if you came in off the ocean from time to time I'd see you more often." Amina countered as she ruffled her sister's hair, which seemed to upset her, even if only a little. "I spent damn near a month in Jadesport working with YOUR merchants. Don't act like you couldn't have stopped by."

"Pah!" Xarina spat. "I was on the other side of the ocean dealing with the runt's religious nuts." She shook her head in mock disgust. "Bunch of glow kelp addicts." She added.

"Yeah. I'll bet." Amina said sarcastically.

James just smiled and nodded at the sailors that passed by. Feeling like a third wheel.

"This him?" Xarina asked suddenly, breaking him out of his awkward silence. "This the so-called Hero?"

"Hi." James said, holding his hand out for a shake.

The hand was slapped away suddenly and James felt himself being crushed and lifted in the same way Amina had only moments before.

"You're smaller than I expected. But thank the gods someone finally got this one to think about a sword that aint made of steel for a change." She said, surprising James with the crudeness of the joke even as he gasped for breath. "It's about time she found a man worth a damn."

"XA!" Amina hissed through her teeth, her face red.

"Ha!" Xarina laughed as she pointed at her sister's red face. "There it is!" Then she waved an arm at her last few sailor cohorts. "Come on lads, let's raid my father's larders!"

The last handful of men all huzzahed at the order and pushed past as the second princess moved around James as fluidly as if she were dancing, leaving the two of them standing there in a daze.

"What just happened?" James asked.

Amina rubbed her eyes as she grimaced.

"She fucking did it again!" She spat suddenly. "Every time!" She said. Then she groaned and flexed her hands as if she wanted to strangle something. Then she took a deep breath as she steadied herself.

"Hon?" James asked nervously. "You.... okay?"

Amina took a moment longer to calm herself.

"Yes." She said sharply, as if trying to convince herself too. "Yes I'm fine." She took another deep breath. "That went better than normal." She said. "Come on. We'll need to redirect her AWAY from the wine room."

"Ooookay." James said and began following his fiance as she stormed off trailing her sister.

\------------------------

Vickers read the scroll one last time as he looked up at the building in front of him. He also looked at the list of choices on the scroll. He'd made his choice, but he'd always been one to check, double check, and triple check intel before he made a move.

Then he looked at the hand holding the scroll.

The human hand.

The hand that WOULDN'T be human much longer.

He looked at the small scar on his thumb. It wasn't much. Just a small little triangular bump right at the base of it.

He'd gotten that scar back when he'd still been just a kid trying to survive the opening attacks that were the precursor to the Water War. He'd gotten it because he'd ignored his father's advice while learning to fire a pistol. He'd gripped the thing incorrectly, and when he'd fired it the slide had cycled back and taken a chunk of thumb with it. It wasn't a terrible injury, but it had hurt, and it had bled. And his father had used it as a lesson.

Would it still be there once he'd transformed?

"Too late for second guessing." He muttered to himself as he stepped forward.

The door opened before he had a chance to knock.

Atrafar stood on the other side, looking minutely less wolfen than the last time he'd seen her. She was wearing her ceremonial armor. It's gauntlets had had their spiked, silver, fingers lengthened and sharpened compared to what they normally looked like.

"Ready?" She asked. "This is your last chance to back out."

Vickers didn't speak. Instead he simply nodded and stepped through the door.

\----------

Samantha sat in the small courtyard near the hospital's cafeteria with her hood drawn down tight over her face.

She jittered nervously as Dr. Munro approached with the tray of food in her hands and set it down on the table between them.

"How is it?" She asked as she sat down opposite of Samantha and grabbed a small bowl with what looked like chowder in it. "It's been a while since you were outside."

Samantha inhaled deeply, the end of her snout only inches away from a bowl that, to her at least, reeked of ham and chilies. No, she realized as she inhaled, it was only chili powder. How she could tell the difference she didn't know. But she could.

"Too many smells." She said as she covered her nose and fought off a sneeze. "Too much sound. Even here." Her left ear twitched as a car honked somewhere.

Normally she wouldn't have been able to hear that from inside a place like this. After all, the small courtyard was surrounded on all sides by the hospital. But her new senses, even halfway through her transformation like now, were stronger than she'd realized before she'd been brought here.

"Is it overwhelming you?" The doctor asked as she blew on a spoon of the soup. "We can go back inside if you'd like."

Samantha shook her head.

"No." She said. "It'd just be worse in the cafeteria. Besides, grass and trees smell better than hospital hallways. Even if I can still smell those too."

Doctor Munro simply nodded. The dislike of a hospital's scent wasn't exactly a revelation, though she hadn't considered how much worse it must have been for her patient now that she was smelling something different.

"And the noise?" She asked. "I can't imagine that this place is worse than inside." She mused as she looked around.

"It's not.... It's not bad." Samantha answered. "And the cafeteria was much louder, even in the few moments I was in there. But..." She looked around, peering out from under her hood for a moment as she looked about. "That tree has a birds nest in it. Birds haven't been pushed out just yet." She looked up and out at the small bit of sky visible above. "I can hear the cars out in the parking lot. And the reporters near the main entrance. It's.... It's like a dull roar of noise... all of it at once."

"But not overwhelming?" The doctor repeated. When Samantha shook her head again she followed up. "Tell me about the birds."

Samantha looked at her curiously. "The birds?" She wondered.

"Yes." Doctor Munro confirmed. "You said there's some birds in a nest. Which tree? How many?"

Samantha's eyebrows furrowed, then she looked the direction of the noise she'd heard.

It was difficult to narrow down her focus. Someone somewhere in the cafeteria was laughing at a joke with way too much volume. Someone was yelling at someone in Spanish on the second floor somewhere behind her. Plus she could still smell the soup setting in front of her.

"Take your time." Doctor Munro said softly. "There's not time limit on any of this. We can sit here all day. There's always more soup."

Samantha put the bowl to her mouth and drank it down in defiance of the statement. The plan backfired as her elongated snout made a mess of the attempt.

"Or you can do that." The doctor said with only mild smugness.

Samantha ignored her in favor of focusing on the task at hand.

It took a few minutes, but eventually she managed to hone in on the nest. She pointed at the tree in question, even as she continued focusing.

"That.... elm?" She said uncertainly. "I don't know trees."

Doctor Munro let out a light laugh. "That's fine." She said. "Now how many?"

THAT was a significantly tougher question. Samantha had no idea how many there were in there. Maybe if she knew what kind of birds they were she might have an answer. But even then, she didn't really know a lot about birds either.

She focused even harder. And as she did, she didn't even notice the way the rest of the world seemed to fall away.

She heard the cheeping and twittering of the young birds. Heard their little clawed feet scraping and rustling in the nest. Heard one of them peck at some part of it with its little beak.

Then as she focused even harder, her eyes shut to keep distractions at a minimum, she began to hear subtle little differences in the noises.

One of the birds was just a tiny bit deeper than the others. It wasn't even a full octave, but it was a difference.

Two of the birds were almost cheeping on top of each other, but their notes were almost identical, and she could hear the two of them.

Then there was the one that was continuously pecking at something. Maybe some left over food or something. Or maybe it was just the bird equivalent of scratching graffiti into your desk.

"Four.... I think." She said hesitantly.

Doctor Munro wiped her mouth with a napkin and stood up, walking over to the tree quietly. Samantha watched her curiously. After a few moments the doctor stood on tiptoes and pressed her phone into a small nook on the tree.

"Sorry little ones." She said softly, though Samantha heard it as clearly as if she was still at the table. Then there was a small snapshot noise as she took a picture with the phone.

She looked at it for a moment, then nodded and walked back over and handed her the phone.

"Five?" Samantha asked, a little upset at being wrong.

"I think the one in the back is sleeping." The doctor said. "Or dead. But I imagine the parents would have gotten rid of it if that was the case."

Then the doctor placed a hand on Samantha's shoulder, pulling her focus back to her.

"Did you hear what I said while you were trying to figure it out?" She asked.

Samantha thought about it, then shook her head as she handed the phone back.

"I said.... this adjustment will be easier once you get used to it." The doctor said with a smile. "I whispered it. But still." She held the phone up with the picture still on display. "Far as I'm concerned that's a pass. And a big step."

Samantha grinned a bit as she looked over at the tree. She'd really HEARD the difference between a bunch of birds from almost twenty yards away. It was just another item on a long list of things that never should have been possible for her. But she'd done it.

Next

Wait, is this just GATE? (290/?)

Previous

Writer's note: And what do you know? The pups are back in the story.

\~

James and Amina rode Steve in near silence through the capital, her arms around his waist.

People waved to James even as they parted for Steve's immense size. Soldiers saluted Amina, who waved them off. She wasn't in her Armor or uniform, and her only show of any Petravian colors was a sash draped from one shoulder to her waist.

The capital showed scars of the intense violence that had occurred just in the previous winter. Buildings had been repaired. But many of them still showed bits of burn damage and had soot and ash stains. Others easily showed where the damage had been repaired with new beams, or roofing, mixed in with the old that had been salvaged.

Then as they neared ground zero, the NEW buildings began to come into view.

The Church to the God of Warmth and Comfort was gone, and the priests that had been dispatched from other cities hadn't thought it a good idea to rebuild their temple in the original location. Not only was that location slagged to glass even to this day, but the priests had (correctly) determined that doing so would leave a bad taste in people's mouths. Their new building was a much smaller, much humbler building on the northeast side of the capital now. The priests there had taken to wearing thin rags throughout the rebuilding effort, forgoing their own comfort as they tended to the displaced refugees from the attack. A show of humility and self inflicted punishment for an event that many people throughout the city had seen as their fault, though the arch-mages had thought otherwise.

James couldn't help but notice how Amina's head shifted from one shoulder to the other as they neared the glass crater that had marked the elemental's emergence, moving so she wouldn't have to look at it.

James did the opposite, staring at the water filled hole as they passed. A trio of young children were playing in the shallow part of it, splashing each other as they laughed. The scars on the side of his head tingled a little bit, as if remembering the pain of the battle.

"I think they'll be okay." He said softly, mostly to himself.

"Hmm?" Amina wondered as she looked at the houses nearby.

"The people." James answered. "I think they'll be okay."

Amina pulled back a bit and looked at the children for just a moment before turning back the other way.

"Not all of them." She said glumly.

"Not about all of them." He countered as he looked back toward the direction they were heading.

They rode in silence for a few moments.

"Did I tell you about L.A.?" He asked as he broke the silence.

"The city that got destroyed?" She asked. He nodded. "A little bit. Why?"

"I told you about how me and my unit got transported through it on a train once, right?" He asked.

She nodded.

"Even in that destroyed city, there were people." He continued. "Not many. And they didn't live good lives. But they were there. Even amidst all that horror and sadness... That.... oppressive.... aura. So thick you could FEEL it.... even without any magic involved. And they were in there living."

She listened silently. He jerked a thumb over his shoulder at the playing children.

"This place will do better." He said. "It's hurt." He placed his wolf hand on her head and rustled her hair a bit. "WE... are hurt. That'll never change. But.... This place will heal."

She remained silent, and a few minutes later they reached their destination.

Amina slid down Steve's side silently as James lent her her hand.

Kela and Jurl's house, now only Jurl's, looked much like most of the city did. The side of it closest to the Elemental's attack had been blasted away from the wind and heat, and the remaining half of the house had collapsed partially as a result. When they'd finally found them after the battle, they'd learned that Jurl and the two children had hidden down in their wine cellar.

Now the house was rebuilt, fresh timber and bricks showed throughout the house, likely supplied by the building company that Jurl owned with his partner. A good sign considering how he had been looking and acting the last time they'd seen him.

Sitting in the corner of the yard was a young willow tree, maybe a year old at most, with a small stone marker at its base. James remembered Kela talking about getting a willow tree from a druid friend of hers that had ended up being turned into a Blight Possessed outside of Jadesport.

James and Amina could both guess at what the marker was for.

The door opened as they approached, startling both of them, and a small, furry, child poked their head out.

"Aunt Amina?" Little Tilo asked as he emerged fully.

Amina stepped forward a bit with her arms out, and the small pup calmly moved forward to hug the woman he called Aunt.

"Hey Tilo." She said as she hugged him. "Is your father home?"

Tilo nodded.

"Well we stopped by to invite you guys to our wedding." She said as she lifted the little pup up onto her hip. "Can you go get him for us?"

Tilo nodded again. But before Amina could put him back down, Jurl pulled the door open all the way.

"No need." He said. "I'm already here."

The last time either of them had seen him, he'd been ragged and weary. The pain of losing his mate, and the mother of his children, wearing at him as much as could be expected of such a loss.

Now Jurl looked much more put together. His hair had greyed some, and the fur around his snout was much thicker, marking him as having a beard when in his human form. His eyes still bore a deep-seated sorrow that they all knew would likely never fade.

"Please." He said as he gestured into the house. "Come in. And congratulations."

Amina hugged him as she passed, still carrying Tilo, and James clasped hands with him as the werewolf clapped him on the shoulder.

\----------

Joey walked back to his room slowly and with his hands against his legs, doing everything he could to keep them from rising up to his ears.

His eyes glowed a bright amber that caused many of the people passing by to look at him curiously before continuing on.

The conversation he'd just had with his teacher had been one that he hadn't really prepared for. It was one that he COULDN'T really prepare for.

But, he and Veliry HAD managed to come to an understanding of how they would work together in the future.

And..... Joey had also admitted that he had a crush on her.

The conversation had gotten... complicated... after that, and Joey was still processing it.

He paused next to a vase with some flowers in it as one of his hands reached up for his ear and his foot started tamping at the stone floor.

His eyes glowed brighter as he tried to ground himself, slowing down his perception of the world around him.

James had been right, the ability to effectively CREATE more time to think about things was a game changer for him. He'd have to thank him for it later.

Slowly, Joey's hand began to lower again, having only gotten about halfway to its goal. His foot slowed and eventually stilled.

"Josephito?" His mother's voice inquired.

Joey looked up to see her approaching him in a bit of a rush.

He willed his eyes to dispel the magic within them.

"Mom?" He asked as the glow faded.

"Joey are you okay?" She asked as she approached and cautiously put a hand on his shoulder. "One of the healers mentioned seeing you in some kind of distress. What's going on?"

Joey smiled. "Nothing mom." He reassured her. "I'm fine. Just... working through some stuff."

His mother studied him for a moment. Then, when she didn't sense any lies she matched the smile.

"What was going on with your eyes? What spell was that?" She asked curiously as she lightly pulled him back into motion.

"Just a trick James showed me." He answered. "And it helps a lot with the uh... overload."

"That's wonderful." She said. "I thought you'd quit magic."

"I have." He said. "But only LEARNING magic. I can't UNLEARN what I already have, but I think I'll keep using this one."

The two of them walked into the small food hall near the healing ward and sat for lunch while Joey explained the spell to her.

If anything, it helped him calm down a bit more.

\-------------------------

Artair drew his hood up so that his face was mostly veiled as he and Kor'Os got to the edge of the capital. She looked at him curiously, but decided not to question it.

"How long has it been since you were home?" She asked instead.

"Oh, only about six months or so." He said easily. "It was still winter."

As they passed by the guard post one of the soldiers noticed them and saluted her. Artair winced at the attention.

"Commander." The soldier greeted, causing the other soldiers with him to perk up.

"Relax." She said as she returned the salute. "I'm not even your garrison." Then she decided to annoy her traveling companion. "I'm from the Riverland Garrison traveling with the second prince here." She gestured at Artair, who fought not to look upset as he showed them the ring dangling from his neck. If the soldiers had perked up before, now they were standing practically ramrod straight. "We've sent message ahead, we need to report in."

The soldier nearest the guard post pulled up their list of orders and checked. A moment later he jogged over and showed the first soldier. "Please continue with haste commander." The young orc said, then turned to Artair. "Your highness."

"Yes yes." Artair said in return. "Let's go SUB-commander." He said venomously.

And the two of them continued on toward the center of the capital.

\----------

Samantha Jenkins sat in a room with Dr. Munro on one side and the lawyer Richard Fletcher on the other. Across from them sat Major Marcus Dennis and a JAG officer, also a Major, by the name of Ariel Friedmann. On the table between them was a voice recorder with a three hundred sixty degree camera on a little pod.

"Just to make sure." Major Friedmann said. "Corporal Jenkins you are aware that declining medical care from our military facilities in favor of a civilian facility will NOT be covered by your Tricare Alpha coverage. Additionally; any lasting injuries or trauma from your condition that may linger beyond your current treatment will NOT be applicable to any disability percentage you receive from the VA upon separating your term of service, should you choose to separate from service instead of re-upping or retiring?"

"I do." She replied meekly.

"Please speak up Corporal Jenkins." The JAG officer said. "For the recorder."

She leaned forward a bit, doing what she could NOT to pay attention to the slightly lengthened snout that she could see in the warped reflection of the camera ball.

"I do." She said louder.

"And you do understand that you will still be required to check in with your chain of command on a daily basis, currently reassigned to the temporary garrison that's been set up to oversee the recovery of the nearby base. For now that will simply require a phone call from one of the hospital land line phones. Though, once you are released from your extended care and observation you will be required to report. In person and in uniform as best as you are capable with your current physiological limitations."

She leaned forward again. "I do." She said.

"For the record." Major Friedmann continued. "You do this despite the United States Military's belief that it is the best suited option for your medical care."

"I do." She said again

Friedmann nodded curtly. "Well then, all that cleared up, here are some papers to sign remanding you to the care of the Neil S. Carter Medical center and its staff until you are considered to be physically and psychologically stable." She said as she slid a small stack of papers across the table.

Before Samantha could reach for them, Fletcher intercepted them and began scanning through them.

Samantha peered over at the papers and was surprised at how quickly he turned the pages on the stack. The font was incredibly small. Not to the point of being unreadable. But an older person would definitely need reading glasses.

The two Majors sat with different levels of patience. Major Friedmann was as still and unperturbed as if she was made of stone. Dennis on the other hand, sighed and began to fidget.

Fletcher didn't so much as acknowledge either of them as he read over the documents. Some twenty, awkward, minutes later he slid the papers to Samantha.

"It's about as legitimate as it can be considering the situation." He said with a soft smile that made Samantha glad she was wearing her hood. "You can sign it if you want Ms. Jenkins."

She nodded and picked up the pen that was in front of her and signed and initialed where the hospital lawyer indicated.

Several minutes later she slid the papers back across to the JAG lawyer who stood up and nodded.

"We'll have copies dropped off in the morning." She said.

"Actually we can get some made on your way out." Fletcher said as he also stood up. "The desk outside has a scanner."

Friedmann didn't even flinch at the statement.

"Come Samantha." Dr. Munro said as she laid a hand over Samantha's. "Let's get you back to your room."

She nodded and let the little old lady lead her out of the room.

"Did you notice..." Doctor Munro began once they got out of ear shot of the departing soldiers and the hospital lawyer. "that they didn't ONCE mention anything about curing you?"

And now that the doctor mentioned it, Samantha HADN'T heard the military lawyer mention it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/107sd2y/wait_is_this_just_gate_291/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (290/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: And what do you know? The pups are back in the story.

\~

James and Amina rode Steve in near silence through the capital, her arms around his waist.

People waved to James even as they parted for Steve's immense size. Soldiers saluted Amina, who waved them off. She wasn't in her Armor or uniform, and her only show of any Petravian colors was a sash draped from one shoulder to her waist.

The capital showed scars of the intense violence that had occurred just in the previous winter. Buildings had been repaired. But many of them still showed bits of burn damage and had soot and ash stains. Others easily showed where the damage had been repaired with new beams, or roofing, mixed in with the old that had been salvaged.

Then as they neared ground zero, the NEW buildings began to come into view.

The Church to the God of Warmth and Comfort was gone, and the priests that had been dispatched from other cities hadn't thought it a good idea to rebuild their temple in the original location. Not only was that location slagged to glass even to this day, but the priests had (correctly) determined that doing so would leave a bad taste in people's mouths. Their new building was a much smaller, much humbler building on the northeast side of the capital now. The priests there had taken to wearing thin rags throughout the rebuilding effort, forgoing their own comfort as they tended to the displaced refugees from the attack. A show of humility and self inflicted punishment for an event that many people throughout the city had seen as their fault, though the arch-mages had thought otherwise.

James couldn't help but notice how Amina's head shifted from one shoulder to the other as they neared the glass crater that had marked the elemental's emergence, moving so she wouldn't have to look at it.

James did the opposite, staring at the water filled hole as they passed. A trio of young children were playing in the shallow part of it, splashing each other as they laughed. The scars on the side of his head tingled a little bit, as if remembering the pain of the battle.

"I think they'll be okay." He said softly, mostly to himself.

"Hmm?" Amina wondered as she looked at the houses nearby.

"The people." James answered. "I think they'll be okay."

Amina pulled back a bit and looked at the children for just a moment before turning back the other way.

"Not all of them." She said glumly.

"Not about all of them." He countered as he looked back toward the direction they were heading.

They rode in silence for a few moments.

"Did I tell you about L.A.?" He asked as he broke the silence.

"The city that got destroyed?" She asked. He nodded. "A little bit. Why?"

"I told you about how me and my unit got transported through it on a train once, right?" He asked.

She nodded.

"Even in that destroyed city, there were people." He continued. "Not many. And they didn't live good lives. But they were there. Even amidst all that horror and sadness... That.... oppressive.... aura. So thick you could FEEL it.... even without any magic involved. And they were in there living."

She listened silently. He jerked a thumb over his shoulder at the playing children.

"This place will do better." He said. "It's hurt." He placed his wolf hand on her head and rustled her hair a bit. "WE... are hurt. That'll never change. But.... This place will heal."

She remained silent, and a few minutes later they reached their destination.

Amina slid down Steve's side silently as James lent her her hand.

Kela and Jurl's house, now only Jurl's, looked much like most of the city did. The side of it closest to the Elemental's attack had been blasted away from the wind and heat, and the remaining half of the house had collapsed partially as a result. When they'd finally found them after the battle, they'd learned that Jurl and the two children had hidden down in their wine cellar.

Now the house was rebuilt, fresh timber and bricks showed throughout the house, likely supplied by the building company that Jurl owned with his partner. A good sign considering how he had been looking and acting the last time they'd seen him.

Sitting in the corner of the yard was a young willow tree, maybe a year old at most, with a small stone marker at its base. James remembered Kela talking about getting a willow tree from a druid friend of hers that had ended up being turned into a Blight Possessed outside of Jadesport.

James and Amina could both guess at what the marker was for.

The door opened as they approached, startling both of them, and a small, furry, child poked their head out.

"Aunt Amina?" Little Tilo asked as he emerged fully.

Amina stepped forward a bit with her arms out, and the small pup calmly moved forward to hug the woman he called Aunt.

"Hey Tilo." She said as she hugged him. "Is your father home?"

Tilo nodded.

"Well we stopped by to invite you guys to our wedding." She said as she lifted the little pup up onto her hip. "Can you go get him for us?"

Tilo nodded again. But before Amina could put him back down, Jurl pulled the door open all the way.

"No need." He said. "I'm already here."

The last time either of them had seen him, he'd been ragged and weary. The pain of losing his mate, and the mother of his children, wearing at him as much as could be expected of such a loss.

Now Jurl looked much more put together. His hair had greyed some, and the fur around his snout was much thicker, marking him as having a beard when in his human form. His eyes still bore a deep-seated sorrow that they all knew would likely never fade.

"Please." He said as he gestured into the house. "Come in. And congratulations."

Amina hugged him as she passed, still carrying Tilo, and James clasped hands with him as the werewolf clapped him on the shoulder.

\----------

Joey walked back to his room slowly and with his hands against his legs, doing everything he could to keep them from rising up to his ears.

His eyes glowed a bright amber that caused many of the people passing by to look at him curiously before continuing on.

The conversation he'd just had with his teacher had been one that he hadn't really prepared for. It was one that he COULDN'T really prepare for.

But, he and Veliry HAD managed to come to an understanding of how they would work together in the future.

And..... Joey had also admitted that he had a crush on her.

The conversation had gotten... complicated... after that, and Joey was still processing it.

He paused next to a vase with some flowers in it as one of his hands reached up for his ear and his foot started tamping at the stone floor.

His eyes glowed brighter as he tried to ground himself, slowing down his perception of the world around him.

James had been right, the ability to effectively CREATE more time to think about things was a game changer for him. He'd have to thank him for it later.

Slowly, Joey's hand began to lower again, having only gotten about halfway to its goal. His foot slowed and eventually stilled.

"Josephito?" His mother's voice inquired.

Joey looked up to see her approaching him in a bit of a rush.

He willed his eyes to dispel the magic within them.

"Mom?" He asked as the glow faded.

"Joey are you okay?" She asked as she approached and cautiously put a hand on his shoulder. "One of the healers mentioned seeing you in some kind of distress. What's going on?"

Joey smiled. "Nothing mom." He reassured her. "I'm fine. Just... working through some stuff."

His mother studied him for a moment. Then, when she didn't sense any lies she matched the smile.

"What was going on with your eyes? What spell was that?" She asked curiously as she lightly pulled him back into motion.

"Just a trick James showed me." He answered. "And it helps a lot with the uh... overload."

"That's wonderful." She said. "I thought you'd quit magic."

"I have." He said. "But only LEARNING magic. I can't UNLEARN what I already have, but I think I'll keep using this one."

The two of them walked into the small food hall near the healing ward and sat for lunch while Joey explained the spell to her.

If anything, it helped him calm down a bit more.

\------------------------

Artair drew his hood up so that his face was mostly veiled as he and Kor'Os got to the edge of the capital. She looked at him curiously, but decided not to question it.

"How long has it been since you were home?" She asked instead.

"Oh, only about six months or so." He said easily. "It was still winter."

As they passed by the guard post one of the soldiers noticed them and saluted her. Artair winced at the attention.

"Commander." The soldier greeted, causing the other soldiers with him to perk up.

"Relax." She said as she returned the salute. "I'm not even your garrison." Then she decided to annoy her traveling companion. "I'm from the Riverland Garrison traveling with the second prince here." She gestured at Artair, who fought not to look upset as he showed them the ring dangling from his neck. If the soldiers had perked up before, now they were standing practically ramrod straight. "We've sent message ahead, we need to report in."

The soldier nearest the guard post pulled up their list of orders and checked. A moment later he jogged over and showed the first soldier. "Please continue with haste commander." The young orc said, then turned to Artair. "Your highness."

"Yes yes." Artair said in return. "Let's go SUB-commander." He said venomously.

And the two of them continued on toward the center of the capital.

\----------

Samantha Jenkins sat in a room with Dr. Munro on one side and the lawyer Richard Fletcher on the other. Across from them sat Major Marcus Dennis and a JAG officer, also a Major, by the name of Ariel Friedmann. On the table between them was a voice recorder with a three hundred sixty degree camera on a little pod.

"Just to make sure." Major Friedmann said. "Corporal Jenkins you are aware that declining medical care from our military facilities in favor of a civilian facility will NOT be covered by your Tricare Alpha coverage. Additionally; any lasting injuries or trauma from your condition that may linger beyond your current treatment will NOT be applicable to any disability percentage you receive from the VA upon separating your term of service, should you choose to separate from service instead of re-upping or retiring?"

"I do." She replied meekly.

"Please speak up Corporal Jenkins." The JAG officer said. "For the recorder."

She leaned forward a bit, doing what she could NOT to pay attention to the slightly lengthened snout that she could see in the warped reflection of the camera ball.

"I do." She said louder.

"And you do understand that you will still be required to check in with your chain of command on a daily basis, currently reassigned to the temporary garrison that's been set up to oversee the recovery of the nearby base. For now that will simply require a phone call from one of the hospital land line phones. Though, once you are released from your extended care and observation you will be required to report. In person and in uniform as best as you are capable with your current physiological limitations."

She leaned forward again. "I do." She said.

"For the record." Major Friedmann continued. "You do this despite the United States Military's belief that it is the best suited option for your medical care."

"I do." She said again

Friedmann nodded curtly. "Well then, all that cleared up, here are some papers to sign remanding you to the care of the Neil S. Carter Medical center and its staff until you are considered to be physically and psychologically stable." She said as she slid a small stack of papers across the table.

Before Samantha could reach for them, Fletcher intercepted them and began scanning through them.

Samantha peered over at the papers and was surprised at how quickly he turned the pages on the stack. The font was incredibly small. Not to the point of being unreadable. But an older person would definitely need reading glasses.

The two Majors sat with different levels of patience. Major Friedmann was as still and unperturbed as if she was made of stone. Dennis on the other hand, sighed and began to fidget.

Fletcher didn't so much as acknowledge either of them as he read over the documents. Some twenty, awkward, minutes later he slid the papers to Samantha.

"It's about as legitimate as it can be considering the situation." He said with a soft smile that made Samantha glad she was wearing her hood. "You can sign it if you want Ms. Jenkins."

She nodded and picked up the pen that was in front of her and signed and initialed where the hospital lawyer indicated.

Several minutes later she slid the papers back across to the JAG lawyer who stood up and nodded.

"We'll have copies dropped off in the morning." She said.

"Actually we can get some made on your way out." Fletcher said as he also stood up. "The desk outside has a scanner."

Friedmann didn't even flinch at the statement.

"Come Samantha." Dr. Munro said as she laid a hand over Samantha's. "Let's get you back to your room."

She nodded and let the little old lady lead her out of the room.

"Did you notice..." Doctor Munro began once they got out of ear shot of the departing soldiers and the hospital lawyer. "that they didn't ONCE mention anything about curing you?"

And now that the doctor mentioned it, Samantha HADN'T heard the military lawyer mention it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/107sbfq/wait_is_this_just_gate_291/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (289/?)

Previous

Writer's note: For all his good qualities, James is still a sarcastic ass about some things.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were having lunch, discussing the upcoming wedding, when Vickers caught up with them.

"-so yes, Father has already arranged the invitations. From what I understand my sister is quite cross with him about it. Something about the tides or something." Amina said before taking a sip from her tea cup.

Vickers plopped down on one of the spare seats at the table they were sitting at.

"Sup Vickers?" James asked curiously as he recovered the piece of smeplie that the unexpected arrival had shocked out of his hand. "Everything good?"

"Yeah man." Vickers said as he reached over and snagged a grape off of James's plate, prompting a short lived scowl. "Just stopped by to let you know that I'm gonna be unavailable for a few days starting on..." He checked his watch to see what day it was back on Earth. "Thursday."

"Yeah?" James asked curiously. "What's going on?"

"I've got a little personal thing going on." Vickers said simply. "Take a few days, five tops, and then I'll be back. Should help out in any future craziness."

James cocked an eyebrow. "Uuuuh... okay?" He said uncertainly. "Seriously though. What's going on?"

"This is about Atrafar isn't it?" Amina said with a sly grin. "Ooh is she accompanying you to the wedding?"

Vickers did what he could NOT to let his surprise show.

James looked at her in confusion. "Atrafar's here?" He asked. "Are the Lunar Council coming to the wedding?"

Amina shrugged. "The council typically doesn't care for royal affairs." She said. "But maybe Vickers decided to take their relationship to the next level."

"Hey congrats man." James said. "That's a big step. I thought most furries didn't like their coworkers knowing about that part of their lives."

Vickers ran his hands over his face in exasperation.

"Maybe she's pregnant." Amina mused. "It's incredibly rare for one of the were-folk to get pregnant from a non-were. But it is possible."

James's eyes widened. "Duuuude!" He exclaimed. "Is she pregnant?!?!"

"What?" Vickers asked in surprise. "No! At least I don't think so." Then he muttered a bit to himself. "She didn't look pregnant."

"You've already seen her?" James asked. "Damn. You are on top of it dude. Literally and figuratively." He writhed in his chair a bit as he mocked a hip thrust without standing up.

"Look." Vickers interrupted. "It's not about Atrafar it's-"

"So you can be converted into one of the were-folk?" Amina asked.

Vickers jaw dropped.

"How did?" He began.

"Please." Amina said flatly. "The Council sends the list of accepted applicants to the king and to the Mayors of the towns they they live in. Just in case anything goes wrong. After all a rampaging, overwhelmed, werewolf or were-bear or whatever is a dangerous thing." She gestured out at the city below. "Especially in a city like this."

"So you knew I applied?" He asked.

"Nah man." James said as he swallowed a bit of toast. "We found out when the application was accepted. Or, you know, Amina did."

"I was incredibly surprised when I read the list and saw your name on there." She admitted. "Though I do suppose it makes sense. And I can't imagine how much more dangerous you'll be with whatever form you choose."

"You're..... " Vickers began, looking at James. "cool with this?" Vickers asked uncertainly.

James shrugged. "Dude, you're a grown ass man. And older than me by what.... almost ten years?" Vickers nodded and see-sawed his hand a bit. "And I assume you thought this through?"

Vickers shrugged. "Mostly." He said. "Just thinking of what subspecies to pick."

"You know it's permanent right?" Amina asked.

Vickers nodded. "Yeah. I know." He answered. "Keep getting reminded of that every step of the way."

James sipped from the cup of coffee in front of him. Then sat back.

"If you think this is the best move." He shrugged. "Then it's the best move."

"That easy?" The SEAL asked, surprised at the immediate approval.

"Hey." James said. "Remember that part where you almost blew yourself up into little bits trying to save my ass?"

Vickers nodded. "Wasn't the original plan." He said.

"And remember how I IMMEDIATELY managed to save your ass from THAT?"

Vickers sighed. "Yeah." He admitted.

"Well." James began. "I figure we can probably trust each other with decisions like this. Yeah?"

Vickers didn't let it show, but he was silently taken aback at the statement of trust.

"Uh... yeah." He replied.

"Then get your furry on dude." James said before sipping some more coffee. "And invite Atrafar to the damn wedding. You're the flower girl after all."

"I.... am not.... EITHER.... of those things." Vickers said with a menacing tone in his voice.

Instead of acknowledging the angry tone James turned to Amina, who was still grinning.

"Hon." He said with a hand over hers. "We might need to put some kibble out for the reception."

Vickers simply stood up, knocking over his chair in the process, and stormed away.

"He's very fun to mess with." Amina said after the door to the balcony closed.

"He is isn't he?" James replied. "Wonder why he didn't tell us sooner?"

"He's not very open with his emotions." Amina said simply. "Well, minus anger anyways."

"Well... A wagging tail should help with that somewhat." James said before picking up another piece of smeplie and dipping it in salt.

\--------------------------

Navarro looked out from under the hole-ridden tin roof outside the door and into the damp cold of what he thought might have been North Dakota. Though, with how far they had run he wouldn't have been surprised if they'd made it to Canada. But he couldn't be sure. Sturgis had been the farthest north he'd ever been in his life until now, and he'd been brought there as a prisoner with no knowledge of where he was until they'd had made their bloody escape.

Their once large group been forced to split up yet again on the way north. The helicopters and drones flying over head had been far too good at tracking them through the woods and hills. And their group had only managed to break away after entering a national park of some kind.

Now they were in some kind of old warehouse that looked like it had been built some time in the early 1900's.

They were tired.

They were cold.

And they were hungrier than Navarro had ever been in his life.

And to make matters worse, they were all but human again. All the gifts that their "Goddess" had bestowed upon them when they'd transformed were vastly reduced. They'd lost their speed, strength, size, and senses. In fact, he felt almost as if he'd never changed at all. Only minor things marked him as still being a wolf; points on his ears, longer canines, sharp nails, and feet that were about ten sizes too large.

An older man, wearing the tattered remnants of a leather biker jacket, placed a hand on his shoulder breaking him out of his thoughts.

Navarro looked into the man's golden eyes for a moment, then nodded and walked inside.

His watch was over. Now it was Reynolds' turn. The old man had been in charge of one of the numerous shops in Sturgis that had catered to the bikers that he very much looked like. He'd been out grabbing groceries when the outbreak had occurred. Navarro suspected that his joining the group had something to do with all the Norse style tattoos across his arms and neck. But he hadn't asked.

Nobody in the group made a habit of digging too deeply into anyone else's life, or their reason for following the guidance of their goddess.

Navarro suspected that her recent, and ongoing, silence was going to change that fact soon enough.

As he neared the sleeping members of the pack, one of them stirred and lifted the bit of ratty tarp that was functioning as a blanket, and beckoned him over.

He looked around for a moment, as if searching for something else to use for warmth. But eventually he simply slid into the pile of bodies and curled the edge of the tarp underneath him.

He went to sleep uneasily, and wondering if they were going to receive any more guidance.

And he feared that if the goddess didn't speak again soon, he might be the only one who could give them any.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zzcmec/wait_is_this_just_gate_290/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (289/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: For all his good qualities, James is still a sarcastic ass about some things.

Enjoy.

\~

James and Amina were having lunch, discussing the upcoming wedding, when Vickers caught up with them.

"-so yes, Father has already arranged the invitations. From what I understand my sister is quite cross with him about it. Something about the tides or something." Amina said before taking a sip from her tea cup.

Vickers plopped down on one of the spare seats at the table they were sitting at.

"Sup Vickers?" James asked curiously as he recovered the piece of smeplie that the unexpected arrival had shocked out of his hand. "Everything good?"

"Yeah man." Vickers said as he reached over and snagged a grape off of James's plate, prompting a short lived scowl. "Just stopped by to let you know that I'm gonna be unavailable for a few days starting on..." He checked his watch to see what day it was back on Earth. "Thursday."

"Yeah?" James asked curiously. "What's going on?"

"I've got a little personal thing going on." Vickers said simply. "Take a few days, five tops, and then I'll be back. Should help out in any future craziness."

James cocked an eyebrow. "Uuuuh... okay?" He said uncertainly. "Seriously though. What's going on?"

"This is about Atrafar isn't it?" Amina said with a sly grin. "Ooh is she accompanying you to the wedding?"

Vickers did what he could NOT to let his surprise show.

James looked at her in confusion. "Atrafar's here?" He asked. "Are the Lunar Council coming to the wedding?"

Amina shrugged. "The council typically doesn't care for royal affairs." She said. "But maybe Vickers decided to take their relationship to the next level."

"Hey congrats man." James said. "That's a big step. I thought most furries didn't like their coworkers knowing about that part of their lives."

Vickers ran his hands over his face in exasperation.

"Maybe she's pregnant." Amina mused. "It's incredibly rare for one of the were-folk to get pregnant from a non-were. But it is possible."

James's eyes widened. "Duuuude!" He exclaimed. "Is she pregnant?!?!"

"What?" Vickers asked in surprise. "No! At least I don't think so." Then he muttered a bit to himself. "She didn't look pregnant."

"You've already seen her?" James asked. "Damn. You are on top of it dude. Literally and figuratively." He writhed in his chair a bit as he mocked a hip thrust without standing up.

"Look." Vickers interrupted. "It's not about Atrafar it's-"

"So you can be converted into one of the were-folk?" Amina asked.

Vickers jaw dropped.

"How did?" He began.

"Please." Amina said flatly. "The Council sends the list of accepted applicants to the king and to the Mayors of the towns they they live in. Just in case anything goes wrong. After all a rampaging, overwhelmed, werewolf or were-bear or whatever is a dangerous thing." She gestured out at the city below. "Especially in a city like this."

"So you knew I applied?" He asked.

"Nah man." James said as he swallowed a bit of toast. "We found out when the application was accepted. Or, you know, Amina did."

"I was incredibly surprised when I read the list and saw your name on there." She admitted. "Though I do suppose it makes sense. And I can't imagine how much more dangerous you'll be with whatever form you choose."

"You're..... " Vickers began, looking at James. "cool with this?" Vickers asked uncertainly.

James shrugged. "Dude, you're a grown ass man. And older than me by what.... almost ten years?" Vickers nodded and see-sawed his hand a bit. "And I assume you thought this through?"

Vickers shrugged. "Mostly." He said. "Just thinking of what subspecies to pick."

"You know it's permanent right?" Amina asked.

Vickers nodded. "Yeah. I know." He answered. "Keep getting reminded of that every step of the way."

James sipped from the cup of coffee in front of him. Then sat back.

"If you think this is the best move." He shrugged. "Then it's the best move."

"That easy?" The SEAL asked, surprised at the immediate approval.

"Hey." James said. "Remember that part where you almost blew yourself up into little bits trying to save my ass?"

Vickers nodded. "Wasn't the original plan." He said.

"And remember how I IMMEDIATELY managed to save your ass from THAT?"

Vickers sighed. "Yeah." He admitted.

"Well." James began. "I figure we can probably trust each other with decisions like this. Yeah?"

Vickers didn't let it show, but he was silently taken aback at the statement of trust.

"Uh... yeah." He replied.

"Then get your furry on dude." James said before sipping some more coffee. "And invite Atrafar to the damn wedding. You're the flower girl after all."

"I.... am not.... EITHER.... of those things." Vickers said with a menacing tone in his voice.

Instead of acknowledging the angry tone James turned to Amina, who was still grinning.

"Hon." He said with a hand over hers. "We might need to put some kibble out for the reception."

Vickers simply stood up, knocking over his chair in the process, and stormed away.

"He's very fun to mess with." Amina said after the door to the balcony closed.

"He is isn't he?" James replied. "Wonder why he didn't tell us sooner?"

"He's not very open with his emotions." Amina said simply. "Well, minus anger anyways."

"Well... A wagging tail should help with that somewhat." James said before picking up another piece of smeplie and dipping it in salt.

\--------------------------

Navarro looked out from under the hole-ridden tin roof outside the door and into the damp cold of what he thought might have been North Dakota. Though, with how far they had run he wouldn't have been surprised if they'd made it to Canada. But he couldn't be sure. Sturgis had been the farthest north he'd ever been in his life until now, and he'd been brought there as a prisoner with no knowledge of where he was until they'd had made their bloody escape.

Their once large group been forced to split up yet again on the way north. The helicopters and drones flying over head had been far too good at tracking them through the woods and hills. And their group had only managed to break away after entering a national park of some kind.

Now they were in some kind of old warehouse that looked like it had been built some time in the early 1900's.

They were tired.

They were cold.

And they were hungrier than Navarro had ever been in his life.

And to make matters worse, they were all but human again. All the gifts that their "Goddess" had bestowed upon them when they'd transformed were vastly reduced. They'd lost their speed, strength, size, and senses. In fact, he felt almost as if he'd never changed at all. Only minor things marked him as still being a wolf; points on his ears, longer canines, sharp nails, and feet that were about ten sizes too large.

An older man, wearing the tattered remnants of a leather biker jacket, placed a hand on his shoulder breaking him out of his thoughts.

Navarro looked into the man's golden eyes for a moment, then nodded and walked inside.

His watch was over. Now it was Reynolds' turn. The old man had been in charge of one of the numerous shops in Sturgis that had catered to the bikers that he very much looked like. He'd been out grabbing groceries when the outbreak had occurred. Navarro suspected that his joining the group had something to do with all the Norse style tattoos across his arms and neck. But he hadn't asked.

Nobody in the group made a habit of digging too deeply into anyone else's life, or their reason for following the guidance of their goddess.

Navarro suspected that her recent, and ongoing, silence was going to change that fact soon enough.

As he neared the sleeping members of the pack, one of them stirred and lifted the bit of ratty tarp that was functioning as a blanket, and beckoned him over.

He looked around for a moment, as if searching for something else to use for warmth. But eventually he simply slid into the pile of bodies and curled the edge of the tarp underneath him.

He went to sleep uneasily, and wondering if they were going to receive any more guidance.

And he feared that if the goddess didn't speak again soon, he might be the only one who could give them any.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zzckqh/wait_is_this_just_gate_290/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (288/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Yeah. Jojo is taking big bro's advice. We'll check in on that tomorrow.

Also, the second part is translated into English for the sake of ease of writing. I've said it before and I'll say it again. I aint going full Tolkien on a made up language.

And yeah, I didn't forget that story line in the last section. It just had to be tabled for a bit in favor of cooler shit that I wanted to write.

Enjoy.

\~

James left Veliry's studio with a smile on his face.

The news about his sword was surprising, to be sure, but it wasn't bad news and didn't seem to have any negative connotations. So he'd simply roll with that until there was a reason not to. After all, it had performed beautifully during the battle in the desert.

What had really made him happy was the success of the fondue machine that Veliry had helped him make. She had been surprised at how well he had enchanted the two horns of brass that were inserted into the base of the matching bowl. They'd filled the bowl with some water and it had circulated and warmed it almost perfectly. James had no doubt that a bit of chocolate and oil would provide the perfect treat for the wedding.

He couldn't wait to see the looks of awe on the guests once they saw it.

He paused as he had the thought.

How many guests does a royal wedding have? He wondered. Do we need to make and send invitations?

As a result of the sudden concern he didn't notice his little brother passing by him. And Joey didn't make any effort to be noticed by his distracted older brother as he approached the door to Veliry's lab.

"Good-" The door began before Joey signaled it with a finger over his lips.

The door's eyes blinked, then it retracted, and Joey walked in.

\----------

Vickers looked over the contents of the scroll as he sat in his room, considering the options entailed.

>Enclosed are the six types of were-folk the Lunar Council has dispatched for the sake of your willing conversion. Details of their species type and potential concerns to consider before your choice are as follows.

1: Were-wolf- Lupine nature. Pack mentality. Vastly enhanced senses. Difficult to control instincts. Elongated limbs and enlarged musculature that will require tailored clothing.

2: Were-fox- Thick fur (typically changes color with season). Vastly enhanced senses. Nocturnal tendencies. Difficulty gaining weight. Difficult to control instincts.

3: Were-jaguar- Vastly enhanced bite strength. Nocturnal tendencies. Preference for warmer climates. Vastly enhanced agility. Almost entirely carnivorous diet.

4: Were-squirrel- Prey instincts. Largely vegetarian diet with focus on nuts and berries. Thick fur and large tail. Enhanced hearing. Extreme climbing abilities. Shortened stature.

5: Were-bear- Vastly enhanced strength. Massive dietary requirements. Borderline unavoidable desire to sleep during winter, though not full hibernation levels. Tendency towards aggression. Will require complete overhaul of wardrobe.

6: Were-eagle- Vastly enhanced senses of sight and smell. Limited flight capabilities. Entirely carnivorous diet. Loss of weight. Easily broken bones. Change in personal hygiene requirements. Required tailoring of clothes based on thickness of plumage. WARNING: Complete restructure of bowels and excretion orifices that also results in restructuring of genitalia.

Should you find none of these options acceptable, let the representatives present know and a request for different conversion options shall be considered and dispatched at first convenience.

Additionally, each representative present has knowledge of businesses and local were-folk who will aide in your efforts to adjust to your new lifestyle after conversion has taken place. These representatives will also inform you of any cultural standards that are to be considered for each of their sub-types. Please take these to heart and ask of them any questions you desire answers for.

And remember, once conversion has taken place it is permanent.

Vickers looked over the last option with a confused and mildly curious expression on his face.

The warning in question meant that that option was completely off the table. But he couldn't help but wonder at what it meant. Though he knew enough about bird anatomy to have an idea.

The thought made him shudder and wonder why people would even choose that option.

He also thought of all the people he'd seen while he'd accompanied Choi and the princess to the Lunar Council city for the internment of their friend. He'd seen plenty of almost all of them, though he couldn't remember off the top of his head whether or not he'd seen any of the bears. Though it had still been cold at the time. Maybe they'd all been asleep.

He had three more days to figure out which of the five options he wanted.

\----------Ambassador Werner lay on the table as Mrs. DeLaRosa and several of the nurses examined her with eyes glowing in different colors. Mrs. DeLaRosa read from the book that had been sent over from Earth to the Petravian healers. With them was the doctor from the Desert FOB, who had been released on a trial period due to her useful medical skills and at the request of Captain Choi.

Even with her years of training to hide her emotions when needed, Werner couldn't help but feel nervous as the small cluster of medical personnel inspected her brain with their magic.

This is your best chance. She told herself. Let them try. This is better than YOU ever trying to guide them on this disease.

She swallowed nervously and had to struggle with a lock-up in her throat. Those had become increasingly common over the last year.

"Wow." The Earth Doctor said as she looked through a pair of goggles with green tinted lenses on them. "This magic is more incredible than anything any of the camp personnel ever managed. You can actually SEE the blood flow?" She asked one of the healers.

"Come over here Doctor." DeLaRosa said with a gesture. "I can't do it yet. But Healer Farzoon is actually measuring electrical energy paths in the Ambassador's body. That's more important for this, correct?"

The doctor quickly hurried over to where the Nurse guided her. After a moment the doctor gasped in shock.

"Is that a good gasp or bad?" Werner asked, concern evident in her tone.

"It's a surprised one." The doctor admitted. "God, what I would give to have something like this back at my old hospital." She said. "Save a lot of space not needing a full EEG machine or MRI setup." She flicked the lenses on the goggles and they became a light purple on her left eye. She gently grasped the healer's shoulder. "Can you also see... uh.. through... material?"

"I can't." The healer admitted. "But several of the Lead Healers can. It's a difficult skill."

The doctor nodded absently.

The examination ended some ten minutes or so later, each healer writing down detailed reports of the various bodily functions they'd examined with their different magical sights and comparing them to the knowledge that the doctor and nurse had, as well as what was in the medical textbook.

Werner waited with bated breath as they discussed what they'd seen.

Finally the doctor and nurse, as well as the senior healer present, walked over with smiles.

"Good news Ambassador." Said the doctor. "I think... that once Nurse Choi and myself get better acquainted with magic, we should be able to do something about your condition."

"Really?" She asked, not sure if she believed it or not. "You can fix this?"

The doctor's face didn't change from happiness, but it did gain a slight... tempering.

"Well. I don't know about CURING it." She said, and Werner felt her heart drop. "BUT.... I do think we can undo the damage that has been caused so far. And in the future should be able to repeat that process as often as needed to prevent the disease from killing you."

For the first time in almost eight years, Werner felt genuine hope about her condition.

"So.... you can.... fix me?" She asked nervously. "Reset my brain back to the way it was? Back... before I had any symptoms?"

The doctor nodded, and the nurse see-sawed her hand a bit.

"Yes and no." Said the doctor. "It's not so much resetting it. We'd be working with a mage that... um..." She turned to the healer. "How did you explain it?"

The healer smiled. "A memory mage." She said. "They will help us maintain your mind's knowledge and memory while we reconstruct the damaged.... New-Rons?" She said hesitantly.

"Neurons, yes." The doctor confirmed. "Anyways. We should be able to reverse the damage. Then, whenever your symptoms return we should be able to simply.... do it again. We'll have to write down the whole process though, since that would likely take years. Or you know, ideally it would anyways."

Werner thought of the countless, vacuum packed and UV shielded packs of pills she had with her in her room, that she had to take every day just to combat the symptoms. The ones she had taken for years in increasingly strong doses.

The thought of not needing them, even if only temporarily, brought tears to her eyes.

"How.... How soon can we do this?" She asked.

The three people in front of her looked at each other for a moment.

"As soon as we get trained up enough." Nurse DeLaRosa said with a reassuring hand on Werner's shoulder.

She gulped. "Can you maybe take some night courses or something?" She asked with a laugh.

The doctor smiled. "To help a patient?" She asked. "Gladly."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zyjced/wait_is_this_just_gate_289/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (288/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Yeah. Jojo is taking big bro's advice. We'll check in on that tomorrow.

Also, the second part is translated into English for the sake of ease of writing. I've said it before and I'll say it again. I aint going full Tolkien on a made up language.

And yeah, I didn't forget that story line in the last section. It just had to be tabled for a bit in favor of cooler shit that I wanted to write.

Enjoy.

\~

James left Veliry's studio with a smile on his face.

The news about his sword was surprising, to be sure, but it wasn't bad news and didn't seem to have any negative connotations. So he'd simply roll with that until there was a reason not to. After all, it had performed beautifully during the battle in the desert.

What had really made him happy was the success of the fondue machine that Veliry had helped him make. She had been surprised at how well he had enchanted the two horns of brass that were inserted into the base of the matching bowl. They'd filled the bowl with some water and it had circulated and warmed it almost perfectly. James had no doubt that a bit of chocolate and oil would provide the perfect treat for the wedding.

He couldn't wait to see the looks of awe on the guests once they saw it.

He paused as he had the thought.

How many guests does a royal wedding have? He wondered. Do we need to make and send invitations?

As a result of the sudden concern he didn't notice his little brother passing by him. And Joey didn't make any effort to be noticed by his distracted older brother as he approached the door to Veliry's lab.

"Good-" The door began before Joey signaled it with a finger over his lips.

The door's eyes blinked, then it retracted, and Joey walked in.

\-------------------

Vickers looked over the contents of the scroll as he sat in his room, considering the options entailed.

>Enclosed are the six types of were-folk the Lunar Council has dispatched for the sake of your willing conversion. Details of their species type and potential concerns to consider before your choice are as follows.
>
>1: Were-wolf- Lupine nature. Pack mentality. Vastly enhanced senses. Difficult to control instincts. Elongated limbs and enlarged musculature that will require tailored clothing.
>
>2: Were-fox- Thick fur (typically changes color with season). Vastly enhanced senses. Nocturnal tendencies. Difficulty gaining weight. Difficult to control instincts.
>
>3: Were-jaguar- Vastly enhanced bite strength. Nocturnal tendencies. Preference for warmer climates. Vastly enhanced agility. Almost entirely carnivorous diet.
>
>4: Were-squirrel- Prey instincts. Largely vegetarian diet with focus on nuts and berries. Thick fur and large tail. Enhanced hearing. Extreme climbing abilities. Shortened stature.
>
>5: Were-bear- Vastly enhanced strength. Massive dietary requirements. Borderline unavoidable desire to sleep during winter, though not full hibernation levels. Tendency towards aggression. Will require complete overhaul of wardrobe.
>
>6: Were-eagle- Vastly enhanced senses of sight and smell. Limited flight capabilities. Entirely carnivorous diet. Loss of weight. Easily broken bones. Change in personal hygiene requirements. Required tailoring of clothes based on thickness of plumage. WARNING: Complete restructure of bowels and excretion orifices that also results in restructuring of genitalia.
>
>Should you find none of these options acceptable, let the representatives present know and a request for different conversion options shall be considered and dispatched at first convenience.
>

>Additionally, each representative present has knowledge of businesses and local were-folk who will aide in your efforts to adjust to your new lifestyle after conversion has taken place. These representatives will also inform you of any cultural standards that are to be considered for each of their sub-types. Please take these to heart and ask of them any questions you desire answers for.
>
>And remember, once conversion has taken place it is permanent.

Vickers looked over the last option with a confused and mildly curious expression on his face.

The warning in question meant that that option was completely off the table. But he couldn't help but wonder at what it meant. Though he knew enough about bird anatomy to have an idea.

The thought made him shudder and wonder why people would even choose that option.

He also thought of all the people he'd seen while he'd accompanied Choi and the princess to the Lunar Council city for the internment of their friend. He'd seen plenty of almost all of them, though he couldn't remember off the top of his head whether or not he'd seen any of the bears. Though it had still been cold at the time. Maybe they'd all been asleep.

He had three more days to figure out which of the five options he wanted.

\---------------------------Ambassador Werner lay on the table as Mrs. DeLaRosa and several of the nurses examined her with eyes glowing in different colors. Mrs. DeLaRosa read from the book that had been sent over from Earth to the Petravian healers. With them was the doctor from the Desert FOB, who had been released on a trial period due to her useful medical skills and at the request of Captain Choi.

Even with her years of training to hide her emotions when needed, Werner couldn't help but feel nervous as the small cluster of medical personnel inspected her brain with their magic.

This is your best chance. She told herself. Let them try. This is better than YOU ever trying to guide them on this disease.

She swallowed nervously and had to struggle with a lock-up in her throat. Those had become increasingly common over the last year.

"Wow." The Earth Doctor said as she looked through a pair of goggles with green tinted lenses on them. "This magic is more incredible than anything any of the camp personnel ever managed. You can actually SEE the blood flow?" She asked one of the healers.

"Come over here Doctor." DeLaRosa said with a gesture. "I can't do it yet. But Healer Farzoon is actually measuring electrical energy paths in the Ambassador's body. That's more important for this, correct?"

The doctor quickly hurried over to where the Nurse guided her. After a moment the doctor gasped in shock.

"Is that a good gasp or bad?" Werner asked, concern evident in her tone.

"It's a surprised one." The doctor admitted. "God, what I would give to have something like this back at my old hospital." She said. "Save a lot of space not needing a full EEG machine or MRI setup." She flicked the lenses on the goggles and they became a light purple on her left eye. She gently grasped the healer's shoulder. "Can you also see... uh.. through... material?"

"I can't." The healer admitted. "But several of the Lead Healers can. It's a difficult skill."

The doctor nodded absently.

The examination ended some ten minutes or so later, each healer writing down detailed reports of the various bodily functions they'd examined with their different magical sights and comparing them to the knowledge that the doctor and nurse had, as well as what was in the medical textbook.

Werner waited with bated breath as they discussed what they'd seen.

Finally the doctor and nurse, as well as the senior healer present, walked over with smiles.

"Good news Ambassador." Said the doctor. "I think... that once Nurse Choi and myself get better acquainted with magic, we should be able to do something about your condition."

"Really?" She asked, not sure if she believed it or not. "You can fix this?"

The doctor's face didn't change from happiness, but it did gain a slight... tempering.

"Well. I don't know about CURING it." She said, and Werner felt her heart drop. "BUT.... I do think we can undo the damage that has been caused so far. And in the future should be able to repeat that process as often as needed to prevent the disease from killing you."

For the first time in almost eight years, Werner felt genuine hope about her condition.

"So.... you can.... fix me?" She asked nervously. "Reset my brain back to the way it was? Back... before I had any symptoms?"

The doctor nodded, and the nurse see-sawed her hand a bit.

"Yes and no." Said the doctor. "It's not so much resetting it. We'd be working with a mage that... um..." She turned to the healer. "How did you explain it?"

The healer smiled. "A memory mage." She said. "They will help us maintain your mind's knowledge and memory while we reconstruct the damaged.... New-Rons?" She said hesitantly.

"Neurons, yes." The doctor confirmed. "Anyways. We should be able to reverse the damage. Then, whenever your symptoms return we should be able to simply.... do it again. We'll have to write down the whole process though, since that would likely take years. Or you know, ideally it would anyways."

Werner thought of the countless, vacuum packed and UV shielded packs of pills she had with her in her room, that she had to take every day just to combat the symptoms. The ones she had taken for years in increasingly strong doses.

The thought of not needing them, even if only temporarily, brought tears to her eyes.

"How.... How soon can we do this?" She asked.

The three people in front of her looked at each other for a moment.

"As soon as we get trained up enough." Nurse DeLaRosa said with a reassuring hand on Werner's shoulder.

She gulped. "Can you maybe take some night courses or something?" She asked with a laugh.

The doctor smiled. "To help a patient?" She asked. "Gladly."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zyjaw7/wait_is_this_just_gate_289/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (287/?)

Previous

Writer's note: STORY..... PROGRESSION!!!!

Idk. i don't really have one today. Hope everyone had a good christmas (or whatever) break.

Enjoy.

*\~\~\~

hands passed over each of them. "It's an imprint of your soul, intertwined with the remnant of the original creator's imprint."

"Aaaaand... that's a bad thing?" James asked. "I mean, it's just an imprint. Not my ACTUAL soul right?"

"Well.... no..." She admitted. "But remember how I explained that weapons of this quality are products of MASTER capability both for forging the base weapon AND enchanting it?"

"Yeah." James recalled. "That's why I was surprised we got it to work again."

"But you've also admitted that it works differently now? Right?" She asked.

"Yeah. It's more aggressive now." He admitted. "And it doesn't just go after magical attacks now."

"That's because when you rebuilt it you were in an incredibly emotional state." She said. "Couple that with being helped by a skilled Dark Elf blacksmith, and quenching it with the milk of a spider queen. Then enchanting it with the help of a fortress town Dwelf enchanter." She shook her head a bit. "All that together and you effectively master crafted a new sword out of an already master crafted relic."

James considered it. He had known even at the time that the successful reconstruction had been almost impossible. But now that it was lain out like that, he had to admit that it was an impressive effort.

"Doubt you'd ever be able to recreate anything like this ever again." Veliry muttered, more to herself than to him.

"Is there a downside to this?" James wondered.

Veliry snapped out of her thoughts. "Um. No, not really." She said as she continued thinking. "But you'll be the only person who can use it effectively. At least until you die some day."

"That's all?" He asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "I was mostly just surprised at the quality of the enchantment on this. But really it's just a weapon that will only work at its best for you and only you."

"Oh..." He said hesitantly. "Well that's cool I guess. Now how about the fondue machine?"

"Uh.... sure... I have the pieces in the back room." She said awkwardly.

\----------

"Good afternoon Sebastian." Atrafar said as she walked through the doors and into the castle.

"Atrafar." He greeted in return. Word of her party reaching the capital had travelled faster than the actual party had. "You're earlier than expected."

"Weather was good." She replied. "Are you certain about this?"

"Nope." He said simply. "But things keep getting crazier and crazier. Need the boost."

She cocked an eyebrow as a look of upset appeared on her face.

"That the wrong answer?" He asked.

"This isn't just.... gaining power." She said with reproach. "Sebastian, this is going to completely alter your life."

Vickers looked around at the room around them.

"Sooooo.... just like every piece of new information I learn in this world?" He asked. "Cause.... yeah. That's been everything here."

She tilted her head. "Vickers. You don't seem to be understanding me." She said sternly. "You're not going to be HUMAN... after this." She said, emphasizing the word human slowly. "You're about to become an entirely different kind of creature. Complete with a new body and entirely new senses and abilities." She looked away, as if remembering something painful. "New instincts."

"Yeah well, Military, War, SEALS, this place, Magic." He said. Then he looked away, remembering his own pains. "Treason?..... What's one more paradigm shift?" He asked. "I'll do what I always do; keep going."

Atrafar looked at him curiously. Then simply nodded.

"We've secured a building from the Royal Guard." She said simply. "It's being prepared as we speak. We should be able to perform the conversion in about two days." She handed him a scroll with the lunar council's seal. "Here's a list of the people we've brought with us and the types of were-folk they are. Prepare yourself and your affairs. Meet us there on dawn of the third day. That will be your last chance to back out." Then she simply turned to walk away.

"That's it?" He asked. Surprised at the sudden departure.

She turned back, eyebrow cocked again. "Were you expecting more?" She asked. "I'm here on official council business."

"I mean. The council made it clear that you took a leave of absence to come here." He replied.

She nodded affirmative. "True." She replied. "But that's only AFTER you've been turned. To aide in your safe transition to a new lifestyle.

Until then I'm still on duty." She gestured at the white and green trimmed armor she was wearing.

"Fair enough." He said, holding up the scroll. "Well than, see you in a few days."

She nodded, then turned and walked away.

Vickers pursed his lips as he watched her depart.

"Why does that kinda sting?" He asked himself quietly.

He didn't notice the wolf's ear twitch a bit as he turned around.

\---------------

Samantha sat in her normal room once again wearing the large hoodie and sweats. Doctor Munro sat in the small chair off in the corner.

Major Marcus Dennis stood next to the bed checking the readouts on her charts.

"Still look human." He said. "Feet are still a bit long. Pointed ears and elongated canines. But other than that, looking fairly normal. Vitals are a bit concerning, but not bad."

Samantha squirmed a bit. She didn't want to mention that her ears were actually MORE pointed than they had been only a few days before. Same for her canines and feet. And that was to say nothing of her hands or the hair hiding underneath her clothes.

"How do you feel?" He asked. It had only taken about thirty minutes of awkwardly silent chart reading and light examination for him to ask that question. Dr. Munro huffed at the poor bedside manner.

Samantha just shrugged. She didn't want to admit that the slow transformation BACK into a wolf had caused her a lot of stress as she'd begun to watch her humanity fade again.

"I'm okay I guess." She said instead.

She didn't see Dr. Munro bristle uncomfortably behind her.

"Good." The Major replied. "Well than, we'll get you transferred over to the AMH over in Fort Rodriguez Texas. We should be able to get you on a plane tonight."

"What?" She asked.

"We're gonna get you to Fort Rodriguez." He said again. ""That way we can see about getting you fixed back up and on your feet."

"Uh. No." Dr. Munro cut in. "I don't think so."

The Major looked over at the unexpected interruption. "She's military personnel, doctor. She'll be taken care of at a military facility."

"She's not stable yet." Dr. Munro replied. "She's only just come to terms with her transformation. She's still in an incredibly vulnerable state."

"Well. We have plenty of psychiatrists." The Major said.

"No, she is not yet capable of being moved from here." Dr. Munro countered. "Our hospital director will not sign off on a transfer until you can prove beyond reasonable doubt that your facility can provide better care for her current condition better than this one can."

"Already done." Major Dennis replied without hesitation. "Paperwork is already being finalized upstairs."

"She also needs to consent." Dr. Munro added. "Corporal Jenkins do you consent to this transfer?"

Samantha wanted to curl into a ball and shrink out of existence.

Then there was a knock on the door.

Before any of them could answer it cracked a bit.

"Dr. Munro?" A young nurse asked. "Miss Jenkins? One of the hospital lawyers is here for you."

"Please come in." Munro said eagerly.

The nurse nodded and opened the door all the way. A tall, handsome, man in a pair of grey slacks and a black dress shirt walked in.

"Hi." He said awkwardly. "I'm Richard Fletcher. I was told there were some questions about patient transfer?"

Dr. Munro couldn't help but notice that Samantha perked up at the sight of the young lawyer.

That might help. She thought.

"Please come in Mister Fletcher." She said. "Good to see you again."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zxpccg/wait_is_this_just_gate_288/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (287/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: STORY..... PROGRESSION!!!!

Idk. i don't really have one today. Hope everyone had a good christmas (or whatever) break.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

"So..... my soul's in the sword now?" James asked as he sat, staring at the weapon in question.

"No." Veliry said. "It's not your soul." Her fingertips glowed with a soft violet light as they ran over the side of the blade. the differently colored sections of the blade emitted matching lights as her hands passed over each of them. "It's an imprint of your soul, intertwined with the remnant of the original creator's imprint."

"Aaaaand... that's a bad thing?" James asked. "I mean, it's just an imprint. Not my ACTUAL soul right?"

"Well.... no..." She admitted. "But remember how I explained that weapons of this quality are products of MASTER capability both for forging the base weapon AND enchanting it?"

"Yeah." James recalled. "That's why I was surprised we got it to work again."

"But you've also admitted that it works differently now? Right?" She asked.

"Yeah. It's more aggressive now." He admitted. "And it doesn't just go after magical attacks now."

"That's because when you rebuilt it you were in an incredibly emotional state." She said. "Couple that with being helped by a skilled Dark Elf blacksmith, and quenching it with the milk of a spider queen. Then enchanting it with the help of a fortress town Dwelf enchanter." She shook her head a bit. "All that together and you effectively master crafted a new sword out of an already master crafted relic."

James considered it. He had known even at the time that the successful reconstruction had been almost impossible. But now that it was lain out like that, he had to admit that it was an impressive effort.

"Doubt you'd ever be able to recreate anything like this ever again." Veliry muttered, more to herself than to him.

"Is there a downside to this?" James wondered.

Veliry snapped out of her thoughts. "Um. No, not really." She said as she continued thinking. "But you'll be the only person who can use it effectively. At least until you die some day."

"That's all?" He asked.

"Yeah." She replied. "I was mostly just surprised at the quality of the enchantment on this. But really it's just a weapon that will only work at its best for you and only you."

"Oh..." He said hesitantly. "Well that's cool I guess. Now how about the fondue machine?"

"Uh.... sure... I have the pieces in the back room." She said awkwardly.

\----------

"Good afternoon Sebastian." Atrafar said as she walked through the doors and into the castle.

"Atrafar." He greeted in return. Word of her party reaching the capital had travelled faster than the actual party had. "You're earlier than expected."

"Weather was good." She replied. "Are you certain about this?"

"Nope." He said simply. "But things keep getting crazier and crazier. Need the boost."

She cocked an eyebrow as a look of upset appeared on her face.

"That the wrong answer?" He asked.

"This isn't just.... gaining power." She said with reproach. "Sebastian, this is going to completely alter your life."

Vickers looked around at the room around them.

"Sooooo.... just like every piece of new information I learn in this world?" He asked. "Cause.... yeah. That's been everything here."

She tilted her head. "Vickers. You don't seem to be understanding me." She said sternly. "You're not going to be HUMAN... after this." She said, emphasizing the word human slowly. "You're about to become an entirely different kind of creature. Complete with a new body and entirely new senses and abilities." She looked away, as if remembering something painful. "New instincts."

"Yeah well, Military, War, SEALS, this place, Magic." He said. Then he looked away, remembering his own pains. "Treason?..... What's one more paradigm shift?" He asked. "I'll do what I always do; keep going."

Atrafar looked at him curiously. Then simply nodded.

"We've secured a building from the Royal Guard." She said simply. "It's being prepared as we speak. We should be able to perform the conversion in about two days." She handed him a scroll with the lunar council's seal. "Here's a list of the people we've brought with us and the types of were-folk they are. Prepare yourself and your affairs. Meet us there on dawn of the third day. That will be your last chance to back out." Then she simply turned to walk away.

"That's it?" He asked. Surprised at the sudden departure.

She turned back, eyebrow cocked again. "Were you expecting more?" She asked. "I'm here on official council business."

"I mean. The council made it clear that you took a leave of absence to come here." He replied.

She nodded affirmative. "True." She replied. "But that's only AFTER you've been turned. To aide in your safe transition to a new lifestyle. Until then I'm still on duty." She gestured at the white and green trimmed armor she was wearing.

"Fair enough." He said, holding up the scroll. "Well than, see you in a few days."

She nodded, then turned and walked away.

Vickers pursed his lips as he watched her depart.

"Why does that kinda sting?" He asked himself quietly.

He didn't notice the wolf's ear twitch a bit as he turned around.

\---------------

Samantha sat in her normal room once again wearing the large hoodie and sweats. Doctor Munro sat in the small chair off in the corner.

Major Marcus Dennis stood next to the bed checking the readouts on her charts.

"Still look human." He said. "Feet are still a bit long. Pointed ears and elongated canines. But other than that, looking fairly normal. Vitals are a bit concerning, but not bad."

Samantha squirmed a bit. She didn't want to mention that her ears were actually MORE pointed than they had been only a few days before. Same for her canines and feet. And that was to say nothing of her hands or the hair hiding underneath her clothes.

"How do you feel?" He asked. It had only taken about thirty minutes of awkwardly silent chart reading and light examination for him to ask that question. Dr. Munro huffed at the poor bedside manner.

Samantha just shrugged. She didn't want to admit that the slow transformation BACK into a wolf had caused her a lot of stress as she'd begun to watch her humanity fade again.

"I'm okay I guess." She said instead.

She didn't see Dr. Munro bristle uncomfortably behind her.

"Good." The Major replied. "Well than, we'll get you transferred over to the AMH over in Fort Rodriguez Texas. We should be able to get you on a plane tonight."

"What?" She asked.

"We're gonna get you to Fort Rodriguez." He said again. ""That way we can see about getting you fixed back up and on your feet."

"Uh. No." Dr. Munro cut in. "I don't think so."

The Major looked over at the unexpected interruption. "She's military personnel, doctor. She'll be taken care of at a military facility."

"She's not stable yet." Dr. Munro replied. "She's only just come to terms with her transformation. She's still in an incredibly vulnerable state."

"Well. We have plenty of psychiatrists." The Major said.

"No, she is not yet capable of being moved from here." Dr. Munro countered. "Our hospital director will not sign off on a transfer until you can prove beyond reasonable doubt that your facility can provide better care for her current condition better than this one can."

"Already done." Major Dennis replied without hesitation. "Paperwork is already being finalized upstairs."

"She also needs to consent." Dr. Munro added. "Corporal Jenkins do you consent to this transfer?"

Samantha wanted to curl into a ball and shrink out of existence.

Then there was a knock on the door.

Before any of them could answer it cracked a bit.

"Dr. Munro?" A young nurse asked. "Miss Jenkins? One of the hospital lawyers is here for you."

"Please come in." Munro said eagerly.

The nurse nodded and opened the door all the way. A tall, handsome, man in a pair of grey slacks and a black dress shirt walked in.

"Hi." He said awkwardly. "I'm Richard Fletcher. I was told there were some questions about patient transfer?"

Dr. Munro couldn't help but notice that Samantha perked up at the sight of the young lawyer.

That might help. She thought.

"Please come in Mister Fletcher." She said. "Good to see you again."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zxpajg/wait_is_this_just_gate_288/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (286/?)

Previous

Writer's note: I start my four day weekend tomorrow so I won't be back until tuesday. Until then enjoy a bunch of different cliffhangers. You know, as is tradition.

Enjoy.

\~

"Well. This is Cheapside." Artair said as he and Kor'Os pulled up on the small town. "Another week and we'll be in the capital."

Kor'Os pulled her horse up to the hitching post at the edge of the town. They'd gotten the little spotted mare only a few days before from an Army garrison. Artair hitched Xhalya to a sturdy tree some dozen yards or so away.

She reached into a pouch on her belt and grabbed a bit of bread as she signaled for Green Eyes. A few moments later the raven landed on her arm and cooed at her.

"Word?" She asked the bird.

Green Eyes looked back the way he'd come. "More TOwn gone." He said in his Raven voice.

She gasped at the simple message. "Another town is gone?" She asked.

The raven stared at her for a moment, then nodded its head up and down twice.

"Shit." She said to herself.

"Prince- er... Rider." She called out.

He looked over from where he was pulling his overnight bag out of one of Xhalya's saddlebags. He read the worry on her face easy enough.

"Another one?" He asked with a look of concern. "That's three now. Did he say where?"

She turned back to Green eyes. "Where at little brother?" She asked as she handed him a bit of jerky that he gobbled up greedily.

The raven hopped up and down in a circle, then nipped at her hair.

"RivER." He said. "Small Town. No shiNY."

"Some kind of river village." She yelled over to the prince. "Small enough that there were no soldiers."

He shook his head as he approached. "Meaning they didn't get evacuated." He said. He'd sent word back to the garrison she'd been part of when they'd reached the first town on their journey, ordering them to evacuate the nearest towns as best as they could to prevent further casualties. But the net still had holes.

"Maybe we should keep riding." She said as she began undoing the horse's tether.

"No." He said sternly. "We need to stay at least the night. Let the mounts rest. Plus we'll let the locals know what's happening and to be ready to evacuate as well."

"Was it getting closer?" She asked the raven. It hopped up and down and nodded. Then shook. Then nodded again.

"Helpful." She said sarcastically.

"Come on." The prince said. "Let's find ourselves some rooms and talk to the town Sheriff."

\------------------

"Hello Captain Choi." The door said as he approached. He didn't think he'd ever get over the discomfort that caused every time it happened.

"Morning.... door." He replied before yawning. "Veliry in?"

"Yes." The door replied. "Do come in."

James stepped forward through the now opened doorway and into the lab.

"Hey Vel." He said to the back of the small mage as she studied a book on her desk while mixing a flask of something blue.

"Morning James." She said half heartedly. "How are you?"

"Looking for a distraction." He said honestly. "You ever figure out the design I gave you way back?"

"For the Fun-Dew machine?" She asked as she set the flask down gently and slowly stepped away from the desk, watching it as if it might explode at any moment. Which, for all he knew, it might.

"Fondue." He corrected as he eyed the desk curiously. "Should I be worried about that?"

She shook her head. "Just don't speak too loudly or bump that table." She said. "And yes. Like I said before, it's an easy enough design. We'll just need to enchant some basic fire magic into it. Are you finally asking to.... wait. That's right. You said you'd already learned enchanting. I've been meaning to ask about that."

James nodded, and before she could continue the line of questioning he drew his sword and held it out to her, handle first.

Veliry snatched it quickly and her eyes began glowing two separate colors.

She gasped as she studied it, and held it out a bit further, as if she was almost scared of it.

"That a good gasp or a bad gasp?" James asked.

"James." She said hesitantly as she turned the blade over and inspected the other side. "What exactly happened while you were reforging and re-enchanting this blade?"

\------------------------------

King Farrick put down the papers as his daughter entered. He did what he could to hide the concern at what the report in the stack had informed him of.

"Father." She greeted.

"Amina." He replied as he gestured at the chair across from him. "How is he?"

"How do you think he is?" She asked rather gruffly. "He's exactly how I said he would be." Her knuckles whitened from gripping the arms of her chair. "He didn't return until well after night fall last night. Stable hands reported him sleeping in his drake's pen most of the day."

The King nodded. "For what it's worth. Tell him I'm sorry." He said. Then he held up the report. "We're going to have to speed up your marriage." He said with no humor. "Unless you want it postponed by another emergency." He slid the papers across his desk and she snatched them up angrily.

He waited as she read over them.

She lowered the papers and looked off into space as she thought about the contents.

"That can't be right." She said. "That's... the other side of the country." She looked back at the report. "Entire towns? How's that possible?" She asked. "Are there any reports of Blight Possessed?"

He spread the papers in front of him a bit and shook his head.

"No mention of them so far." He replied. "Not that we know enough about what they're capable of to know if that means anything. And with us not even knowing where this is originating from."

'What are we doing about it?" She asked.

"What little we can." He answered. "Sigbert has dispatched three hundred of the Earth arrows to the surrounding towns. It's all we can spare. Plus your brother Artair of all people put out orders for evacuation of neighboring towns."

"Really?" She asked. "That's a change for him."

"Indeed. And it couldn't be at a better time. He's on his way here with an eyewitness of some kind."

"Should we dispatch griffin riders?" She asked.

"Already done." He said.

"So what can I do?" She wondered.

"For now. Nothing." He admitted. "I asked you to come to ask about James."

"You could have asked him yourself." She replied with a bit of anger.

"No." He said. "I've got a feeling that I'm one of the last people he wants to see right now."

"Wonder why." She said testily.

He glared at her for just a moment. Then his face softened. "You know WHY Amina." He said, and his voice sounded weary.

He was about to say more when there was a knock at the door.

"Who's there?" He asked.

The guard outside answered. "The arch mage sir!"

"Another time daughter." He said before looking back at the door. "Enter!"

The door opened, and arch mage Marcos entered, hobbling on his cane as he approached.

"What is it Marcos?" He asked.

"I believe." The old mage began before plopping in to the chair next to Amina's. "That I have successfully replicated the designs given to us by the Captain."

Amina cocked an eyebrow. "Designs?" She asked curiously.

"There is a small issue of power." Marcos continued as if not hearing the question. "THe Earth... er... scientists... used something called um... nuclear power. We... do not have access to such things."

"Father." Amina interrupted. "What is he talking about?"

King Farrick looked at her with no emotion.

"He's talking about taking the upper hand from Earth." He said grimly. Then he turned back to Marcos. "Do you have an alternative for the power issue?" He asked.

\------------------------

Driscoll looked around at the people around him.

How long had this presentation been going on that he'd zoned out? Had he actually fallen asleep? That couldn't be right.

"Anyways, that's how we're going to get the Earth prisoners out of the capital." The odd, green skinned man said as they gestured at the map. "Any questions?"

A young woman in mage robes spoke up. "Don't the Petravians have Earth weapons now?" She asked. "What's our answer to that?"

Driscoll was just about to replay his suits camera's to catch up on whatever the plan had been while he was zoned out.

"Chief Driscoll?" The speaker addressed him, drawing his attention unexpectedly. "That's your field. How do we counter the... rifles... right?"

He nodded without meaning to. "Right." He said. "And the key is gonna be armor. Your mages are all capable of creating shields right?" He asked.

A large portion of the group nodded or murmured affirmative.

"Good. Those worked in the desert." He said. "The rest of us will just have to wear good old fashioned armor." He said while gesturing at his suit.

"Speaking of." The speaker interrupted. "Our priority among the prisoners is the Major and the other members of Chief Driscoll's squad."

Driscoll flinched at that. His squad had been captured?

"That can't be right." He said to himself inside his helmet. "Weren't they?...."

But where was that question leading him. Something had happened to his squad. But what?

"If we can recover the Chief's squad they will be a massive force multiplier to our forces." The speaker continued. "Plus their suits will give us access to massive amounts of information on the castle and its forces."

No. He thought. They would USE that intel. but his people didn't just SHARE intel.

But then again, he just had only moments before.

He looked around.

Who were these people? And where was he?

"I'm sorry." He said, interrupting the speaker. "Actually no... I'm not." He admitted as everyone turned to look at him. "But who the fuck are you people?"

"We're the Agency." The speaker answered matter of factly. "We recovered you from the desert to help us strike back at the Petravians." They looked at him curiously. "Are you okay chief?"

"I'm fine." He said. "But you're bullshitting me."

"What?" One of the people around him asked.

"First off." He began, counting on his fingers. "I don't remember any of that shit. Second; Me and my people don't get captured unless we WANT to get captured. And we can break out any time we want." He held up a third finger. "Lastly... my squad....." He shook his head as a migraine formed. "My squad is...." Something made him not WANT to remember it. "My squad is..."

"Chief." The speaker interrupted. "We're working with your command remember. We gave you the recovery verification phrase once your people warned us about it."

"Yeah." He said as he looked up at them with a look of anger. "And what was that?" He asked.

The speaker looked over at one of the people off to their side, and older looking woman in a hooded robe.

"Sherman's march, two seven thirty five, whiskey, niner." The woman said.

Driscoll looked at the log in his suit's files. Sure enough that WAS one of the codes.

"And what mission does that correspond to?" He challenged.

"Something called the Suez blockade." She answered. Then she corrected herself. "Er, the Suez Blockade Failure." She said.

"Shit." He said to himself.

Does that mean that I'm wrong about the guys? He wondered. But what was I wrong about?

"Chief?" The speaker asked again. "You okay?"

He looked up at them, suddenly uncertain.

"No." He said. "I think something's wrong."

"Well. It's still a few days before the royal wedding." The speaker said. "Go see the healers. Maybe you were hurt worse than we realized. We still don't fully understand how your suit works with your physiology. Maybe we missed something."

"Yeah." He said hesitantly as he stood up. "Yeah maybe that's a good idea. Sorry for the interruption."

As he left the room, it faded out of existence.

Except for the old hooded woman, who smiled wryly before stepping into a wall and disappearing.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zwvbhr/wait_is_this_just_gate_287/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (286/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: I start my four day weekend tomorrow so I won't be back until tuesday. Until then enjoy a bunch of different cliffhangers. You know, as is tradition.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Green Eyes looked back the way he'd come. "More TOwn go^(ne)." He said in his Raven voice.

She gasped at the simple message. "Another town is gone?" She asked.

The raven stared at her for a moment, then nodded its head up and down twice.

"Shit." She said to herself.

"Prince- er... Rider." She called out.

He looked over from where he was pulling his overnight bag out of one of Xhalya's saddlebags. He read the worry on her face easy enough.

"Another one?" He asked with a look of concern. "That's three now. Did he say where?"

She turned back to Green eyes. "Where at little brother?" She asked as she handed him a bit of jerky that he gobbled up greedily.

The raven hopped up and down in a circle, then nipped at her hair.

"RivER." He said. "Sm^(all) Town. No shiNY."

"Some kind of river village." She yelled over to the prince. "Small enough that there were no soldiers."

He shook his head as he approached. "Meaning they didn't get evacuated." He said. He'd sent word back to the garrison she'd been part of when they'd reached the first town on their journey, ordering them to evacuate the nearest towns as best as they could to prevent further casualties. But the net still had holes.

"Maybe we should keep riding." She said as she began undoing the horse's tether.

"No." He said sternly. "We need to stay at least the night. Let the mounts rest. Plus we'll let the locals know what's happening and to be ready to evacuate as well."

"Was it getting closer?" She asked the raven. It hopped up and down and nodded. Then shook. Then nodded again.

"Helpful." She said sarcastically.

"Come on." The prince said. "Let's find ourselves some rooms and talk to the town Sheriff."

\----------

"Hello Captain Choi." The door said as he approached. He didn't think he'd ever get over the discomfort that caused every time it happened.

"Morning.... door." He replied before yawning. "Veliry in?"

"Yes." The door replied. "Do come in."

James stepped forward through the now opened doorway and into the lab.

"Hey Vel." He said to the back of the small mage as she studied a book on her desk while mixing a flask of something blue.

"Morning James." She said half heartedly. "How are you?"

"Looking for a distraction." He said honestly. "You ever figure out the design I gave you way back?"

"For the Fun-Dew machine?" She asked as she set the flask down gently and slowly stepped away from the desk, watching it as if it might explode at any moment. Which, for all he knew, it might.

"Fondue." He corrected as he eyed the desk curiously. "Should I be worried about that?"

She shook her head. "Just don't speak too loudly or bump that table." She said. "And yes. Like I said before, it's an easy enough design. We'll just need to enchant some basic fire magic into it. Are you finally asking to.... wait. That's right. You said you'd already learned enchanting. I've been meaning to ask about that."

James nodded, and before she could continue the line of questioning he drew his sword and held it out to her, handle first.

Veliry snatched it quickly and her eyes began glowing two separate colors.

She gasped as she studied it, and held it out a bit further, as if she was almost scared of it.

"That a good gasp or a bad gasp?" James asked.

"James." She said hesitantly as she turned the blade over and inspected the other side. "What exactly happened while you were reforging and re-enchanting this blade?"

\------------------------------

King Farrick put down the papers as his daughter entered. He did what he could to hide the concern at what the report in the stack had informed him of.

"Father." She greeted.

"Amina." He replied as he gestured at the chair across from him. "How is he?"

"How do you think he is?" She asked rather gruffly. "He's exactly how I said he would be." Her knuckles whitened from gripping the arms of her chair. "He didn't return until well after night fall last night. Stable hands reported him sleeping in his drake's pen most of the day."

The King nodded. "For what it's worth. Tell him I'm sorry." He said. Then he held up the report. "We're going to have to speed up your marriage." He said with no humor. "Unless you want it postponed by another emergency." He slid the papers across his desk and she snatched them up angrily.

He waited as she read over them.

She lowered the papers and looked off into space as she thought about the contents.

"That can't be right." She said. "That's... the other side of the country." She looked back at the report. "Entire towns? How's that possible?" She asked. "Are there any reports of Blight Possessed?"

He spread the papers in front of him a bit and shook his head.

"No mention of them so far." He replied. "Not that we know enough about what they're capable of to know if that means anything. And with us not even knowing where this is originating from."

'What are we doing about it?" She asked.

"What little we can." He answered. "Sigbert has dispatched three hundred of the Earth arrows to the surrounding towns. It's all we can spare. Plus your brother Artair of all people put out orders for evacuation of neighboring towns."

"Really?" She asked. "That's a change for him."

"Indeed. And it couldn't be at a better time. He's on his way here with an eyewitness of some kind."

"Should we dispatch griffin riders?" She asked.

"Already done." He said.

"So what can I do?" She wondered.

"For now. Nothing." He admitted. "I asked you to come to ask about James."

"You could have asked him yourself." She replied with a bit of anger.

"No." He said. "I've got a feeling that I'm one of the last people he wants to see right now."

"Wonder why." She said testily.

He glared at her for just a moment. Then his face softened. "You know WHY Amina." He said, and his voice sounded weary.

He was about to say more when there was a knock at the door.

"Who's there?" He asked.

The guard outside answered. "The arch mage sir!"

"Another time daughter." He said before looking back at the door. "Enter!"

The door opened, and arch mage Marcos entered, hobbling on his cane as he approached.

"What is it Marcos?" He asked.

"I believe." The old mage began before plopping in to the chair next to Amina's. "That I have successfully replicated the designs given to us by the Captain."

Amina cocked an eyebrow. "Designs?" She asked curiously.

"There is a small issue of power." Marcos continued as if not hearing the question. "THe Earth... er... scientists... used something called um... nuclear power. We... do not have access to such things."

"Father." Amina interrupted. "What is he talking about?"

King Farrick looked at her with no emotion.

"He's talking about taking the upper hand from Earth." He said grimly. Then he turned back to Marcos. "Do you have an alternative for the power issue?" He asked.

\------------------------

Driscoll looked around at the people around him.

How long had this presentation been going on that he'd zoned out? Had he actually fallen asleep? That couldn't be right.

"Anyways, that's how we're going to get the Earth prisoners out of the capital." The odd, green skinned man said as they gestured at the map. "Any questions?"

A young woman in mage robes spoke up. "Don't the Petravians have Earth weapons now?" She asked. "What's our answer to that?"

Driscoll was just about to replay his suits camera's to catch up on whatever the plan had been while he was zoned out.

"Chief Driscoll?" The speaker addressed him, drawing his attention unexpectedly. "That's your field. How do we counter the... rifles... right?"

He nodded without meaning to. "Right." He said. "And the key is gonna be armor. Your mages are all capable of creating shields right?" He asked.

A large portion of the group nodded or murmured affirmative.

"Good. Those worked in the desert." He said. "The rest of us will just have to wear good old fashioned armor." He said while gesturing at his suit.

"Speaking of." The speaker interrupted. "Our priority among the prisoners is the Major and the other members of Chief Driscoll's squad."

Driscoll flinched at that. His squad had been captured?

"That can't be right." He said to himself inside his helmet. "Weren't they?...."

But where was that question leading him. Something had happened to his squad. But what?

"If we can recover the Chief's squad they will be a massive force multiplier to our forces." The speaker continued. "Plus their suits will give us access to massive amounts of information on the castle and its forces."

No. He thought. They would USE that intel. but his people didn't just SHARE intel.

But then again, he just had only moments before.

He looked around.

Who were these people? And where was he?

"I'm sorry." He said, interrupting the speaker. "Actually no... I'm not." He admitted as everyone turned to look at him. "But who the fuck are you people?"

"We're the Agency." The speaker answered matter of factly. "We recovered you from the desert to help us strike back at the Petravians." They looked at him curiously. "Are you okay chief?"

"I'm fine." He said. "But you're bullshitting me."

"What?" One of the people around him asked.

"First off." He began, counting on his fingers. "I don't remember any of that shit. Second; Me and my people don't get captured unless we WANT to get captured. And we can break out any time we want." He held up a third finger. "Lastly... my squad....." He shook his head as a migraine formed.

"My squad is...." Something made him not WANT to remember it. "My squad is..."

"Chief." The speaker interrupted. "We're working with your command remember. We gave you the recovery verification phrase once your people warned us about it."

"Yeah." He said as he looked up at them with a look of anger. "And what was that?" He asked.

The speaker looked over at one of the people off to their side, and older looking woman in a hooded robe.

"Sherman's march, two seven thirty five, whiskey, niner." The woman said.

Driscoll looked at the log in his suit's files. Sure enough that WAS one of the codes.

"And what mission does that correspond to?" He challenged.

"Something called the Suez blockade." She answered. Then she corrected herself. "Er, the Suez Blockade Failure." She said.

"Shit." He said to himself.

Does that mean that I'm wrong about the guys? He wondered. But what was I wrong about?

"Chief?" The speaker asked again. "You okay?"

He looked up at them, suddenly uncertain.

"No." He said. "I think something's wrong."

"Well. It's still a few days before the royal wedding." The speaker said. "Go see the healers. Maybe you were hurt worse than we realized. We still don't fully understand how your suit works with your physiology. Maybe we missed something."

"Yeah." He said hesitantly as he stood up. "Yeah maybe that's a good idea. Sorry for the interruption."

As he left the room, it faded out of existence.

Except for the old hooded woman, who smiled wryly before stepping into a wall and disappearing.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zwva0s/wait_is_this_just_gate_287/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (285/?)

Previous /

First

Writer's note: James does an emotional recovery.

Enjoy

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

It was night time when James finally woke back up.

He sat for a while longer, scratching Steve's head and neck in thanks as the massive drake rumbled and emitted the deep warmth unique to his kind.

But eventually James had to get up and get back to the world.

He walked through the silent dampness of the castle now that the rain had let up. The guards and servants parted for him with silent nods. His boots bounced against his legs as he carried them by their laces.

He passed the room he and Amina shared and instead continued on to the next hall over and to his mother and brother's room.

He knocked on the door and nobody answered. He figured his mother was probably still at the healing ward so he simply entered and sat on one of the chairs inside.

A few minutes later the door to the side room opened and Joey poked his head out.

"Mom?" He called. Then he looked around and spotted James. "James?" He asked instead.

"Hey Jojo." James said without looking.

"Are you okay?" Joey asked.

James thought for a few moments, Joey stepped out a bit further.

"Not really." James admitted with a shake of his head. Then he looked up and saw that his little brother's eyes were red. "You?"

Joey just shook his head a bit.

"Cause of the Veliry thing?" James asked.

"Yeah." Joey answered. "You did the thing? With the major?"

"Yeah." James replied solemnly.

"Did you do it?"

James took a deep breath. "Yeah."

The two of them stayed like that for a moment. Then James sat up a bit.

"Wanna talk about it?" He asked. "She said you were swearing off magic."

Joey shook his head "No" but began talking anyways.

"I don't think it would be safe." He said.

James nodded understanding. "Fair." He said simply. "But stopping your lessons isn't gonna prevent you from having the magic you've already got."

"I know." Joey said. "But it stops me from getting more. Keeps me low level. Keeps me out of bad situations."

James nodded again. "Fair." He repeated. "And she understands that. But I think she'd still like you to help her as an assistant. After all, you're the one that figured out the whole bag door thing. You should talk to her."

Joey thought about it for a few moments.

"Plus you aint gonna get your crush if you stay as far from her as possible." James said with a grin before Joey could respond. His little brother's face flushed red.

"I don't-" Joey began, stammering. His leg began to bounce a bit. "I don't have a-"

James just chuckled. "Remember little Susan Davies back when you were in third grade?" He asked, cutting off his stammering little brother. "You used to get so awkward and flustered around her. She was the one person that could shock you into talking unexpectedly without mentioning something nerdy."

"I... that was." Joey began. "I don't-"

"We all knew buddy. Mom and I." James continued. "Granted back then I wasn't exactly the charming, savvy guy I am now. But I could still tell you had a crush on her."

Joey looked like he might burst with embarrassment.

"Look." James continued. "I... don't know if you and Vel are ever gonna be a thing. She's.... quite a bit older than you. And honestly I think she's only into women, though we've never actually talked about it. But she clearly likes you. And very clearly cares about you. And even if it never becomes anything romantic you still shouldn't hold her at arms length." He said with a small smile. Then the smile faded. "This is a dangerous place. You never know how long you've got with the people you care about."

"I know that already." Joey said softly.

James looked at him wearily, then nodded understanding.

The two of them remained silent for a while again.

"You want to talk about your thing?" Joey asked after a while.

James took a deep breath. Then he smiled. "Nah." He said. "That ones for me to handle. But... talking to you helped Jojo."

Suddenly the door to the room opened and their mother came in, still wearing her healing robes.

"James?" She asked in surprise. "What are you doing here? Is everything okay?"

James nodded, still smiling.

"Yeah mom. I'm fine." He said as he stood up to greet her with a hug. "How was your training?"

His mom gestured at her eyes and they glowed red for just a second.

"I figured out the thing with my eyes that lets me see people's blood flow." She said excitedly. "This is going to make drawing blood and giving I.V.'s so, SO much easier."

James smiled even wider. "That's awesome. I think I've seen that one before..... um.... firsthand."

"Yes." She said with exasperation. "Several of the healers have told me as much."

Something dawned on James. He turned back to Joey.

"Hey Jojo. I think I know a bit of magic that might help you if you get overloaded again." He said. "Mom's eye thing reminded me of something."

\---------------------------

Atrafar Stalwart stopped as she and her other party members got to the edge of the capital.

It had been a long time since she'd been here, and last time the city had still been mourning from the destruction of the Elemental. At the time it had mostly smelled of burnt buildings and the dull sorrow that came from a city in mourning.

Now it smelled of the freshly cooked food, freshly poured booze, and of course like the rain.

"We are finally here." Jaegheri said as he stepped up next to her. "I have never been to the capital before."

"It's not as nice as the Elven wood villages." Atrafar said. "But it is much more lively."

"Excited to see your mate?" The jaguar-like man asked.

Atrafar sighed as she rolled her eyes.

"He's not my mate." She said for what seemed like the thousandth time since they'd left the Lunar Council City.

"Yes. A member of the Outer Light requested a leave of absence to oversee the turning of a man who ISN'T her mate." He said smugly.

Atrafar simply walked away.

"Come on." She said, ignoring him. "We need to secure and set up a room for an un-blooded turning."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zt1fty/wait_is_this_just_gate_286/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (284/?)

Previous

Writer's note: What? Did you expect gore-porn or something? Nah dawg.

Enjoy.

\~

James gripped the handle of the massive axe, so similar in design to the one that Kela had once carried, and listened as the King spoke to the small gathering. He wiped a bit of rain from his eyes as he did, and was thankful for it.

"Major Denise Patinson of Earth. You have, on behalf of your superiors, led an expedition into the lands of an allied nation." The King said flatly. "And while this could have been considered a mission to rescue Earth citizens stranded by an experiment gone wrong. It must be called what it ACTUALLY was." He paused for effect. "It was an attempted invasion."

The Major said nothing, and showed no sign of acknowledging anything going on. She stood in her patchless uniform staring ahead with blank eyes.

"During this attempted invasion you killed a mining and exploration party of Clan Dunebasher's dwarves, a rider from Clan Drakrid, and a Royal army Patrol. And also abducted one of those soldiers to send to your world on a trip that you were uncertain would leave them alive." He continued. several gasps and cries of shock could be heard over the pattering of the rain. "Then you requested additional supplies and armaments from your government to hold your position KNOWING that we would be forced to send reinforcements for the lost patrol."

Werner, standing a few yards from the King on the balcony, coughed. The King sighed as he glanced that direction for a moment.

"Your government has disavowed these actions as those of a rogue soldier acting of their own volition." He said. "Which tells me that either they're lying, or that you make a piss poor leader. I am.... politically inclined.... to believe the latter."

Still, the Major remained unmoving.

"Then when an Army of my soldiers, led by my very own daughter and General, attempted to secure your forces peacefully, you instead opted to open fire." He gripped the wooden railing with white knuckled anger that James himself felt for a lot of different reasons. "You used weapons my people don't even understand to slaughter them wholesale, when a peaceful arrest was an option." He hissed. "You killed Petravian citizens so effectively that we still aren't completely certain how many were lost because their bodies were incinerated."

The King took a moment to calm himself.

"And did you know that that initial scouting party's only intentions were to secure your people so that we might help them get home?" He asked. "They had no intention of harming any of you. Only to confirm who you were and where you were from and then bring you to the capital."

This finally drew the Major's gaze. She looked at him with a raised eyebrow.

But she still said nothing.

"For these crimes, and because you are NO LONGER a member of your world's military FORMER Major Patinson." The King said venomously. "You are sentenced to death."

James closed his eyes as he adjusted his grip again.

The two guards next to the former Major pushed her forward and forced her to her knees. They held her arms up at an angle behind her and one of them planted a foot on her back. The hold put her head in the perfect spot for the axe to take it off.

James walked toward the woman in a daze. He didn't want to be here.

Didn't want to be the one doing this. Shouldn't have been the one doing this.

James got next to the kneeling woman. She craned her neck to look up at him with empty eyes.

"Denise Patinson." The King addressed her one final time. "Any last words?"

She remained silent.

"So be it." The King said simply. "Captain." He said to James.

James stared down at her.

How could she remain so passive? Why wasn't she saying anything? She'd been so defiant back in the desert. How could she just sit her and accept this fate?

Sure she probably would have gotten the same treatment back on earth. Life in prison. Probably even a death sentence. Lord knew the Military had become harsher in its punishments during the Water War and hadn't loosened its rulings since. But James still couldn't understand this silent acceptance.

James dropped the axe down until its massive head was resting on the ground.

"Captain Choi?" The King asked curiously.

James struggled to justify any of it. She'd shot at him with the Miffy's. She'd tried to kill him again. Had tried to kill Amina, and Veliry, and in her own way even his little brother. But she herself hadn't pulled the trigger on any of them.

But her orders had. And those same orders had killed hundreds more before the battle had ended.

"Captain Choi!" Werner yelled before the king could. "Perform the duty you agreed to."

James looked up at the ambassador with fury in his eyes. He'd disliked her since day one of her being here. Now had the nerve to try and order him to execute someone.

"Fuck you Werner." He said under his breath. The former Major huffed at the silent curse.

"Captain Choi." The King repeated. "You put the peace of our worlds at risk right now."

James's hand flashed to his waist.

He didn't even look as he did it.

BANG!

Everyone present, including the two guards next to him flinched back in surprise at the noise and unexpected action. In doing so they released Patinson's wrists.

Her lifeless body fell limply into the red and pink splattered mud.

James and the King stared at each other for several long seconds.

Then King Farrick nodded subtly, and James walked away from the dead body silently, leaving the axe to fall into the mud next to her.

\---

Vickers watched from one of the nearby doorways, wearing a heavy cloak against the rain. The cloak had the added benefit of keeping his face from being seen.

He listened to the whole thing. Watched as Choi stood motionless, thinking about what he was going to do. Heard Werner chime in. Saw the words on Choi's lips, even though he didn't hear them.

Part of him regretted not sneaking into the castle's jail and offing the Major on his behalf, sparing him the blood that was now on his hands.

But there was too much risk to that. And too many kinds of that risk too.

Plus he needed to see how Choi handled this.

Even he flinched at the shot. He'd forgotten just how fast the young Captain was with a pistol.

The fact that Choi hadn't even looked at the kill was curious. Normally he thought it might have been a sign of cowardice. But he knew full well that if there was one thing Choi WASN'T, it was a coward.

No. This was an act of defiance. It may have been a small act, and a somewhat childish one, but it still was one.

The pistol was an act of defiance against the King.

And not looking, not engaging with the act, was defiance against the President and Werner.

As Choi stalked out of the courtyard Vickers grinned.

"Lil shit knew he was being punished." He said to himself as he turned and walked through the doorway and into the castle again.

\---

"I see that some of our suspicions were correct." Dr. Munro said as Samantha sat in the chair in front of her desk inspecting herself in the hand mirror. "Though I hope this doesn't cause undue stress if it doesn't end up being permanent."

Samantha placed two of her fingers over the end of her nose, covering the small dark pad there that still looked canine. With it covered her nose looked almost like it had when she was human. It even had the few freckles that had always crossed its bridge.

"It'll be permanent." She said. "It has to be. It will be." Then she pulled her lips up and inspected the nice square teeth there. Her canines were still a bit long, but not exaggeratedly so. "Positive thinking." She said.

"Normally I'm all for positivity." The doctor said. "So long as it's tempered by due caution."

"Screw that." Samantha said. "I just want to get my body back."

Dr. Munro watched her inspect herself for several moments. The obsession was worrying.

"Samantha, do you know why I asked you to come in today?" She asked.

"To check up on my transition back to normal?" She mused as she moved her hair out of the way of her ear and ran her finger around it. It still had a bit of a point, and some fur on its top side. But other than that it looked normal.

"No." Dr. Munro replied. "The military wishes to have you transferred to their care." She said with a bit of a break in her voice. "Our legal people are working to prevent it because none of you can be said to be 'cured' or 'stable' just yet. But they are still sending in military doctors to evaluate you."

That finally got Samantha to drop the mirror and pay attention.

"They're coming to take me away?" She asked. "What for?"

Dr. Munro shrugged.

"Take your pick." She said. "Because you're potentially dangerous now that you.... effectively, have super powers. Because you regenerate. Because there are still two packs of werewolves who escaped the cordon and are unaccounted for. And in your case... well, you are still technically a soldier."

Samantha placed the mirror on her lap, face down, and looked down at the ground as she thought.

On the one hand, she WAS still a soldier, like the doctor said. She couldn't just IGNORE orders if they were given to her.

But on the other hand, she knew for a fact that the attack that had caused this had originated from the very facility she'd been tasked with guarding. Someone in that facility had been toying with whatever had created werewolves, and now she was one.

She didn't know if she wanted to put herself back in their control.

"Samantha?" The Doctor asked, breaking her out of her thoughts. "What are you thinking?"

She looked away for a second.

Then she turned back.

"How strict is that whole doctor-patient confidentiality thing?" She asked nervously. "Also, are any of the other... werewolves... working with lawyers?"

\----------

James walked into the pen in a haze.

He kicked his boots and socks off and walked on the mixture of straw and dirt with bare feet.

He tossed his uniform shirt at the bars of the pen, hoping to get it hung up on one of the cross bars, and watched as it instead fell to the dirt in a heap. He'd have to clean it later.

Steve watched him with that intelligent curiosity that he always had.

James dropped the pistol into a pile of hay that had what looked like a cow bone sticking out of it.

Finally, James walked up to Steve and gave the drake a hug. Steve recoiled a bit at how wet James was, then relaxed.

James slid down the drake's side and turned until he was sitting with his back against the massive lizard's furred side.

Steve seemed to sense the whirlwind of emotions within his master and did what little he could. First bringing his massive head curling in to rest on James's legs, then curling his tail up around that so that he formed a massive, protective, spiral around his rider.

James leaned forward, resting his head on his arms, which were resting on Steve's furred head.

He didn't want to be alone right now. But he also didn't want to talk to anyone. And Steve was the perfect companion for both of those needs.

The two of them stayed like that until James was lightly snoring on the drake's head.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zs4xia/wait_is_that_just_gate_285/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (283/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Tiny little like... two day... time skip story wise. Aaaaand James gets to be a villain for just a second. Every officer gets there at some point.

Also this is a good reminder that even without magic, James had been training almost daily (minus his extended hospital stays) with some of the best warriors in the land for almost two years now.

Enjoy(?)

\~

James stood rooted in the arena of the castle's training yard watching First Sergeant Nguyen as he picked through the items on the weapon table.

Don't take it. He thought. Don't take the pistol. It will only make this worse.

Then he saw Nguyen spot it, tense up in surprise, and then take the pistol in question and tuck it into the holster on his chest.

"Dammit." He said as he prepared himself for what was coming.

Nguyen spent a few more moments checking the table and settled on a one handed battle-hammer and a rectangular shield.

Then he stepped into the arena.

James closed his eyes and breathed deeply, intentionally hyperventilating for a few seconds, as the King began to speak.

King Farrick adressed the crowd. First letting them know that he was already aware of their gossiping about the battle in the desert, then assuring them that he didn't mind because he was accustomed to them doing so. He explained the broad strokes of what had led to the battle, and how Nguyen had ended up in the current situation. How he and James had discussed whether lashings were appropriate, and had ultimately presented Trial By Combat as an alternative.

The King admitted not liking the idea, especially since in theory Nguyen MIGHT escape unscathed.

Then he told the crowd about what James would do to prevent that from happening, and what would occur if it somehow did.

James opened his eyes and looked at Nguyen when he heard the King say that. He hadn't told Nguyen what would happen should he win. What kind of burden James would take as a result.

Once he was done with his speech the King stepped back, and Amina stepped forward in full ceremonial armor.

"There are only two ways this battle ends!" She yelled to the crowd. "Either one of the combatants agrees to yield and or loses consciousness, whichever way that occurs..... Or death." She looked at James with only a slight shift of her head. He gave a small nod. "Each contestant has been given their choice of armor and weaponry. No magic or enchantments allowed. This has been confirmed by our royal mages and our soldiery. The only magic on the field at the moment is Captain Choi's Clan Drakrid tattoo, which has no combat abilities." She nodded to the King. "Resultant punishments have been preordained for this match."

"Witnessed?" Asked the King in a firm tone.

"Witnessed!" The crowd, including James, echoed. The only people that didn't join the response being the Earth prisoners, who were standing to one side under guard.

"You sure about this Choi?" Vickers asked softly from where he stood next to the ring. "I mean unarmed is one thing. But he picked up the forty five. You sure you don't want your plates?"

"I've made my choice." James said. "Let's get it over with."

"Poor Nguyen. At least he gets to keep his rep a bit." Vickers said as he squatted down behind the low stone wall.

"Mages!" Amina yelled. "Shield the crowd!"

The handful of mages present, Veliry included, raised defensive shields around the edge of the arena. James had warned them about the possibility of stray rounds if Nguyen chose the pistol.

"Combatants?" The King asked. James looked up at him. "Ready?" He nodded, then turned and saw Nguyen, with the pistol already out, nod as well.

"Then fight." The King said simply before turning to his chair and sitting down.

That was all the warning James got.

Nguyen was fast. James had expected as much from a former Senior Drill Sergeant with who knew how many combat tours on his shoulder. The fact that he'd been in this world for the better part of a year made him even faster.

But he had nothing on James, who had been here longer and had honed his combat skills almost since day one.

Nguyen's speed, magically imbued or not, was nothing compared to Amina, Gixelle, Kela, Artair, Alixan, or even Vickers nowadays. Hell, he'd learned about Vickers' speed the hard way only a few days before.

When the first KRAK! of the pistol went off James had no doubt that it would have likely struck him in the chest. But James wasn't where he'd been when Nguyen had pulled the trigger. The round slammed into the faintly bluish shimmer of a shield and deformed, falling to the ground uselessly.

James didn't need his reflex enhancing vision to track the First Sergeant's movements. Countless training sessions with his own fiance had taught him to read another fighter's movements by the subtle shifts of their weight, their eyes, and most importantly their feet.

James's initial dodge had been to the right, Nguyen's left, putting the man's shield arm in the way of his shooting arm.

James watched as he predictably tried to turn to get a line on James, while also moving the shield further out of his way. He lowered himself down, running at an angle that likely made him look like he was on the verge of running on all fours, making him a smaller target.

He saw the small black dot of the pistol's barrel bare down on him.

On his next step with his right foot James launched himself in the air as high as he could.

KRAK!

The pistol round kicked up dirt right behind where James had been then skipped into the stone wall around the ring.

James saw the surprise in Nguyen's eyes as he realized that James was airborne. He tried to bring the pistol up to track but James was way too close and moving way too fast.

His left arm flashed out as he flew over the startled Nguyen. His claws dug deeply into the man's right shoulder and leaving long, bleeding, slashes there.

James landed in a roll and rebounded off of the opposite wall before continuing his run again.

KRA-KRA-KRAK! The pistol barked as the First Sergeant whirled and fired angrily at Choi, but hit nothing but the shimmering magical shield.

Five left. Ten more. James thought as he moved to close the distance once again.

Then Nguyen began running at him, leading with his shield.

James lowered his left shoulder to batter the shield aside, then had to dive sideways as he saw the shield pull away at the last second.

KRAK!

James winced as he felt a line of fire go past the bicep of his wolf arm. That same arm lashed out and latched onto Nguyen's shield as he passed, pulling it aside and putting Nguyen off balance at the same time. James didn't stop the roll, but actually used it to wrench the shield sideways, twisting Nguyen's arm to a dangerous angle.

To James's surprise, instead of pulling his arm out of the shield, or trying to counter with the pistol, the First Sergeant jumped up, tucking his legs in as he did, and flipped in the matching direction. The startling move undid the tension James had just put his arm in.

But it also left Nguyen wide open.

James's right hand flashed forward and slammed into Nguyen's sternum just as he'd landed on his feet. The plates in Nguyen's vest stopped the impact from breaking anything, but the impact still sent the man flying backwards, and James didn't release the shield.

As Nguyen tried to regain his feet, his own shield came flying at him like a frisbee, striking his right hand just above the wrist. There was a cracking noise and Nguyen cried out in shock and pain, then scrambled to recover the pistol which the impact had knocked from his hand.

James beat him to it.

His left hand grabbed the pistol and launched it into the air behind him. It hit the arena shield and clattered to the dirt.

His right hand latched onto Nguyen's neck like a vice.

Nguyen was taller than him by at least four or five inches, yet James still lifted him up off the ground effortlessly.

Nguyen brought an elbow up and tried slamming it into James's arm, attempting to break the hold on him as his face turned red.

For the effort James punched him in the side of his ribs, in one of the few spots where he knew the man's vest wasn't completely rigid. It still padded the blow, but the impact still drove the air out of Nguyen's lungs.

\["Should've taken command from the Major."\] James said as Nguyen struggled against him. \["Should've relieved her of command."\]

He dropped Nguyen in a heap. Nguyen gasped for air as he rose up to his feet on shaky legs.

James slapped him across the face hard enough to send the man staggering to the side where he fell back to the ground in a sprawl.

\["Should've upheld your duty as an NCO!"\] He yelled as Nguyen crawled away, spitting blood and a tooth out as he scrambled away from James. \["Backbone of the Army."\] James spat. \["Well where was the fucking BACKBONE!"\]

He kicked Nguyen in the side, sending the man sliding. He ignored the pain in his leg from impacting the plate there and continued stalking the man.

Nguyen used the slide to roll over, grabbing at the short sword on his belt with his good arm.

James let him.

\["You were supposed to be better then that DRILL SERGEANT!"\] James yelled at him as he continued approaching. Nguyen held the sword up and James saw it shaking just a bit. \["You were supposed to set the example of what a soldier is! Not bow and fuckin' boot-lick someone just because they had some fucking RANK!"\]

He lunged in in a feint. When Nguyen lashed out with the sword he pulled back, letting the steel blade slice through the air harmlessly. Then he moved in and punched the opposing soft spot in the vest, though not as hard as last time.

Nguyen brought the blade back in a backhanded slash that James ducked under easily. He caught the arm in his wolf hand before it could complete its arc, and twisted.

James kicked the falling sword before it had even hit the ground and sent it flipping away.

Then, as he turned back to continue lambasting the First Sergeant, Nguyen headbutted him.

James staggered back in shock at the impact. He should've expected it, it was the kind of move he would have done in that situation.

Before he could recover, Nguyen was on him.

A fist, stronger than it would have been back on Earth, slammed into his jaw and sent him spinning for a moment. Before he could stabilize himself a booted foot slammed into the back of his leg and put him on the ground.

Nguyen brought that same boot up to stomp on his back and send him to the ground.

James snarled as he rolled and his left hand punched forward and intercepted the foot, claws first.

Nguyen screamed as the long, knife sharp, claws punched through the side of his booted foot and held fast. James winced as he felt several of those nails snap off from the impact. But was relieved to see how effective they'd been at the improvised defense.

He wrenched his hand free as Nguyen fell back and grabbed at his mangled foot.

James picked himself up, rubbing his bloodied hand in the dirt a bit as he did, and approached the writhing NCO.

Nguyen, to his credit, still tried to fight James off. But it was feeble, desperate, and mostly just panicked. With only one unbroken arm, and one un-wounded leg, the struggle was pointless.

James hated this. But he'd promised the King that the First Sergeant's defeat would be at least somewhat comparable to the lashes he would have received otherwise.

He didn't know whether or not the broken arm and the mangled foot would reach that level. But if they didn't, then this next bit would.

James slammed his fist into the side of Nguyen's face. He held back most of his strength as he did. He was tasked with hurting the man. A task that even now, he detested.

But he wasn't here to kill him. And he already felt bad about the fact that he might have already crippled him. Even if it did end up only being temporary.

Still, it was this or worse.

So James beat the man.

When it was done, and when James was almost certain that Nguyen was unconscious, he stood up and stepped away. He looked up at the King, and for the first time almost since he'd come to this world, he felt a flash of hatred at the man that would soon be his father in law.

"Good enough?" He asked.

The King looked at James with an expression of pity that didn't make James feel any better, and nodded.

James walked away silently. Nobody in the crowd cheered, or made to congratulate him, how could they.

Nobody except the healer that rushed to Nguyen's aid heard the beaten and bloody man's two word, formed by a swollen and blood filled mouth.

\["I know."\] Nguyen said as he sobbed into the dirt.

\---

James flinched when Amina touched him.

He'd gone back to their room, not waiting to hear or see anything that occurred after the match. He'd simply made for their room and pulled off the dirty, blood stained, fighting clothes he'd worn into the ring. He'd been sitting on the edge of the bathtub with his head between his legs as he fought off the adrenaline crash that he was going through.

He should have heard her come in. She was still wearing her armor after all. But he'd been so deep in his anger and self loathing that he had completely tuned everything else out. Hell, he'd even forgotten the reason he'd come into the bathroom. He touched the water in the tub, and sure enough it was cold already.

"I won't ask if you're okay." She said, knowing exactly how he felt about the whole thing already. "But will you be?" She asked instead as she dipped a wash cloth into the cold water and used it to wipe at his face. She rubbed the cloth under his nose and he was surprised to see it come away caked in blood. Then he remembered being headbutted.

"Eventually." He said as he inspected his nose with his hand. It wasn't broken, luckily.

She dipped the cloth back into the water and shook it before wiping more blood from his face.

"I won't say you did well either." She said as she cleaned him. "Because I know how much you hated every second of it." She continued. "But you did it. It's over." He winced as she rubbed at his actual nostrils for a second. "And if any of your Earth soldiers were thinking of causing problems- for us or you- then they're rethinking that idea no."

"Great." He said in a deadpan. "I get to be America's first Commissar."

"What's that?" She asked, knowing that he'd only said it sarcastically.

"Depends who you ask?" He said. "But regardless of who you ask the end result is the same: and officer who keeps the men in line. Even if it means killing them."

She didn't say anything to that. Any counter to the statement would have been rendered moot by the fact that Nguyen's beating was the event of TODAY.

Tomorrow still had the other of the two sentences to carry out.

James was snapped back to the present by the damp washcloth being pressed to his left arm, causing a bloom of pain that shocked the breath out of him.

"He got you once." She said as she inspected the long line of a graze from the pistol. "Should've worn your armor."

James looked at the wound, noticing it for the first time since the fight.

"No." He said as he saw her hand light up with familiar amber light. "Let that one stay."

"It might scar." She said. "I mean, probably not on this arm. But it might."

"It's fine." He said. "Just leave it. He earned that much at least."

"For being so mad at him you sure do show him a lot of respect." She said in response. "Why?"

James took a deep breath.

"Same reason I didn't think he deserved any of it in the first place." He said painfully. "I don't think you Petravian soldiers understand the level of indoctrination us Earth soldiers go through."

"You mean when it comes to him not arresting the Major?" She asked.

He nodded. "It's more difficult than I think you realize." He said. "The military puts a LOT of work into getting us to fall in line with its rules. It's difficult to get one of us to do anything contrary to them. Especially something as big as relieving an officer of command. And especially given the circumstances they were facing at the time." He looked up at her and she could see the roiling sea of emotions going on behind his eyes. "And for a career soldier like him? Probably over twenty years in the uniform?"

"And yet he still should have." She countered.

James nodded before his head dropped and his shoulder sagged.

"That's the only thing that let me justify going through with it." He admitted.

Then he fell back into the water, startling her, and let its coldness shock some feeling back into him as he let himself sink to the bottom of the tub.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zr2u26/wait_is_this_just_gate_284/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (283/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Tiny little like... two day... time skip story wise. Aaaaand James gets to be a villain for just a second. Every officer gets there at some point.

Also this is a good reminder that even without magic, James had been training almost daily (minus his extended hospital stays) with some of the best warriors in the land for almost two years now.

Enjoy(?)

\~

James stood rooted in the arena of the castle's training yard watching First Sergeant Nguyen as he picked through the items on the weapon table.

Don't take it. He thought. Don't take the pistol. It will only make this worse.

Then he saw Nguyen spot it, tense up in surprise, and then take the pistol in question and tuck it into the holster on his chest.

"Dammit." He said as he prepared himself for what was coming.

Nguyen spent a few more moments checking the table and settled on a one handed battle-hammer and a rectangular shield.

Then he stepped into the arena.

James closed his eyes and breathed deeply, intentionally hyperventilating for a few seconds, as the King began to speak.

King Farrick adressed the crowd. First letting them know that he was already aware of their gossiping about the battle in the desert, then assuring them that he didn't mind because he was accustomed to them doing so. He explained the broad strokes of what had led to the battle, and how Nguyen had ended up in the current situation. How he and James had discussed whether lashings were appropriate, and had ultimately presented Trial By Combat as an alternative.

The King admitted not liking the idea, especially since in theory Nguyen MIGHT escape unscathed.

Then he told the crowd about what James would do to prevent that from happening, and what would occur if it somehow did.

James opened his eyes and looked at Nguyen when he heard the King say that. He hadn't told Nguyen what would happen should he win. What kind of burden James would take as a result.

Once he was done with his speech the King stepped back, and Amina stepped forward in full ceremonial armor.

"There are only two ways this battle ends!" She yelled to the crowd. "Either one of the combatants agrees to yield and or loses consciousness, whichever way that occurs..... Or death." She looked at James with only a slight shift of her head. He gave a small nod. "Each contestant has been given their choice of armor and weaponry. No magic or enchantments allowed. This has been confirmed by our royal mages and our soldiery. The only magic on the field at the moment is Captain Choi's Clan Drakrid tattoo, which has no combat abilities." She nodded to the King. "Resultant punishments have been preordained for this match."

"Witnessed?" Asked the King in a firm tone.

"Witnessed!" The crowd, including James, echoed. The only people that didn't join the response being the Earth prisoners, who were standing to one side under guard.

"You sure about this Choi?" Vickers asked softly from where he stood next to the ring. "I mean unarmed is one thing. But he picked up the forty five. You sure you don't want your plates?"

"I've made my choice." James said. "Let's get it over with."

"Poor Nguyen. At least he gets to keep his rep a bit." Vickers said as he squatted down behind the low stone wall.

"Mages!" Amina yelled. "Shield the crowd!"

The handful of mages present, Veliry included, raised defensive shields around the edge of the arena. James had warned them about the possibility of stray rounds if Nguyen chose the pistol.

"Combatants?" The King asked. James looked up at him. "Ready?" He nodded, then turned and saw Nguyen, with the pistol already out, nod as well.

"Then fight." The King said simply before turning to his chair and sitting down.

That was all the warning James got.

Nguyen was fast. James had expected as much from a former Senior Drill Sergeant with who knew how many combat tours on his shoulder. The fact that he'd been in this world for the better part of a year made him even faster.

But he had nothing on James, who had been here longer and had honed his combat skills almost since day one.

Nguyen's speed, magically imbued or not, was nothing compared to Amina, Gixelle, Kela, Artair, Alixan, or even Vickers nowadays. Hell, he'd learned about Vickers' speed the hard way only a few days before.

When the first KRAK! of the pistol went off James had no doubt that it would have likely struck him in the chest. But James wasn't where he'd been when Nguyen had pulled the trigger. The round slammed into the faintly bluish shimmer of a shield and deformed, falling to the ground uselessly.

James didn't need his reflex enhancing vision to track the First Sergeant's movements. Countless training sessions with his own fiance had taught him to read another fighter's movements by the subtle shifts of their weight, their eyes, and most importantly their feet.

James's initial dodge had been to the right, Nguyen's left, putting the man's shield arm in the way of his shooting arm.

James watched as he predictably tried to turn to get a line on James, while also moving the shield further out of his way. He lowered himself down, running at an angle that likely made him look like he was on the verge of running on all fours, making him a smaller target.

He saw the small black dot of the pistol's barrel bare down on him.

On his next step with his right foot James launched himself in the air as high as he could.

KRAK!

The pistol round kicked up dirt right behind where James had been then skipped into the stone wall around the ring.

James saw the surprise in Nguyen's eyes as he realized that James was airborne. He tried to bring the pistol up to track but James was way too close and moving way too fast.

His left arm flashed out as he flew over the startled Nguyen. His claws dug deeply into the man's right shoulder and left long, bleeding, slashes there.

James landed in a roll and rebounded off of the opposite wall before continuing his run again.

KRA-KRA-KRAK! The pistol barked as the First Sergeant whirled and fired angrily at Choi, but hit nothing but the shimmering magical shield.

Five left. Ten more. James thought as he moved to close the distance once again.

Then Nguyen began running at him, leading with his shield.

James lowered his left shoulder to batter the shield aside, then had to dive sideways as he saw the shield pull away at the last second.

KRAK!

James winced as he felt a line of fire go past the bicep of his wolf arm. That same arm lashed out and latched onto Nguyen's shield as he passed, pulling it aside and putting Nguyen off balance at the same time. James didn't stop the roll, but actually used it to wrench the shield sideways, twisting Nguyen's arm to a dangerous angle.

To James's surprise, instead of pulling his arm out of the shield, or trying to counter with the pistol, the First Sergeant jumped up, tucking his legs in as he did, and flipped in the matching direction. The startling move undid the tension James had just put his arm in.

But it also left Nguyen wide open.

James's right hand flashed forward and slammed into Nguyen's sternum just as he'd landed on his feet. The plates in Nguyen's vest stopped the impact from breaking anything, but the impact still sent the man flying backwards, and James didn't release the shield.

As Nguyen tried to regain his feet, his own shield came flying at him like a frisbee, striking his right hand just above the wrist. There was a cracking noise and Nguyen cried out in shock and pain, then scrambled to recover the pistol which the impact had knocked from his hand.

James beat him to it.

His left hand grabbed the pistol and launched it into the air behind him. It hit the arena shield and clattered to the dirt.

His right hand latched onto Nguyen's neck like a vice.

Nguyen was taller than him by at least four or five inches, yet James still lifted him up off the ground effortlessly.

Nguyen brought an elbow up and tried slamming it into James's arm, attempting to break the hold on him as his face turned red.

For the effort James punched him in the side of his ribs, in one of the few spots where he knew the man's vest wasn't completely rigid. It still padded the blow, but the impact still drove the air out of Nguyen's lungs.

\["Should've taken command from the Major."\] James said as Nguyen struggled against him. \["Should've relieved her of command."\]

He dropped Nguyen in a heap. Nguyen gasped for air as he rose up to his feet on shaky legs.

James slapped him across the face hard enough to send the man staggering to the side where he fell back to the ground in a sprawl.

\["Should've upheld your duty as an NCO!"\] He yelled as Nguyen crawled away, spitting blood and a tooth out as he scrambled away from James. \["Backbone of the Army."\] James spat. \["Well where was the fucking BACKBONE!"\]

He kicked Nguyen in the side, sending the man sliding. He ignored the pain in his leg from impacting the plate there and continued stalking the man.

Nguyen used the slide to roll over, grabbing at the short sword on his belt with his good arm.

James let him.

\["You were supposed to be better then that DRILL SERGEANT!"\] James yelled at him as he continued approaching. Nguyen held the sword up and James saw it shaking just a bit. \["You were supposed to set the example of what a soldier is! Not bow and fuckin' boot-lick someone just because they had some fucking RANK!"\]

He lunged in in a feint. When Nguyen lashed out with the sword he pulled back, letting the steel blade slice through the air harmlessly. Then he moved in and punched the opposing soft spot in the vest, though not as hard as last time.

Nguyen brought the blade back in a backhanded slash that James ducked under easily. He caught the arm in his wolf hand before it could complete its arc, and twisted.

James kicked the falling sword before it had even hit the ground and sent it flipping away.

Then, as he turned back to continue lambasting the First Sergeant, Nguyen headbutted him.

James staggered back in shock at the impact. He should've expected it, it was the kind of move he would have done in that situation.

Before he could recover, Nguyen was on him.

A fist, stronger than it would have been back on Earth, slammed into his jaw and sent him spinning for a moment. Before he could stabilize himself a booted foot slammed into the back of his leg and put him on the ground.

Nguyen brought that same boot up to stomp on his back and send him to the ground.

James snarled as he rolled and his left hand punched forward and intercepted the foot, claws first.

Nguyen screamed as the long, knife sharp, claws punched through the side of his booted foot and held fast. James winced as he felt several of those nails snap off from the impact. But was relieved to see how effective they'd been at the improvised defense.

He wrenched his hand free as Nguyen fell back and grabbed at his mangled foot.

James picked himself up, rubbing his bloodied hand in the dirt a bit as he did, and approached the writhing NCO.

Nguyen, to his credit, still tried to fight James off. But it was feeble, desperate, and mostly just panicked. With only one unbroken arm, and one un-wounded leg, the struggle was pointless.

James hated this. But he'd promised the King that the First Sergeant's defeat would be at least somewhat comparable to the lashes he would have received otherwise.

He didn't know whether or not the broken arm and the mangled foot would reach that level. But if they didn't, then this next bit would.

James slammed his fist into the side of Nguyen's face. He held back most of his strength as he did. He was tasked with hurting the man. A task that even now, he detested.

But he wasn't here to kill him. And he already felt bad about the fact that he might have already crippled him. Even if it did end up only being temporary.

Still, it was this or worse.

So James beat the man.

When it was done, and when James was almost certain that Nguyen was unconscious, he stood up and stepped away. He looked up at the King, and for the first time almost since he'd come to this world, he felt a flash of hatred at the man that would soon be his father in law.

"Good enough?" He asked.

The King looked at James with an expression of pity that didn't make James feel any better, and nodded.

James walked away silently. Nobody in the crowd cheered, or made to congratulate him, how could they.

Nobody except the healer that rushed to Nguyen's aid heard the beaten and bloody man's two word, formed by a swollen and blood filled mouth.

\["I know."\] Nguyen said as he sobbed into the dirt.

\---

James flinched when Amina touched him.

He'd gone back to their room, not waiting to hear or see anything that occurred after the match. He'd simply made for their room and pulled off the dirty, blood stained, fighting clothes he'd worn into the ring. He'd been sitting on the edge of the bathtub with his head between his legs as he fought off the adrenaline crash that he was going through.

He should have heard her come in. She was still wearing her armor after all. But he'd been so deep in his anger and self loathing that he had completely tuned everything else out. Hell, he'd even forgotten the reason he'd come into the bathroom. He touched the water in the tub, and sure enough it was cold already.

"I won't ask if you're okay." She said, knowing exactly how he felt about the whole thing already. "But will you be?" She asked instead as she dipped a wash cloth into the cold water and used it to wipe at his face. She rubbed the cloth under his nose and he was surprised to see it come away caked in blood. Then he remembered being headbutted.

"Eventually." He said as he inspected his nose with his hand. It wasn't broken, luckily.

She dipped the cloth back into the water and shook it before wiping more blood from his face.

"I won't say you did well either." She said as she cleaned him. "Because I know how much you hated every second of it." She continued. "But you did it. It's over." He winced as she rubbed at his actual nostrils for a second. "And if any of your Earth soldiers were thinking of causing problems- for us or you- then they're rethinking that idea no."

"Great." He said in a deadpan. "I get to be America's first Commissar."

"What's that?" She asked, knowing that he'd only said it sarcastically.

"Depends who you ask?" He said. "But regardless of who you ask the end result is the same: and officer who keeps the men in line. Even if it means killing them."

She didn't say anything to that. Any counter to the statement would have been rendered moot by the fact that Nguyen's beating was the event of TODAY.

Tomorrow still had the other of the two sentences to carry out.

James was snapped back to the present by the damp washcloth being pressed to his left arm, causing a bloom of pain that shocked the breath out of him.

"He got you once." She said as she inspected the long line of a graze from the pistol. "Should've worn your armor."

James looked at the wound, noticing it for the first time since the fight.

"No." He said as he saw her hand light up with familiar amber light. "Let that one stay."

"It might scar." She said. "I mean, probably not on this arm. But it might."

"It's fine." He said. "Just leave it. He earned that much at least."

"For being so mad at him you sure do show him a lot of respect." She said in response. "Why?"

James took a deep breath.

"Same reason I didn't think he deserved any of it in the first place." He said painfully. "I don't think you Petravian soldiers understand the level of indoctrination us Earth soldiers go through."

"You mean when it comes to him not arresting the Major?" She asked.

He nodded. "It's more difficult than I think you realize." He said. "The military puts a LOT of work into getting us to fall in line with its rules. It's difficult to get one of us to do anything contrary to them. Especially something as big as relieving an officer of command. And especially given the circumstances they were facing at the time." He looked up at her and she could see the roiling sea of emotions going on behind his eyes. "And for a career soldier like him? Probably over twenty years in the uniform?"

"And yet he still should have." She countered.

James nodded before his head dropped and his shoulder sagged.

"That's the only thing that let me justify going through with it." He admitted.

Then he fell back into the water, startling her, and let its coldness shock some feeling back into him as he let himself sink to the bottom of the tub.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zr2s1d/wait_is_this_just_gate_284/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (282/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Episode..... (looks up)..... 282 of "James if you literally just took five seconds to unfuck your brain you might not be in this mess"

And also Joey being... god... just... the best. Even if it's painful.

Enjoy.

\~

IT was well past sundown when James finally finished reading the papers he'd set to going through. Amina had stopped by a few times to change the few bandages she still had to wear, and to change into formal, unarmored, clothes for official business. She'd seen how upset James was and the two had shared only a few words. She'd known what his meeting with the king had been about the day before so she'd already known WHY he was mad.

When he finally set the papers aside he rubbed his face with his hands and looked at the remaining two thirds of the paperwork that was still left.

He'd grown more and more frustrated and stressed with each page he finished.

He'd warned Amina and the King about just how good the Governments of his world were at legal papers. He should have listened to his own advice and looked closer at the papers before signing them.

"So fuckin stupid." He muttered to himself as he ruffled his hair and stood up. He swigged from the bottle just in time for someone to knock at the door.

"Hey fool! Get your wolf hand off your dick and open up!" Demanded the familiar voice of his friend Batty.

James rushed over to the door with a look of curiosity on his face. When he opened it he saw his friend, standing on his own two feet. Though he was sweating and leaning on the door frame.

"Shit man." He said as he stepped aside. "What are you doing here? And you're walking? Hell yeah!"

"Just got out of the wheelchair today." Batty replied with a smile as he slowly stepped through the door. "Could use a normal one though. That was a long fuckin walk."

James eagerly took his friends arm and helped him over to the very chair he'd just vacated.

"Shiiiit." Batty said as he looked at all the papers scattered across the table. "You catch an article or some shit?" He asked.

James plopped down on the chair that Amina usually sat in and slumped back.

"Worse." He said.

"Worse?" Batty wondered. "They reclass you as a cook or something." He looked up with mock horror. "Don't tell me they're making you S-one? Or S-four?"

James laughed despite his stress.

Batty smiled. "Man I just came to let you know I was only a few steps from whoopin' you at basketball again. What's goin on man?"

James told him. Batty had already heard about the battle. He had been in the healing ward alongside the wounded from it after all. He'd also suspected that the Major would end up with a life or death sentence. The First Sergeant's fate was a surprise to him. But he also admitted that it wasn't exactly shocking.

But when James told him of HIS role in their sentences Batty sympathized. The idea of having to carry those out made him uncomfortable too.

"That's fucked up man." He said after James was done with the whole thing. "Sucks for Top too. But... at least he'll live."

"That's the only upside to it." James replied as he reached over to the table and scattered the papers a bit more. "And there aint a loophole in here big enough to breath through. Least not in the first twenty pages."

The two sat for a minute thinking the whole thing over. Batty took a sip from the liquor bottle curiously. He grimaced as he set it back down.

"Ugh. That's like someone made vodka out of habaneros. How do you drink that?" He asked.

"Painfully." James admitted. "Tastes a lot better if you mix it with cider. Some kind of chemical reaction. Makes it closer to fireball."

"You're a sick man Choi." Batty replied. Then he reached out with his leg and kicked James's foot to get his attention. James looked over curiously. "What'd Nguyen say when you told him about what's gonna happen?"

James looked at him in surprise.

"Shit." He said. "I didn't."

Batty kicked him again, harder this time, causing James to sit up straight and grab his leg in shock.

"Fool." He said as James looked at him with mild annoyance. "Go ask HIM first."

\----------

Joey walked through the hallways nervously as he went. He hadn't told his mother where he was going.

He'd bathed, and had one of the castle groomers give him a haircut. And while he'd been tempted to shave, he'd instead asked for a simple trim. He hadn't been sure what he wanted his facial hair to look like, so he'd asked the groomer if his brother had ever come through. The grey-haired orc had nodded, and Joey had simply asked for the same kind of cut since they had similar faces. The orc had nodded again.

An hour later Joey had walked out smelling like vanilla and citrus and with a pointed goatee and a simple mustache.

And now he was walking down the halls, doing what he could to avoid being noticed while also trying not to look suspicious, toward a door that he'd needed to come knock on for a while now.

Every few minutes he would tap his pocket nervously, checking to see if the headband and amulet were still there.

Eventually, after numerous odd looks and whispered questions, that he intentionally ignored, he arrived at the familiarly odd door.

He paused before he reached the slightly off colored stone in the wall that he'd noted as being the door's limit of perception. He had gone over what he was about to do countless times since he'd been brought out of his funk by James, and subsequently realized what he needed to do.

"Good evening Apprentice Choi." The door said in its odd voice, startling him somewhat. Maybe he had been wrong about the door's abilities. "It is good to see you again."

"Hello. May I come in?" He asked as he moved closer, avoiding the gaze of the eye near the door's center. The door had learned early that he didn't do well with eye contact, and so always made sure to keep them minimal when he approached.

"Certainly." It replied after a moment before receding.

"Joey?" Veliry's voice rang out. "Come in! Just give me one second."

Joey stepped into the laboratory hesitantly and waited. He heard a few strikes of what he assumed was a hammer on some metal. Then Veliry came out of one of the back rooms and approached him eagerly with a smile and her arms outstretched for a hug.

Joey held up a hand in warding and she stopped, a look of concern on her face.

"Is everything okay?" She asked. "I'm glad you're out and about again. Also nice beard. Looks just like James's."

"Thank you." He said as he fumbled the amulet out of his pocket and held it up. "And I came to say thank you for helping me out." He took a deep breath. "In the desert. Also, I'm sorry if I scared you."

Veliry took the amulet gingerly.

"Joey. What's going on?" She asked.

Joey gulped nervously. "I.... I think I should stop learning magic Miss Veliry." He said.

"What?" She asked.

"I.... I'm sorry." He continued. "This ISN'T your fault." He could feel tears forming on his eyes and he struggled to hold them in. "I should have known when I began, that... that my brain... and how it works... might make magic a dangerous thing to have. And I don't want to be..." He gulped again. "I don't want to be dangerous. I don't want to hurt anyone. Not even by accident. Not again."

"Joseph that wasn't your fault." She tried to say. But as she approached he stepped back.

"It is." He said. "Everyone keeps acting like it isn't because I can't help how I am. But it IS." He said sternly, his hands up to keep her back. "I knew I wasn't typical and I jumped into a field where that could be a problem. And then it was. That makes it more my fault than anyone else's. I should have known better." He lowered his hands and smoothed his pants a bit with one to cover up the fact that his leg was twitching. "I'm sorry but I don't think that beginning my training again would be in anyone's best interest."

He moved to turn away, but Veliry placed a hand on his shoulder and turned him back.

"But I could teach you how to control it better." She said. "With training we can get past this."

Joey shook her off by dipping his shoulder.

"But I'd have to get STRONGER for that to happen." He said. "That's what you taught me. Advancement means greater power. What happens if I get stronger and I slip? Or if I get overwhelmed again? Get... get scared again?" He asked as a tear rolled down his cheek. "I KILLED someone Miss Veliry. And all they did was slip in the sand. And I hurt myself." He said as he looked down at the light scars on his hand. "And I hurt James. I've hurt James before but NEVER like that. It was nothing but luck that he'd already been hurt that way." She could hear the fear in his voice as he admitted the fact. "Rule one: Don't hurt people." He said softly to himself.

She wanted to say something in response. To let him know that at some point almost EVERY mage had caused an unwanted death. That all but the most stone-hearted casters would have a crisis of identity about that fact at some point. And that him being so upset by it was, if anything, a good thing.

But before she could, Joey bowed slightly.

"Thank you for being my teacher Miss Veliry. I hope we can remain close moving forward." He said quickly.

And before she could respond he turned and walked quickly away. Leaving her there, confused and holding a headband in her hands.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zq6cd0/wait_is_this_just_gate_283/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (282/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Episode..... (looks up)..... 282 of "James if you literally just took five seconds to unfuck your brain you might not be in this mess"

And also Joey being... god... just... the best. Even if it's painful.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

It was well past sundown when James finally finished reading the papers he'd set to going through. Amina had stopped by a few times to change the few bandages she still had to wear, and to change into formal, unarmored, clothes for official business. She'd seen how upset James was and the two had shared only a few words. She'd known what his meeting with the king had been about the day before so she'd already known WHY he was mad.

When he finally set the papers aside he rubbed his face with his hands and looked at the remaining two thirds of the paperwork that was still left.

He'd grown more and more frustrated and stressed with each page he finished.

He'd warned Amina and the King about just how good the Governments of his world were at legal papers. He should have listened to his own advice and looked closer at the papers before signing them.

"So fuckin stupid." He muttered to himself as he ruffled his hair and stood up. He swigged from the bottle just in time for someone to knock at the door.

"Hey fool! Get your wolf hand off your dick and open up!" Demanded the familiar voice of his friend Batty.

James rushed over to the door with a look of curiosity on his face. When he opened it he saw his friend, standing on his own two feet. Though he was sweating and leaning on the door frame.

"Shit man." He said as he stepped aside. "What are you doing here? And you're walking? Hell yeah!"

"Just got out of the wheelchair today." Batty replied with a smile as he slowly stepped through the door. "Could use a normal one though. That was a long fuckin walk."

James eagerly took his friends arm and helped him over to the very chair he'd just vacated.

"Shiiiit." Batty said as he looked at all the papers scattered across the table. "You catch an article or some shit?" He asked.

James plopped down on the chair that Amina usually sat in and slumped back.

"Worse." He said.

"Worse?" Batty wondered. "They reclass you as a cook or something." He looked up with mock horror. "Don't tell me they're making you S-one? Or S-four?"

James laughed despite his stress.

Batty smiled. "Man I just came to let you know I was only a few steps from whoopin' you at basketball again. What's goin on man?"

James told him. Batty had already heard about the battle. He had been in the healing ward alongside the wounded from it after all. He'd also suspected that the Major would end up with a life or death sentence. The First Sergeant's fate was a surprise to him. But he also admitted that it wasn't exactly shocking.

But when James told him of HIS role in their sentences Batty sympathized. The idea of having to carry those out made him uncomfortable too.

"That's fucked up man." He said after James was done with the whole thing. "Sucks for Top too. But... at least he'll live."

"That's the only upside to it." James replied as he reached over to the table and scattered the papers a bit more. "And there aint a loophole in here big enough to breath through. Least not in the first twenty pages."

The two sat for a minute thinking the whole thing over. Batty took a sip from the liquor bottle curiously. He grimaced as he set it back down.

"Ugh. That's like someone made vodka out of habaneros. How do you drink that?" He asked.

"Painfully." James admitted. "Tastes a lot better if you mix it with cider. Some kind of chemical reaction. Makes it closer to fireball."

"You're a sick man Choi." Batty replied. Then he reached out with his leg and kicked James's foot to get his attention. James looked over curiously. "What'd Nguyen say when you told him about what's gonna happen?"

James looked at him in surprise.

"Shit." He said. "I didn't."

Batty kicked him again, harder this time, causing James to sit up straight and grab his leg in shock.

"Fool." He said as James looked at him with mild annoyance. "Go ask HIM first."

\---

Joey walked through the hallways nervously as he went. He hadn't told his mother where he was going.

He'd bathed, and had one of the castle groomers give him a haircut. And while he'd been tempted to shave, he'd instead asked for a simple trim. He hadn't been sure what he wanted his facial hair to look like, so he'd asked the groomer if his brother had ever come through. The grey-haired orc had nodded, and Joey had simply asked for the same kind of cut since they had similar faces. The orc had nodded again.

An hour later Joey had walked out smelling like vanilla and citrus and with a pointed goatee and a simple mustache.

And now he was walking down the halls, doing what he could to avoid being noticed while also trying not to look suspicious, toward a door that he'd needed to come knock on for a while now.

Every few minutes he would tap his pocket nervously, checking to see if the headband and amulet were still there.

Eventually, after numerous odd looks and whispered questions, that he intentionally ignored, he arrived at the familiarly odd door.

He paused before he reached the slightly off colored stone in the wall that he'd noted as being the door's limit of perception. He had gone over what he was about to do countless times since he'd been brought out of his funk by James, and subsequently realized what he needed to do.

"Good evening Apprentice Choi." The door said in its odd voice, startling him somewhat. Maybe he had been wrong about the door's abilities. "It is good to see you again."

"Hello. May I come in?" He asked as he moved closer, avoiding the gaze of the eye near the door's center. The door had learned early that he didn't do well with eye contact, and so always made sure to keep them minimal when he approached.

"Certainly." It replied after a moment before receding.

"Joey?" Veliry's voice rang out. "Come in! Just give me one second."

Joey stepped into the laboratory hesitantly and waited. He heard a few strikes of what he assumed was a hammer on some metal. Then Veliry came out of one of the back rooms and approached him eagerly with a smile and her arms outstretched for a hug.

Joey held up a hand in warding and she stopped, a look of concern on her face.

"Is everything okay?" She asked. "I'm glad you're out and about again. Also nice beard. Looks just like James's."

"Thank you." He said as he fumbled the amulet out of his pocket and held it up. "And I came to say thank you for helping me out." He took a deep breath. "In the desert. Also, I'm sorry if I scared you."

Veliry took the amulet gingerly.

"Joey. What's going on?" She asked.

Joey gulped nervously. "I.... I think I should stop learning magic Miss Veliry." He said.

"What?" She asked.

"I.... I'm sorry." He continued. "This ISN'T your fault." He could feel tears forming on his eyes and he struggled to hold them in. "I should have known when I began, that... that my brain... and how it works... might make magic a dangerous thing to have. And I don't want to be..." He gulped again. "I don't want to be dangerous. I don't want to hurt anyone. Not even by accident. Not again."

"Joseph that wasn't your fault." She tried to say. But as she approached he stepped back.

"It is." He said. "Everyone keeps acting like it isn't because I can't help how I am. But it IS." He said sternly, his hands up to keep her back. "I knew I wasn't typical and I jumped into a field where that could be a problem. And then it was. That makes it more my fault than anyone else's. I should have known better." He lowered his hands and smoothed his pants a bit with one to cover up the fact that his leg was twitching. "I'm sorry but I don't think that beginning my training again would be in anyone's best interest."

He moved to turn away, but Veliry placed a hand on his shoulder and turned him back.

"But I could teach you how to control it better." She said. "With training we can get past this."

Joey shook her off by dipping his shoulder.

"But I'd have to get STRONGER for that to happen." He said. "That's what you taught me. Advancement means greater power. What happens if I get stronger and I slip? Or if I get overwhelmed again? Get... get scared again?" He asked as a tear rolled down his cheek. "I KILLED someone Miss Veliry. And all they did was slip in the sand. And I hurt myself." He said as he looked down at the light scars on his hand. "And I hurt James. I've hurt James before but NEVER like that. It was nothing but luck that he'd already been hurt that way." She could hear the fear in his voice as he admitted the fact. "Rule one: Don't hurt people." He said softly to himself.

She wanted to say something in response. To let him know that at some point almost EVERY mage had caused an unwanted death. That all but the most stone-hearted casters would have a crisis of identity about that fact at some point. And that him being so upset by it was, if anything, a good thing.

But before she could, Joey bowed slightly.

"Thank you for being my teacher Miss Veliry. I hope we can remain close moving forward." He said quickly.

And before she could respond he turned and walked quickly away. Leaving her there, confused and holding a headband in her hands.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zq6b1y/wait_is_this_just_gate_283/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (281/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Sorry if yesterday's absence surprised you. Work got a bit backed up yesterday and by the time it got not-backed-up I was just not down to write.

And look at that. James actually does the smart thing for a change. READ THE FINE PRINT JAMES. READ THE FINE PRINT!

Enjoy.

\~

"You do appear... less... lupine." Dr. Munro said hesitantly. "And I think you are a few inches shorter. Of course, I'm barely five two so... it can be hard for me to tell. How do you feel?"

Samantha Jenkins studied her fingers with just a glimmer of hope. The nails were shorter, rounder, and just a bit lighter in color.

When she'd looked in the mirror that morning, as both an exercise in coping AND to clean herself up, she'd noticed that her teeth were somewhat stubbier, and that her eyes were less of a yellow and more of a dark amber. Her ears had seemed lower to her. It had made her wonder if she was imagining things.

"Good." She replied. "Does..... does this mean I'm becoming human again?"

"I... I don't know." The doctor answered honestly. "Let me check some things." She said as she moved to her desk and began typing at her computer. She also picked up the phone there and hit one of the speed dial buttons.

Samantha held the small hand mirror that the doctor had given her, back when they'd first started working together, and pulled her lips back to check the teeth again.

"Hi Miranda." Doctor Munro said into the phone, still typing as she pressed it to her shoulder. "Yes. Corporal Jenkins has had a bit of a development. Can you please put me in touch with Dr. Wilder or Dr. Esteves. Whichever one is available, or their aides if they aren't..... Yeah, that's fine." She focused on the computer for a moment. "Well.

That may be part of the reason." She said as she saw something on the screen. "Samantha?" She called with one hand while the other held the phone in place. Samantha looked over and the doctor waved her over.

Samantha walked over hestitantly, putting the hand mirror into her hoodie pocket as she did. Was she ready to see the answer that the doctor had potentially found? She didn't have much of a choice.

She looked over the doctor's shoulder as she slid her chair sideways. "Yes. I'm still here." Dr. Munro said as the person on the other end said something. "Fantastic. Thank you Miranda."

Samantha looked at the screen. On it was two calendars. One of the calendars had notes written on it. The header read "CPL JENKINS PROGRESS". The other was pulled up on a web browser. Each day had an image of the moon, and tracked it's cycle through the month.

She looked down at the date in the corner of the screen. Then matched it to the one on the calendar.

They were only a week away from a new moon.

She felt her head and shoulders fall in defeat. The answer was just more werewolf stuff. She was simply changing with the moon like a cliche.

She was about to walk back around the desk when the doctor, who was still conversing with whoever she'd gotten a hold of, slapped her shoulder lightly. She looked over and the doctor pointed at one of the days on HER calendar.

She looked at it and saw a note that said. "Day of incident.". The one next to it read "CPL Jenkins brought in while still sedated."

She looked at it curiously. Her head tilted a bit subconsciously. Then she looked over at the lunar calendar.

Her head tilted even more.

"Wait ho-" She began.

She was cut off by Doctor Munro's hand waving for silence as she listened to the phone.

"Thank you Doctor Wilder that helps quite a bit." She said before listening to a bit more. "That's fantastic..... No. No I don't think we're at that point yet. Though she has expressed some interest in meeting them. Hopefully we can make that happen soon." She slid over and looked like she was about to hang up. "Sounds good. I'll ask her, she's right here..... You too. Alright bye." She said before placing the phone back in its cradle.

"If the moon is causing this change of mine as we get closer to the new moon, than how did I change INTO this DURING a new moon?" She asked as the doctor faced her.

"That was exactly what I was wondering." Doctor Munro answered. "And that was one of the other psychiatrists dealing with someone else in a similar position to yourself. He said that they are experiencing a similar change. I'm willing to bet that Doctor Esteves would say the same."

"And you want me to meet the people they're taking care of?" Samantha asked curiously. "Why?"

"Eventually." The Doctor answered. "Once you're a bit more adjusted to your situation. And them to theirs. In the mean time I'm still curious about this shift. I wonder how far it will go. Will the new moon see you looking full human again? And what happens when the new moon passes?"

"That's what I was about to ask." Samantha agreed. "More or less."

"Well." The doctor continued. "I suppose the only way to know for sure is to go through it, and pray to whatever 'GOD' it was that supposedly gave you this power that the new moon means you're back to normal. Maybe it'll mark the end of this. In the mean time, lets go to the exam room so we can take a few pictures for data's sake."

Samantha sighed. She really didn't like the exam room. Something about it made her uncomfortable, even though she'd never had problems with doctors visits before.

"Okay." She said glumly as she stood back up to follow the doctor.

"Hey Samantha?" Doctor Munro said.

"Yeah?"

"You spent several minutes looking at yourself in the mirror just now." The doctor answered. "That's got to be a new record."

She paused as she thought about it, pulling the mirror from her pocket as she did and looking at her eyes again. They seemed even darker than this morning, though that could've been just a matter of lighting.

"Huh. I guess I did." She admitted.

\----------

James was lucky, and to an extent happy, to find his and Amina's room empty by the time he made it back. He didn't want to have to explain the situation a second time in one day. Plus, she'd already known the message that the King had had for him.

But also he just wanted to have a chance to vent without upsetting anyone.

He stomped over to the table that he'd set the papers on after he'd signed them and returned. He grabbed them off the table, then walked over to the small bar that Amina had in their room and pulled out some of the liquor there.

James sat with the papers and the bottle and began reading.

He hated legal paperwork.

\--------------------

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.

It didn't help that the small room was completely devoid of detail. Not just in the sense of being boring either. It was made of a completely flat, almost glass like, grey stone, as if it were the most expertly polished concrete in existence.

He was about to slam his fist into one of the walls when a section of the opposite wall opened, allowing light into the otherwise bland room. A short woman stepped peeked in hesitantly. Her eyes widened as she saw him and she rushed in.

"We've finally found you!" She exclaimed as she got near.

Driscoll stepped back with his remaining hand in a defensive position.

She paused in her stride and held her hands up in a non threatening gesture.

"Woah! Woah Chief Driscoll." She said as she slowed. "I'm not an enemy. I'm here to get you out of here."

"Who are you?" He asked.

"My name is Andressa." She replied. "We've been trying to find you for weeks now."

"Who has?" He asked. "Where are we? Did you say two weeks?"

"I'm with the Petravian Military." She said. "After the battle the Guardian- that's the man that used the spiders to subdue you, took you into the deep dark and handed you over to the agency." She said as she approached. "Once they realized you were missing your government negotiated for a rescure operation. Apparently your suit is too valuable for them to just let you fall into agency hands."

That.... sounded correct to Driscoll. But there was something wrong with this woman. He didn't know how but he felt like he knew her somehow. He pulled up his recent video records. But there were just too many missing sections, and too much missing time.

"Have we.... met?" He asked. "Why do I feel like I know you?"

"I don't know." She said. "I'm just part of the recovery party. We're mostly mages. The Agency's facilities are almost always filled with poison. Your suit is protecting you. I'm using magic to breath. but we've also got someone called a.... too-lee?" She said uncertainly. "He's wearing a big puffy suit."

"You've got a toolie with you?" He asked as he looked down at his mangled arm.

"Yes. But we've got to g-" She began before he heard an explosion from somewhere out in the hallway beyond. "Shit. They still haven't gotten that golem out of the way." She jogged over and took his good hand. "Come on. We need to go."

Driscoll let her lead him for a moment. But something nagged at the back of his mind.

"Something's wrong." He said inside his helmet..

"Yeah I know." She said as she pulled him.

Driscoll froze in place. His hand locked onto hers with increasing pressure, causing her to jerk to a halt.

"What are you doing?" She asked.

"What recovery phrase were you told to say?" He asked as the pressure continued to grow.

"What?" She asked.

He pulled her back a bit. "Standard SOP is to provide non-squad recovery personnel with a phrase to say to a downed or captured operator to assure them that you're a friendly."

Driscoll applied more pressure. Her hand made a slight cracking noise.

"Ow! What the hells?" She exclaimed as she struggled to loose her hand. "Errr. Shit! What was the phrase they gave us?" She asked as he heard bones begin to creak.

"I didn't say anything out loud." He said calmly. "I didn't chin my speaker on. You shouldn't have been able to hear me."

"What?" She wondered.

Driscoll crushed her hand even further and she began cursing.

"I said 'something's wrong'." He informed her. "But I didn't tell my suit to let you hear that. So why did you respond to it."

"I'm using magic." She said hastily. "I can hear more than a normal person."

Driscoll pressed his hand shut, crushing her hand into pulp.

"Bullshit." He said.

She screamed and brought her other hand up. Lightning started to form near her finger tips.

Driscoll swung her by her crushed hand and slammed her into the ground hard enough to break her arm.

Then he kicked her in the ribs and sent her flying into the wall nearby. He watched with satisfaction as she slumped to the ground limp.

There was a loud roar of some alien origin outside the room, followed by another explosion.

Driscoll turned and began walking toward the newly revealed door.

He almost made it before his heard her speak again. He was surprised that his suit didn't ping any movement as he turned and saw her moving to stand up.

"Damn." She said, her voice less concerned now, and a touch deeper. "This one's on me. We need to find out if that phrase thing is real too." She said.

"What the fuck?" He asked as he turned around to approach her again.

Suddenly his view changed. He felt a moment of panic as he realized that he was no longer looking at the inside of his helmet anymore. Instead he was looking at a room with a couple of people staring at him with looks of annoyance.

"Who the hell are you?" He yelled. "What is this?" He asked as he struggled to free his arms and legs from the dark matter that was engulfing them.

"Same questions every time." One of the people said in a nasal voice. "Lets reset and see if we can confirm that phrase thing."

"Attempt what? One hundred thirty seven now?" Someone who looked like a taller, leaner version of the woman he'd just tried to kill.

"One thirty eight." The nasal man said. He touched something on a table that began glowing a dark pink color.

And, as he struggled against his bonds, Driscoll went back to the grey room.

And so did his memory.

\----------

Batty wavered as he slowly stood to his feet.

"No no." He said as the healer next to him reached out to help steady him. "I got it miss Pansa." He said as he stretched back and forth a bit, flexing his abdominal muscles as he did. "I got it."

"For the last time mister Batista; it's just Pansa." The healer said. "How does it feel?"

"It'll be MISS Pansa until you stop calling me MISTER Batista and just start calling me Batty." He shot back. "Or for dinner." He said with a devilish grin that made the older woman blush a bit. "And it's still stiff. But..... tight. Tight's more accurate. But not bad."

"Good." Pansa said. "Now the real trick."

"Toes?" He asked. She nodded. "Great. Yeah. Let's give it a go."

Slowly, and with great exertion, Batty bent forward and reached down to touch his toes. The trick was that he wasn't allowed to just drop. It had to be a slow drop. After roughly ten seconds he was touching his toes.

"Got it." He said with a deep breath.

"You know that's not the real test." She said sternly.

"I know." He said. "But I can always hope that you forgot."

"Come on Mister Batista. Back up."

Batty took several quick, deep breaths.

Then, slowly, and shakily, he began to rise back up. There were a few moments when he felt himself flagging and almost dropped back down. But, after nearly half a minute and with more than a bit of sweat beading on his face, Batty stood back up.

He swayed just a bit and Pansa steadied him.

"You good dear?" She asked.

Batty breathed deeply as he wiped the sweat from his brow.

"Yeah." He said after a moment. "Yeah. Just... like I said; still tight."

"But you're up." She said with a smile. "You're finally healed. Now it's just a matter of strengthening."

"And I can do that myself." He said. "Weekly checks now, right?"

"That's right. You're all done here." She said with a smile. "And no more wheel chair."

Batty nodded as he reached over to the pitcher of water nearby.

"Yaaaay." He said sarcastically as he grabbed the pitcher and drank directly from it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/znsyno/wait_is_this_just_gate_282/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (281/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Sorry if yesterday's absence surprised you. Work got a bit backed up yesterday and by the time it got not-backed-up I was just not down to write.

And look at that. James actually does the smart thing for a change. READ THE FINE PRINT JAMES. READ THE FINE PRINT!

Enjoy.

\~

"You do appear... less... lupine." Dr. Munro said hesitantly. "And I think you are a few inches shorter. Of course, I'm barely five two so... it can be hard for me to tell. How do you feel?"

Samantha Jenkins studied her fingers with just a glimmer of hope. The nails were shorter, rounder, and just a bit lighter in color.

When she'd looked in the mirror that morning, as both an exercise in coping AND to clean herself up, she'd noticed that her teeth were somewhat stubbier, and that her eyes were less of a yellow and more of a dark amber. Her ears had seemed lower to her. It had made her wonder if she was imagining things.

"Good." She replied. "Does..... does this mean I'm becoming human again?"

"I... I don't know." The doctor answered honestly. "Let me check some things." She said as she moved to her desk and began typing at her computer. She also picked up the phone there and hit one of the speed dial buttons.

Samantha held the small hand mirror that the doctor had given her, back when they'd first started working together, and pulled her lips back to check the teeth again.

"Hi Miranda." Doctor Munro said into the phone, still typing as she pressed it to her shoulder. "Yes. Corporal Jenkins has had a bit of a development. Can you please put me in touch with Dr. Wilder or Dr. Esteves. Whichever one is available, or their aides if they aren't..... Yeah, that's fine." She focused on the computer for a moment. "Well. That may be part of the reason." She said as she saw something on the screen. "Samantha?" She called with one hand while the other held the phone in place. Samantha looked over and the doctor waved her over.

Samantha walked over hestitantly, putting the hand mirror into her hoodie pocket as she did. Was she ready to see the answer that the doctor had potentially found? She didn't have much of a choice.

She looked over the doctor's shoulder as she slid her chair sideways. "Yes. I'm still here." Dr. Munro said as the person on the other end said something. "Fantastic. Thank you Miranda."

Samantha looked at the screen. On it was two calendars. One of the calendars had notes written on it. The header read "CPL JENKINS PROGRESS". The other was pulled up on a web browser. Each day had an image of the moon, and tracked it's cycle through the month.

She looked down at the date in the corner of the screen. Then matched it to the one on the calendar.

They were only a week away from a new moon.

She felt her head and shoulders fall in defeat. The answer was just more werewolf stuff. She was simply changing with the moon like a cliche.

She was about to walk back around the desk when the doctor, who was still conversing with whoever she'd gotten a hold of, slapped her shoulder lightly. She looked over and the doctor pointed at one of the days on HER calendar.

She looked at it and saw a note that said. "Day of incident.". The one next to it read "CPL Jenkins brought in while still sedated."

She looked at it curiously. Her head tilted a bit subconsciously. Then she looked over at the lunar calendar.

Her head tilted even more.

"Wait ho-" She began.

She was cut off by Doctor Munro's hand waving for silence as she listened to the phone.

"Thank you Doctor Wilder that helps quite a bit." She said before listening to a bit more. "That's fantastic..... No. No I don't think we're at that point yet. Though she has expressed some interest in meeting them. Hopefully we can make that happen soon." She slid over and looked like she was about to hang up. "Sounds good. I'll ask her, she's right here..... You too. Alright bye." She said before placing the phone back in its cradle.

"If the moon is causing this change of mine as we get closer to the new moon, than how did I change INTO this DURING a new moon?" She asked as the doctor faced her.

"That was exactly what I was wondering." Doctor Munro answered. "And that was one of the other psychiatrists dealing with someone else in a similar position to yourself. He said that they are experiencing a similar change. I'm willing to bet that Doctor Esteves would say the same."

"And you want me to meet the people they're taking care of?" Samantha asked curiously. "Why?"

"Eventually." The Doctor answered. "Once you're a bit more adjusted to your situation. And them to theirs. In the mean time I'm still curious about this shift. I wonder how far it will go. Will the new moon see you looking full human again? And what happens when the new moon passes?"

"That's what I was about to ask." Samantha agreed. "More or less."

"Well." The doctor continued. "I suppose the only way to know for sure is to go through it, and pray to whatever 'GOD' it was that supposedly gave you this power that the new moon means you're back to normal. Maybe it'll mark the end of this. In the mean time, lets go to the exam room so we can take a few pictures for data's sake."

Samantha sighed. She really didn't like the exam room. Something about it made her uncomfortable, even though she'd never had problems with doctors visits before.

"Okay." She said glumly as she stood back up to follow the doctor.

"Hey Samantha?" Doctor Munro said.

"Yeah?"

"You spent several minutes looking at yourself in the mirror just now." The doctor answered. "That's got to be a new record."

She paused as she thought about it, pulling the mirror from her pocket as she did and looking at her eyes again. They seemed even darker than this morning, though that could've been just a matter of lighting.

"Huh. I guess I did." She admitted.

\----------

James was lucky, and to an extent happy, to find his and Amina's room empty by the time he made it back. He didn't want to have to explain the situation a second time in one day. Plus, she'd already known the message that the King had had for him.

But also he just wanted to have a chance to vent without upsetting anyone.

He stomped over to the table that he'd set the papers on after he'd signed them and returned. He grabbed them off the table, then walked over to the small bar that Amina had in their room and pulled out some of the liquor there.

James sat with the papers and the bottle and began reading.

He hated legal paperwork.

\--------------------

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.

It didn't help that the small room was completely devoid of detail. Not just in the sense of being boring either. It was made of a completely flat, almost glass like, grey stone, as if it were the most expertly polished concrete in existence.

He was about to slam his fist into one of the walls when a section of the opposite wall opened, allowing light into the otherwise bland room. A short woman stepped peeked in hesitantly. Her eyes widened as she saw him and she rushed in.

"We've finally found you!" She exclaimed as she got near.

Driscoll stepped back with his remaining hand in a defensive position.

She paused in her stride and held her hands up in a non threatening gesture.

"Woah! Woah Chief Driscoll." She said as she slowed. "I'm not an enemy. I'm here to get you out of here."

"Who are you?" He asked.

"My name is Andressa." She replied. "We've been trying to find you for weeks now."

"Who has?" He asked. "Where are we? Did you say two weeks?"

"I'm with the Petravian Military." She said. "After the battle the Guardian- that's the man that used the spiders to subdue you, took you into the deep dark and handed you over to the agency." She said as she approached. "Once they realized you were missing your government negotiated for a rescure operation. Apparently your suit is too valuable for them to just let you fall into agency hands."

That.... sounded correct to Driscoll. But there was something wrong with this woman. He didn't know how but he felt like he knew her somehow. He pulled up his recent video records. But there were just too many missing sections, and too much missing time.

"Have we.... met?" He asked. "Why do I feel like I know you?"

"I don't know." She said. "I'm just part of the recovery party. We're mostly mages. The Agency's facilities are almost always filled with poison. Your suit is protecting you. I'm using magic to breath. but we've also got someone called a.... too-lee?" She said uncertainly. "He's wearing a big puffy suit."

"You've got a toolie with you?" He asked as he looked down at his mangled arm.

"Yes. But we've got to g-" She began before he heard an explosion from somewhere out in the hallway beyond. "Shit. They still haven't gotten that golem out of the way." She jogged over and took his good hand. "Come on. We need to go."

Driscoll let her lead him for a moment. But something nagged at the back of his mind.

"Something's wrong." He said inside his helmet..

"Yeah I know." She said as she pulled him.

Driscoll froze in place. His hand locked onto hers with increasing pressure, causing her to jerk to a halt.

"What are you doing?" She asked.

"What recovery phrase were you told to say?" He asked as the pressure continued to grow.

"What?" She asked.

He pulled her back a bit. "Standard SOP is to provide non-squad recovery personnel with a phrase to say to a downed or captured operator to assure them that you're a friendly."

Driscoll applied more pressure. Her hand made a slight cracking noise.

"Ow! What the hells?" She exclaimed as she struggled to loose her hand. "Errr. Shit! What was the phrase they gave us?" She asked as he heard bones begin to creak.

"I didn't say anything out loud." He said calmly. "I didn't chin my speaker on. You shouldn't have been able to hear me."

"What?" She wondered.

Driscoll crushed her hand even further and she began cursing.

"I said 'something's wrong'." He informed her. "But I didn't tell my suit to let you hear that. So why did you respond to it."

"I'm using magic." She said hastily. "I can hear more than a normal person."

Driscoll pressed his hand shut, crushing her hand into pulp.

"Bullshit." He said.

She screamed and brought her other hand up. Lightning started to form near her finger tips.

Driscoll swung her by her crushed hand and slammed her into the ground hard enough to break her arm.

Then he kicked her in the ribs and sent her flying into the wall nearby. He watched with satisfaction as she slumped to the ground limp.

There was a loud roar of some alien origin outside the room, followed by another explosion.

Driscoll turned and began walking toward the newly revealed door.

He'd almost made it before he heard her speak again. He was surprised that his suit didn't ping any movement as he turned and saw her moving to stand up.

"Damn." She said, her voice less concerned now, and a touch deeper. "This one's on me. We need to find out if that phrase thing is real too." She said.

"What the fuck?" He asked as he turned around to approach her again.

Suddenly his view changed. He felt a moment of panic as he realized that he was no longer looking at the inside of his helmet anymore. Instead he was looking at a room with a couple of people staring at him with looks of annoyance.

"Who the hell are you?" He yelled. "What is this?" He asked as he struggled to free his arms and legs from the dark matter that was engulfing them.

"Same questions every time." One of the people said in a nasal voice. "Lets reset and see if we can confirm that phrase thing."

"Attempt what? One hundred thirty seven now?" Someone who looked like a taller, leaner version of the woman he'd just tried to kill.

"One thirty eight." The nasal man said. He touched something on a table that began glowing a dark pink color.

And, as he struggled against his bonds, Driscoll went back to the grey room.

And so did his memory.

\----------

Batty wavered as he slowly stood to his feet.

"No no." He said as the healer next to him reached out to help steady him. "I got it miss Pansa." He said as he stretched back and forth a bit, flexing his abdominal muscles as he did. "I got it."

"For the last time mister Batista; it's just Pansa." The healer said. "How does it feel?"

"It'll be MISS Pansa until you stop calling me MISTER Batista and just start calling me Batty." He shot back. "Or for dinner." He said with a devilish grin that made the older woman blush a bit. "And it's still stiff. But..... tight. Tight's more accurate. But not bad."

"Good." Pansa said. "Now the real trick."

"Toes?" He asked. She nodded. "Great. Yeah. Let's give it a go."

Slowly, and with great exertion, Batty bent forward and reached down to touch his toes. The trick was that he wasn't allowed to just drop. It had to be a slow drop. After roughly ten seconds he was touching his toes.

"Got it." He said with a deep breath.

"You know that's not the real test." She said sternly.

"I know." He said. "But I can always hope that you forgot."

"Come on Mister Batista. Back up."

Batty took several quick, deep breaths.

Then, slowly, and shakily, he began to rise back up. There were a few moments when he felt himself flagging and almost dropped back down. But, after nearly half a minute and with more than a bit of sweat beading on his face, Batty stood back up.

He swayed just a bit and Pansa steadied him.

"You good dear?" She asked.

Batty breathed deeply as he wiped the sweat from his brow.

"Yeah." He said after a moment. "Yeah. Just... like I said; still tight."

"But you're up." She said with a smile. "You're finally healed. Now it's just a matter of strengthening."

"And I can do that myself." He said. "Weekly checks now, right?"

"That's right. You're all done here." She said with a smile. "And no more wheel chair."

Batty nodded as he reached over to the pitcher of water nearby.

"Yaaaay." He said sarcastically as he grabbed the pitcher and drank directly from it.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/znsx83/wait_is_this_just_gate_282/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (280/?)

Previous

Writer's note: The trullbyr is literally a bear sized tardigrade with troll regeneration. I HAVE SPOKEN!!!

Also, bottomless bags make having backup gear way easier for the adventurous backpacker.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

fault. You're just unlucky enough to be the poor little grunt stuck between two governments that are doing everything in their power to see who has the bigger dick. And you're getting fucked as a result."

"Graphic." James said sullenly. "Fuck am I supposed to do?"

Vickers sighed as he sat down.

"I don't see a lot of options dude." He said after a moment. "On the one hand I'm surprised the Pres accepted flogging as a punishment. But on the other hand; healing magic makes it a fairly light punishment if the King allows it.

"It's still not right." James countered. "And it's gonna be excruciating. And I still don't think he deserves it."

"That's just because you know the guy." Vickers replied. "And at the end of the day the King's right. He COULD have stopped the fight before it began and he didn't. Granted, you're also right. It's not that simple for people in uniform. Hard to break years and years of conditioning to follow orders. But that doesn't make him innocent. He had a choice. May not have been an easy choice. And it obviously didn't work out for him. But he did have that choice. And guess what Choi. This gets to be another lesson for you about the burdens of leadership CAPTAIN."

"So what? I should just do it?" James asked.

"Never said that." Vickers said with a shrug.

"Then what do I do?"

"That's up to you." Vickers replied. "You said that part of your new duties was to come up with solutions for punishments that aren't kosher right?"

"Yeah." James answered.

"Supposed to offer alternatives right?"

"Yeah." James repeated.

Vickers shrugged again. "Well than. Find an alternative."

"Like what?"

"I don't know man. What about that trial by combat shit you did with Prince Asshole or whatever?" Vickers replied with a wave of his hand. "Hell, with the differences in your abilities you could kick the crap out of him, which'll please the King, while still giving him a shot at sticking up for himself. That oughta at least give you a bit of relief or whatever."

"Yeah, if the King goes for it." James countered.

Vickers shrugged one more time. "So put some teeth on the ground. Really thrash him. Give a pound of flesh and it oughta work. Even the King will know how much of a power disparity there is between you two."

"I don't know man." James said as he rubbed the bruise forming on his stomach. "Still doesn't feel right. And what about the major."

"Fuckin' kill her." Vickers said as simply as if he was stating the weather. "That bitch is fuckin' crazy."

"What?" James asked incredulously. "That's your solution to me not wanting to outright EXECUTE someone?"

Vickers nodded. "Yep." He said. "Saw her get interviewed by the King's people. She is grade-A nutso. Got a feeling you'd save everyone on both sides a lot of trouble if you just walked over to her cell and gave her a triple tap."

"Dude." James said in disgust.

Vickers held his hands up in a "what are you gonna do?" gesture.

"Hey, you were the one that actually spoke to her out on the sands." Vickers said as he leaned back. "You saw how blood thirsty she was. Even said so yourself. During the interview she was all rank, name, D.O.D. number and that's it. She's a fuckin zealot man. Hooah dialed all the way to eleven and then snapped off trying to go even further."

"That doesn't mean she deserves execution." James said uncomfortably.

"No. THAT doesn't." Vickers agreed. "But openly committing an act of war against an allied nation and giving orders that are war crimes in all but technicality do. She'd get the needle back on Earth, that's for sure." He nodded a bit. "Least beheading is a bit quicker."

"I still shouldn't be the one holding the axe." James said in exasperation. He hated that Vickers was right.

"No." Vickers admitted. "But it looks like the legalese says you gotta. And if it keeps our guys from sending over a nuke, or the King from sending a bunch of Elementals to home, then.... well... it's a small sacrifice from one guy for a bit less bloodshed." His eyes darkened as he recalled something he'd never tell James, or anyone else for that matter. "I've done worse for less." He admitted.

The two of them sat in tense silence for several minutes while James held his head in his hands and thought.

"Fuck." He said after a while.

"Yeah." Vickers agreed.

"I gotta go read that paperwork." James said.

"That'll be a nice change for you." Vickers replied.

"Fuck off." James shot back venomously as he grabbed his uniform jacket and stood up. "First I gotta go hit the healers. I think that punch knocked something loose again. At least it feels that way."

"It was a clean shot though." Vickers said as he also stood up, flexing his hand and forming some frost on it as he did. "Gotta admit that much."

"I'll get you back for that by the way." James said in response as he gingerly opened the door.

"Sure you will." Vickers said with a devilish grin.

Behind them the communication hub sat silently.

A small red light pulsed on the back of it. It had been pulsing ever since the table it was on had felt an impact from the two men fighting.

\----------

"Was that a Trullbyr?" Artair asked as he wiped some of its gore off of his left hand scimitar with some of the creatures fur.

"Yes." Kor'Os replied as she cleaned her own great-sword with a rag and then tossed it into the new bonfire. "They're common enough this close to the Druidic lands."

"I though they were supposed to be tougher than that?" He said in a disappointing tone. "But that was remarkably easy."

Kor'Os nodded. "Having a drake that can breath fire made it a lot easier. Usually it's a matter of outlasting the thing until you can get a flame into an open wound."

"That's another thing." Artair said. "I thought they were fireproof?"

Kor'Os used her short sword to lop off one of the beasts six legs and lifted the limb up so he could see. Artair cringed at the admittedly disgusting display.

"Their outer hide is incredibly fire RESISTANT." She said in the same tone she used when training new scout recruits. "And if I had some vinegar and salt I'd save as much of the hide as I could. It makes for great cloaks. both fireproof and incredibly insulated. But I don't, so fire it is." She pointed at the layer of fat underneath its thick skin. "Their fat is what made that work. About as flammable as any oil out there. Hence the new bonfire. That'll burn all night." She said before tossing the limb on top of its former body.

"Still. That wasn't exactly a dangerous fight." Artair said. "I thought trullbyr were incredibly deadly."

"To someone unskilled or unarmed they certainly are." She replied with a smile. "You saw the claws, the rows of teeth in its mouth. If it had caught us unaware it would have been a bad time for at least one of us. Probably you."

"Whatever." Artair said simply. "Any chance there are more?"

"Unlikely." She replied. "They are incredibly territorial, and only share their territory for mating purposes. Once they do the deed they're back to fighting over their space." She tilted her head. "Sometimes they don't even wait to finish."

"Well now that's just rude." The prince said as he turned back and went back to making his tent. "Oh uh... Commander." He said a moment later.

"Hmm?" She said as she watched the creature burn inside its own skin, happy that they wouldn't need to worry about it regenerating and being a threat again later.

"It kind of ruined your tent." He said, pointing to the canvas of her tents roof, and a broken support as well.

"Dammit." She said as she made her way over. "That was my good one." She said as she pulled up the broken one, which was splintered half way. Then she pulled on the canvas and it made a squelching sound as it came out of the mud that one of the creatures feet had stamped it into deeply.

"My tent will have more than enough space if you'd like to share." He offered with obvious discomfort.

"Not necessary." She said simply. "I have spares."

"Oh. Good." He said with a polite smile. She didn't know it but he was glad that she wouldn't see him in his sleeping gear. "I'll get back to making my tent than."

"Same." She said as she pulled a spare support pole and a folded square of canvas to replace the dirtied one until she could clean it.

Thirty minutes later she was sitting comfortably next to the fire of the beast's burning body, using the flames to warm some tea while a fish from the nearby pond that the prince had mentioned. He was still struggling to set up his tent.

"Do you need help?" She asked as she sipped at the tea to see how it was doing.

"No?" He said with annoyance. "I do this all the time." He added, while not admitting that he typically stayed at inns or taverns instead.

"I can tell." She replied as she set the tea back down to warm some more. She didn't look forward to trullbyr smoked fish. But it was better than jerky or bottomless bag preserved bread for the millionth time. The drake leaned against a tree nearby snacking on some creature it had caught at some point while she'd been bow fishing.

She sipped her tea as she looked over the expanse of land at the massive, slightly glowing, tree that marked the druid's land in the distance.

She wondered if they knew anything about what had happened back in the village. Or if maybe they might be attacked by it at some point.

"Hey. Ummmm. Your.... highness?" She called awkwardly.

There was a clatter of noise as something inside the tent was dropped, and she heard him swear in what she thought was old Frisian before his head popped out of the tent's door flap.

"What?" He asked. "And don't call me that. Call me Artair if you want. Or if that makes you uncomfortable than call me rider. It's common enough."

"Think the druids would know anything about the blight thing?" She asked. "And should we warn them about it."

He considered the notion for a moment, then simply shook his head.

"No." He said as he withdrew back into the tent. She heard him heave something up for a moment. Then he stepped back out with a large pot in his hands. "They likely already know something went wrong there. What with being in communion with nature. And an entire elvish forest home being destroyed? They've likely already sent some of their people to investigate. And my father has already met with them. They know only about as much about the blight as anyone else does." He shrugged a bit. "Big debate amongst them as to whether or not the blight patches can be considered NATURAL or not too."

Before she could say anything he'd set the pot next to the fire and grabbed her fish by the stick she'd skewered it on.

"Hey!" She cried out as he pulled a piece off and tasted it.

Artair immediately made a face and she couldn't help but smile a bit at his disgust.

"Ugh. Tastes like old shoe leather that's been burnt." He said with a shake of his head. He quickly handed her the stick which she snatched out of his hand. "You eat that?" He asked.

"Beats jerky and stale bread." She replied angrily as she inspected the piece of the fish where he'd taken his piece from. "Besides, it's not cooked all the way."

He shuddered. "Toss that to Xha and go catch a few more." He said. "I'll start a second fire while you do. I assume that flavors from the beast. Yeah?"

She nodded. "Don't need a second fire." She said. "Ones enough."

"Not if that fire poisons our food." He replied, hastily taking the pot back from the side of the blaze. "I'll make another."

"What is that anyways?" She asked while pointing at the pot.

He looked at the pot and smiled. "It's this new dish from up north. It's called white shell chowder." Then he pointed at the fish in her hand, his smile fading. "Now seriously, give that to Xha, catch a few more. We'll cook em on a PROPER fire and add them to the pot. I've done it before. It'll be great."

She looked at the burning Trullbyr. She supposed a second fire wouldn't hurt anything. After all it wasn't like the WEREN'T going to have this one going the whole night, and probably the morning.

Reluctantly, she tossed the fish over near the drake. She cut a branch off of a tree, submerged it in the fire, and stalked off toward the pond.

Xhalya sniffed at the fish and recoiled in disgust.

"I know girl." Artair said. "Disgusting. Right?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zn0k5t/wait_is_this_just_gate_281/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (280/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: The trullbyr is literally a bear sized tardigrade with troll regeneration. I HAVE SPOKEN!!!

Also, bottomless bags make having backup gear way easier for the adventurous backpacker.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

since it was already soiled. "I'm not executing someone." He said. "And I'm definitely not flogging someone who did what they could to stop the whole thing."

"So what? You're gonna scream at the damn President? Resign from the army? Maybe make a show of tearing up all the papers you signed yesterday?" Vickers asked. "Ooh, I know; you can destroy the comm hub. I might actually help you with that one. It'll be cathartic or whatever."

James.... hadn't really thought that far ahead, if he was honest. He hadn't really had a plan for what he was going to do. He just knew that he had to do something, to give someone a piece of his mind.

"I don't know." He muttered.

"I didn't think so." Vickers replied. "That fight wasn't your fault Choi. The fact that the King has passed the verdict he has ISN'T your fault. You're just unlucky enough to be the poor little grunt stuck between two governments that are doing everything in their power to see who has the bigger dick. And you're getting fucked as a result."

"Graphic." James said sullenly. "Fuck am I supposed to do?"

Vickers sighed as he sat down.

"I don't see a lot of options dude." He said after a moment. "On the one hand I'm surprised the Pres accepted flogging as a punishment. But on the other hand; healing magic makes it a fairly light punishment if the King allows it.

"It's still not right." James countered. "And it's gonna be excruciating. And I still don't think he deserves it."

"That's just because you know the guy." Vickers replied. "And at the end of the day the King's right. He COULD have stopped the fight before it began and he didn't. Granted, you're also right. It's not that simple for people in uniform. Hard to break years and years of conditioning to follow orders. But that doesn't make him innocent. He had a choice. May not have been an easy choice. And it obviously didn't work out for him. But he did have that choice. And guess what Choi. This gets to be another lesson for you about the burdens of leadership CAPTAIN."

"So what? I should just do it?" James asked.

"Never said that." Vickers said with a shrug.

"Then what do I do?"

"That's up to you." Vickers replied. "You said that part of your new duties was to come up with solutions for punishments that aren't kosher right?"

"Yeah." James answered.

"Supposed to offer alternatives right?"

"Yeah." James repeated.

Vickers shrugged again. "Well than. Find an alternative."

"Like what?"

"I don't know man. What about that trial by combat shit you did with Prince Asshole or whatever?" Vickers replied with a wave of his hand. "Hell, with the differences in your abilities you could kick the crap out of him, which'll please the King, while still giving him a shot at sticking up for himself. That oughta at least give you a bit of relief or whatever."

"Yeah, if the King goes for it." James countered.

Vickers shrugged one more time. "So put some teeth on the ground. Really thrash him. Give a pound of flesh and it oughta work. Even the King will know how much of a power disparity there is between you two."

"I don't know man." James said as he rubbed the bruise forming on his stomach. "Still doesn't feel right. And what about the major."

"Fuckin' kill her." Vickers said as simply as if he was stating the weather. "That bitch is fuckin' crazy."

"What?" James asked incredulously. "That's your solution to me not wanting to outright EXECUTE someone?"

Vickers nodded. "Yep." He said. "Saw her get interviewed by the King's people. She is grade-A nutso. Got a feeling you'd save everyone on both sides a lot of trouble if you just walked over to her cell and gave her a triple tap."

"Dude." James said in disgust.

Vickers held his hands up in a "what are you gonna do?" gesture.

"Hey, you were the one that actually spoke to her out on the sands." Vickers said as he leaned back. "You saw how blood thirsty she was. Even said so yourself. During the interview she was all rank, name, D.O.D. number and that's it. She's a fuckin zealot man. Hooah dialed all the way to eleven and then snapped off trying to go even further."

"That doesn't mean she deserves execution." James said uncomfortably.

"No. THAT doesn't." Vickers agreed. "But openly committing an act of war against an allied nation and giving orders that are war crimes in all but technicality do. She'd get the needle back on Earth, that's for sure." He nodded a bit. "Least beheading is a bit quicker."

"I still shouldn't be the one holding the axe." James said in exasperation. He hated that Vickers was right.

"No." Vickers admitted. "But it looks like the legalese says you gotta. And if it keeps our guys from sending over a nuke, or the King from sending a bunch of Elementals to home, then.... well... it's a small sacrifice from one guy for a bit less bloodshed." His eyes darkened as he recalled something he'd never tell James, or anyone else for that matter. "I've done worse for less." He admitted.

The two of them sat in tense silence for several minutes while James held his head in his hands and thought.

"Fuck." He said after a while.

"Yeah." Vickers agreed.

"I gotta go read that paperwork." James said.

"That'll be a nice change for you." Vickers replied.

"Fuck off." James shot back venomously as he grabbed his uniform jacket and stood up. "First I gotta go hit the healers. I think that punch knocked something loose again. At least it feels that way."

"It was a clean shot though." Vickers said as he also stood up, flexing his hand and forming some frost on it as he did. "Gotta admit that much."

"I'll get you back for that by the way." James said in response as he gingerly opened the door.

"Sure you will." Vickers said with a devilish grin.

Behind them the communication hub sat silently.

A small red light pulsed on the back of it. It had been pulsing ever since the table it was on had felt an impact from the two men fighting.

\----------

"Was that a Trullbyr?" Artair asked as he wiped some of its gore off of his left hand scimitar with some of the creatures fur.

"Yes." Kor'Os replied as she cleaned her own great-sword with a rag and then tossed it into the new bonfire. "They're common enough this close to the Druidic lands."

"I though they were supposed to be tougher than that?" He said in a disappointing tone. "But that was remarkably easy."

Kor'Os nodded. "Having a drake that can breath fire made it a lot easier. Usually it's a matter of outlasting the thing until you can get a flame into an open wound."

"That's another thing." Artair said. "I thought they were fireproof?"

Kor'Os used her short sword to lop off one of the beasts six legs and lifted the limb up so he could see. Artair cringed at the admittedly disgusting display.

"Their outer hide is incredibly fire RESISTANT." She said in the same tone she used when training new scout recruits. "And if I had some vinegar and salt I'd save as much of the hide as I could. It makes for great cloaks. both fireproof and incredibly insulated. But I don't, so fire it is." She pointed at the layer of fat underneath its thick skin. "Their fat is what made that work. About as flammable as any oil out there. Hence the new bonfire. That'll burn all night." She said before tossing the limb on top of its former body.

"Still. That wasn't exactly a dangerous fight." Artair said. "I thought trullbyr were incredibly deadly."

"To someone unskilled or unarmed they certainly are." She replied with a smile. "You saw the claws, the rows of teeth in its mouth. If it had caught us unaware it would have been a bad time for at least one of us. Probably you."

"Whatever." Artair said simply. "Any chance there are more?"

"Unlikely." She replied. "They are incredibly territorial, and only share their territory for mating purposes. Once they do the deed they're back to fighting over their space." She tilted her head. "Sometimes they don't even wait to finish."

"Well now that's just rude." The prince said as he turned and went back to making his tent. "Oh uh... Commander." He said a moment later.

"Hmm?" She said as she watched the creature burn inside its own skin, happy that they wouldn't need to worry about it regenerating and being a threat again later.

"It kind of ruined your tent." He said, pointing to the canvas of her tents roof, and a broken support as well.

"Dammit." She said as she made her way over. "That was my good one." She said as she pulled up the broken one, which was splintered half way. Then she pulled on the canvas and it made a squelching sound as it came out of the mud that one of the creatures feet had stamped it into deeply.

"My tent will have more than enough space if you'd like to share." He offered with obvious discomfort.

"Not necessary." She said simply. "I have spares."

"Oh. Good." He said with a polite smile. She didn't know it but he was glad that she wouldn't see him in his sleeping gear. "I'll get back to making my tent than."

"Same." She said as she pulled a spare support pole and a folded square of canvas to replace the dirtied one until she could clean it.

Thirty minutes later she was sitting comfortably next to the fire of the beast's burning body, using the flames to warm some tea while a fish from the nearby pond that the prince had mentioned. He was still struggling to set up his tent.

"Do you need help?" She asked as she sipped at the tea to see how it was doing.

"No?" He said with annoyance. "I do this all the time." He added, while not admitting that he typically stayed at inns or taverns instead.

"I can tell." She replied as she set the tea back down to warm some more. She didn't look forward to trullbyr smoked fish. But it was better than jerky or bottomless bag preserved bread for the millionth time. The drake leaned against a tree nearby snacking on some creature it had caught at some point while she'd been bow fishing.

She sipped her tea as she looked over the expanse of land at the massive, slightly glowing, tree that marked the druid's land in the distance.

She wondered if they knew anything about what had happened back in the village. Or if maybe they might be attacked by it at some point.

"Hey. Ummmm. Your.... highness?" She called awkwardly.

There was a clatter of noise as something inside the tent was dropped, and she heard him swear in what she thought was old Frisian before his head popped out of the tent's door flap.

"What?" He asked. "And don't call me that. Call me Artair if you want. Or if that makes you uncomfortable than call me rider. It's common enough."

"Think the druids would know anything about the blight thing?" She asked. "And should we warn them about it."

He considered the notion for a moment, then simply shook his head.

"No." He said as he withdrew back into the tent. She heard him heave something up for a moment. Then he stepped back out with a large pot in his hands. "They likely already know something went wrong there. What with being in communion with nature. And an entire elvish forest home being destroyed? They've likely already sent some of their people to investigate. And my father has already met with them. They know only about as much about the blight as anyone else does." He shrugged a bit. "Big debate amongst them as to whether or not the blight patches can be considered NATURAL or not too."

Before she could say anything he'd set the pot next to the fire and grabbed her fish by the stick she'd skewered it on.

"Hey!" She cried out as he pulled a piece off and tasted it.

Artair immediately made a face and she couldn't help but smile a bit at his disgust.

"Ugh. Tastes like old shoe leather that's been burnt." He said with a shake of his head. He quickly handed her the stick which she snatched out of his hand. "You eat that?" He asked.

"Beats jerky and stale bread." She replied angrily as she inspected the piece of the fish where he'd taken his piece from. "Besides, it's not cooked all the way."

He shuddered. "Toss that to Xha and go catch a few more." He said. "I'll start a second fire while you do. I assume that flavors from the beast. Yeah?"

She nodded. "Don't need a second fire." She said. "Ones enough."

"Not if that fire poisons our food." He replied, hastily taking the pot back from the side of the blaze. "I'll make another."

"What is that anyways?" She asked while pointing at the pot.

He looked at the pot and smiled. "It's this new dish from up north. It's called white shell chowder." Then he pointed at the fish in her hand, his smile fading. "Now seriously, give that to Xha, catch a few more. We'll cook em on a PROPER fire and add them to the pot. I've done it before. It'll be great."

She looked at the burning Trullbyr. She supposed a second fire wouldn't hurt anything. After all it wasn't like the WEREN'T going to have this one going the whole night, and probably the morning.

Reluctantly, she tossed the fish over near the drake. She cut a branch off of a tree, submerged it in the fire, and stalked off toward the pond.

Xhalya sniffed at the fish and recoiled in disgust.

"I know girl." Artair said. "Disgusting. Right?"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zn0ij9/wait_is_this_just_gate_281/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (279/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James throws a tantrum and learns how Vickers handles that kind of thing. Hint: It's about how you'd expect a guy like Vickers to handle it.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Vickers was just returning from his morning PT, wiping sweat off his face when he saw Choi storm past in a fury. He'd intended their standard greeting for whenever they passed each other randomly, a simple nod with a, "Sup Choi." thrown in. But it had been clear that the young Captain was not only angry, but hadn't even noticed him.

He looked the way Choi had come from.

Only the King's offices and the Mage's tower are that way. He realized. And I doubt the mage'd put him in that kinda mood.

So he opted to follow the angry young man.

Typically Choi would greet the castle staff pleasantly, typically opting for a simple, "Morning." for most of the people he passed, and occasionally something more personal for people he actually knew. At worst he might simply nod at people if he was busy with something, but he pretty much always managed at least a minimal acknowledgement.

But not today.

Today the castle staff, and occasional dignitaries and nobles, seemed to almost sense the anger of the soldier as he walked through the halls. People who saw him head on made way for him, like schools of fish parting around a shark. People who didn't see him would turn to greet him only to suddenly look apprehensive and concerned.

Vickers saw his hands rapidly flexing, open and closed, as he walked, and heard him grumbling. Had he been wearing a set of cowboys clothes and his pistol he would have looked like a caricature of a bad guy on his way to shoot someone who'd cheated him at cards.

What the hell happened? And where's he going? Vickers wondered.

Then they rounded a corner and he saw a statue that he recognized.

Oh shit. He thought and began walking faster to catch up.

\---

James walked past the two guards to the communication room too fast and too angry for them to greet them like they usually would. He slammed the door open, and was about to move toward the communication hub when a hand clamped on his shoulder.

"Fuck off!" He exclaimed as he turned to shake the shoulder off.

Instead, James was spun around and pushed hard enough that he tumbled over the table and crashed off the other side, knocking a chair over in the process.

"What the fuck?" He cried out as he rolled over and scrambled to his feet.

"What're you doin' Choi?" Vickers' familiar Boston accent asked.

"None of your fuckin' business." He shot back as he made to move toward the hub again.

Then Vickers grabbed the chair nearest to himself, tipped it backwards, and launched it under the table. It slammed into the chair James had just knocked over and made THAT chair slam into the side of his shin. He fell in a sprawl as pain shot up his leg from the offended leg bone.

In response James planted a hand on the table and tried to push. But Vickers beat him to the chase and had already braced it against just that.

"What's goin' on Choi?" Vicker's asked again. "Why're you stormin' in here like all hell and damnation? What'd the King tell you?"

James ignored the question and began crawling rapidly over the mess of chairs and toward the hub again. Vickers vaulted the table and landed behind him. He kicked at the chair he'd just passed and slammed it into Vicker's hand, which was still steadying him against the table.

"Motherfucker!" Vickers yelled as he whipped the hand away from the danger of the chair.

"Fuck off Vickers!" Choi yelled as he gained his feet.

Then Vickers' hand snapped onto the back of his shirt and hauled him back. James made to slip from the uniform, but when he arm raised up to slip from the sleeve Vicker's other hand snapped around his wrist and spun him, applying painful torsion on the limb in the process.

Before James knew what was happening he was pressed into the top of the table in a classic wrist hold pulled straight from any police hand book.

"GET OFF ME!" He yelled into the wood of the table. He felt energy building up in himself and knew that his eyes were likely glowing. "FUCK! OFF!"

KRACK!

A frost coated fist slammed into the table only inches from his face, cracking the wood and sending frost coated splinters spraying. He instinctively shut his eyes.

He felt Vickers pull at his shirt even as he released his arm.

Then he was flying.

James slid across the ten or so feet of table and over the edge of it, slamming into the wall in a heap of pain as his already sore body was abused.

"Choi! Chill the fuck out!" Vickers demanded. "And fuck you, that's not a pun!"

James's wolf hand reached up and gripped the edge of the table hard enough to drive his nails into the wood, pulling up long curling ribbons of it off as he pulled himself up. He was breathing heavily and his eyes were glowing.

"Don't even think of using magic on me asshole." Vickers said in a voice that was as calm as it was venomous. "Don't do it." He demanded as he saw James tensing.

James leapt over the table, aimed at the massive SEAL.

Vickers blurred out of the way, almost faster than James's enhanced reflexes could even track, and he suddenly realized that the man had grown far stronger than he'd realized.

What he was able to see, though not in time, was a massive ice-coated fist rocketing toward him in an uppercut.

It impacted his stomach, just below the scar that marked where he'd been impaled, hard enough to launch him into the ceiling. He hit the ceiling hard enough to knock the wind out of him. Or at least it would have if Vickers' punch hadn't already done that for it. His head impacted and he saw stars before he fell back down and landed on the table.

He groaned and threw up the small amount of coffee he'd drank while speaking to the king.

Vickers grabbed him by the back of his shirt again and dragged him across the puke, mopping it up with his own clothes, and then threw him roughly into a sitting position in one of the chairs.

James's head lolled for a second as he struggled to get his breath back.

He wasn't given a chance to recover as Vickers pointed a stern knife hand at his face.

"Tell me what the fuck is going on that you'd even try that shit. Or else I'm gonna drag you by the fuckin' balls over to your mother and tell her what you just tried to do." The visibly angry man demanded.

Thoroughly beaten, more than a little disgusted by the mess on his face and shirt, and even more scared of the threat of matronly wrath, James told him.

\---

Kor'Os stirred from her half slumber against the prince's back as she felt the drake beneath them begin to slow down.

"What's... what's going on?" She asked groggily. They'd been riding for over two days now.

Prince Artair turned back to face her a bit. "Stopping. Xha's almost at her limit. And so are you." He said. "You've been drooling on my cloak for nearly an hour now. Plus there's a small pond in a mile or so, makes for good fishing."

She looked around a bit and was surprised to see the great Druidic tree off in the distance.

"Wha?" She wondered. "How far have we ridden?"

"Bout three hundred miles." The prince answered. "A few more hours and we'd be in the Bergland marshes. We'll hit them tomorrow."

"Your drake is that fast?" She asked.

"When I need her to be. But mostly she's just got a lot more endurance than most drakes. Hence why we kept riding through the night." He replied. "Do you have your own supplies? Tent? Bedroll? All that? I assume so from a scout."

"I do." She said, patting at the bottomless bag on on her back. "You?"

He gestured at the saddle bags behind her. "All that and more. I'll leave the fishing to you. I assume you're better at it than I am."

"Probably." She replied. "I get the sense that you're not the patient type. What with the storming off on your drake and not listening to common sense."

"That wasn't impatience." He shot back. His face suddenly serious, though she couldn't see it from behind him. "That was understanding an emergency when you see it and acting."

"I still don't understand this... vanishing blight." She admitted as the drake came to a slow halt. Artair waited as she clambered down its side and stepped on the somewhat damp grass. "How can it be the cause of the village's destruction if it's on the other side of the country?"

"Well first of all." The prince began as he climbed down as well, undoing the straps to Xhalya's saddle in the same motion. "It's not JUST on the other side of the country. There are a few patches in other places in Petravus. That's simply the largest and most easily observed due to its proximity to Jadesport." He heaved the saddle onto a downed tree and began rummaging through one of the bags.

Kor'Os unslung her pack and pulled out the small canvas tarp and wooden poles that made up her tent's roof.

"Additionally. I told you about the battle that nearly cost us the crown prince, most of the local Drakrid riders, and a good portion of Jadesport and its garrison." He continued. "Well. That battle was between them and the creatures that came OUT of the blight."

"And you think that happened in the village?" She wondered as she sank the end of one of the poles into the dirt until it hit its crossbeam and stopped. "That some kind of creature emerged from the blight and did all that?"

"It's the only thing that makes sense to me after seeing the aftermath." He replied as he pulled out a massive tent easily four times the size of hers. He looked back the way they came for a moment, then panned around. "Though.... I don't remember there being any documented blight areas around there." He admitted. "And I'm curious as to why it hadn't moved on Waterside as well."

She brushed off the last bit.

"Maybe the villagers killed it." She offered.

The prince shook his head as he finally pulled the last of the tent out. "Doubt it." He said simply. "All the resources we used outside of Jadesport and even then we almost lost. Had to rely on....." He glanced at her, weighing what he should say. "Outside help." He finished. "If that village had managed to defend itself we would have seen signs of it. Magical damage. Burns. Plus the dead body of whatever had attacked. Instead we simply saw a disappeared village. No. They fell unaware of what was happening. Poor bastards."

"Don't sound so heartbroken." She said with a scoff as she ran a piece of rope from one support pole to the other and pressed the end into the ground with a stake.

He looked at her warily.

"I am." He said. "But I didn't know those people except in passing. And if something like this is going to happen, than I'd prefer it happen in a small village like that than in one of the larger cities. It's a tragedy. But not as big a one as it could have been."

She stopped what she was doing to glare at him.

"There were at least three hundred people living in that village." She said in disgust. "If not more. And now they're dead."

"And if that creature had attacked a larger city. Or even a large village. Say one with.... a few hundred more, or a thousand eve. Then that would have been an even larger death toll." He shot back as he pulled a ten foot long, nearly six inch wide, pole from his bag. She stared at it curiously. "Besides. They're not dead. Not really." He said with a look of concern.

"What?" She asked curiously.

"You don't want to know." He said simply. "Though, it'll probably save your life if you do."

Her confused expression deepened as she asked. "What do you mean?"

Artair slammed his pole into the ground just as she had with hers. He took a deep breath before turning to her.

"The things that came out of the blight outside Jadesport?" He asked rhetorically and with a surprisingly sad expression. "Were the things that had gone IN...to the blight. Including the people that had been fighting against them only a few minutes earlier and fell to them."

He tossed the canvas canopy of his tent, which was significantly larger than hers, up over the top of the pole as she realized what he meant.

"By the gods." She said softly.

Suddenly the prince stopped what he was doing. He turned his head at an angle and seemed to listen for something.

She focused on her own hearing and realized what was wrong almost at the same moment that he asked.

"Is it just me? Or is it way too quiet here?"

Then she heard Xhalya rumbling, and felt the air growing hot.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zl8i2b/wait_is_this_just_gate_280/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (279/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: James throws a tantrum and learns how Vickers handles that kind of thing. Hint: It's about how you'd expect a guy like Vickers to handle it.

Enjoy.

\~

Vickers was just returning from his morning PT, wiping sweat off his face when he saw Choi storm past in a fury. He'd intended their standard greeting for whenever they passed each other randomly, a simple nod with a, "Sup Choi." thrown in. But it had been clear that the young Captain was not only angry, but hadn't even noticed him.

He looked the way Choi had come from.

Only the King's offices and the Mage's tower are that way. He realized. And I doubt the mage'd put him in that kinda mood.

So he opted to follow the angry young man.

Typically Choi would greet the castle staff pleasantly, typically opting for a simple, "Morning." for most of the people he passed, and occasionally something more personal for people he actually knew. At worst he might simply nod at people if he was busy with something, but he pretty much always managed at least a minimal acknowledgement.

But not today.

Today the castle staff, and occasional dignitaries and nobles, seemed to almost sense the anger of the soldier as he walked through the halls. People who saw him head on made way for him, like schools of fish parting around a shark. People who didn't see him would turn to greet him only to suddenly look apprehensive and concerned.

Vickers saw his hands rapidly flexing, open and closed, as he walked, and heard him grumbling. Had he been wearing a set of cowboys clothes and his pistol he would have looked like a caricature of a bad guy on his way to shoot someone who'd cheated him at cards.

What the hell happened? And where's he going? Vickers wondered.

Then they rounded a corner and he saw a statue that he recognized.

Oh shit. He thought and began walking faster to catch up.

\---

James walked past the two guards to the communication room too fast and too angry for them to greet them like they usually would. He slammed the door open, and was about to move toward the communication hub when a hand clamped on his shoulder.

"Fuck off!" He exclaimed as he turned to shake the shoulder off.

Instead, James was spun around and pushed hard enough that he tumbled over the table and crashed off the other side, knocking a chair over in the process.

"What the fuck?" He cried out as he rolled over and scrambled to his feet.

"What're you doin' Choi?" Vickers' familiar Boston accent asked.

"None of your fuckin' business." He shot back as he made to move toward the hub again.

Then Vickers grabbed the chair nearest to himself, tipped it backwards, and launched it under the table. It slammed into the chair James had just knocked over and made THAT chair slam into the side of his shin. He fell in a sprawl as pain shot up his leg from the offended leg bone.

In response James planted a hand on the table and tried to push. But Vickers beat him to the chase and had already braced it against just that.

"What's goin' on Choi?" Vicker's asked again. "Why're you stormin' in here like all hell and damnation? What'd the King tell you?"

James ignored the question and began crawling rapidly over the mess of chairs and toward the hub again. Vickers vaulted the table and landed behind him. He kicked at the chair he'd just passed and slammed it into Vicker's hand, which was still steadying him against the table.

"Motherfucker!" Vickers yelled as he whipped the hand away from the danger of the chair.

"Fuck off Vickers!" Choi yelled as he gained his feet.

Then Vickers' hand snapped onto the back of his shirt and hauled him back. James made to slip from the uniform, but when he arm raised up to slip from the sleeve Vicker's other hand snapped around his wrist and spun him, applying painful torsion on the limb in the process.

Before James knew what was happening he was pressed into the top of the table in a classic wrist hold pulled straight from any police hand book.

"GET OFF ME!" He yelled into the wood of the table. He felt energy building up in himself and knew that his eyes were likely glowing. "FUCK! OFF!"

KRACK!

A frost coated fist slammed into the table only inches from his face, cracking the wood and sending frost coated splinters spraying. He instinctively shut his eyes.

He felt Vickers pull at his shirt even as he released his arm.

Then he was flying.

James slid across the ten or so feet of table and over the edge of it, slamming into the wall in a heap of pain as his already sore body was abused.

"Choi! Chill the fuck out!" Vickers demanded. "And fuck you, that's not a pun!"

James's wolf hand reached up and gripped the edge of the table hard enough to drive his nails into the wood, pulling up long curling ribbons of it off as he pulled himself up. He was breathing heavily and his eyes were glowing.

"Don't even think of using magic on me asshole." Vickers said in a voice that was as calm as it was venomous. "Don't do it." He demanded as he saw James tensing.

James leapt over the table, aimed at the massive SEAL.

Vickers blurred out of the way, almost faster than James's enhanced reflexes could even track, and he suddenly realized that the man had grown far stronger than he'd realized.

What he was able to see, though not in time, was a massive ice-coated fist rocketing toward him in an uppercut.

It impacted his stomach, just below the scar that marked where he'd been impaled, hard enough to launch him into the ceiling. He hit the ceiling hard enough to knock the wind out of him. Or at least it would have if Vickers' punch hadn't already done that for it. His head impacted and he saw stars before he fell back down and landed on the table.

He groaned and threw up the small amount of coffee he'd drank while speaking to the king.

Vickers grabbed him by the back of his shirt again and dragged him across the puke, mopping it up with his own clothes, and then threw him roughly into a sitting position in one of the chairs.

James's head lolled for a second as he struggled to get his breath back.

He wasn't given a chance to recover as Vickers pointed a stern knife hand at his face.

"Tell me what the fuck is going on that you'd even try that shit. Or else I'm gonna drag you by the fuckin' balls over to your mother and tell her what you just tried to do." The visibly angry man demanded.

Thoroughly beaten, more than a little disgusted by the mess on his face and shirt, and even more scared of the threat of matronly wrath, James told him.

\---

Kor'Os stirred from her half slumber against the prince's back as she felt the drake beneath them begin to slow down.

"What's... what's going on?" She asked groggily. They'd been riding for over two days now.

Prince Artair turned back to face her a bit. "Stopping. Xha's almost at her limit. And so are you." He said. "You've been drooling on my cloak for nearly an hour now. Plus there's a small pond in a mile or so, makes for good fishing."

She looked around a bit and was surprised to see the great Druidic tree off in the distance.

"Wha?" She wondered. "How far have we ridden?"

"Bout three hundred miles." The prince answered. "A few more hours and we'd be in the Bergland marshes. We'll hit them tomorrow."

"Your drake is that fast?" She asked.

"When I need her to be. But mostly she's just got a lot more endurance than most drakes. Hence why we kept riding through the night." He replied. "Do you have your own supplies? Tent? Bedroll? All that? I assume so from a scout."

"I do." She said, patting at the bottomless bag on on her back. "You?"

He gestured at the saddle bags behind her. "All that and more. I'll leave the fishing to you. I assume you're better at it than I am."

"Probably." She replied. "I get the sense that you're not the patient type. What with the storming off on your drake and not listening to common sense."

"That wasn't impatience." He shot back. His face suddenly serious, though she couldn't see it from behind him. "That was understanding an emergency when you see it and acting."

"I still don't understand this... vanishing blight." She admitted as the drake came to a slow halt. Artair waited as she clambered down its side and stepped on the somewhat damp grass. "How can it be the cause of the village's destruction if it's on the other side of the country?"

"Well first of all." The prince began as he climbed down as well, undoing the straps to Xhalya's saddle in the same motion. "It's not JUST on the other side of the country. There are a few patches in other places in Petravus. That's simply the largest and most easily observed due to its proximity to Jadesport." He heaved the saddle onto a downed tree and began rummaging through one of the bags.

Kor'Os unslung her pack and pulled out the small canvas tarp and wooden poles that made up her tent's roof.

"Additionally. I told you about the battle that nearly cost us the crown prince, most of the local Drakrid riders, and a good portion of Jadesport and its garrison." He continued. "Well. That battle was between them and the creatures that came OUT of the blight."

"And you think that happened in the village?" She wondered as she sank the end of one of the poles into the dirt until it hit its crossbeam and stopped. "That some kind of creature emerged from the blight and did all that?"

"It's the only thing that makes sense to me after seeing the aftermath." He replied as he pulled out a massive tent easily four times the size of hers. He looked back the way they came for a moment, then panned around. "Though.... I don't remember there being any documented blight areas around there." He admitted. "And I'm curious as to why it hadn't moved on Waterside as well."

She brushed off the last bit.

"Maybe the villagers killed it." She offered.

The prince shook his head as he finally pulled the last of the tent out. "Doubt it." He said simply. "All the resources we used outside of Jadesport and even then we almost lost. Had to rely on....." He glanced at her, weighing what he should say. "Outside help." He finished. "If that village had managed to defend itself we would have seen signs of it. Magical damage. Burns. Plus the dead body of whatever had attacked. Instead we simply saw a disappeared village. No. They fell unaware of what was happening. Poor bastards."

"Don't sound so heartbroken." She said with a scoff as she ran a piece of rope from one support pole to the other and pressed the end into the ground with a stake.

He looked at her warily.

"I am." He said. "But I didn't know those people except in passing. And if something like this is going to happen, than I'd prefer it happen in a small village like that than in one of the larger cities. It's a tragedy. But not as big a one as it could have been."

She stopped what she was doing to glare at him.

"There were at least three hundred people living in that village." She said in disgust. "If not more. And now they're dead."

"And if that creature had attacked a larger city. Or even a larger village. Say one with.... a few hundred more, or a thousand even. Then that would have been an even larger death toll." He shot back as he pulled a ten foot long, nearly six inch wide, pole from his bag. She stared at it curiously. "Besides. They're not dead. Not really." He said with a look of concern.

"What?" She asked curiously.

"You don't want to know." He said simply. "Though, it'll probably save your life if you do."

Her confused expression deepened as she asked. "What do you mean?"

Artair slammed his pole into the ground just as she had with hers. He took a deep breath before turning to her.

"The things that came out of the blight outside Jadesport?" He asked rhetorically and with a surprisingly sad expression. "Were the things that had gone IN...to the blight. Including the people that had been fighting against them only a few minutes earlier and fell to them."

He tossed the canvas canopy of his tent, which was significantly larger than hers, up over the top of the pole as she realized what he meant.

"By the gods." She said softly.

Suddenly the prince stopped what he was doing. He turned his head at an angle and seemed to listen for something.

She focused on her own hearing and realized what was wrong almost at the same moment that he asked.

"Is it just me? Or is it way too quiet here?"

Then she heard Xhalya rumbling, and felt the air growing hot.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zl8g6f/wait_is_this_just_gate_280/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (278/?)

Previous

Writer's note: James's entire approach to life can be summed up with that last line.

Enjoy.

\~

James woke up the next morning just before dawn.

He gently disentangled himself from Amina's long, scar-pocked limbs and quietly went over to the bathroom. She mumbled a bit as she grasped for him in her sleep, then wrapped her arm around his pillow and went back to the tiny snores he'd grown used to.

He did the necessities, all the standard post-sex rituals that any guy would do the next day, then quickly bathed and dressed. He even shaved.

He'd seen the night before just how concerned Amina had been about whatever her father was going to tell him today, and he figured it would be best to get it done early, and as officially as he was able. So, he wore his full duty uniform, though he was starting to run low on the components to do so. He really needed to stop wearing the pants and athletic under shirts that came with it. And he definitely needed more boots.

A few minutes later he stepped out of their bathroom and picked up the last thing he needed to complete the ensemble. He strapped the short, dark, multicolored sword to his belt quietly and crept out of the door after giving Amina's hand a gentle kiss.

The halls were simultaneously bustling with castle staff going about their early morning duties, and eerily silent despite the numerous maids, cleaners, butlers, guards, and whatever else. It was as if everyone was being as busy as possible, while simultaneously doing everything in their power not to wake anyone up. He subconsciously took to the same silent tempo as he walked, nodding and smiling in greeting at anyone he crossed paths with.

He stopped on his way. He knew from experience with his own NCO's and Officers on Earth, that if bad news or a dressing down were going to occur, certain things could be done to ease the anger on either side. It took nearly ten minutes, but when he recommenced with his short journey he did so with a tray, carrying a small container of milk, some sugar, and two steaming cups of dark black coffee. He didn't know if King Farrick had even tried Earth style coffee yet. But he figured it couldn't hurt to try.

When he arrived at the King's study he'd expected to wait. To be told that the King had yet to rise, or was still dressing.

Instead the two guards simply nodded and moved to open the door for him. He recognized one of them from the old fashioned, large bore, rifle slung over her shoulder.

"He's expecting you sir." The large elf woman said as he passed.

"Thanks." He said back.

King Farrick set down the papers he'd been reading over, James recognized the Presidential seal on them, and gestured for James to sit at the chair in front of his desk even as he moved to sit in his own.

"You're earlier than expected." He said as James set the tray down on the desk. "And you brought beverages?"

James sat down and took a long sip of his coffee, still black, before he spoke. The king looked at the other drink and James had a sense that he was questioning it, then simply picked it up and also took a sip. He grimaced at the bitterness.

James nodded with a small smile. He pointed at the tray. "THAT is why I brought the cream and sugar."

The King set his cup down and picked up the small bottle of milk. "Amina told you didn't she?"

"Not in so many words. But.... I got the message." He replied honestly. "As for the earliness and the coffee. Well, I learned a long time ago that bad news is better BEFORE breakfast. And coffee helps everything."

"It's dreadful." The king said, and James had a feeling that he meant both the news AND the beverage. He sipped at the newly cream laden coffee and then spooned a bit of sugar into it. Another sip and he nodded. "But like anything else it can be made better if done right."

James nodded, but didn't say anything.

"You two are good together." The King continued. "Not like when you first met."

James rubbed his jaw, remembering the encounter. "We've uh.... come a long way."

King Farrick just nodded. "Indeed." He said. "I remember when you seemed to get drunk and end up in trouble at almost every new dawn."

James chuckled. "Starting to wonder why the latter keeps occurring even though I've stopped the former." He said with a grin.

The King nodded. "Trouble rarely cares asks if one is sober when it approaches."

James smiled as he nodded back. "Should engrave that on beer mugs and flasks." He said back. "You'd make a fortune."

The two of them sat like that for a moment, sipping from their respective coffees.

"Have you read the papers that your President had you fill out?" The King asked after a while.

James thought back to the stack of papers he now had sitting on the dresser back in his and Amina's room.

"Not word for word." He said.

The King nodded and held up one of the papers on his desk for emphasis. "I was just finishing up on mine." He set it down and looked at it as if it might attack him. "Very well written. Your world's legal papers."

"I did warn you of that." James reminded him.

"Yes. Yes... YOU... did." The King admitted slowly. "And also of how your world's politicians think and act. How they likely WOULD act." He said. "And every word of warning has ended up ringing true."

James nodded solemnly. "Unfortunately."

"Most." The King agreed. "And under ordinary circumstances I'd be rewarding you greatly for your honest council." He said. "And I shall. But today I'm afraid the only reward I can grant is a grim duty."

James took a deep breath as he braced himself.

"As you know." The King began. "As the new commanding officer of a- I don't know what your world's term for it is- but a military penal unit."

James nodded.

"You are charged with oversight of their punishments and ensuring that they are carried out in an appropriate manner." He paused. "And in certain circumstances, being the one to carry them out, so as to avoid violence occurring between our two peoples."

And just like that, James knew where this was going.

He close his eyes as he said. "When necessary to avoid uneccessary hostility between our people."

"Just so. And you know what judgment will be passed regarding this Major and her First Sergeant?" The King asked.

James looked up at him suddenly in surprise.

"The First Sergeant too?" He asked, anger flickering in his eyes. "But he's the one that called for the surrender."

"And for that he will LIVE." The King shot back his own eyes growing in anger even as they hardened somewhat. "But he still took part in leading the people under his command against the Kingdom, and against his own country's allies in an illegal act of war."

James's jaw clenched even as he felt himself deflate.

"What's...What are their sentences?" He asked. His eyes shutting as he waited for the answer.

"For the Major." The King began. "Death."

James recoiled as if struck, he leaned over and placed his face in his hand as he heard the news. He'd expected it. But it still felt wrong to him.

"And for the First Sergeant. A flogging. Twenty lashes." The King finished.

"Lashes?" James asked as he looked at the King. He felt his breathing quicken. "I have to whip someone? Someone who did what they could to save people? To stop the battle?"

"Someone who could have done so before the battle ever started." The King said sternly. "Who could have arrested the Major, who's clearly some kind of psychotic, and ordered the surrender before any attacks even occurred." He took a deep breath of his own. "As I have said. His actions have earned him mercy. Had he not ordered the surrender he would be joining the Major under the headsman's axe. And HAD he ordered it later he would have been receiving forty, or maybe even time in the stocks on top of it."

James felt his heart pounding in his ears as his breathing quickened.

"I can't..." He began. "I can't do that." He said in between breaths. "It's not that simple for us.... For soldiers.... Especially life l-"

He was cut off by a sudden SLAM! of the King's hand on the desk. The tray with the coffee rattled from the impact as the King stared at him and pointed the finger of the hand at him.

"Do not speak to ME of SIMPLE James." He said angrily. "There is no SIMPLE... in this matter. There is only the duty that the both of us have taken upon ourselves to maintain peace between two worlds that could likely destroy one another if they ever entered open warfare with each other." He jabbed a finger at the papers on his desk. "I do not choose these verdicts out of some devious desire to kill or inflict pain." He said. "For them OR you. I choose them because any more or any less would mean either a war, or fomenting rebellion and distrust among my own troops."

"But why me?" James asked. "Why do I have to carry them out?"

King Farrick sat back, looking suddenly weary and apathetic.

"Because it is the agreement that your President and I have come to." He answered. "The long and short of it is; no more military blood spilled by the other nation. My people are allowed to defend themselves if it comes to it. Just as yours are. But outside of that, no killing. Earth blood may only be INTENTIONALLY spilled by Earth citizens. And Petravian blood by Petravian citizens." He gestured at James. "Plus you signed the papers. You yourself agreed to this."

James thought back to the mound of papers and all the places he'd signed and initialed. He'd only had time to skim them. The pressure of speaking to the President himself had made him anxious and eager to please and behave. Like a good little toy soldier.

"Fuck." He said.

"Should have taken your own advice when it came to your world's legal papers." The King said softly. "I'm sorry James."

"That and that silver platter will get you a cup of coffee." James said as he stood up quickly, wobbling just a bit as he did. Then he began toward the door.

"Where are you going Captain Choi?" The King called behind him as he slammed the door open. James stopped in the door as he heard the elf guard grunt from stopping it.

"To do something dramatic and probably stupid." He said. Then he stormed away.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zkewgg/wait_is_this_just_gate_279/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (278/?)

Previous /

First

Writer's note: James's entire approach to life can be summed up with that last line.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

James woke up the next morning just before dawn.

He gently disentangled himself from Amina's long, scar-pocked limbs and quietly went over to the bathroom. She mumbled a bit as she grasped for him in her sleep, then wrapped her arm around his pillow and went back to the tiny snores he'd grown used to.

He did the necessities, all the standard post-sex rituals that any guy would do the next day, then quickly bathed and dressed. He even shaved.

He'd seen the night before just how concerned Amina had been about whatever her father was going to tell him today, and he figured it would be best to get it done early, and as officially as he was able. So, he wore his full duty uniform, though he was starting to run low on the components to do so. He really needed to stop wearing the pants and athletic under shirts that came with it. And he definitely needed more boots.

A few minutes later he stepped out of their bathroom and picked up the last thing he needed to complete the ensemble. He strapped the short, dark, multicolored sword to his belt quietly and crept out of the door after giving Amina's hand a gentle kiss.

The halls were simultaneously bustling with castle staff going about their early morning duties, and eerily silent despite the numerous maids, cleaners, butlers, guards, and whatever else. It was as if everyone was being as busy as possible, while simultaneously doing everything in their power not to wake anyone up. He subconsciously took to the same silent tempo as he walked, nodding and smiling in greeting at anyone he crossed paths with.

He stopped on his way. He knew from experience with his own NCO's and Officers on Earth, that if bad news or a dressing down were going to occur, certain things could be done to ease the anger on either side. It took nearly ten minutes, but when he recommenced with his short journey he did so with a tray, carrying a small container of milk, some sugar, and two steaming cups of dark black coffee. He didn't know if King Farrick had even tried Earth style coffee yet. But he figured it couldn't hurt to try.

When he arrived at the King's study he'd expected to wait. To be told that the King had yet to rise, or was still dressing.

Instead the two guards simply nodded and moved to open the door for him. He recognized one of them from the old fashioned, large bore, rifle slung over her shoulder.

"He's expecting you sir." The large elf woman said as he passed.

"Thanks." He said back.

King Farrick set down the papers he'd been reading over, James recognized the Presidential seal on them, and gestured for James to sit at the chair in front of his desk even as he moved to sit in his own.

"You're earlier than expected." He said as James set the tray down on the desk. "And you brought beverages?"

James sat down and took a long sip of his coffee, still black, before he spoke. The king looked at the other drink and James had a sense that he was questioning it, then simply picked it up and also took a sip. He grimaced at the bitterness.

James nodded with a small smile. He pointed at the tray. "THAT is why I brought the cream and sugar."

The King set his cup down and picked up the small bottle of milk. "Amina told you didn't she?"

"Not in so many words. But.... I got the message." He replied honestly. "As for the earliness and the coffee. Well, I learned a long time ago that bad news is better BEFORE breakfast. And coffee helps everything."

"It's dreadful." The king said, and James had a feeling that he meant both the news AND the beverage. He sipped at the newly cream laden coffee and then spooned a bit of sugar into it. Another sip and he nodded. "But like anything else it can be made better if done right."

James nodded, but didn't say anything.

"You two are good together." The King continued. "Not like when you first met."

James rubbed his jaw, remembering the encounter. "We've uh.... come a long way."

King Farrick just nodded. "Indeed." He said. "I remember when you seemed to get drunk and end up in trouble at almost every new dawn."

James chuckled. "Starting to wonder why the latter keeps occurring even though I've stopped the former." He said with a grin.

The King nodded. "Trouble rarely cares to ask if one is sober when it approaches."

James smiled as he nodded back. "Should engrave that on beer mugs and flasks." He said back. "You'd make a fortune."

The two of them sat like that for a moment, sipping from their respective coffees.

"Have you read the papers that your President had you fill out?" The King asked after a while.

James thought back to the stack of papers he now had sitting on the dresser back in his and Amina's room.

"Not word for word." He said.

The King nodded and held up one of the papers on his desk for emphasis. "I was just finishing up on mine." He set it down and looked at it as if it might attack him. "Very well written. Your world's legal papers."

"I did warn you of that." James reminded him.

"Yes. Yes... YOU... did." The King admitted slowly. "And also of how your world's politicians think and act. How they likely WOULD act." He said. "And every word of warning has ended up ringing true."

James nodded solemnly. "Unfortunately."

"Most." The King agreed. "And under ordinary circumstances I'd be rewarding you greatly for your honest council." He said. "And I shall. But today I'm afraid the only reward I can grant is a grim duty."

James took a deep breath as he braced himself.

"As you know." The King began. "As the new commanding officer of a- I don't know what your world's term for it is- but a military penal unit."

James nodded.

"You are charged with oversight of their punishments and ensuring that they are carried out in an appropriate manner." He paused. "And in certain circumstances, being the one to carry them out, so as to avoid violence occurring between our two peoples."

And just like that, James knew where this was going.

He close his eyes as he said. "When necessary to avoid uneccessary hostility between our people."

"Just so. And you know what judgment will be passed regarding this Major and her First Sergeant?" The King asked.

James looked up at him suddenly in surprise.

"The First Sergeant too?" He asked, anger flickering in his eyes. "But he's the one that called for the surrender."

"And for that he will LIVE." The King shot back his own eyes growing in anger even as they hardened somewhat. "But he still took part in leading the people under his command against the Kingdom, and against his own country's allies in an illegal act of war."

James's jaw clenched even as he felt himself deflate.

"What's...What are their sentences?" He asked. His eyes shutting as he waited for the answer.

"For the Major." The King began. "Death."

James recoiled as if struck, he leaned over and placed his face in his hand as he heard the news. He'd expected it. But it still felt wrong to him.

"And for the First Sergeant. A flogging. Twenty lashes." The King finished.

"Lashes?" James asked as he looked at the King. He felt his breathing quicken. "I have to whip someone? Someone who did what they could to save people? To stop the battle?"

"Someone who could have done so before the battle ever started." The King said sternly. "Who could have arrested the Major, who's clearly some kind of psychotic, and ordered the surrender before any attacks even occurred." He took a deep breath of his own. "As I have said. His actions have earned him mercy. Had he not ordered the surrender he would be joining the Major under the headsman's axe. And HAD he ordered it later he would have been receiving forty, or maybe even time in the stocks on top of it."

James felt his heart pounding in his ears as his breathing quickened.

"I can't..." He began. "I can't do that." He said in between breaths. "It's not that simple for us.... For soldiers.... Especially life l-"

He was cut off by a sudden SLAM! of the King's hand on the desk. The tray with the coffee rattled from the impact as the King stared at him and pointed the finger of the hand at him.

"Do not speak to ME of SIMPLE James." He said angrily. "There is no SIMPLE... in this matter. There is only the duty that the both of us have taken upon ourselves to maintain peace between two worlds that could likely destroy one another if they ever entered open warfare with each other." He jabbed a finger at the papers on his desk. "I do not choose these verdicts out of some devious desire to kill or inflict pain." He said. "For them OR you. I choose them because any more or any less would mean either a war, or fomenting rebellion and distrust among my own troops."

"But why me?" James asked. "Why do I have to carry them out?"

King Farrick sat back, looking suddenly weary and apathetic.

"Because it is the agreement that your President and I have come to." He answered. "The long and short of it is; no more military blood spilled by the other nation. My people are allowed to defend themselves if it comes to it. Just as yours are. But outside of that, no killing. Earth blood may only be INTENTIONALLY spilled by Earth citizens. And Petravian blood by Petravian citizens." He gestured at James. "Plus you signed the papers. You yourself agreed to this."

James thought back to the mound of papers and all the places he'd signed and initialed. He'd only had time to skim them. The pressure of speaking to the President himself had made him anxious and eager to please and behave. Like a good little toy soldier.

"Fuck." He said.

"Should have taken your own advice when it came to your world's legal papers." The King said softly. "I'm sorry James."

"That and that silver platter will get you a cup of coffee." James said as he stood up quickly, wobbling just a bit as he did. Then he began toward the door.

"Where are you going Captain Choi?" The King called behind him as he slammed the door open. James stopped in the door as he heard the elf guard grunt from stopping it.

"To do something dramatic and probably stupid." He said. Then he stormed away.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zketlc/wait_is_this_just_gate_279/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (277/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Remember where I said that the doctor looks like Avaserala? Well, now that's really the case.

Also, I may or may not come back and put a >!PANCAKE!< section in after the first part later. Maybe. Who knows? I sure don't. We'll see.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

Despite the bandages and ointments the healers had used, some of which she was still using under her clothes, James could still see countless bruises and small pockmarks from the bullets she'd been hit by. It was a gruesome and painful reminder of what they'd been through. He even still had some bruising around the hole that had scarred over in his abdomen.

Once her armor was completely off James grabbed the small tin of ointment from their nightstand and rubbed some onto his hands. To him it smelled like candied yams and strawberry. Though a discreet taste-test while Amina hadn't been looking one day had revealed that it definitely didn't taste like them. Once he'd spread a good amount on his hands he began applying it to some of the bruises on Amina's back. She winced at the first touch of the cold paste to her bruised flesh.

"Sorry." He said. "What'd your father want?"

"It's okay." She said as she pulled her hair over her shoulder and out of his way. "And he just had some bad news."

James peered around at her as she looked away.

"Everything okay?" He asked as he spread some of the balm to a bruised bullet wound just under her shoulder blade. The muscle there spasmed a bit and he gently pressed his thumb into it and kneaded it a bit to calm it down. "Anything I should worry about?"

Amina grunted and grit her teeth a bit as he massaged the upset muscle. "Yes. But I've been told to let him tell you about it. He wants you to come see him in the morning." She replied honestly.

"Something bad enough that he wants me prepped, rested and relaxed first?" James said as he took a bit more ointment out of the tin and passed it to her. She took it and began applying some to the bruises on her ribs. "That's not good."

"No." She agreed. "You're going to hate it."

James nodded as he pressed some of the ointment into a line of scar tissue and bruises that ran from just under her left breast to the back of her ribs, some kind of long graze from the battle.

"Anything to do with the P.O.W.'s?" He asked. "That meeting was the President- that's my country's leader- giving me command of them until further notice."

She looked back at him curiously. "He gave you command of a bunch of prisoners?" She asked. "Why?"

"It's... a thing when it comes to prisoners of war in our world." He said with a shrug. "The prisoners are supposed to default to the command of the highest ranking among them. But since there are civilian personnel, and because the military members are from multiple branches they chose me instead. Mostly because I'm now the highest ranking soldier around, AND because I'm not ACTUALLY a prisoner."

She considered the idea for a moment.

"What kind of responsibilities does it entail?" She asked. as she rubbed some ointment on her collarbone.

"Mostly just standard day to day type stuff." He replied as he finished with the scar on her side and wrapped his wolf hand around her waist. With his other hand he pulled her belt down just a bit to inspect a scar he knew was just beneath it, but it was lighter than the rest and she didn't react to the discomfort, so he left it and tended to a different one. "Keeping them on a PT schedule, making sure they remain presentable, follow the orders of the guards. So on and so forth."

Suddenly she grabbed the ointment hand, and placed her other hand on his wolf hand.

"And what about punishment?" She asked.

"What do you mean?" He asked.

"If a punishment needs to be doled out to any of them. What's your role in its administration?"

He thought for a moment. He and the President HAD spoken of such a thing.

"If the punishment is just and fair. I'm to oversee it's application and ensure that its done in an appropriate manner." He recalled. "Extra duty, half rations, isolation. Whatever it might be. I'm also supposed to offer alternatives to anything deemed unnecessary or cruel. And outright resist anything that breaks the new peace agreement our two leaders signed earlier today."

"Do you carry out any of these punishments?" She asked, looking away. "Is that part of the job too?"

James looked at her curiously, and with mounting concern.

"Amina. What's this about?" He asked. "Is this about the bad news?"

She took a deep breath. "I told you I'm not supposed to tell you." She said after a moment of thought.

The reminder was, itself, an admission.

James pulled her close to him and wrapped his left arm around her. With his other hand he pulled her face to look at him.

The two of them stared at each other for several long seconds.

Then James just nodded slightly. "Well... We'll deal with it." He said. "That's what we do."

And he pulled her face toward him.

\---------------------------------

Samantha gripped the bar on the squat machine and lifted it on her shoulders, surprised at how light the weight felt.. She kicked the safety bar into its off position and proceeded to lower herself down until her knees were at ninety degrees.

Her newly rearranged leg bones made the position awkward, and she felt like she was simultaneously on the verge of falling forward, AND breaking her ankles.

Still. She had nearly a thousand pounds on the machine. Doctor Munro and one of the physical therapists that ran the exercise room looked on in awe as she did ten reps of the weight and then lifted it back up high enough to reengage the safety.

"That's nine ninety." The young man said after a soft whistle. "Any more than that and I'm gonna have to start piling on the free weights. How's it feel?"

She looked at the bars on the side, and all the forty five pound weights still rocking slightly on it. Then she rubbed her shoulder and felt no soreness there where the bar had rested. Her legs felt fine too, despite the awkwardness they'd caused.

"My old squat weight felt heavier." She replied. "You know.... before.... this."

He nodded. "Matches the bench, deadlift, and curls." He said. "In medical terms; you're strong as hell now."

"Thank you Doctor Barnes." Dr. Munro said. Then she turned to Samantha. "How do you feel?"

She shrugged, her black hoodie sagging a bit as her ears pressed back and down.

"Less.... like a human." She said softly. "But.... it's cool I guess."

"I told you it would probably have that effect." Dr. Munro reminded her.

She furrowed her eyebrows. Or at least she would have, if she'd still had discernible eyebrows..

"I thought the idea was to make me feel more like myself. Why make me feel LESS human?" She asked. as she sat on one of the lifting benches and drank from the bottle of water she'd been given earlier. Drinking was much harder with a snout. She kept having to wipe spilled water off of her chin.

"That's exactly right." Dr. Munro agreed. "I said Iam going to make you feel more like yourself." She held out her hand as if requesting the bottle. Samantha looked at her curiously, then handed the bottle over.

But when she did, Dr. Munro instead snagged her wrist. "Tell me." She began as Samantha looked up at her in surprise. "What does this hand look like to you?" She pointed at Samantha's clawed hand, still wrapped around the bottle.

"You know damn well what it looks like." She said in a hiss. "That's the problem."

"Say it." The Doctor said. "What does it look like?"

"Fuck off." She replied as she began to pull back.

"Say it."

Samantha pulled her arm back hard, crushing the bottle hard enough that its cap popped off, and nearly pulling the elderly doctor onto her.

"It looks like a fucking monster's hand!" She spat.

"And who's it belong to?" Dr. Munro asked.

"What?" She asked, thrown off by the odd question. "Obviously it's mine."

"Your hand?"

"Obviously." Samantha said as she pulled her sleeve up, revealing the dark fur beneath, and holding it up.

"Say it."

"It's MY hand!" She half yelled, getting annoyed now.

"Do you know how to make it human again?" The doctor asked.

"If I did I wouldn't be here."

"Damn right." The doctor said. "And we don't know how to fix it either. So until then it's YOUR hand. You need to treat it as such."

"What?"

"I'm not here to try to make you feel HUMAN, Samantha. I'm here to make you feel like you are YOURSELF." The doctor replied, holding Samantha's hand back up in front of her. "Step one: Admit that, until something changes, or we figure out a cure, this is WHO and WHAT you are now."

"No it's not!" Samantha yelled back as she stepped back.

"Then turn back into a human." The doctor demanded. "If you're not a wolf, then turn human now!"

Samantha stared at her.

"I... I can't!" She admitted.

"Then are you a human?"

"I.... I'm supposed to be." She said, almost crying now.

"But are you? Be truthful. Not just to me. But to you."

Samantha slammed her hand into the machine she'd just been using.

"NO!" She yelled at full volume as the machine fell over in a clangor of bending metal and crashing weight plates. Dr. Munro's eyes widened at the damage. "I'M NOT WHAT I'M SUPPOSED TO BE!!! I'M NOT HUMAN ANYMORE!!!"

Samantha looked at the wreckage as she panted heavily, her mouth hanging open as she did.

"Look at how strong you can be Ms. Jenkins." Doctor Munro said, snapping Samantha's attention back to her. "Now imagine if you acknowledged that fact, and controlled it. A HUMAN can't do that." She said as she pointed at the wreckage. "Monsters aren't monsters because of how they look, but how they act."

Then she turned and began to leave.

The physical therapist stared at the destroyed machine.

"She's a soldier, she aint got no money." He said. "That bill's on you Doctor Munro."

Samantha pulled the strings on her hoodie and pressed her hands to her head as she realized just what she'd done, and how she'd acted.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zh5d03/wait_is_this_just_gate_278/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (277/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Remember where I said that the doctor looks like Avaserala? Well, now that's really the case.

Also, I may or may not come back and put a >!PANCAKE!< section in after the first part later. Maybe. Who knows? I sure don't. We'll see.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

When James arrived at their room that night he did so to the sight of Amina sullenly pulling off her armor. She looked at him briefly before turning back to the task at hand, and once James had put down the box and the stack of papers he moved to help her.

Despite the bandages and ointments the healers had used, some of which she was still using under her clothes, James could still see countless bruises and small pockmarks from the bullets she'd been hit by. It was a gruesome and painful reminder of what they'd been through. He even still had some bruising around the hole that had scarred over in his abdomen.

Once her armor was completely off James grabbed the small tin of ointment from their nightstand and rubbed some onto his hands. To him it smelled like candied yams and strawberry. Though a discreet taste-test while Amina hadn't been looking one day had revealed that it definitely didn't taste like them. Once he'd spread a good amount on his hands he began applying it to some of the bruises on Amina's back. She winced at the first touch of the cold paste to her bruised flesh.

"Sorry." He said. "What'd your father want?"

"It's okay." She said as she pulled her hair over her shoulder and out of his way. "And he just had some bad news."

James peered around at her as she looked away.

"Everything okay?" He asked as he spread some of the balm to a bruised bullet wound just under her shoulder blade. The muscle there spasmed a bit and he gently pressed his thumb into it and kneaded it a bit to calm it down. "Anything I should worry about?"

Amina grunted and grit her teeth a bit as he massaged the upset muscle. "Yes. But I've been told to let him tell you about it. He wants you to come see him in the morning." She replied honestly.

"Something bad enough that he wants me prepped, rested and relaxed first?" James said as he took a bit more ointment out of the tin and passed it to her. She took it and began applying some to the bruises on her ribs. "That's not good."

"No." She agreed. "You're going to hate it."

James nodded as he pressed some of the ointment into a line of scar tissue and bruises that ran from just under her left breast to the back of her ribs, some kind of long graze from the battle.

"Anything to do with the P.O.W.'s?" He asked. "That meeting was the President- that's my country's leader- giving me command of them until further notice."

She looked back at him curiously. "He gave you command of a bunch of prisoners?" She asked. "Why?"

"It's... a thing when it comes to prisoners of war in our world." He said with a shrug. "The prisoners are supposed to default to the command of the highest ranking among them. But since there are civilian personnel, and because the military members are from multiple branches they chose me instead. Mostly because I'm now the highest ranking soldier around, AND because I'm not ACTUALLY a prisoner."

She considered the idea for a moment.

"What kind of responsibilities does it entail?" She asked. as she rubbed some ointment on her collarbone.

"Mostly just standard day to day type stuff." He replied as he finished with the scar on her side and wrapped his wolf hand around her waist. With his other hand he pulled her belt down just a bit to inspect a scar he knew was just beneath it, but it was lighter than the rest and she didn't react to the discomfort, so he left it and tended to a different one. "Keeping them on a PT schedule, making sure they remain presentable, follow the orders of the guards. So on and so forth."

Suddenly she grabbed the ointment hand, and placed her other hand on his wolf hand.

"And what about punishment?" She asked.

"What do you mean?" He asked.

"If a punishment needs to be doled out to any of them. What's your role in its administration?"

He thought for a moment. He and the President HAD spoken of such a thing.

"If the punishment is just and fair. I'm to oversee it's application and ensure that its done in an appropriate manner." He recalled. "Extra duty, half rations, isolation. Whatever it might be. I'm also supposed to offer alternatives to anything deemed unnecessary or cruel. And outright resist anything that breaks the new peace agreement our two leaders signed earlier today."

"Do you carry out any of these punishments?" She asked, looking away. "Is that part of the job too?"

James looked at her curiously, and with mounting concern.

"Amina. What's this about?" He asked. "Is this about the bad news?"

She took a deep breath. "I told you I'm not supposed to tell you." She said after a moment of thought.

The reminder was, itself, an admission.

James pulled her close to him and wrapped his left arm around her. With his other hand he pulled her face to look at him.

The two of them stared at each other for several long seconds.

Then James just nodded slightly. "Well... We'll deal with it." He said. "That's what we do."

And he pulled her face toward him.

\----------

Samantha gripped the bar on the squat machine and lifted it on her shoulders, surprised at how light the weight felt.. She kicked the safety bar into its off position and proceeded to lower herself down until her knees were at ninety degrees.

Her newly rearranged leg bones made the position awkward, and she felt like she was simultaneously on the verge of falling forward, AND breaking her ankles.

Still. She had nearly a thousand pounds on the machine. Doctor Munro and one of the physical therapists that ran the exercise room looked on in awe as she did ten reps of the weight and then lifted it back up high enough to reengage the safety.

"That's nine ninety." The young man said after a soft whistle. "Any more than that and I'm gonna have to start piling on the free weights. How's it feel?"

She looked at the bars on the side, and all the forty five pound weights still rocking slightly on it. Then she rubbed her shoulder and felt no soreness there where the bar had rested. Her legs felt fine too, despite the awkwardness they'd caused.

"My old squat weight felt heavier." She replied. "You know.... before.... this."

He nodded. "Matches the bench, deadlift, and curls." He said. "In medical terms; you're strong as hell now."

"Thank you Doctor Barnes." Dr. Munro said. Then she turned to Samantha. "How do you feel?"

She shrugged, her black hoodie sagging a bit as her ears pressed back and down.

"Less.... like a human." She said softly. "But.... it's cool I guess."

"I told you it would probably have that effect." Dr. Munro reminded her.

She furrowed her eyebrows. Or at least she would have, if she'd still had discernible eyebrows..

"I thought the idea was to make me feel more like myself. Why make me feel LESS human?" She asked. as she sat on one of the lifting benches and drank from the bottle of water she'd been given earlier. Drinking was much harder with a snout. She kept having to wipe spilled water off of her chin.

"That's exactly right." Dr. Munro agreed. "I said Iam going to make you feel more like yourself." She held out her hand as if requesting the bottle. Samantha looked at her curiously, then handed the bottle over. But when she did, Dr. Munro instead snagged her wrist. "Tell me." She began as Samantha looked up at her in surprise. "What does this hand look like to you?" She pointed at Samantha's clawed hand, still wrapped around the bottle.

"You know damn well what it looks like." She said in a hiss. "That's the problem."

"Say it." The Doctor said. "What does it look like?"

"Fuck off." She replied as she began to pull back.

"Say it."

Samantha pulled her arm back hard, crushing the bottle hard enough that its cap popped off, and nearly pulling the elderly doctor onto her.

"It looks like a fucking monster's hand!" She spat.

"And who's it belong to?" Dr. Munro asked.

"What?" She asked, thrown off by the odd question. "Obviously it's mine."

"Your hand?"

"Obviously." Samantha said as she pulled her sleeve up, revealing the dark fur beneath, and holding it up.

"Say it."

"It's MY hand!" She half yelled, getting annoyed now.

"Do you know how to make it human again?" The doctor asked.

"If I did I wouldn't be here."

"Damn right." The doctor said. "And we don't know how to fix it either. So until then it's YOUR hand. You need to treat it as such."

"What?"

"I'm not here to try to make you feel HUMAN, Samantha. I'm here to make you feel like you are YOURSELF." The doctor replied, holding Samantha's hand back up in front of her. "Step one: Admit that, until something changes, or we figure out a cure, this is WHO and WHAT you are now."

"No it's not!" Samantha yelled back as she stepped back.

"Then turn back into a human." The doctor demanded. "If you're not a wolf, then turn human now!"

Samantha stared at her.

"I... I can't!" She admitted.

"Then are you a human?"

"I.... I'm supposed to be." She said, almost crying now.

"But are you? Be truthful. Not just to me. But to you."

Samantha slammed her hand into the machine she'd just been using.

"NO!" She yelled at full volume as the machine fell over in a clangor of bending metal and crashing weight plates. Dr. Munro's eyes widened at the damage. "I'M NOT WHAT I'M SUPPOSED TO BE!!! I'M NOT HUMAN ANYMORE!!!"

Samantha looked at the wreckage as she panted heavily, her mouth hanging open as she did.

"Look at how strong you can be Ms. Jenkins." Doctor Munro said, snapping Samantha's attention back to her. "Now imagine if you acknowledged that fact, and controlled it. A HUMAN can't do that." She said as she pointed at the wreckage. "Monsters aren't monsters because of how they look, but how they act."

Then she turned and began to leave.

The physical therapist stared at the destroyed machine.

"She's a soldier, she aint got no money." He said. "That bill's on you Doctor Munro."

Samantha pulled the strings on her hoodie and pressed her hands to her head as she realized just what she'd done, and how she'd acted.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zh5bf8/wait_is_this_just_gate_278/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (276/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Surprise presents just in time for Christmas? And double edged swords/backhanded compliments? Ooooh you wascawwy politicians.

Enjoy.

\~

James stepped out of the communication room nearly an hour after he'd entered. In one hand he held a stack of papers that had been printed out from the hub and that he'd then had to sign and initial in numerous places.

And he was exhausted.

At least it wasn't a massive promotion this time. He thought to himself. Just command of an entire company of prisoners and de facto supervision of the civilian prisoners they brought with them. He gulped. No biggie.

He walked the few doors down to the summoning room and greeted the guards, informing them that he was expecting a package. They logged it in their records and let him in. Sure enough when he got inside he saw the interior guards inspecting a small styrofoam box that was on the floor.

He said it was a wedding present. James thought. But I think I should probably inspect it. He might be the president but I'm not dumb enough to trust him explicitly.

James greeted the two guards inspecting the box and asked if he could see it. They nodded and he picked it up. Inside was a nice dark wooden box. The top of it bore a pyrographed version of the presidential seal, and the lid had a simple brass clasp.

He gingerly undid the clasp, bracing himself in case his suspicions were correct. When nothing happened he slowly opened the lid, waiting for a tell tale click or pop.

But the lid simply opened.

James looked inside at the blue velvet lined interior, and the two large items inside.

\["Holy shit."\] He said in surprise, slipping back into English without realizing it. The two guards looked at him before peering into the box. "Sorry." He said to them. "Just one hell of a gift."

Still, he had to do his diligence. James lifted the box onto one of the tables near the door and set to dismantling it as far as he could go. He held each of the two items in turn, examining them and admiring their finish before gently setting them down. Then he removed the padding of the box, which did end up concealing several small boxes, though the contents of the boxes were somewhat expected given the two items that comprised the gift.

The two boxes were, fortunately, the only surprise the box had in store for him. He'd have Vickers give it a once over whenever he saw him but, as far as he could tell, it was safe. He put everything back in place and took the box with him out the door.

The contents of the box had him smiling as he walked back to his and Amina's room.

\--------------------------

"He won't like this." Amina said as she read over the agreement that her father and the President had come to and signed.

"It's not meant to be liked." King Farrick replied as he poured himself some tea. "It's meant to buy peace and punish him without LOOKING like a punishment."

"But James didn't do anything wrong." She said. "He went there to try to maintain peace. It's not his fault that his own people opened fire."

Her father sighed as he rested his hands on the table and leaned on it, his head hanging.

"I know." He said simply. "From our point of view your fiance did everything as well as he was able. He didn't just perform well, he legitimately did a GOOD... THING. His actions, as well as those of the First Sergeant -still an odd rank- saved a lot of lives. On both sides."

He poured a bit of liquor into the tea, considered, then simply swigged from the bottle instead.

"But imagine if you were in THEIR shoes." He said as he turned around, the cup of liquored tea in hand as he sat. "Imagine if one of YOUR soldiers had so blatantly acted against your forces. To the point of even killing some of them. Hell, imagine if Kela had killed any of my royal guardians while she was out on a deployment. Even if it ends up being justified it's going to cause problems."

"If Kela had been the one to do it, I would have trusted her judgment." She answered.

"Yes." He agreed. "YOU... would have. But what about Sigbert? Or Alixan?" He considered the latter. "Well, maybe not Alixan. But still, what would the other Generals have thought? What would the Guardian Lord have thought? What would they have assumed?"

Amina took his meaning.

"He killed members of his OWN military." Her father continued. "And not just any members, but apparently some of the most deadly and most expensively equipped, highly trusted, covert members of his own military." He waved at the papers as he sat back and sipped at his tea. "Justified or not. It's still an insult to his own leaders."

"He still doesn't deserve this." Amina countered.

"No." The King agreed. "No he doesn't. But it is the price of peace." He sipped the spiked tea again. "Peace with a world that we now know better the capability of in a fight. And one which is not afraid to stab its own so-called allies in the back to get what it desires. Just like he'd warned us of."

The two of them sat in uncomfortable silence for several long moments.

"I'll go tell him." She said as she began to rise.

"No." Her father said firmly. "I won't put that on you. Simply tell him that I wish to speak with him in the morning. If this kind of punishment is to be meted out, then I am the one to do it." He downed the last of the tea then set the cup back down firmly. "Your job is to aide him in the aftermath."

\----------

When Margaret Choi made it back to their room, having left Amina only a few minutes earlier, she set down the shopping that they had gotten for the day and set to putting them away in the closet.

She worried about her son and Amina. To both be called in to their respective leaders unexpectedly like that. Even without being in the military she knew that that wasn't normal.

It was as she considered this, and put away the handful of dresses and other clothes she'd got today, that she heard a door open.

But it wasn't the rooms front door.

"Mom?" A familiar, and sorely missed, voice said from the room off to the side of their main room.

"Josephito?" She cried as she spun around.

Joey stood in the door to his room. His hair and the short beard on his face were scraggly. But he was standing tall, even as he hid behind the door just a bit.

He stepped out a bit more, and she moved to hug him.

\----------

Artair rode as fast as Xhalya would take him, which was quite a bit faster than most horses.

"Slo-S-Slow down!" The orc scout Kor'Os said from behind him on his saddle as she bounced up and down from Xhalya's scrabbling.

"No." He said back to her. "We need to get to the capital."

"I ne-need to ge-get back to Waterside." She countered. "I need to tell the garrison commander what I found and what you said."

"You already sent your bird to do that." He replied. "Besides I didn't tell you to come with me. Much less to hop on behind me."

"I wa-a-as trying to stop you." She yelled back.

"Well you did a great job." He shot back. "Now either hold on tight and grip Xha's sides with your legs like you mean it, or get off."

He felt her hesitantly move her hands forward around him and hold on tighter, he also felt her stop bouncing quite as much behind him.

"Better?" He asked.

"Sure." She answered. "Now turn around."

"No. My father needs to know what's happened here." He said.

"And what has happened here?" She asked. The prince hadn't exactly said anything once he'd seen what was left of Finewood. "What do you know?"

He peered back at her with a look of mild annoyance.

"You hear the reports of what happened outside Jadesport?" He asked. "The devastation?"

She nodded.

"A big battle between the army, your rider clan, and some kind of undead that came from the vanishing blight." She said. "Least that's what we heard on this side of the country. Plus some kind of magic explosion."

"Bit of a simplification." He replied. "And it wasn't a magical explosion. But.... it might as well have been."

"What's that got to do with this?" She asked.

He thought for a moment. "I think that damage we saw back there was caused by the same kind of thing. Or things perhaps."

"What? Explosions?" She wondered in confusion.

"No." He said as he turned back ahead and kicked Xhalya to move faster. "It's the UNDEAD... things."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zgguup/wait_is_this_just_gate_277/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (276/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Surprise presents just in time for Christmas? And double edged swords/backhanded compliments? Ooooh you wascawwy politicians.

Enjoy.

\~

James stepped out of the communication room nearly an hour after he'd entered. In one hand he held a stack of papers that had been printed out from the hub and that he'd then had to sign and initial in numerous places.

And he was exhausted.

At least it wasn't a massive promotion this time. He thought to himself. Just command of an entire company of prisoners and de facto supervision of the civilian prisoners they brought with them. He gulped. No biggie.

He walked the few doors down to the summoning room and greeted the guards, informing them that he was expecting a package. They logged it in their records and let him in. Sure enough when he got inside he saw the interior guards inspecting a small styrofoam box that was on the floor.

He said it was a wedding present. James thought. But I think I should probably inspect it. He might be the president but I'm not dumb enough to trust him explicitly.

James greeted the two guards inspecting the box and asked if he could see it. They nodded and he picked it up. Inside was a nice dark wooden box. The top of it bore a pyrographed version of the presidential seal, and the lid had a simple brass clasp.

He gingerly undid the clasp, bracing himself in case his suspicions were correct. When nothing happened he slowly opened the lid, waiting for a tell tale click or pop.

But the lid simply opened.

James looked inside at the blue velvet lined interior, and the two large items inside.

\["Holy shit."\] He said in surprise, slipping back into English without realizing it. The two guards looked at him before peering into the box. "Sorry." He said to them. "Just one hell of a gift."

Still, he had to do his diligence. James lifted the box onto one of the tables near the door and set to dismantling it as far as he could go. He held each of the two items in turn, examining them and admiring their finish before gently setting them down. Then he removed the padding of the box, which did end up concealing several small boxes, though the contents of the boxes were somewhat expected given the two items that comprised the gift.

The two boxes were, fortunately, the only surprise the box had in store for him. He'd have Vickers give it a once over whenever he saw him but, as far as he could tell, it was safe. He put everything back in place and took the box with him out the door.

The contents of the box had him smiling as he walked back to his and Amina's room.

\--------------------------

"He won't like this." Amina said as she read over the agreement that her father and the President had come to and signed.

"It's not meant to be liked." King Farrick replied as he poured himself some tea. "It's meant to buy peace and punish him without LOOKING like a punishment."

"But James didn't do anything wrong." She said. "He went there to try to maintain peace. It's not his fault that his own people opened fire."

Her father sighed as he rested his hands on the table and leaned on it, his head hanging.

"I know." He said simply. "From our point of view your fiance did everything as well as he was able. He didn't just perform well, he legitimately did a GOOD... THING. His actions, as well as those of the First Sergeant -still an odd rank- saved a lot of lives. On both sides."

He poured a bit of liquor into the tea, considered, then simply swigged from the bottle instead.

"But imagine if you were in THEIR shoes." He said as he turned around, the cup of liquored tea in hand as he sat. "Imagine if one of YOUR soldiers had so blatantly acted against your forces. To the point of even killing some of them. Hell, imagine if Kela had killed any of my royal guardians while she was out on a deployment. Even if it ends up being justified it's going to cause problems."

"If Kela had been the one to do it, I would have trusted her judgment." She answered.

"Yes." He agreed. "YOU... would have. But what about Sigbert? Or Alixan?" He considered the latter. "Well, maybe not Alixan. But still, what would the other Generals have thought? What would the Guardian Lord have thought? What would they have assumed?"

Amina took his meaning.

"He killed members of his OWN military." Her father continued. "And not just any members, but apparently some of the most deadly and most expensively equipped, highly trusted, covert members of his own military." He waved at the papers as he sat back and sipped at his tea. "Justified or not. It's still an insult to his own leaders."

"He still doesn't deserve this." Amina countered.

"No." The King agreed. "No he doesn't. But it is the price of peace." He sipped the spiked tea again. "Peace with a world that we now know better the capability of in a fight. And one which is not afraid to stab its own so-called allies in the back to get what it desires. Just like he'd warned us of."

The two of them sat in uncomfortable silence for several long moments.

"I'll go tell him." She said as she began to rise.

"No." Her father said firmly. "I won't put that on you. Simply tell him that I wish to speak with him in the morning. If this kind of punishment is to be meted out, then I am the one to do it." He downed the last of the tea then set the cup back down firmly. "Your job is to aide him in the aftermath."

\----------

When Margaret Choi made it back to their room, having left Amina only a few minutes earlier, she set down the shopping that they had gotten for the day and set to putting them away in the closet.

She worried about her son and Amina. To both be called in to their respective leaders unexpectedly like that. Even without being in the military she knew that that wasn't normal.

It was as she considered this, and put away the handful of dresses and other clothes she'd got today, that she heard a door open.

But it wasn't the rooms front door.

"Mom?" A familiar, and sorely missed, voice said from the room off to the side of their main room.

"Josephito?" She cried as she spun around.

Joey stood in the door to his room. His hair and the short beard on his face were scraggly. But he was standing tall, even as he hid behind the door just a bit.

He stepped out a bit more, and she moved to hug him.

\----------

Artair rode as fast as Xhalya would take him, which was quite a bit faster than most horses.

"Slo-S-Slow down!" The orc scout Kor'Os said from behind him on his saddle as she bounced up and down from Xhalya's scrabbling.

"No." He said back to her. "We need to get to the capital."

"I ne-need to ge-get back to Waterside." She countered. "I need to tell the garrison commander what I found and what you said."

"You already sent your bird to do that." He replied. "Besides I didn't tell you to come with me. Much less to hop on behind me."

"I wa-a-as trying to stop you." She yelled back.

"Well you did a great job." He shot back. "Now either hold on tight and grip Xha's sides with your legs like you mean it, or get off."

He felt her hesitantly move her hands forward around him and hold on tighter, he also felt her stop bouncing quite as much behind him.

"Better?" He asked.

"Sure." She answered. "Now turn around."

"No. My father needs to know what's happened here." He said.

"And what has happened here?" She asked. The prince hadn't exactly said anything once he'd seen what was left of Finewood. "What do you know?"

He peered back at her with a look of mild annoyance.

"You hear the reports of what happened outside Jadesport?" He asked. "The devastation?"

She nodded.

"A big battle between the army, your rider clan, and some kind of undead that came from the vanishing blight." She said. "Least that's what we heard on this side of the country. Plus some kind of magic explosion."

"Bit of a simplification." He replied. "And it wasn't a magical explosion. But.... it might as well have been."

"What's that got to do with this?" She asked.

He thought for a moment. "I think that damage we saw back there was caused by the same kind of thing. Or things perhaps."

"What? Explosions?" She wondered in confusion.

"No." He said as he turned back ahead and kicked Xhalya to move faster. "It's the UNDEAD... things."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zggt64/wait_is_this_just_gate_277/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (275/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Hey look. It's that guy. Haven't seen him in a while. Wonder what he's up to.

And yes. The first section means EXACTLY what you think it means..... maybe.... guess we'll see.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

confirm your willingness and surety of conversion. Or be dismissed if you have changed your mind.
>
>\-Asha Longsighted of the Lunar council

Vickers stared at the letter.

He'd sent the request almost two weeks ago while he'd still been recovering from the battle. Now that he'd cooled down and wasn't in the amped up state he'd been then, he was beginning to doubt the request.

But on the other hand, he needed more power to keep up with everything that was going on.

The equation running through his mind weighed on him heavily as he leaned against the bars of Tom's pen. Only the griffin's tugging at his jacket broke him out of the deep train of thought he'd brought upon himself. He turned and patted at the beast's feathered head.

"Two weeks to make a big ass decision." He said to the griffin, who looked back at him with eagle's eyes. "Then I either embrace the suck and nut up. Or do something drastic."

Tom just squawked at him as he nibbled on Vickers' forearm.

\----------

James, Amina, and James's mother arrived back at the castle just after sundown. Amina and his mother carried several large bundles of new clothes in a pair of baskets and James was carrying a small crate loaded with groceries.

It turned out that while this world didn't have beans, they did have something that functioned almost identically. He'd described the classic Mexican side dish in detail and Amina had been able to point him toward a vendor who served something that was nearly identical, though it had a lighter color than he was used to. He'd asked them what the food was made of and the woman running the small cart had shown him something that looked like a celery stalk, black eyed pea hybrid. But the flavor and consistency of the resulting dish had been spot on. Even his mother had said so.

"Alright guys. I'm gonna go store this in the castle kitchen and make sure they know to leave it alone. You two have fun gossiping. I'll meet you in the room in a bit." He'd said as he'd been on the verge of doing just that.

Then the guard near the entrance had called him.

"Captain Choi." The guard hailed. The three of them stopped.

"Yeah. What's up?" He asked.

"King gave orders to let you know your presence requested in the Communication Room sir." The dwarf said. "And General the King also requested your presence in HIS study. Whenever you two are available that is."

James and Amina looked at each other curiously for a moment.

"Mom." James said. "Head on back to your room for a bit. We'll see what's going on." She nodded awkwardly then slowly made to walk away. "Thank you Sergeant." He said to the guard.

"Indeed." Amina agreed. "I'll go drop this off and head over. Come with me Mrs. Choi. We'll walk together."

"Okay." She said as the two of them left for the rooms.

James dropped the food off as he'd planned, then made for the communication room.

His legs ached. They had all day, same as the rest of him. But the light exercise of the day had loosened them up a bit. He stretched as he entered the room. Then he walked over to the communication hub and reached to activate it.

He waited the minute or so for it to boot up all the way. Then a video chat opened up.

James's face went pale as he saw who was on the other side. He immediately stood up straighter.

"Mister Choi!" Said the President before yawning just a little. "I'm glad you could finally find the time to report in after everything that's happened." He shook his head a little bit and then took a sip of what James assumed was coffee. "Let's have a little chat."

\----------

Kor'Os' legs shook as she slowly ambled back to the town to report on her findings. Green eyes watched her curiously as she slowly made her way down the empty road.

The tears on her cheeks had dried hours ago. She'd never seen anything like what had been at the village.

She passed through the place many times in her travels and exploration. Had always been a fan of the way they baked their river fish with the sour-grass and herbs native to the area. She'd always made a a point of grabbing a few fillets any time she was nearby.

Now it was just a massive empty place in the world. It's trees, its homes, the very lake that had sat next to it, and all the people that had lived in it save one, were gone.

They hadn't been burned, or attacked by raiders of any kind. It hadn't been any sickness or flood or even any kind of magical spell as far as she could tell. Though only a mage would know that with absolute certainty. Gods knew she WANTED to call it magic. Magic was the only thing that made any sense. How else could something make an entire village just DISAPPEAR like that one had?

But even as a novice caster, capable of little more than starting a fire or moving a bit of earth when needed, she could sense the absolute LACK of magical energy in the area.

She was broken out of her thoughts as she heard the sound of a rider approaching, a drake rider if her ears were true, and they always were.

She rounded the copse at the bend and sure enough was proven right. A well dressed man who looked familiar to her somehow rode on the back of a sizable blue tinged drake.

"Halt!" She said. "Go no further if you wish to live."

The man pulled on the reins of his drake and brought it to a halt. Then he looked at her curiously.

"Oh." He said. "Are guard scouts taking to highway robbery now?" The man asked.

She considered the question, then realized how it must have looked from his point of view. She shook her head.

"No." She said as she rubbed a bit of exhaustion from her face. "It's just that there's nothing that way except death and.... well..." She considered what she'd seen. "I don't really know what, honestly. But it's nothing good."

"How so?" He asked. "Finewood is only a few miles that way. I was hoping to get some of their fish for dinner before turning in for the night."

She felt tears forming on her cheek again. Then remembered that she was a damned Scout Sub-Commander. She had a job to do, and right now that job entailed keeping a civilian safe.

"Finewood is gone." She said as she felt the steel return to her voice. "Don't know what happened to it. But it aint there no more. I'm returning to Waterside to report what I've found. Turn back now."

"Gone?" The man asked. What do you mean?"

"I mean isn't there." Kor'Os clarified. "GONE."

The man considered this for a moment, then kicked his drake into motion again.

Kor'Os stood in his path. "I said TURN AROUND!" She repeated. "That's an order from the King's Army."

The man cocked an eyebrow. "Sadly Scout Sub-Commander." He said, having somehow recognized her rank despite its uniqueness. "I'm one of the few people you'll ever run into who doesn't have to care about an order from a member of the King's Army."

"Like hells you are." She said as she stepped forward. The drake began to rumble as she felt the air heat up. It was preparing to breath fire at her.

"Xhalya." The man said sternly. "No." And just like that the rumble, and the rising heat, ceased.

She looked down at it curiously for a moment.

"Out of the way commander. I would see this.... GONE.... village."

"I can't let you do that." She said. "It's too dangerous. Not until we know what happened."

He rolled his eyes at that. "Look. I'm going past you to see what it is you're talking about. If it really is GONE, like you say, then I may be one of the few people around here who knows what happened. At least if it's what it sounds like."

"And just who the hell are you?" She asked, suddenly on edge at the man admitting he might know what happened.

The man sighed deeply. "Please don't make me tell you." He said.

"Either you tell me, or I arrest you and haul you to the garrison." She said, her hand on the short sword at her hip.

He sighed again. "Gods dammit." He muttered to himself. Then he turned and looked her in the eyes. "I'm Prince Artair Petravius. Second son of the very King you serve." He pulled out a silver chain from under his shirt and showed her the ring on it. It bore the royal crest. Then he pointed nonchalantly at the road ahead. "I'm on the way to the capital because once again there's been some kind of battle involving my sister and her damnable fiance."

Kor'Os's hand flew off of her sword's hilt. Had she almost drawn a weapon on a member of the royal family?

"Anyways." He said as his drake began walking again. "Now that that's solved I'm going to go check this out and hope that I'm wrong."

"What? No!" She yelled as she jogged to catch up. "You can't it's too dangerous!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zfbzib/wait_is_this_just_gate_276/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (275/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Hey look. It's that guy. Haven't seen him in a while. Wonder what he's up to.

And yes. The first section means EXACTLY what you think it means..... maybe.... guess we'll see.

Enjoy.

\~\~\~

elite guard who desires to bear witness and has requested temporary leave to aide you in your adjustment after.
>
>This party shall arrive roughly two weeks after you have received this letter, weather and road conditions permitting. At which time they will confirm your willingness and surety of conversion. Or be dismissed if you have changed your mind.
>
>\-Asha Longsighted of the Lunar council

Vickers stared at the letter.

He'd sent the request almost two weeks ago while he'd still been recovering from the battle. Now that he'd cooled down and wasn't in the amped up state he'd been then, he was beginning to doubt the request.

But on the other hand, he needed more power to keep up with everything that was going on.

The equation running through his mind weighed on him heavily as he leaned against the bars of Tom's pen. Only the griffin's tugging at his jacket broke him out of the deep train of thought he'd brought upon himself. He turned and patted at the beast's feathered head.

"Two weeks to make a big ass decision." He said to the griffin, who looked back at him with eagle's eyes. "Then I either embrace the suck and nut up. Or do something drastic."

Tom just squawked at him as he nibbled on Vickers' forearm.

\----------

James, Amina, and James's mother arrived back at the castle just after sundown. Amina and his mother carried several large bundles of new clothes in a pair of baskets and James was carrying a small crate loaded with groceries.

It turned out that while this world didn't have beans, they did have something that functioned almost identically. He'd described the classic Mexican side dish in detail and Amina had been able to point him toward a vendor who served something that was nearly identical, though it had a lighter color than he was used to. He'd asked them what the food was made of and the woman running the small cart had shown him something that looked like a celery stalk, black eyed pea hybrid. But the flavor and consistency of the resulting dish had been spot on. Even his mother had said so.

"Alright guys. I'm gonna go store this in the castle kitchen and make sure they know to leave it alone. You two have fun gossiping. I'll meet you in the room in a bit." He'd said as he'd been on the verge of doing just that.

Then the guard near the entrance had called him.

"Captain Choi." The guard hailed. The three of them stopped.

"Yeah. What's up?" He asked.

"King gave orders to let you know your presence requested in the Communication Room sir." The dwarf said. "And General the King also requested your presence in HIS study. Whenever you two are available that is."

James and Amina looked at each other curiously for a moment.

"Mom." James said. "Head on back to your room for a bit. We'll see what's going on." She nodded awkwardly then slowly made to walk away. "Thank you Sergeant." He said to the guard.

"Indeed." Amina agreed. "I'll go drop this off and head over. Come with me Mrs. Choi. We'll walk together."

"Okay." She said as the two of them left for the rooms.

James dropped the food off as he'd planned, then made for the communication room.

His legs ached. They had all day, same as the rest of him. But the light exercise of the day had loosened them up a bit. He stretched as he entered the room. Then he walked over to the communication hub and reached to activate it.

He waited the minute or so for it to boot up all the way. Then a video chat opened up.

James's face went pale as he saw who was on the other side. He immediately stood up straighter.

"Mister Choi!" Said the President before yawning just a little. "I'm glad you could finally find the time to report in after everything that's happened." He shook his head a little bit and then took a sip of what James assumed was coffee. "Let's have a little chat."

\----------

Kor'Os' legs shook as she slowly ambled back to the town to report on her findings. Green eyes watched her curiously as she slowly made her way down the empty road.

The tears on her cheeks had dried hours ago. She'd never seen anything like what had been at the village.

She passed through the place many times in her travels and exploration. Had always been a fan of the way they baked their river fish with the sour-grass and herbs native to the area. She'd always made a a point of grabbing a few fillets any time she was nearby.

Now it was just a massive empty place in the world. It's trees, its homes, the very lake that had sat next to it, and all the people that had lived in it save one, were gone.

They hadn't been burned, or attacked by raiders of any kind. It hadn't been any sickness or flood or even any kind of magical spell as far as she could tell. Though only a mage would know that with absolute certainty. Gods knew she WANTED to call it magic. Magic was the only thing that made any sense. How else could something make an entire village just DISAPPEAR like that one had?

But even as a novice caster, capable of little more than starting a fire or moving a bit of earth when needed, she could sense the absolute LACK of magical energy in the area.

She was broken out of her thoughts as she heard the sound of a rider approaching, a drake rider if her ears were true, and they always were.

She rounded the copse at the bend and sure enough was proven right. A well dressed man who looked familiar to her somehow rode on the back of a sizable blue tinged drake.

"Halt!" She said. "Go no further if you wish to live."

The man pulled on the reins of his drake and brought it to a halt. Then he looked at her curiously.

"Oh." He said. "Are guard scouts taking to highway robbery now?" The man asked.

She considered the question, then realized how it must have looked from his point of view. She shook her head.

"No." She said as she rubbed a bit of exhaustion from her face. "It's just that there's nothing that way except death and.... well..." She considered what she'd seen. "I don't really know what, honestly. But it's nothing good."

"How so?" He asked. "Finewood is only a few miles that way. I was hoping to get some of their fish for dinner before turning in for the night."

She felt tears forming on her cheek again. Then remembered that she was a damned Scout Sub-Commander. She had a job to do, and right now that job entailed keeping a civilian safe.

"Finewood is gone." She said as she felt the steel return to her voice. "Don't know what happened to it. But it aint there no more. I'm returning to Waterside to report what I've found. Turn back now."

"Gone?" The man asked. What do you mean?"

"I mean isn't there." Kor'Os clarified. "GONE."

The man considered this for a moment, then kicked his drake into motion again.

Kor'Os stood in his path. "I said TURN AROUND!" She repeated. "That's an order from the King's Army."

The man cocked an eyebrow. "Sadly Scout Sub-Commander." He said, having somehow recognized her rank despite its uniqueness. "I'm one of the few people you'll ever run into who doesn't have to care about an order from a member of the King's Army."

"Like hells you are." She said as she stepped forward. The drake began to rumble as she felt the air heat up. It was preparing to breath fire at her.

"Xhalya." The man said sternly. "No." And just like that the rumble, and the rising heat, ceased.

She looked down at it curiously for a moment.

"Out of the way commander. I would see this.... GONE.... village."

"I can't let you do that." She said. "It's too dangerous. Not until we know what happened."

He rolled his eyes at that. "Look. I'm going past you to see what it is you're talking about. If it really is GONE, like you say, then I may be one of the few people around here who knows what happened. At least if it's what it sounds like."

"And just who the hell are you?" She asked, suddenly on edge at the man admitting he might know what happened.

The man sighed deeply. "Please don't make me tell you." He said.

"Either you tell me, or I arrest you and haul you to the garrison." She said, her hand on the short sword at her hip.

He sighed again. "Gods dammit." He muttered to himself. Then he turned and looked her in the eyes. "I'm Prince Artair Petravius. Second son of the very King you serve." He pulled out a silver chain from under his shirt and showed her the ring on it. It bore the royal crest. Then he pointed nonchalantly at the road ahead. "I'm on the way to the capital because once again there's been some kind of battle involving my sister and her damnable fiance."

Kor'Os's hand flew off of her sword's hilt. Had she almost drawn a weapon on a member of the royal family?

"Anyways." He said as his drake began walking again. "Now that that's solved I'm going to go check this out and hope that I'm wrong."

"What? No!" She yelled as she jogged to catch up. "You can't it's too dangerous!"

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zfbxhw/wait_is_this_just_gate_276/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (274/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Played a weekend long Apocalypse 40k event this weekend. 4000PL per side. So I am fuckin exhausted my dudes. No energy for witty notes. Writing. Stuff happens. Enjoy.

^(INB4 y'all tell me to take my time. I did. And now here we are.)

\~

James poked lightly at the dark spot at the base of his ribs. It ached underneath, but the skin was smooth and soft, and a shade lighter than the area around it.

"Any pain?" The healer asked as they inspected the matching spot on James's back. They prodded it with their finger.

James grunted. "A bit. Like a bruise or something."

"No pain in the bones though? Not feeling anything that feels.... Loose? Or like it's moving when it shouldn't?"

James shook his head. "No. No just tender."

"How about the rest of you?" His mother asked from where she was watching nearby.

James just shook his head again. "I'm fine mom." He said. "Got my bell rung and broke a bunch of stuff. But... I'm fine." He looked over to the other bed nearby. "Hon?" He asked.

Amina winced as the healer attending her maneuvered her left arm up above her head, as if trying to high five someone. At the apex her expression soured as she strained against the torn muscles that were still healing. "I'm fine." She said.

"Debatable." The healer countered. "You've still got partially torn muscles in both shoulders and in your legs. And the only reason none of those... " They referenced the medical reports that the previous healers had left on the princess. "Bullets. Still a weird word.....Anyways the only reason they didn't kill you is because you entered a Fury-State. If it hadn't been for that, you would have ended up like all the other soldiers. That and your shield kept MOST of the damage from getting through to anything important."

The Healer gripped Amina's head and turned her head to the side and jabbed at a scar that ran just past the end of her eyebrow.

"This one right here only needed a few inches and it would have taken your bad eye." The healer continued. "But, lucky you, it was just a graze."

Amina shook the man's hand off and grunted as she stood up.

"I've had torn muscles before." She said. "Broken bones too." She pointed at the bad eye in question. "In fact I've had worse before and I didn't even get to take part in THAT fight. I'll be fine."

The healer scowled a bit. "At least return for your last few regenerative sessions and physical reconditioning checks. And don't forget to bandage before bed." He said. "No questions."

"Fine." Amina said as she slid back into her breastplate and clasped it in place.

"You're good to go Captain Choi." The young Orc healer attending to him said. "Same thing though. Last few check ups, no questions." Then the healer muttered under their breath. ^("Still don't know how you survived that though.")

James nodded as he looked over his shoulder at them in confusion. "Got it. Thanks."

With that James stood up and took Amina's hand. His mother walked beside them as they made their way down the hall.

"I'm glad you're doing better mijo." She said after a few minutes. "I was so worried when I saw them bring you in." She looked past him. "You too Amina."

"I know mom. Sorry 'bout that." He replied.

"Thank you Mrs. Choi." Amina said with a smile.

"Now. Why did you ask me to join you?" His mother asked. "I mean, I'm glad to see you two doing better. But I could do without seeing the Healing Ward for a bit."

James chuckled. His mother had basically become the go to expert when it came to treating gun shot wounds. As a result she had spent most of the past few weeks in and out of the ward in question to help with the recovering Petravian soldiers.

"Well. We've gotta go shopping today." He said.

"Oh yes." Amina said with a smile. "I've got to take you to my favorite tailor."

His mother looked at both of them with furrowed eyebrows. "Why?"

"Well." James began. "Remember how Amina and I are engaged?"

His mother's eyes widened and she smiled. "It's finally happening?"

James nodded as he felt Amina bump into him.

"Yeah we've gotten tired of emergencies and surprise attacks and things delaying it over and over. So we asked King Farrick to speed things up a bit." He pointed at a pair of castle staff members who were carrying a massive bolt of crimson and gold cloth down the hall. "Prep is underway right now. It happens in about a week and a half."

"Oh mijo!" His mother exclaimed as she wrapped him in a hug that felt like it was going to re-break a few of his bones. "I'm so excited!" Then she quickly wrapped her arms around Amina in a similar hug.

"Ow." Amina mouthed over his mother's shoulder.

James smiled.

"Okay mom. Let her breath." James said as he took his moms shoulder and guided her out of the killing embrace. "Now come on. Let's get you a wedding outfit. You'll be sitting in front of all the rich folk of the land."

"Shouldn't we bring your brother?" She asked. Then her smile faltered "Or you know.... once he's better?"

James wrapped his arm around his mom's shoulder.

"Mom, he'll be okay. He just needs a bit of time to process. And for us to help him when he's ready." He said with a smile. "Besides. I already took him to MY tailor for his wedding outfit. This is all about you."

"What?" She asked. "He already has his?"

"Been in my closet since before the whole desert thing went down." He said. "Now come on. Amina's gonna show you the good stuff when it comes to clothes. And IIIII am gonna grab the ingredients for grandma's chile verde." He said. "Gonna have to B.S. the beans though. Cause I do not recall ever seeing any since I got here." He paused in his tracks as he tried to come to terms with that sudden realization.

He turned to look at Amina.

"Hon. Does Petravus NOT have beans?" He asked, suddenly concerned.

"What are beans?" She asked in return.

Next to her Mrs. Choi's mouth dropped open as she heard the new info about the world she was now in.

\----------

"Are you ready Samantha?" Dr. Munro asked. "We can hold off if you want to."

Samantha nodded, the hood of her jacket bouncing a little as she did. Her hands clenched on the leg of her sweatpants and she could feel the nails there straining at the cloth of her gloves.

"Okay." The doctor said. "Remember; it's just the two of them and a security officer for safety reasons. No cameras or anything."

"You mean in case I hurt anyone?" Samantha asked.

Dr. Munro frowned a bit.

"In case anyone tries to hurt you." She answered. "Or in case anyone tries to get in besides Mr. Morgan or Mr. Laurent. We're still not allowing press or anyone else in yet. This is only happening because I thought it might help you. Even lawyers and government officials are being stonewalled until you've been brought back into a.... state of stability."

Samantha looked over at the doctor, despite her eyes being concealed by her hood.

"So I'm unstable?" She asked.

Dr. Munro just stared at her emotionally. "Aren't you?" She asked back.

Samantha thought about it for a moment. Then simply turned back.

"I'm glad we were at least able to get you in touch with your father." The doctor said a moment later as she walked over to the wall and prepared to open the blinds there. "And I'm glad he took it so well."

She nodded. "Thank you for that by the way."

"Of course." Dr Munro replied. "Now are you ready?"

Samantha gulped. This would be her first time talking to anyone in person besides the doctor since being brought to the hospital.

She nodded and Dr. Munro pulled the chain that withdrew the curtains.

On the other side of the window were a middle aged black man in a pair of jeans and a flannel shirt, and a scrawny young white guy that she thought might have been in high school, wearing hole-ridden jeans and a shirt that had some kind of scrabbly black band logo on it. In the corner stood a large man in a police-like outfit wearing a vest with HOSPITAL SECURITY on the front doing everything he could to look like he wasn't looking at Samantha.

Samantha Jenkins on the other hand, looked like an professional linebacker wearing their workout sweat gear. She was dressed head to toe in the largest set of black sweatpants and black hoodie that the staff could find. The hood was drawn over her face and cinched tight enough that she could only see a few inches around her new snout. Her hands were bundled into a set of leather gloves that didn't even reach her wrists, and pressed into the hoodie's belly pouch. They hadn't been able to find any shoes that fit the shape of her new feet, so they'd simply put some of the hospital's grippy socks on them instead.

"Woah." Said the young punk. "That's not intimidating at all."

Jenkins winced and withdrew even as the other man elbowed the younger one in the ribs.

"What?" He asked as he rubbed his ribs. "She looks like a freaking werewolf ninja. It's badass."

The older man simply sighed and rolled his eyes. "Good afternoon Ms. Jenkins." He said in his Hispanic accent. "Do you remember us?"

Samantha nodded. "Course I do." She said. "Hard to forget something like that." She pointed at one then the other with her gloved hand. "Wizard." She said as she pointed at him. "Bargain bin Hulk."

"Hey!" The younger man said. "If anything. Being the hulk IN REAL LIFE makes me the better hulk than any actor ever was. Also, real rich coming from a 'BARGAIN BIN' Wonder Woman." He said while making air quotes around the words.

"ANYWAYS." Said the older man. "We wanted to come see how you were doing. And the Doctor here thought that might be a good idea. Shared experience and all. I'm Damarius Laurent. This is-"

"Call me A.P." The punk said. "Real name's too long. Glad to see you up and moving and not wheeled away to some government lab."

She nodded. "Corporal Samantha Jenkins." She replied. "And same. I'm surprised none of us is being dissected after whatever that whole thing was."

A.P. shrugged. "President called it a 'magical experiment' gone wrong." He said. "Oh yeah. He totally admitted that magic is a thing now. So, that's new."

"What did he say about us?" She asked.

"Admitted we exist." Laurent said. "Hasn't said much else about it. I'm honestly surprised he even admitted that that facility you were at was messing with magic. People are calling us the first Super Heroes though."

She winced. "How do You know I worked there?" She asked.

"Well for starters you introduced yourself as CORPORAL Jenkins, and were wearing what was left of a military uniform when you turned back into a wolf that night." He said. "It makes sense that if you were turned into a wolf that you would've been coming from the place that the wolves came from." He thought for a moment. "Unless that change is crazy fast. But that's not what any of the news stations are saying."

She didn't really have a reply to that. It was pretty obvious now that she thought about it.

"Speaking of wolves." A.P. began. "Why are you and the others so different? Like... why weren't you trying to kill people like they were."

She looked at him. Her head unconsciously tilted to the side in confusion even as she felt her ear lifting up her hood. She quickly straightened her head and pressed her ear and hood down with a gloved hand.

"Others?" She asked.

Suddenly Dr. Munro's hand was on her shoulder.

"I hadn't told you yet. I wasn't going to until you were in a better state of mind." She said as Samantha turned to look at her. "But you aren't the only werewolf that turned on the others. And also, not the only one that was subsequently brought into the hospital for observation and treatment."

"There's more people like me?" She asked. Something thumped against her leg and made her sweatpants rustle. "More people going through this too?"

"Well." A.P. said. "Kinda.... I mean.... None of them were superheroes like you were." He pointed. "Also I think your tail's wagging."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zemzn3/wait_is_this_just_gate_275/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (274/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Played a weekend long Apocalypse 40k event this weekend. 4000PL per side. So I am fuckin exhausted my dudes. No energy for witty notes. Writing. Stuff happens. Enjoy.

^(INB4 y'all tell me to take my time. I did. And now here we are.)

\~

James poked lightly at the dark spot at the base of his ribs. It ached underneath, but the skin was smooth and soft, and a shade lighter than the area around it.

"Any pain?" The healer asked as they inspected the matching spot on James's back. They prodded it with their finger.

James grunted. "A bit. Like a bruise or something."

"No pain in the bones though? Not feeling anything that feels.... Loose? Or like it's moving when it shouldn't?"

James shook his head. "No. No just tender."

"How about the rest of you?" His mother asked from where she was watching nearby.

James just shook his head again. "I'm fine mom." He said. "Got my bell rung and broke a bunch of stuff. But... I'm fine." He looked over to the other bed nearby. "Hon?" He asked.

Amina winced as the healer attending her maneuvered her left arm up above her head, as if trying to high five someone. At the apex her expression soured as she strained against the torn muscles that were still healing. "I'm fine." She said.

"Debatable." The healer countered. "You've still got partially torn muscles in both shoulders and in your legs. And the only reason none of those... " They referenced the medical reports that the previous healers had left on the princess. "Bullets. Still a weird word.....Anyways the only reason they didn't kill you is because you entered a Fury-State. If it hadn't been for that, you would have ended up like all the other soldiers. That and your shield kept MOST of the damage from getting through to anything important."

The Healer gripped Amina's head and turned her head to the side and jabbed at a scar that ran just past the end of her eyebrow.

"This one right here only needed a few inches and it would have taken your bad eye." The healer continued. "But, lucky you, it was just a graze."

Amina shook the man's hand off and grunted as she stood up.

"I've had torn muscles before." She said. "Broken bones too." She pointed at the bad eye in question. "In fact I've had worse before and I didn't even get to take part in THAT fight. I'll be fine."

The healer scowled a bit. "At least return for your last few regenerative sessions and physical reconditioning checks. And don't forget to bandage before bed." He said. "No questions."

"Fine." Amina said as she slid back into her breastplate and clasped it in place.

"You're good to go Captain Choi." The young Orc healer attending to him said. "Same thing though. Last few check ups, no questions." Then the healer muttered under their breath. "^(Still don't know how you survived that though.")

James nodded as he looked over his shoulder at them in confusion. "Got it. Thanks."

With that James stood up and took Amina's hand. His mother walked beside them as they made their way down the hall.

"I'm glad you're doing better mijo." She said after a few minutes. "I was so worried when I saw them bring you in." She looked past him. "You too Amina."

"I know mom. Sorry 'bout that." He replied.

"Thank you Mrs. Choi." Amina said with a smile.

"Now. Why did you ask me to join you?" His mother asked. "I mean, I'm glad to see you two doing better. But I could do without seeing the Healing Ward for a bit."

James chuckled. His mother had basically become the go to expert when it came to treating gun shot wounds. As a result she had spent most of the past few weeks in and out of the ward in question to help with the recovering Petravian soldiers.

"Well. We've gotta go shopping today." He said.

"Oh yes." Amina said with a smile. "I've got to take you to my favorite tailor."

His mother looked at both of them with furrowed eyebrows. "Why?"

"Well." James began. "Remember how Amina and I are engaged?"

His mother's eyes widened and she smiled. "It's finally happening?"

James nodded as he felt Amina bump into him.

"Yeah we've gotten tired of emergencies and surprise attacks and things delaying it over and over. So we asked King Farrick to speed things up a bit." He pointed at a pair of castle staff members who were carrying a massive bolt of crimson and gold cloth down the hall. "Prep is underway right now. It happens in about a week and a half."

"Oh mijo!" His mother exclaimed as she wrapped him in a hug that felt like it was going to re-break a few of his bones. "I'm so excited!" Then she quickly wrapped her arms around Amina in a similar hug.

"Ow." Amina mouthed over his mother's shoulder.

James smiled.

"Okay mom. Let her breath." James said as he took his moms shoulder and guided her out of the killing embrace. "Now come on. Let's get you a wedding outfit. You'll be sitting in front of all the rich folk of the land."

"Shouldn't we bring your brother?" She asked. Then her smile faltered "Or you know.... once he's better?"

James wrapped his arm around his mom's shoulder.

"Mom, he'll be okay. He just needs a bit of time to process. And for us to help him when he's ready." He said with a smile. "Besides. I already took him to MY tailor for his wedding outfit. This is all about you."

"What?" She asked. "He already has his?"

"Been in my closet since before the whole desert thing went down." He said. "Now come on. Amina's gonna show you the good stuff when it comes to clothes. And IIIII am gonna grab the ingredients for grandma's chile verde." He said. "Gonna have to B.S. the beans though. Cause I do not recall ever seeing any since I got here." He paused in his tracks as he tried to come to terms with that sudden realization.

He turned to look at Amina.

"Hon. Does Petravus NOT have beans?" He asked, suddenly concerned.

"What are beans?" She asked in return.

Next to her Mrs. Choi's mouth dropped open as she heard the new info about the world she was now in.

\----------

"Are you ready Samantha?" Dr. Munro asked. "We can hold off if you want to."

Samantha nodded, the hood of her jacket bouncing a little as she did. Her hands clenched on the leg of her sweatpants and she could feel the nails there straining at the cloth of her gloves.

"Okay." The doctor said. "Remember; it's just the two of them and a security officer for safety reasons. No cameras or anything."

"You mean in case I hurt anyone?" Samantha asked.

Dr. Munro frowned a bit.

"In case anyone tries to hurt you." She answered. "Or in case anyone tries to get in besides Mr. Morgan or Mr. Laurent. We're still not allowing press or anyone else in yet. This is only happening because I thought it might help you. Even lawyers and government officials are being stonewalled until you've been brought back into a.... state of stability."

Samantha looked over at the doctor, despite her eyes being concealed by her hood.

"So I'm unstable?" She asked.

Dr. Munro just stared at her emotionally. "Aren't you?" She asked back.

Samantha thought about it for a moment. Then simply turned back.

"I'm glad we were at least able to get you in touch with your father." The doctor said a moment later as she walked over to the wall and prepared to open the blinds there. "And I'm glad he took it so well."

She nodded. "Thank you for that by the way."

"Of course." Dr Munro replied. "Now are you ready?"

Samantha gulped. This would be her first time talking to anyone in person besides the doctor since being brought to the hospital.

She nodded and Dr. Munro pulled the chain that withdrew the curtains.

On the other side of the window were a middle aged black man in a pair of jeans and a flannel shirt, and a scrawny young white guy that she thought might have been in high school, wearing hole-ridden jeans and a shirt that had some kind of scrabbly black band logo on it. In the corner stood a large man in a police-like outfit wearing a vest with HOSPITAL SECURITY on the front doing everything he could to look like he wasn't looking at Samantha.

Samantha Jenkins on the other hand, looked like an professional linebacker wearing their workout sweat gear. She was dressed head to toe in the largest set of black sweatpants and black hoodie that the staff could find. The hood was drawn over her face and cinched tight enough that she could only see a few inches around her new snout. Her hands were bundled into a set of leather gloves that didn't even reach her wrists, and pressed into the hoodie's belly pouch. They hadn't been able to find any shoes that fit the shape of her new feet, so they'd simply put some of the hospital's grippy socks on them instead.

"Woah." Said the young punk. "That's not intimidating at all."

Jenkins winced and withdrew even as the other man elbowed the younger one in the ribs.

"What?" He asked as he rubbed his ribs. "She looks like a freaking werewolf ninja. It's badass."

The older man simply sighed and rolled his eyes. "Good afternoon Ms. Jenkins." He said in his Hispanic accent. "Do you remember us?"

Samantha nodded. "Course I do." She said. "Hard to forget something like that." She pointed at one then the other with her gloved hand. "Wizard." She said as she pointed at him. "Bargain bin Hulk."

"Hey!" The younger man said. "If anything. Being the hulk IN REAL LIFE makes me the better hulk than any actor ever was. Also, real rich coming from a 'BARGAIN BIN' Wonder Woman." He said while making air quotes around the words.

"ANYWAYS." Said the older man. "We wanted to come see how you were doing. And the Doctor here thought that might be a good idea. Shared experience and all. I'm Damarius Laurent. This is-"

"Call me A.P." The punk said. "Real name's too long. Glad to see you up and moving and not wheeled away to some government lab."

She nodded. "Corporal Samantha Jenkins." She replied. "And same. I'm surprised none of us is being dissected after whatever that whole thing was."

A.P. shrugged. "President called it a 'magical experiment' gone wrong." He said. "Oh yeah. He totally admitted that magic is a thing now. So, that's new."

"What did he say about us?" She asked.

"Admitted we exist." Laurent said. "Hasn't said much else about it. I'm honestly surprised he even admitted that that facility you were at was messing with magic. People are calling us the first Super Heroes though."

She winced. "How do You know I worked there?" She asked.

"Well for starters you introduced yourself as CORPORAL Jenkins, and were wearing what was left of a military uniform when you turned back into a wolf that night." He said. "It makes sense that if you were turned into a wolf that you would've been coming from the place that the wolves came from." He thought for a moment. "Unless that change is crazy fast. But that's not what any of the news stations are saying."

She didn't really have a reply to that. It was pretty obvious now that she thought about it.

"Speaking of wolves." A.P. began. "Why are you and the others so different? Like... why weren't you trying to kill people like they were."

She looked at him. Her head unconsciously tilted to the side in confusion even as she felt her ear lifting up her hood. She quickly straightened her head and pressed her ear and hood down with a gloved hand.

"Others?" She asked.

Suddenly Dr. Munro's hand was on her shoulder.

"I hadn't told you yet. I wasn't going to until you were in a better state of mind." She said as Samantha turned to look at her. "But you aren't the only werewolf that turned on the others. And also, not the only one that was subsequently brought into the hospital for observation and treatment."

"There's more people like me?" She asked. Something thumped against her leg and made her sweatpants rustle. "More people going through this too?"

"Well." A.P. said. "Kinda.... I mean.... None of them were superheroes like you were." He pointed. "Also I think your tail's wagging."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zemxzb/wait_is_this_just_gate_275/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (273/?)

previous

Writer's note: Don't worry there's absolutely no foreshadowing in this chapter. None. I promise.

^(Okay. Maaaaaaybe a little.)

Enjoy.

\~

Knock! Knock! Knock!

James and Amina both groaned at the sound of their door being rapped upon repeatedly by whoever was outside of it.

Being the more recovered of the two James slowly rolled out of the bed with a cry of, "Just a minute!" before slipping into the robes that he wore during his downtime.

He looked out the window and saw that the sun was only an hour or so away from setting. The two of them had passed out almost immediately upon getting to their room and getting Amina situated in their bed. And also being cared for by a pair of healers.

James opened the door with a look of annoyance and confusion.

"Kai?" He asked. "Didn't even realize you were here in the castle." His eyes widened as he saw the elf in full for the first time since the desert. And even then he'd been only barely conscious and hadn't SEEN the elf. "What's going on?" He asked.

Kai turned his newly sightless face to face James more directly, the glittering gems of his mask glinting as they caught the sun's last few rays.

"I come to bid you both farewell." He answered. "The sun is setting on my last day here in the castle for the foreseeable future. I must return to my duties. I wanted to make sure that you were both doing well. I was pleasantly surprised to find that you were no longer in the Healing Ward."

"Based on appearances I'm surprised you weren't in one of the beds beside us." James countered. Then he remembered his manners and gestured for the Deep Dark Guardian to enter. "Please, come in."

Kai held up a hand and James watched as a pair of what looked like black widows retreated up his arm.

"I'm afraid there's not much time." He said as he gestured to the windows behind James. James remembered the elf's warning about not being able to stay out at night. "Besides I simply came to say goodbye and see to your well being. And to thank you."

James's head cocked. "Thank us?" He asked.

Kai nodded. "Indeed. You helped me find justice for the dwarves." HE took a deep breath and absently scratched at the edge of the mask. "And a bit of.... well... vengeance for the injuries I gained while helping you."

James furrowed his eyebrows.

"Last time I checked you patched my ass back together from a jigsaw puzzle." James countered. "Twice actually." He pointed a thumb over his shoulder. "And I'm guessing you helped Amina too."

Kai nodded. "She's a good match for you." He said. "She was nearly as badly injured as you were." He shrugged a bit. "Though, with significantly less internal bleeding for my spiders to-"

James cut him off with a shake of his head and a hand in the air.

"Don't.... don't mention that." James said. "Please and thank you."

Kai simply smiled. Then his face turned more serious.

"Has the King told you?" He asked.

"About?" James shot back.

Kai nodded grimly. "The armored man that stood beside their... Major." He began, and James looked at him curiously. "How he wasn't recovered after the battle despite my having subdued him. How he disappeared?"

"He did?" James asked with concern. "How?"

Kai looked around, despite no longer needing to, as if making sure nobody was around to see or hear them.

"The Agency interfered." He said softly. "They stole him right from under us while we were too busy fighting."

James felt his hairs stand on edge, and felt the fur on his left arm puff up. He also looked around, and glanced back at Amina who was staring at the door from the bed.

"King Farrick informed me of how you have clashed with them in the past." Kai added. "I thought you should know about this. Especially since the armored man is one of your world's people."

James gulped as he nodded. "Yeah. That's.... that's good to know." He replied. "I'll have to keep an eye out." He winced. "Sorry."

Kai simply chuckled once. Then held out a hand. James took the hand and shook.

"We are...." Kai began before pausing to think. "Well met. James Choi of Earth. Even if it was under ill circumstances." He said.

"Yeah man." James said. "Thank you. For... everything really. Especially the whole not-letting-me-die thing."

Kai nodded. "If you ever find yourself in the dark around Petravius. Know that you are watched and in good hands James. Though I stand by what I said about healing you anymore." He said as he turned around and began to walk away. "Until we meet again."

"Same if you ever end up needing my help." James said to the departing elf. "And also we'll see each other again in three weeks."

Kai turned around to peer at him curiously.

"When Amina and I get married. You're sitting front row with the guests of honor." James continued. "We'll make sure to cut the cake before sundown. Open bar."

Kai smiled.

"I like.... smeplie.... spice cake." Kai said hesitantly. "They're hard to get in the deep."

James smiled back. "We'll make sure to have a layer of it."

Then the two turned back and parted ways.

They can put smeplies in cake? James wondered as he closed the door. But what about the sourness? The salt?

\----------

Scout Sub-Commander Kor'Os The Unseen approached the area slowly and carefully. She hadn't earned his name by being loud and easily spotted after all. Even her tusks had been carefully stained with charcoal over the years to make them harder to spot at night.

The report given by the one armed elf had, thus far anyways, matched up with everything she'd seen.

She'd passed the horse, which had sadly perished and was being picked apart by carrion birds. She'd been happy to see that its face had made it to the grains the old elf had laid out for it. It wasn't much, but knowing the unfortunate beast had at least had a final meal had been a comfort if nothing else.

Then she'd come to the small creek that he knew from experience had originated from the lake the elf had spoken of. She'd smelled it's salty, rotten stench miles before he'd actually laid eyes upon the dried up husk of a thing. And as she'd approached it he'd seen countless birds flocking about as they had their pick of the fish that lay dead within the creek bed.

She also spotted the signs and tracks of a handful of travelers that had passed this way, and likely in the same direction he was heading. They'd clearly stopped to wonder at the small creek's dryness and death toll before crossing at the usual spot. She did the same, and hoped that whatever the elf had ACTUALLY seen didn't get these people too.

She hadn't had to worry about that it turned out.

On the sixth and, at least according to the elf's rambling, last day of the trip she found the group that had stopped at the creek.

There were only four of them. Three adults, two of whom appeared to be a couple and one other adult, either a friend or potentially an employee of some kind, and a child.

Kor'Os didn't bother approaching them stealthily. For starters she had no reason to suspect them of hostility.

But she also doubted they would have noticed her even if she'd been walking around covered in bells and whistles.

She found them standing at the edge of a small ledge that she knew from previous trips overlooked the lake in question. They stood staring out at the FORMER body of water with wide eyes and mouths agape. And as she stepped up next to them her expression matched.

The man who wasn't part of the couple glanced at her absently for a moment as they realized she was there. She noticed him glance down at the badge on her chest that was her only visible marker as a member of the Petravian Army. Then he went back to staring out at the "lake".

"Fuckin' hells." She said in amazement.

"Yeah." The man said quietly.

She looked around at the sludgy, stinking, mix of mud, silt, lake weed, fish, and whatever else was down there. She noticed what looked like slashes in some areas, as if some massive blade had torn up the ground beneath the lake, forming massive trenches seemingly at random. But the edges were too clean, and the mud around them hadn't been raised or crushed or anything to mark something passing through and disturbing it.

She thought of what the elf had described, how the end of his arm had looked with its odd, non-bleeding, open end.

She left the small party there. Telling them to turn back and head the way they'd come, Royal orders.

She had no such orders. But most people simply took that kind of thing at face value when said by a soldier of the army. Especially when those people were in the same kind of shock she was in now.

They'd probably turn back. Or at least she hoped they did.

She let out a shrill whistle that warbled for a moment. A few seconds later her crow Green-Eye, named for his eyes, landed on her shoulder. She whispered in Green-Eye's ear for a moment. Once she was done the crow tapped its beak against her head and she held up a scrap of jerky for it, which it gobbled greedily.

"Go tell the Commander and hurry back." She said. Green-Eye cawed, then took to the air.

Then she continued on toward the arboreal village that she already knew was as gone as the lake it had been next to. She'd already seen the empty space it was supposed to be in from the small ledge with the travelers. Seen, despite still lingering disbelief, all the trees that simply WEREN'T there any more.

But she needed to see the extent of whatever was happening.

After all. She thought as the dread in the pit of her stomach grew. Not much of a scout if I don't get eyes on the exact thing I was told to report on.

She made a point of ignoring how a large portion of the trees she passed seemed to be missing their upper sections. Especially since she saw no signs of the discarded treetops anywhere on the forest floor.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zdoscm/wait_is_this_just_gate_274/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (272/?)

Previous

Writer's note: Am I redeeming him? No. No I'm not. (At least not right now. IDK about later.)

But also, not every bad guy is straight 100% bad guy. AND YES.... I do mean that. Do with that info as you will.

Enjoy.

\~

James was almost glad that his mother had left the healing ward when he and the King arrived.

He didn't have any issue with her being there. But he knew she needed rest. And he also wanted to have this discussion without her for now. He wanted the marriage to have at least some surprises for her. After all, she'd been bugging him about getting married almost since he'd moved out of the house all those years ago now.

When the King had left, happy to see both of them doing better and excited to focus on something other than political disasters, James struggled his way to his feet again so he could ask the healers something.

A few minutes later he was wheeling Amina down the halls in a wheelchair, using it as a walking aid as he did.

Both of them wore ear to ear smiles as they did.

\----------

"So. Let met get this straight." Driscoll said as he looked down at the people in the dark room.

He had a feeling that the darkness in the room, and the odd shimmering in front of their faces was supposed to keep him from seeing them. But they apparently didn't know much about the tech his suit had built in. He could see each of their faces clearly.

"You want me to join you as a sort of.... advisor slash spy. You'll release me. Give me a new arm. Though I doubt it'll be up to spec. And you'll even see if you can teach me magic in my mechanical body. Though, you're doubtful on that front."

"Correct." Said the large, goat horned man in the back right seat of the room.

"And all you need me to do is eliminate Captain Choi, Princess Amina, and if possible the King? After that I can either keep working with you guys or fuck off to wherever I want?" He asked.

"In-eloquently put. But essentially. Yes." Said a tall slim woman that he couldn't tell the species of. She looked like an elf with gills.

"And what exactly do I get from joining you guys? You know. Assuming I do." He asked.

"Well." Said the group of people that harmonized together. "For starters you'll be one of the few people who will survive the destruction of this world by the entity they are calling the 'cleanser' when it inevitably defeats them."

"If it defeating them is inevitable, then why do you guys need anyone dead?" He countered. "Leave em here and let this CLEANSER do the work for you. Or just do your escape plan and leave. Either way they stop being your issue."

The people in the room looked at each other and Driscoll got the idea that they were having a conversation without actually saying anything. Or at least nothing his suit could pick up.

"We have plans in motion." Said the large goat man. "As well as contracts that we intend to honor before this world ends. We may be an organization of.... ill means. But we still have a code."

Driscoll sat motionless and silent for several seconds. He tilted his helmet a bit as he did, giving the impression of being deep in thought.

Actually he was watching footage of his old teammates. He also quickly skimmed some footage of Choi and Vickers and read some of their reports.

He hated them. These two traitors who'd gone native and turned on their own people. These two fighters who'd killed his entire team, almost by themselves. Hell, Vickers had literally dismantled Five with his own hands.

He wanted them dead. And he wanted the Princess dead too. The King? Well. He didn't really give a damn about the King one way or the other.

But at the end of the day, emotions or not, the math was simple.

The Agency wasn't the U.S.A.

And while he may have hated the traitors and the princess. He at least UNDERSTOOD their motives. He understood WHY they had approached the FOB in force and been ready for a fight. Especially with Choi and the SEAL advising them.

He pulled up one of the few images he had actually SAVED to his suits heavily encrypted memory.

A single picture of his old OLD squad back when he'd first put the suit on. Back before Five or any of the others besides Doc.

Doc was standing right next to him. Along with The Goat, who'd been dead for six years now. The original Doc, who was leading his own recovery squad back on Earth now. Nickel, who'd fallen to the very blood toxicity that had been her namesake only a year after that picture had been taken. And lastly Benny. Easily the most important person in that picture to Driscoll.

He.... didn't like to think about what had happened to Benny.

The six of them stood on top of a deep sea desalinization plant holding a New China Party flag that had been half burned away by the op they'd just run. And American flag had replaced it on the massive plexiglass structure behind them.

He stared at the flag as he thought.

"Deal." He said.

The people in the room murmured as they began smirking and grinning.

"Shake on it?" He asked. "Also, is there any paperwork we need to fill out? If so I want the new arm first."

"There are certain rituals to partake." The harmonizing group said as they and the goat person approached.

Driscoll struggled a bit as he attempted to extend his remaining hand for the gesture.

The.... hive mind.... or whatever they were, waved a hand as their eyes flared with red light, and he felt his arm being released. He extended it and the man with the goat horns shook it once. Then he extended it to the one that had released him.

His eyes lingered over the small button on his interface.

Get closer. He said.

He shook the lead person's hand and only a moment later felt his legs release too. He began walking over to where the other people were sitting and made like he was going to greet them too.

Something nagged at the back of his mind. Something he'd forgotten. It was like an itch that he couldn't quite reach.

He got near one of the tables and a large man with a scar running from his forehead down the side of his head and even down his neck stood up to shake as well. A small woman barely three feet tall stood up on her chair and tried to join.

Driscoll looked at the small button on the interface and winked at it.

The window appeared that was designed to make sure the option wasn't chosen accidentally and he clicked on the "Confirm" button.

He smiled as he knew that his suit was sending every ounce of information it had out in the strongest communication burst it could muster with energy cells that wouldn't be necessary in a moment. He waited for the heat of the thermite charges to go off before they set off the rest of the charges stored in his back.

He shook the small woman's hand right as he expected it all to go off.

Then nothing did.

He looked back, as if he might be able to see the problem with whatever was going wrong with his pack.

"Something the matter Mister Driscoll?" The harmonic people asked. "Expecting something to happen?"

He clicked on the "DET. ALL" button on his screen again. Then the confirmation button.

Still nothing happened.

He looked up and the large scarred man was smiling.

He clicked the two buttons again. Still nothing.

"What the fuck?" He asked inside his helmet.

"That won't work." The small woman said in a startlingly husky voice.

Driscoll looked at her and saw that her eyes were glowing blue.

He lashed out with his one hand and slammed it into her head. There was a sickeningly familiar crunch as her head caved in and snapped sideways.

"Ow." She said from where her mouth was resting against her shoulder. "That hurts." She said in a pouty voice.

He moved to kick her away from him. But instead his suit froze in place.

His vision blurred and changed.

And suddenly he was looking up at a ceiling that had a massive blue symbol glowing on it.

And he was looking at it with his own biological eyes. Not with the digital display of the inside of his helmet.

"Tssssk.... Tssssssk... Tssssk." Said the same harmonious voice from earlier.

The small woman with the glowing blue eyes appeared over him, looking down at him from where she stood on whatever bed or table he was being held on.

"Told you he wasn't for us." The woman said.

He tried to speak. To ask where his helmet was and how in the hell they'd gotten it off of him without his permission. But he couldn't move a muscle.

"You were right." Said the hive-mind person as they stepped up next to her and looked down at him as well. "And here we'd hoped to gain a valuable operative with weapons unlike anything seen in this world." He held up his hand and Driscoll saw the helmet in their grip.

"GGgg-gg-" He strained to speak.

"Hmmmm. He is a strong one though." The woman said.

"Yes. What a waste." The man said, his eyes still glowing red. "You know the method. Clean out his memory. Put him back in. See if we can get a bit further down the path this time." He said as he peered into the helmet and poked at one of the buttons on the screen. Not that it would do anything. It wasn't a touch screen. "At the very least get info from him."

Driscoll shook as he struggled against whatever effect they were using to restrain him.

"L-l-llet..." He spat out.

"No." Said the hive mind person.

The blue light above him flared and his vision blurred again.

\---------

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.....

\---------

Lights flash and phones and cameras and microphones are raised as President Washington stepped out from the door near the back of the small stage and walked up behind the small podium with the Presidential seal on it.

He smiled warmly and nodded to a few of the correspondents in the room. Waved at one who had been out on maternity leave for the past few months. Then he held his hands up to silence the room before straightening his tie.

"Good afternoon everyone." He greeted them with a smile. "No need for introductions I'm sure your networks and webcasts are already reminding you of who I am in little red and blue boxes right beneath me." He joked with a quick chuckle. The correspondents and reporters matched the laugh for just a moment. "I'm here to discuss the elephant in the room. Though

I suppose it would be more accurate to call it a wolf." Another small laughter break, though this one was a bit tenser.

His expression shifted and became more serious.

"Over the past few months I'm sure you have all seen videos on your phones and computers. Videos of people shooting fire and lightning from their hands. Or moving faster than people should be able to move. People finding herculean strength that couldn't even be explained by the life threatening situations they were in." He nods his head and sucks in his lips for just a second to moisten them. "And of course there is what happened just outside of Sturgis last week. Which we are still working to understand."

He takes a deep breath as he smiles somewhat awkwardly.

"My fellow Americans, it is strange times we live in. And if I had known that IIII." He gestures to himself. "Would be the one having to deal with this particular.... announcement." He shrugs. "Well, who knows? Maybe I would've waited a term to run for office."

Another brief bit of laughter as he smiles and nods.

He takes another deep breath.

"Ladies and Gentlemen of America. It is very difficult to say this but um...." He says, visibly preparing himself for what he's about to say. The recording devices in the room all move just ever so closely to the podium.

"Magic is real."

The room explodes into chaos as questions and requests for quotes and accusations begin to fly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/zb0ql0/wait_is_this_just_gate_273/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (272/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: Am I redeeming him? No. No I'm not. (At least not right now. IDK about later.)

But also, not every bad guy is straight 100% bad guy. AND YES.... I do mean that. Do with that info as you will.

Enjoy.

\~

James was almost glad that his mother had left the healing ward when he and the King arrived.

He didn't have any issue with her being there. But he knew she needed rest. And he also wanted to have this discussion without her for now. He wanted the marriage to have at least some surprises for her. After all, she'd been bugging him about getting married almost since he'd moved out of the house all those years ago now.

When the King had left, happy to see both of them doing better and excited to focus on something other than political disasters, James struggled his way to his feet again so he could ask the healers something.

A few minutes later he was wheeling Amina down the halls in a wheelchair, using it as a walking aid as he did.

Both of them wore ear to ear smiles as they did.

\--------------------------------

"So. Let met get this straight." Driscoll said as he looked down at the people in the dark room.

He had a feeling that the darkness in the room, and the odd shimmering in front of their faces was supposed to keep him from seeing them. But they apparently didn't know much about the tech his suit had built in. He could see each of their faces clearly.

"You want me to join you as a sort of.... advisor slash spy. You'll release me. Give me a new arm. Though I doubt it'll be up to spec. And you'll even see if you can teach me magic in my mechanical body. Though, you're doubtful on that front."

"Correct." Said the large, goat horned man in the back right seat of the room.

"And all you need me to do is eliminate Captain Choi, Princess Amina, and if possible the King? After that I can either keep working with you guys or fuck off to wherever I want?" He asked.

"In-eloquently put. But essentially. Yes." Said a tall slim woman that he couldn't tell the species of. She looked like an elf with gills.

"And what exactly do I get from joining you guys? You know. Assuming I do." He asked.

"Well." Said the group of people that harmonized together. "For starters you'll be one of the few people who will survive the destruction of this world by the entity they are calling the 'cleanser' when it inevitably defeats them."

"If it defeating them is inevitable, then why do you guys need anyone dead?" He countered. "Leave em here and let this CLEANSER do the work for you. Or just do your escape plan and leave. Either way they stop being your issue."

The people in the room looked at each other and Driscoll got the idea that they were having a conversation without actually saying anything. Or at least nothing his suit could pick up.

"We have plans in motion." Said the large goat man. "As well as contracts that we intend to honor before this world ends. We may be an organization of.... ill means. But we still have a code."

Driscoll sat motionless and silent for several seconds. He tilted his helmet a bit as he did, giving the impression of being deep in thought.

Actually he was watching footage of his old teammates. He also quickly skimmed some footage of Choi and Vickers and read some of their reports.

He hated them. These two traitors who'd gone native and turned on their own people. These two fighters who'd killed his entire team, almost by themselves. Hell, Vickers had literally dismantled Five with his own hands.

He wanted them dead. And he wanted the Princess dead too. The King? Well. He didn't really give a damn about the King one way or the other.

But at the end of the day, emotions or not, the math was simple.

The Agency wasn't the U.S.A.

And while he may have hated the traitors and the princess. He at least UNDERSTOOD their motives. He understood WHY they had approached the FOB in force and been ready for a fight. Especially with Choi and the SEAL advising them.

He pulled up one of the few images he had actually SAVED to his suits heavily encrypted memory.

A single picture of his old OLD squad back when he'd first put the suit on. Back before Five or any of the others besides Doc.

Doc was standing right next to him. Along with The Goat, who'd been dead for six years now. The original Doc, who was leading his own recovery squad back on Earth now. Nickel, who'd fallen to the very blood toxicity that had been her namesake only a year after that picture had been taken. And lastly Benny. Easily the most important person in that picture to Driscoll.

He.... didn't like to think about what had happened to Benny.

The six of them stood on top of a deep sea desalinization plant holding a New China Party flag that had been half burned away by the op they'd just run. And American flag had replaced it on the massive plexiglass structure behind them.

He stared at the flag as he thought.

"Deal." He said.

The people in the room murmured as they began smirking and grinning.

"Shake on it?" He asked. "Also, is there any paperwork we need to fill out? If so I want the new arm first."

"There are certain rituals to partake." The harmonizing group said as they and the goat person approached.

Driscoll struggled a bit as he attempted to extend his remaining hand for the gesture.

The.... hive mind.... or whatever they were, waved a hand as their eyes flared with red light, and he felt his arm being released. He extended it and the man with the goat horns shook it once. Then he extended it to the one that had released him.

His eyes lingered over the small button on his interface.

Get closer. He said.

He shook the lead person's hand and only a moment later felt his legs release too. He began walking over to where the other people were sitting and made like he was going to greet them too.

Something nagged at the back of his mind. Something he'd forgotten. It was like an itch that he couldn't quite reach.

He got near one of the tables and a large man with a scar running from his forehead down the side of his head and even down his neck stood up to shake as well. A small woman barely three feet tall stood up on her chair and tried to join.

Driscoll looked at the small button on the interface and winked at it.

The window appeared that was designed to make sure the option wasn't chosen accidentally and he clicked on the "Confirm" button.

He smiled as he knew that his suit was sending every ounce of information it had out in the strongest communication burst it could muster with energy cells that wouldn't be necessary in a moment. He waited for the heat of the thermite charges to go off before they set off the rest of the charges stored in his back.

He shook the small woman's hand right as he expected it all to go off.

Then nothing did.

He looked back, as if he might be able to see the problem with whatever was going wrong with his pack.

"Something the matter Mister Driscoll?" The harmonic people asked. "Expecting something to happen?"

He clicked on the "DET. ALL" button on his screen again. Then the confirmation button.

Still nothing happened.

He looked up and the large scarred man was smiling.

He clicked the two buttons again. Still nothing.

"What the fuck?" He asked inside his helmet.

"That won't work." The small woman said in a startlingly husky voice.

Driscoll looked at her and saw that her eyes were glowing blue.

He lashed out with his one hand and slammed it into her head. There was a sickeningly familiar crunch as her head caved in and snapped sideways.

"Ow." She said from where her mouth was resting against her shoulder. "That hurts." She said in a pouty voice.

He moved to kick her away from him. But instead his suit froze in place.

His vision blurred and changed.

And suddenly he was looking up at a ceiling that had a massive blue symbol glowing on it.

And he was looking at it with his own biological eyes. Not with the digital display of the inside of his helmet.

"Tssssk.... Tsssssk... Tssssk." Said the same harmonious voice from earlier.

The small woman with the glowing blue eyes appeared over him, looking down at him from where she stood on whatever bed or table he was being held on.

"Told you he wasn't for us." The woman said.

He tried to speak. To ask where his helmet was and how in the hell they'd gotten it off of him without his permission. But he couldn't move a muscle.

"You were right." Said the hive-mind person as they stepped up next to her and looked down at him as well. "And here we'd hoped to gain a valuable operative with weapons unlike anything seen in this world." He held up his hand and Driscoll saw the helmet in their grip.

"GGgg-gg-" He strained to speak.

"Hmmmm. He is a strong one though." The woman said.

"Yes. What a waste." The man said, his eyes still glowing red. "You know the method. Clean out his memory. Put him back in. See if we can get a bit further down the path this time." He said as he peered into the helmet and poked at one of the buttons on the screen. Not that it would do anything. It wasn't a touch screen. "At the very least get info from him."

Driscoll shook as he struggled against whatever effect they were using to restrain him.

"L-l-llet..." He spat out.

"No." Said the hive mind person.

The blue light above him flared and his vision blurred again.

\---

Despite having a chronometer built into his suit that was accurate down to a one hundredth of a second, Driscoll didn't know how long he had been in the small room. The time display on his HUD seemed to speed and slow at random intervals that he hadn't been able to parse just yet. Part of him wondered if it was just his perception that had changed it. But no, the timestamps on his recording feeds didn't match up either.....

\---

Lights flash and phones and cameras and microphones are raised as President Washington stepped out from the door near the back of the small stage and walked up behind the small podium with the Presidential seal on it.

He smiled warmly and nodded to a few of the correspondents in the room. Waved at one who had been out on maternity leave for the past few months. Then he held his hands up to silence the room before straightening his tie.

"Good afternoon everyone." He greeted them with a smile. "No need for introductions I'm sure your networks and webcasts are already reminding you of who I am in little red and blue boxes right beneath me." He joked with a quick chuckle. The correspondents and reporters matched the laugh for just a moment. "I'm here to discuss the elephant in the room. Though I suppose it would be more accurate to call it a wolf." Another small laughter break, though this one was a bit tenser.

His expression shifted and became more serious.

"Over the past few months I'm sure you have all seen videos on your phones and computers. Videos of people shooting fire and lightning from their hands. Or moving faster than people should be able to move. People finding herculean strength that couldn't even be explained by the life threatening situations they were in." He nods his head and sucks in his lips for just a second to moisten them. "And of course there is what happened just outside of Sturgis last week. Which we are still working to understand."

He takes a deep breath as he smiles somewhat awkwardly.

"My fellow Americans, it is strange times we live in. And if I had known that IIII." He gestures to himself. "Would be the one having to deal with this particular.... announcement." He shrugs. "Well, who knows? Maybe I would've waited a term to run for office."

Another brief bit of laughter as he smiles and nods.

He takes another deep breath.

"Ladies and Gentlemen of America. It is very difficult to say this but um...." He says, visibly preparing himself for what he's about to say. The recording devices in the room all move just ever so closely to the podium.

"Magic is real."

The room explodes into chaos as questions and requests for quotes and accusations begin to fly.

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/HFY/comments/zb0oi5/wait_is_this_just_gate_273/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (271/?)

Previous

Writer's note: MULTIPLE FORMS OF HEALING ENGAGED!

Also. I want you to picture the doctor as Chrisjen Avaserala/Shorhreh Agdashloo.

Enjoy.

\~

James was about halfway back to the healing ward when he came across the POW's from Earth.

He'd been slowly making his way down the hall, taking breaks every few minutes and leaning on any support he could along the way, when the line of soldiers, scientists, and technicians went clanking past. A cadre of Petravian guards escorted them, truncheons and crossbows ready should any of them attempt anything.

He paused and took a seated position on the edge of a plinth for a statue of some kind of dragon-man thing as he watched them pass by. The civilians looked at him warily, stealing glances from time to time, or nodding their head in passive greeting as they walked, their shackles clanking at ankle and wrist.

The soldiers were a different story. Most of them avoided looking at him entirely, making a point of looking anywhere but at James. And the handful that didn't looked at him with scorn and malice in their eyes. James sighed deeply and avoided their eyes as they did. He understood why they were angry with him. Hell, he would have been acting pretty similarly if he'd been in their shoes.

The Major was of the latter group, staring at him with a clenched jaw even as the guards practically shoved her along down the hall.

But the First Sergeant stopped for a moment as neared James's position. He didn't avoid James's gaze, nor did he show any aggression toward him. Instead he looked almost sorrowful as the guards ushered him on.

"Do we know each other First Sergeant?" James asked as Nguyen hobbled along, his gait limited by the chains. "Why do I feel like I know you?"

"Not First Sergeant anymore I don't think." Nguyen said as he turned around and awkwardly walked backwards. "And you really don't remember me zero three nine?" He asked as he walked through the door to the next hall and out of sight.

James stood up in surprise, not entirely oblivious to the pain this caused him.

"Senior Drill Sergeant?" He asked.

"Captain Choi?" A familiar voice asked from behind him. James glanced back and saw the King walking down the hall from where all the prisoners had come from. But he almost immediately turned back to look at the door still echoed with the slowly fading sounds of chained feet and arms.

"Your majesty." He greeted back quietly.

"What are you doing out here lad?" The King asked curiously as he got near. "Should be in bed healing."

James looked back at him as he settled the crutch back under his arm.

"Yeah. Just uh...." He glanced back at the door. "Just had to check in on my brother. He's uh.... He's struggling with what happened a bit." He said as he recommenced his slow walk.

King Farrick took his off hand and helped support him, walking the same direction as he did.

"I heard what happened." The King said with sorrow. "A lot for a young man to go through unexpectedly. How is he?"

James nodded thanks for the helping hand. "Not good." He admitted. "Like you said. It was a lot for him. But I... I think I got him back on his feet. Up to him to walk or run." He looked over. "Where are you heading sir? Don't wanna take you on too long of a detour. I can only imagine how much you need to deal with considering what's happened."

King Farrick nodded grimly. "That's alright. I was actually heading to the same place I imagine you are. Wanted to check on my daughter. Make sure she's doing alright. Besides, I've done just about all I can for today. At least as far as this current debacle is concerned." He squeezed James's arm slightly. "How is Amina?"

James smiled. "Itching to get released from the healing ward. Same as me." He said. "That actually reminds me. She and I kind of wanted to um.... accelerate things... in regards to the wedding."

The King arched an eyebrow. "Oh?" He wondered.

"Yeah." James replied. "But lets talk about that once I'm off of these probably still broken legs."

King Farrick simply nodded and continued guiding James forward.

\------------------------------

"Corporal Jenkins?" A soft voice asked.

Jenkins slowly swam back into consciousness. "Hmm?"

"Corporal Jenkins are you awake?"

"Mmmmm.... yeah?" She said uncertainly. "Whe....where am I?"

"You're in a hospital." The soft voice answered. "I'm doctor Janessa Munro. I've been asked to speak to you."

"Hospital?" She wondered. "Cause I was hurt."

"That was part of it. Yes." Doctor Munro replied. "But also because of the change you underwent. Multiple... changes really. But one more-so than the other."

"Changes?" Her face scrunched up as that reminded her of something. Wait. Why couldn't she see? "I.... I changed." She said. "I became... I am... a monster." She said. She could feel tears streaming down her face. A face that was too long now. And the tears didn't fall on open skin. But on fur. "Why can't I see?" She asked. Her mind was clearing rapidly. "Why can't I move?" She asked as she struggled against some kind of firmly pressed blanket.

"We've restrained you for now. We don't want you accidentally hurting anyone. Yourself included." The doctor answered. "As for your eyes, I can uncover them. But I need you to remain calm if I do. Okay?"

Jenkins felt herself beginning to hyperventilate. But her breaths were deeper than they had been before.... before she'd been changed. They rumbled with each deep inhale, and hissed out of her nostrils with each exhale.

"Not okay." She said between breaths. "Not okay. I'm not supposed to be like this." She struggled a bit more. "I'm a person. Not supposed to be a monster."

Suddenly she felt a small, soft, hand gently rest on her forearm.

"Samantha." The doctor said just as gently. "You're right. You're not supposed to be like this."

The sudden agreement from the doctor made her stop her struggling for a moment as she felt the hand rest there. She turned her head to look at where the hand was despite not being able to see it.

"We're going to try to get you back the way you were by any means necessary Corporal. We really are. But until then we need you to be able to cooperate with us. And part of that is coming to terms with what has happened." The doctor said softly. "I know it's difficult. And likely terrifying. But we're here to help okay?"

Jenkins gulped as she tried to get her breathing back under control. She nodded once, quickly.

"Okay." Doctor Munro said. "I'm going to take the blindfold off. There's a mirror above you. I need you to look at it for as long as you can. But I can take the mirror away, or cover your eyes again if you want. Just let me know. Alright?"

She nodded again. "Just not the blindfold. Don't make me blind again. Please."

"Okay." The doctor said as she took her hand from Jenkins' arm. "I'm taking the blindfold off now. Try to stay calm.

Jenkins felt the doctor's hands moving at the back of her head. A moment later the cloth over her eyes loosened and pulled away. She winced at the sudden light.

When they opened the sight in front of her caused her to begin hyperventilating again.

Her eyes locked on the bright orange, slightly reflective, eyes in the massive mirror in front of her. The eyes surrounded by dark brown, almost black fur. That sat just above a fanged snout and just below a set of pointed, slightly tufted ears that rotated to and fro seemingly at random.

She locked eyes with the mirror image of herself and felt a primal, instinctive, need to maintain that eye contact until the other her backed down. Even as she felt dread, disgust, and anger at the fact that that WASN'T supposed to be her.

She strained at the blue plastic wrapped blanket restraint that covered the rest of her body and kept her pressed to the medical bed. But it was unyielding.

"Corporal Jenkins?" The Doctor asked from where she was standing next to the bed. "Samantha?"

"Take it away." She hissed through her bared fangs. The bared fangs that made her subconsciously puff her fur up in the mirror. "Take it away!" She yelled. "TAKE IT AWAY!"

The doctors hands reached up and spun the mirror around on its gimbal. Despite the logical part of her mind knowing better, she became relieved and just a little bit proud of the fact that the OTHER wolf had backed down first.

She felt tension release from her joints and muscles as she slowly sank back down. She hadn't even realized that she'd arched up toward the mirror.

Her breathing slowed as she began to look around.

She'd expected to see a series of tools and equipment. Needles and saws and scalpels and things that might be used to dissect her and analyze her new form.

Instead she simply saw an vitals machine, with a few lines leading under her restraint blanket, and a crash cart. Other than that the room was sparse, with a few chairs and a surveillance camera up in the corner of the ceiling.

She looked at the Doctor and saw a small, grey haired, woman of middle eastern complexion.

She had a kind face that bore a sad expression as she looked at Jenkins.

"Are you okay?" Doctor Munro asked.

Jenkins looked up at the back of the mirror. Her breathing quickened a little bit and she felt more tears forming on her eyes.

"No." She said softly. "What's happened to me?"

Suddenly she felt that small hand on her arm again. She looked down at the doctor, who was wearing a pained smile.

"That's part of what we're trying to figure out ." The doctor said. "And I'm here to help you through the process of learning about it. We're going to try to cure you and make you.... well... you... again. But in the meantime we need to learn what we can about this. And until we discover a cure I'm going to help you come to terms with your new body. Will you let me do that?"

Jenkins looked down at her with teary eyes.

"You'll cure me?" She asked.

Doctor Munro shook her head, causing a bit of panic to form in her mind.

"Not me personally no. I'm just a psychiatrist. But the doctors here will do everything they can. Yes." She said with a smile.

She looked around again. Then she nodded.

"Please help me." She said as she began to cry in earnest. "I don't want to be this."

The doctor pressed a tissue to her eyes, where it had come from she didn't know, and wiped the tears away.

"I will." Doctor Munro said as she balled up the tissue and tossed it away.

"And please wear less perfume next time." Jenkins added with a sniffle. "My nose is really strong now."

Doctor Munro chuckled. "Sorry." She said. "I'll keep that in mind. Now, besides a cure for.... I don't know what they're officially calling this yet... Do you need anything?"

Jenkins looked at her.

"Can I call my Dad?" She asked. "He's probably worried about me."

Doctor Munro smiled again. "That shouldn't be too hard to arrange."

[\[Next\]](https://www.reddit.com/r/GATEhouse/comments/za0xl9/wait_is_this_just_gate_272/)

Wait, is this just GATE? (271/?)

Previous /
First

Writer's note: MULTIPLE FORMS OF HEALING ENGAGED!

Also. I want you to picture the doctor as Chrisjen Avaserala/Shorhreh Agdashloo.

Enjoy.

\~

James was about halfway back to the healing ward when he came across the POW's from Earth.

He'd been slowly making his way down the hall, taking breaks every few minutes and leaning on any support he could along the way, when the line of soldiers, scientists, and technicians went clanking past. A cadre of Petravian guards escorted them, truncheons and crossbows ready should any of them attempt anything.

He paused and took a seated position on the edge of a plinth for a statue of some kind of dragon-man thing as he watched them pass by. The civilians looked at him warily, stealing glances from time to time, or nodding their head in passive greeting as they walked, their shackles clanking at ankle and wrist.

The soldiers were a different story. Most of them avoided looking at him entirely, making a point of looking anywhere but at James. And the handful that didn't looked at him with scorn and malice in their eyes. James sighed deeply and avoided their eyes as they did. He understood why they were angry with him. Hell, he would have been acting pretty similarly if he'd been in their shoes.

The Major was of the latter group, staring at him with a clenched jaw even as the guards practically shoved her along down the hall.

But the First Sergeant stopped for a moment as neared James's position. He didn't avoid James's gaze, nor did he show any aggression toward him. Instead he looked almost sorrowful as the guards ushered him on.

"Do we know each other First Sergeant?" James asked as Nguyen hobbled along, his gait limited by the chains. "Why do I feel like I know you?"

"Not First Sergeant anymore I don't think." Nguyen said as he turned around and awkwardly walked backwards. "And you really don't remember me zero three nine?" He asked as he walked through the door to the next hall and out of sight.

James stood up in surprise, not entirely oblivious to the pain this caused him.

"Senior Drill Sergeant?" He asked.

"Captain Choi?" A familiar voice asked from behind him. James glanced back and saw the King walking down the hall from where all the prisoners had come from. But he almost immediately turned back to look at the door still echoed with the slowly fading sounds of chained feet and arms.

"Your majesty." He greeted back quietly.

"What are you doing out here lad?" The King asked curiously as he got near. "Should be in bed healing."

James looked back at him as he settled the crutch back under his arm.

"Yeah. Just uh...." He glanced back at the door. "Just had to check in on my brother. He's uh.... He's struggling with what happened a bit." He said as he recommenced his slow walk.

King Farrick took his arm and helped support him, walking the same direction as he did.

"I heard what happened." The King said with sorrow. "A lot for a young man to go through unexpectedly. How is he?"

James nodded thanks for the helping hand. "Not good." He admitted. "Like you said. It was a lot for him. But I... I think I got him back on his feet. Up to him to walk or run." He looked over. "Where are you heading sir? Don't wanna take you on too long of a detour. I can only imagine how much you need to deal with considering what's happened."

King Farrick nodded grimly. "That's alright. I was actually heading to the same place I imagine you are. Wanted to check on my daughter. Make sure she's doing alright. Besides, I've done just about all I can for today. At least as far as this current debacle is concerned." He squeezed James's arm slightly. "How is Amina?"

James smiled. "Itching to get released from the healing ward. Same as me." He said. "That actually reminds me. She and I kind of wanted to um.... accelerate things... in regards to the wedding."

The King arched an eyebrow. "Oh?" He wondered.

"Yeah." James replied. "But lets talk about that once I'm off of these probably still broken legs."

King Farrick simply nodded and continued guiding James forward.

\--------------------------------

"Corporal Jenkins?" A soft voice asked.

Jenkins slowly swam back into consciousness. "Hmm?"

"Corporal Jenkins are you awake?"

"Mmmmm.... yeah?" She said uncertainly. "Whe....where am I?"

"You're in a hospital." The soft voice answered. "I'm doctor Janessa Munro. I've been asked to speak to you."

"Hospital?" She wondered. "Cause I was hurt."

"That was part of it. Yes." Doctor Munro replied. "But also because of the change you underwent. Multiple... changes really. But one more-so than the other."

"Changes?" Her face scrunched up as that reminded her of something. Wait. Why couldn't she see? "I.... I changed." She said. "I became... I am... a monster." She said. She could feel tears streaming down her face. A face that was too long now. And the tears didn't fall on open skin. But on fur. "Why can't I see?" She asked. Her mind was clearing rapidly. "Why can't I move?" She asked as she struggled against some kind of firmly pressed blanket.

"We've restrained you for now. We don't want you accidentally hurting anyone. Yourself included." The doctor answered. "As for your eyes, I can uncover them. But I need you to remain calm if I do. Okay?"

Jenkins felt herself beginning to hyperventilate. But her breaths were deeper than they had been before.... before she'd been changed. They rumbled with each deep inhale, and hissed out of her nostrils with each exhale.

"Not okay." She said between breaths. "Not okay. I'm not supposed to be like this." She struggled a bit more. "I'm a person. Not supposed to be a monster."

Suddenly she felt a small, soft, hand gently rest on her forearm.

"Samantha." The doctor said just as gently. "You're right. You're not supposed to be like this."

The sudden agreement from the doctor made her stop her struggling for a moment as she felt the hand rest there. She turned her head to look at where the hand was despite not being able to see it.

"We're going to try to get you back the way you were by any means necessary Corporal. We really are. But until then we need you to be able to cooperate with us. And part of that is coming to terms with what has happened." The doctor said softly. "I know it's difficult. And likely terrifying. But we're here to help okay?"

Jenkins gulped as she tried to get her breathing back under control. She nodded once, quickly.

